d In the 84th year of the Hejra, or of the Christian æra 703, according to Theophanes and Cedrenus, the Khalif sent Azib, or Azid, one of the Moslem commanders, with an army into Cilicia, in order to make himself master of that country. Meeting with no enemy at first to oppose him, he laid siege to Sisium; took it, and levelled it with the ground. But Heraclius, the imperial general, soon after appearing at the head of the Christian forces, brought him to a general action; in which he cut off 12,000 of the Arabs, and probably defeated Azib; tho' this has not been expressly asserted by any of the Greek historians. As we hear no more of Azib after this action, we may naturally suppose, that he soon abandoned Cilicia, and retired with the shatter'd remains of his army into the Khalif's dominions<sup>3</sup>.

e THE following year, being the 85th year of the Hejra, and of CHRIST 704, if we will believe Theophanes, the Khalif Abd'almâlec Ebn Merwân departed this life. Some other Christian writers affirm, that he died the preceding year. But none of them, in this point, are to be depended upon, as running counter to the express testimony of the best and most authentic Moslem historians. The Arabs seem to have enjoyed this year an uninterrupted repose, as no account of any achievements, or military operations, performed by them in it has been handed down to us by any of the Greek or Moslem writers<sup>4</sup>.

f THE next year, the 86th of the Hejra, and of CHRIST 705, Abd'alaziz Ebn Merwân, the Khalif's brother, died at Al Fostât in Egypt, and was buried there on Monday, the 12th day of the former Jomâda. He governed Egypt above twenty years, having been constituted lieutenant of that country by his father Merwân. Being infected with the leprosy, the physicians advised him to retire to Holwân, as the most proper place for him to reside in. Here he made a large fish-pond, or reservoir, which he took care to supply constantly with water from the springs, or fountains, on mount Al Mokattam, by means of certain arches, or vaults, which he caused to be built, that kept open a communication between them; upon which, according to Eutychius, he erected a throne of glass. Upon these and other works at Holwân, where he first planted dates, he is said to have laid out 1,000,000 dinârs. He rode every Thursday from Holwân to Al Fostât; and the next day, after the morning prayer was over, returned to the former place. He likewise built a Mikeas, or measuring pillar, in order to form an estimate of the increase of the Nile. His two chamberlains were Christians of the Melchite sect, whom he gave leave to erect the church of St. John at Holwân, death, and character.

for those of their own communion. He likewise obliged the Egyptians to pay part of their tribute every Friday, that he might be the better enabled to supply the exigencies of the state, till the death of Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, and the perfect settlement of his brother upon the Moslem throne. He constructed a bridge upon the Khalij Amir Al Mumenin, or the river of the emperor of the faithful, the Amnis Trajanus of the antients, and the Khalis of the moderns; and had an intention to remove the bridge at Al Fostât to Holwân, a pleasant village about two parasangs distant from that city, on the eastern bank of the Nile. He likewise designed to transfer the port, the merchants, and the exchange, from Al Fostât to Holwân; but did not live long enough to put this design in execution. One Athanasius, a Christian of the Jacobite persuasion, was his secretary, whom he permitted to build the church of St. George in Kasril Shamaa, and that of Abukir in the citadel near Asbabol Rabiât.
 We are told by some of the Christian writers, that he was the first who fixed upon the Egyptian monks a capitation, obliging every one of them to pay annually a dinâr. An author cited by Al Makin relates, that Abd'alaziz, entering into a monastery at Holwân the day before his death, saw there an image of the virgin Mary with CHRIST in her arms; which he spat upon; and that the night following our Saviour appeared to him in a dream, commanding him to be killed; upon which, he imagined himself to be immediately run through with a lance. This struck him with such terror that he instantly awaked, and expired the same night. His son, according to the same author, survived him only forty days. After Abd'alaziz's death, the Khalif conferred the government of Egypt upon his son Abd'allah, who rendered himself more disagreeable to the Egyptians than any of his predecessors. In this post he continued till his father Abd'almâlec's death, which happened about the middle of the month Shawâl, in the 86th year of the Hejra. The disease he died of seems to have been a dropsy, since the physicians had absolutely prohibited him the use of all kinds of liquors. Notwithstanding which, being tortured with extreme thirst, he commanded his son Al Walid to give him some water to drink; which he refusing to do, he ordered his daughter Fâtema to bring some to him. But Al Walid, desirous of keeping his father alive as long as possible, would not suffer her to approach him; which so exasperated the Khalif, that he threatened to disinherit him. Fâtema, therefore, gave him water, which he greedily drank, and soon after expired. He was always apprehensive that the month Ramadân would prove fatal to him; as he was born, weaned, learned the Korân by heart, and was saluted Khalif in that month. He sat upon the Moslem throne above twenty-one years; and was either sixty or sixty-two, or, as others say, fifty-seven years old at the time of his death. He was buried at Damascus, without the little gate, and his son Al Walid said the funeral service at the time of his interment. As to his person, Abd'almâlec was of a middle stature, and a fair, or, as others will have it, a swarthy complexion; having a large gaping mouth, a long beard, and a prominent belly. With regard to his disposition, he was so extremely covetous, that some of his subjects, by way of derision, called him the sweat of a stone. However, according to Abu'lfeda, as well as the authors followed by Al Makin, he was a man of a very good capacity, being exceeded by few of his subjects in judgment and penetration. He was also courageous, learned, and wise; but did not make so amiable a figure after his elevation to the Khalifat as before. He had such stinking breath, that the flies lighting on his lips were almost instantly struck dead with it; for which reason he received from some the appellation of father of flies. He one night dreamed, that he made water in the most sacred part of the temple of Mecca; and this dream was repeated four times successively; which greatly affecting him, he consulted Sa'id Ebn Mosabbib, a person very expert in the interpretation of dreams, about the signification of so ominous a vision. Sa'id told him, that he had no reason to look upon it in so disagreeable a light, as it undoubtedly portended the exaltation of four of his sons, all of whom should be advanced to the Khalifat after their father's death. Which nocturnal prediction was exactly verified, Al Walid, Soliman, Yezid, and Heshâm, four of his sons, afterwards actually ascended the Moslem throne. He left sixteen sons behind him, the eldest of which was Al Walid, who succeeded him. His first secretary was Rûb Ebn Riba', and his second Kabida Ebn Dawib; his principal Kadi, or judge, Ebn Idris Al Holwâni, who was succeeded by Abd'allah Ebn Kais; his chamberlain Yusef, who was likewise succeeded by several others of his servants, one of whom was Abu'l Rogairaga; the first captain of his guards Yezid Ebn Abu Habsa Al Sakfâki, and the second Abd'allah Ebn Yezid Al Hakemi. The inscription of his seal was, I believe in God our Saviour. He was much more powerful than any of his predecessors; having subdued Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, and annexed Arabia to his dominions; reduced to his obedience the sectaries of all denominations that appeared in arms against him; conquered India, or at least a considerable part of that vast region in the east; and, in the west, penetrated with his victorious troops as far as Spain. The first day of his reign was Wednesday, and the last Thursday. He was so implacable an enemy to the house of Ali, that

S E C T. XII.

- b AL WALID, the son of Abd'almâlec, was proclaimed Khalîf the same day his father died. His mother was Walada, the daughter of Abbâs Ebn Harbi Ebn Hâreth. He was surnamed Abu'l Abbâs, and continued all his father's lieutenants of provinces in their respective governments. At his inauguration, his principal subjects took the usual oath of allegiance to him. Korrah Ebn Shebal, or, according to others, Korrah Ebn Sharik, of the house of Abbâs, his governor of Egypt, at the Khalîf's command, demolished the principal mosque at Mesr, and either built or beautified another, deaurating the tops or heads of its pillars; which rendered that governor extremely disagreeable to the Egyptians. Al Walid also is said to have adorned the temple at Jerusalem with some additional buildings; soon after his accession; and, after the example of his father Abd'almâlec, to have ordered his subjects to go on pilgrimage thither. His troops made a very successful irruption into the imperial territories; under the command of his brother Moslem Ebn Abd'almâlec, who carried off a very considerable number of the emperor's subjects prisoners. This Arab general seems to have been called by Theophanes Masalmas. That writer places the expedition here hinted at in the fourth year of Al Walid's reign. In the 88th year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 707, money was coined in the new mint lately erected at Wâset; as appears from a dirhém explained by the learned Dr. Hunt, and now preserved in the cabinet of medals belonging to the university of Oxford <sup>c</sup>.

- ABOUT the same time, or rather in the very same year, according to the author of Leb Tarikh and Khondemir, this Khalîf rebuilt the temple of Medina, where Mohammed and the first Khalîfs lay interred. This was a much more superb and magnificent structure than the former; and, in order to render it the more grand, Al Walid commanded Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz, his governor in Arabia, to demolish the houses set apart for the habitations of the prophet's wives. This gave great offence to the inhabitants of Medina; who reproached the Khalîf with having deprived the Moslems, coming thither from different parts of the world, of the finest monument of Mohammed's modesty, in having assigned his wives, for their habitations, such low and small cottages as those, that then remained. About this time, Walid also ordered the construction of a most stately and famous mosque at Damascus; to which he joined the superb church of St. John Baptist, that had been enriched with many invaluable ornaments by the Greek emperors, for several ages. He would first have purchased this church of the Christians for a sum of money, with which they might have built them a church in some other part of the city, amounting to about 40,000 dinârs. But they shewing him the instrument signed by Khâled Ebn Al Walid, confirming to them the possession of that church, and refusing to part with it at any rate, he took it from them by force. He employed 12,000 workmen in the erection of his mosque, but did not live to see it finished; the last hand having not been put to it before the beginning of his brother Soliman's reign. This year Katiba Ebn Moslem penetrated into the Transoxanian provinces; and having passed the Jihân, or the Oxus, without any loss, defeated a numerous army that had kept him blocked up for four months together, and reduced him to very great straits. That army was composed of Turks and Tartars, of whom Khatiba slew a very great number. After this victory he laid siege to Bokhâra, the metropolis of Bukharia properly so called, and took it. From thence he marched to Samarkand, which in a short time surrendered to him. In fine, he reduced Sogd, or Sogdiana, Bagrafa, Shâsh, Fargâna, and the whole immense tract going under the name of Mawara'nahr. After he had concluded a peace with, or rather conquered, the Khân of Khovarazm, he erected a mosque in his capital; where he officiated every Friday, and destroyed all the idols he met with in that city. These idols were fixed to the places where they stood by golden nails, that weighed 50,000 Methkals, or Arabic drachms; all which Khatiba carried off with him. The principal article of the treaty concluded with the Khân of Khovarazm was, that he should pay an annual tribute of 2,000,000 dinârs to the Khalîf. Mohammed Ebn Kasem Al Thakifi, another of Al Walid's generals, at or near the same time, also invaded India, or Al Hind, and subjugated a considerable part of that country. He likewise made himself master of the kingdom of Sindia, or Al Sind,<sup>a</sup> bounded by Kermân, or rather the region of Makran, the desert of Sijistân, and Indiâ, some parts of which vast continent it likewise comprehends, whose king Dabar he defeated, killed him in battle, and cut off his head. The Greek writers mention few particulars relating to the Moslem affairs, during the three first years of Al Walid's reign. However, Theophanes observes, that he mounted the Moslem throne the same year his father Abd'almâlec died; and that he deprived the Christians of their great church at Damascus, in his second year. We are told by an eastern writer, that a dreadful pestilence raged about two years before this time in Mesopotamia, and made terrible havock in the territory of Sarug; no less than seventy-two persons dying in the monastery of St. Silas there<sup>p</sup>.

The building of the mosque at

THE following year, being the 89th of the Hejra, and of CHRIST 708, no remarkable<sup>b</sup> occurrences happened in the Moslem empire, an account of which has been handed down to us by any historian, except the continuation of the building of Al Walid's famous mosque at Damascus; the expence of which is said to have amounted to 400 chests, or purses, every one of which contained 14,000 dinârs. The golden chains for the lamps there, in number 600, were so bright, says an Arab author, that they disturbed, or rather hindered, the devotions of the Moslems who came thither to pray. They were afterwards blackened by the smoke of the lamps, and remained in that condition till they were removed into the public treasury by Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz, who substituted iron chains in their room. One of the historians followed by Al Makin relates, that when the workmen were digging for the foundations of this mosque, they found a stone with an inscription upon it, importing, that<sup>c</sup> the temple, or edifice, to which it belonged, was built by Mahab Al Khair, in the fourth year of Al Astowâna. This year, Theodorus was constituted patriarch of Jerusalem, and lived, after his promotion to that high dignity, thirty-five years<sup>q</sup>.

His forces
make an irruption into Cappadocia.

WE are told by Al Makin, that Al Walid appointed, Korrah Ebn Sharik governor of Egypt in the 90th year of the Hejra; though Eutychius, who, in this point, has probability on his side, seems to place that event three or four years higher, in the beginning of this Khalif's reign, as has been already observed. Be that as it will, this Korrah was most certainly a very impious and abandoned person; taking with him frequently a company of catamites, players, and buffoons, into the cathedral at Mesr, and placing them upon the seats belonging to the priests, in time of divine service, there. At this time, Masalmas, Mossema, or<sup>d</sup> Moslem, and Abbâs, two Arab commanders, according to Theophanes, made an irruption into Cappadocia, and formed the siege of Tyana. The emperor, being apprized of this, sent an army under the conduct of Theodorus Carteruca and Theophylactus Saliba, two of his generals, to force them to raise the siege. But this army, being made up of raw undisciplined troops, assembled in haste, was easily routed by the Arabs, who killed a great number of the Christians upon the spot, took most of the rest prisoners, and made themselves masters of their camp. The besieged, being now destitute of all hopes of relief, and reduced to the last extremity, surrendered the place to the Moslems, who had been so straitened in their camp for want of provisions, before the late action, that they had entertained thoughts of abandoning the siege, and took on in the Khalif's service. However, the Arabs<sup>e</sup> are said to have violated their agreement with the Tyaneans, by sending many of them into remote deserts, and making the greatest part of the remainder slaves. A synod was held in the monastery of St. Silas, at Sarug in Mesopotamia, over which the patriarch Julian, Thomas the bishop of Amida, and James the bishop of Edessa, presided, about the beginning of the second year of Al Walid's reign<sup>r</sup>.

IN the 91st year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 710, Abbâs one of the Khalif's generals, made an incursion into the imperial territories, and carried off with him a vast number of that prince's subjects prisoners, who of course were by the Arabs made made slaves. The same commander founded a city near Heliopolis this year; but neither the precise situation of that city, nor the time when it was finished, has been told us by any good author<sup>s</sup>.<sup>f</sup> etrates into Cilicia.

THE following year, Othmân, an Arab general, penetrated into the very heart of Cilicia, and obliged several cities, seated in that province, to surrender to him. Others he likewise made himself master of by treachery and surprize; though it does not appear, that he long kept possession of his conquests there. With regard to the new mosque at Damascus, the building of which went on this year, we must beg leave to observe, that Al Walid was the first who erected there those elevated towers, or steeples, called by the Arabs Menârats, and by the Turks Minârets, from whence the Mueddhins, or criers, give public notice of the a times of prayer. The Persian geographer, to whom we are obliged for this article, also relates, in agreement with what we have already extracted from some of the Arab historians, that Al Walid adorned, with several additional buildings, the mosque erected at Jerusalem by the Khalif Omar<sup>1</sup>.

In the 93d year of the Hejra, answering to the year of our LORD 712, Tarik Ebn Zarka Tarik Ebn Zarka conquered part of Spain. made a descent in Spain with a body of the Moslem troops, defeated Roderic, the last king of the Goths there, reduced the city of Toledo, and over-ran a considerable part of that kingdom. Tarik was sent to Spain by Mûsa Ebn Okair, or Okail, who seems to have commanded the Khalif's forces in the western parts of Africa, and to have been the person who projected this expedition. Mûsa, being informed of Tarik's success, soon followed him with a body of auxiliary troops, composed of Arabs and Africans; and, after the junction of these two Moslem generals, the Arabs made themselves masters of a great number of fortresses in Spain; subjugating in a manner the whole country, and obliging it to become tributary to the Khalif. The Moslems acquired spoils of immense value in these expeditions, and, amongst other things, an exceeding rich table, called by the Arab writers the table of Solomon, the son of David. Those writers pretend, that this table consisted intirely of silver and gold, and was adorned with three borders of pearls; but Roderick of Toledo represents it as consisting of one intire stone, of a green colour, and an immense size, having no less than 365 feet. He also relates, that it was found in a certain village, or town, denominated from it the city of the table, near the mountain called in his days Jibel Solimân, mount Solomon, or the mountain of Solomon. Roderic is, however, inconsistent with himself, when he asserts, that Mûsa had first the possession of this famous table, and yet, almost in the same breath, is pleased immediately after to affirm, that Tarik made a present of it, with many other valuable effects, to Mûsa. It will, therefore, be more safe to adhere, in this point, to the testimony of the Arab historians; who relate, that Tarik either brought it, or took care to have it conveyed, to Al Walid himself. After Mûsa and Tarik had committed dreadful devastations in Spain, they were recalled from thence by the Khalif. However, Mûsa sent his son Abd'alaziz into that country, who fixed his residence at Seville, and afterwards married Egebo, or Egibon, king Roderic's widow; but, being persuaded by his wife to wear the diadem after the Gothic manner, he was assassinated by the Arabs, who from thence concluded that he had become a convert to Christianity, whilst he was performing his devotions. Abd'alaziz, after a reign of three years, was succeeded by Ayub Ebn Halib, by whose advice his predecessor had been murdered, and who was looked upon by the Arabs as the most prudent Moslem in Spain. Ayub is said to have built a city, called Calatayub, and to have transferred the royal seat from Seville to Corduba. Some authors relate, that the two sons of Vitiza, Roderic's predecessor, and count Julian, whose daughter Roderic had ravished, applied this year to Mûsa for a body of troops, which they offered to conduct into Spain, and put that kingdom into the hands of the Khalif. But Al Walid, say they, suspecting treachery in this affair, ordered Mûsa to send over first with Julian, and the two princes attending him, only a small detachment of his forces, and to form a notion of that count's sincerity from the reception those Arabs should meet with in Spain. Upon which, continue they, he assigned Julian only a body of 400 foot and 100 horse, under the command, as should seem, of Tarik, or, as he is called by the Spanish historians, Tarif, who passed the straits of Hercules, now known by the name of the straits of Gibraltar, was joined by a good number of Julian's friends, and ravaged the maritime coast of Bætica and Lusitania. Soon after which, the Arabs returned loaded with spoil and plunder to Africa. The Moslems also this year extended their conquests in other parts; Masalamas, Moslema, or Moslem, one of their generals, reducing the city of Amasia, and seizing upon a considerable part of Pontus and Armenia<sup>2</sup>.

f THE next year, being the 94th of the Hejra, and of CHRIST 713, the city of Antioch He undertakes a second expedition into that country. was almost totally destroyed by an earthquake, the shocks of which were extremely violent, and continued, tho' with intermission, forty days together. The same year died Zein Alabaddin Ebn Hosein Ebn Ali Ebn Abu Taleb, who was pious, devout, and held in great veneration amongst many of the Moslems. He performed every day a thousand genuflexions, or ingenuculations. He left behind him two sons, Zeid and Mohammed Abu Jaafar, who were highly esteemed by those of the Shiite persuasion. This year likewise Tarik, or Tarif, assembled a body of twelve thousand men, which he put privately on board some merchant-men, collected for that purpose by count Julian, and transported them to the rock or mountain Calpe, denominated afterwards from this general Jibel Tarif, that is, the rock or mountain of Tarif; from whence the word Gibraltar, the name of a city erected at the foot of this rock since that event, has been formed. Tarif, soon after his arrival in Spain, made himself master of an ancient city, that stood at no great distance, in a western direction, from the spot on which Gibraltar was afterwards built, and from him received the name of Tarifa, or Tariffa, by which it is also at present known. This town was undoubtedly the Julia Traducta of the old geographers, and neither the Mallaria nor the Carteia of the antients, as some of the Spanish historians pretend. After the reduction of this place, the Moslem general marched to Seville, which he easily possessed himself of, as it was not in a state of defence. Many other towns of considerable note likewise surrendered to him; which enabled him to plunder the whole province of Extica, and a very considerable part of Lusitania. Roderic, receiving advice of these depredations, sent his cousin-german Linco, Enecon, or Inach, called by some writers Sanctius, with a raw undisciplined rabble of an army, drawn together in haste, against the Arabs. But the Goths were soon put to flight, and left a great number of their men dead upon the field of battle. This so animated Tarif, that he resolved not to lay down his victorious arms till he had made an absolute conquest of Spain. Some of the Christian writers pretend, that Al Walid died this year; but this, as running counter to the concurrent testimony of all the best Arab historians, we must by no means admit. About the same time that Tarif made so rapid a progress in Spain, Abbás, another Moslem general, fell into Pisidia, with a powerful army, took the city of Antioch there, and, after he had ravaged the whole province, retired into the Khalif's territories with very inconsiderable loss <sup>w</sup>.

Al Hejaj's death, and extreme severity. THE Arab authors of best repute place the death of Al Hejáj Ebn Yusuf Al Thakáfi in the month of Ramadán, and the 95th year of the Hejra, answering to the year of our LORD 714. When he died, he was fifty-four years of age, and had presided over Irák about twenty years. He is said to have killed 120,000 men, and to have suffered 50,000 men, and 30,000 women, to perish in prison. In order to excuse his extreme severity, or rather cruelty, he used frequently to say, that a severe, or even violent, government is better than a weak and too indulgent, or rather indolent, administration; because the former hurts only some particular persons, whereas the latter injures the whole body of the people. He did not scruple to say, that the obedience due to princes is more absolute than that which men owe even to God himself; since they are enjoined by the Korán only to obey God as far as they are able, whereas that book requires of them an unconditional and unlimited obedience to all earthly rulers. Some persons, once hearing him talk after this extravagant manner, told him, that nothing could equal either his envy or ambition, as he assumed to himself such a monstrous degree of authority. To which he replied, that man is still more envious and ambitious than me, who says to God, Give me, O LORD, such a state of life as no person can enjoy after my death. We are told by Abu'l Faraj, that Al Hejáj destroyed 120,000 persons of rank and distinction, besides those that fell in war through his means, and others of a lower degree; as also, that he was only fifty-three years old at the time of his death, and had then presided over Hejáz, as well as Irák, about twenty years <sup>x</sup>.

A remarkable story of Al Hejáj. AL HEJAJ, being one day in the country, met an Arab of the desert, who was a perfect stranger to him, and asked him what sort of a man this Al Hejáj was, of whom people talked so much? The Arab answered, that he was a very wicked man. Don't you know me, then? said Al Hejáj. No, replied the Arab. I am, said the other, Al Hejáj, of whom you give so bad a character. Upon which, the Arab, without the least emotion or concern, demanded of Al Hejáj, in his turn, whether he knew him? No, answered the other. I am, said the Arab, a member of the family of Zobeir, whose posterity all become fools three days in the year, and this is one of them. Al Hejáj could not forbear laughing at, and admiring, so ingenious an evasion; so that, notwithstanding his natural fierceness, he pardoned the Arab, whom he esteemed for his wit and courage. As he was a man of fine parts and great eloquence, as well as a military genius, and not much advanced in years at his death, he was both a judge and an admirer of every thing that appeared smart and brilliant in others, even to the very last. He is said to have expired in the 95th year of the Hejra not only by the best Arab, but likewise by some of the Persian, historians <sup>y</sup>.

Another. It has been already observed, that Al Hejáj at last intirely defeated Abd'alrahmán, and killed 4000 of his men. To which we must here beg leave to add, that he took a great number of officers prisoners in that decisive action; all which he resolved to put to the sword. One of them, going to the place of execution, said, he had a piece of justice to demand of Al Hejáj; as he had reproved his general Abd'alrahmán for speaking with great acrimony against him. Al Hejáj asked him whether he could produce any one to attest this a point of conduct? To which he replied, that one of his comrades, now condemned to die as well as himself, heard every thing that passed between him and Abd'almalec on this occasion, Al Hejâj, being satisfied with the truth of the fact, asked the other why he did not behave in the same manner? This undaunted man answered him fiercely, I did not do it, because you are my enemy. Upon which, Al Hejâj gave both of them their lives; the one, in order to acknowledge the obligation he was under to him, and the other, for having confessed the truth with so much frankness and courage. Hence it may seem to appear, that Al Hejâj was not quite void of generous sentiments, and that what some of the Arabs termed in him enormous cruelties were, in reality, to be considered only as wholesome severities, adapted to the nature of the people he governed. This may possibly be farther evinced by an extemporary speech he once made to the Moslems under his inspection, after he had been taxed with barbarity by them; which was to the following effect: God, said he, has at present given me the power over you; and, if I exercise it with some severity, don't imagine that you will find yourselves in a better situation after my decease. You will always hereafter meet with at least as ill treatment from my successors, as you have hitherto experienced from me. When I shall be dead, God will send you another of his servants, who may possibly execute his commands against you with greater severity than I have done. Would you have a prince sweet and moderate? Follow justice, and obey his orders. Your own conduct will be the principle and source of the good or ill treatment you will receive at your governor's hands. The prince, or his lieutenant, may justly be compared to a mirror: all that you see in the glass is only the return of the objects you present to it. Nor can any piece be drawn more to the life than the portrait here given of the people of Irâk by Al Hejâj, as sufficiently appears from the best Arab authors, who have already been cited on this head in the preceding part of this history<sup>a</sup>.

THIS general, as he was hunting, being once separated from his retinue, found himself very thirsty in a solitary place, where an Arab was feeding his camels. As soon as Al Hejâj appeared, those animals were scared away; which made the Arab, then attentive to something else, lift up his head in a great passion, and say, Who is this with his fine cloaths that comes here into the desert to fright my camels? the curse of God light upon him! Al Hejâj, without taking notice of what he had said, made up to him, saluted him very civilly, and, after the Arab manner, wished him peace. But the other, instead of returning his salutation in proper terms, answered him roughly; telling him, that he neither wished him peace, nor any blessing of God. Al Hejâj seemed not to understand him, and begged of him, with great humility, a little water to drink. The Arab told him, that he might alight and help himself, for he was neither his companion nor his servant. Al Hejâj did as he bade him; and, after he had drunk, asked him whom he took to be the most noble and excellent of all men? The prophet sent by God, burst you! answered the Arab. And what think you of Ali? added Al Hejâj. His excellency cannot be sufficiently expressed by words, replied the other. Al Hejâj, continuing his discourse, then asked him what an opinion he entertained of Abd'almalec? To which at first he made no answer; but, being pressed, he at last dropped some words which seemed to imply, that he believed him to be a bad prince. Why so? answered Al Hejâj. Because, replied the Arab, he has sent us for a governor the most wicked man under the heavens. The words were scarce out of his mouth, when a bird flew over their heads, making at the same time a sort of noise, which the Arab had no sooner heard, than he looked stedfastly upon Al Hejâj, and demanded of him who he was? Al Hejâj, not chusing to give him a direct answer, desired to know the reason of that question. Because, said the Arab, this bird assured me, that a company of people draws near, and that you probably are the chief of them. Al Hejâj's attendants then came up, and, by his order, carried the Arab along with him; who, the next day, was admitted to Al Hejâj's table, and commanded by him to eat. The Arab then said his usual grace, God grant that the end of this meal may be as fortunate as the beginning. Whilst they were eating, Al Hejâj asked him if he remembered the discourse that had passed between them the day before. The Arab answered him immediately, God prosper you in every thing; but as for yesterday's secret, take care you do not divulge it to-day. That I most certainly shall, replied Al Hejâj; but you must chuse one of these two things, either to acknowledge me your master, and then I will retain you in my service; or else to be sent to the Khalîf Abd'almalec Ebn Merwân, to whom I shall give an account of all that you have said of him. The Arab, having heard Al Hejâj's proposal, answered him instantly, There is a third way you may take, which seems to me to be much better. What is that? said Al Hejâj. Send me home, replied the Arab, and let I and you never see one another more. Upon which, Al Hejâj, not a little pleased to hear the poor man talk with so much spirit and vivacity, made him a present of ten thousand dirhems, and dismissed him, according to his desire. With regard to the language of birds, such as that mentioned here, the Arabs pretend, that several of their nation have all along understood this, even from Solomon's time. They affirm, that this science has been known amongst them ever since the reign of that prince, when Balkis, the queen of Sheba, or Saba, had a bird called Hudud, that is, the hoop or lapwing, which she dispatched to Solomon on several occasions, and which was the messenger of their amours. We are told by Jallal'oddin, that Solomon, having notice of the embassy designed to be sent him by Balkis, by means of the lapwing, even before the persons that composed it set out, ordered a large square to be inclosed with a wall built of gold and silver bricks, wherein he ranged his forces and attendants to receive them <sup>a</sup>.

Kumeil saved by his wit. KUMEIL, the son of Ziyâd, was a man of fine wit. He lived in the time of Al Hejâj, and did by no means approve of his conduct. One day that governor ordered him to be brought before him, and reproached him, because, in a certain garden, before some persons that he named, he had uttered several imprecations against him, some of which were to the following effect: The Lord blacken his face! that is, fill him with shame and confusion; and may his neck be cut off, and his blood shed! To which Kumeil, who had an exceeding ready wit, answered instantly, 'Tis true, I did speak these words in the garden you mention; but then I was under a vine-arbour, looking upon a bunch of grapes not yet ripe, and I wished that they would turn black soon, that they might be cut off, and made wine of. This ingenious explication so pleased Al Hejâj, that he sent Kumeil home, and re-established him in his favour <sup>b</sup>.

Ebn Korrah's evasion. ABU AYAS EBN KORRAH AL BASRI, a person celebrated for his piety and learning, whose father had been one of the COMPANIONS, being once with Al Hejâj, the porter told them, that a secretary was at the gate; upon which Ebn Korrah said, These secretaries are the worst of all sorts of people. However, the secretary was introduced, and well received by Al Hejâj; who, after he had dismissed him, assured Ebn Korrah, that, had not the title of Companion of the prophet been in his family, he would have ordered his head to be struck off, because the Korân says, Honour the writers. Ebn Korrah, finding what imminent danger he was in, answered immediately, I spoke of the secretaries of the Divân, and not of the angels that are called writers in the Korân. To which he likewise thought fit to add, that the latter merited the appellation given them in that book, because they write down the actions of men, in order to produce them at the general judgment. This Ebn Korrah was the master of Kotâdah, Shabab, and Aimash, and made a very considerable figure amongst the Moslems <sup>c</sup>.

A religious Moslem's prayer for Al Hejâj. SADI relates, that Al Hejâj once recommended himself to the prayers of a religious Moslem; upon which, he instantly prayed that God would please to kill him quickly; for nothing, said he, can be more advantageous either to himself or the people. By which it in some measure appears, that the Khalif's subjects he was sent to govern entertained a very disagreeable, and even shocking, idea of him <sup>d</sup>.

Al Hejâj, before his death, orders his astrologer to be dispatched. MIRKHOND writes, that, when he was upon his death-bed, he consulted his astrologer, to know of him, if he had not found in his Ephemerides, that some great captain was near the end of his days. The astrologer answered him, that a certain great lord, named Kolaib, was threatened with speedy death, according to his observations. Al Hejâj replied, that is the very name my mother gave me when I was a child. Then, said the astrologer, with great imprudence, you must certainly die; there is no room to doubt of it. Al Hejâj, offended at this discourse, said instantly to him, If that be the case, and you are so dexterous in your predictions, I will send you before me into the other world, that I may make use of you there; and at the same time gave an order to have him dispatched. We must here beg leave to remark, that the word Kolaib, in Arabic, signifies a little dog; and that we meet with an account of this astrologer's fate, similar to that handed down to us by Mirkbond, in Abu'l Faraj <sup>e</sup>.

Some farther particulars relating to him. THE former of those writers also relates, that this general was born shut up at the bottom; so that his parents found it necessary to have him opened with surgeons instruments, lest a stop should be put by this natural impediment to the exercise of the animal functions. The latter of them inform us, that he fell sick by eating dirt; which he afterwards abstained from, by the advice of Theodunus, an eminent physician, who was cotemporary with him. The same author adds, that he died of a phthisis, or consumption, which, for a considerable time, deprived him of his natural rest. The dirt mentioned by this historian was a sort of medicinal clay, called by the Latins Terra Lemnia, and by the Arabs Thîn, and Thîn Mekhtown, Lutum, Lutum sigillatum, & Terra sigillata, being prescribed in several cases by the most eminent physicians. We are told by a writer of some note, that Al Hejâj was extremely magnificent in his entertainments; insomuch that he furnished, on some occasions, no less than a thousand tables. He also, according to the same author, sometimes made very valuable presents to his friends; it having been known, that certain of them received of him 1,000,000 dirhems at once. Al Hejâj left behind him a son, who erected a little principality, consisting of only seven small towns in Al Jebâl, or the Persian Irâk; which

- a gradually going to decay, a city was at last formed out of them all, called Kom. This town stands at almost an equal distance from Ispahân and Cazbîn, and about twenty-one parasangs from Raya. Between this last place and Kom there is a frightful desert, in which there was formerly a very large and strong castle, called Gerdesbîr; a particular description of which we meet with in Nâkût. This city was raised out of the ruins of the seven others, in the 203d year of the Hejra. Abd'alrahmân, the son of Al Hejâj, having been defeated by his enemies, and his country ruined, the inhabitants of the seven original towns gradually deserted them, and their descendants built the city of Kom; which was divided into seven parts, that retained the names of those towns. The principal of these was called Kommedan, a name apparently formed of Kom. The city of Kom is at this day justly celebrated for its manufactures of silk, called in the Turkish and Persian languages Komash, in the same manner as velvet is denominated in the east Karîfab, from the town of Karîf, situated in the province of Babrein, on the Persian gulf, about two days journey from Aksâ, where it is made. Abd'almogni Ali, a famous astrologer, who left behind him an astrological treatise, intitled, Ekbîarat, was a native of Kom, and from thence surnamed Al Komi, or Al Kommi. Abu Obeidab Mâmer Ebn Al Mothâni writ the life of Al Hejâj, under the title of Al Akbâr Hejâj. That author was a native of Baghdâd, and died in the 209th year of the Hejra <sup>f</sup>.
- b
- c THE same year in which Al Hejâj died, that is, the 95th of the Hejra, Al Walid Ebn Abd'almalék banished Ali Ebn Abd'allab Ebn Al Abbâs from Damascus to Honein, a valley which lies about three miles from Mecca, towards Al Tâyes, where he begot twenty sons. The Khalîf also ordered this Ali to receive seventy stripes, for meditating the murder of Salit. The Arabs gained this year a complete victory over the Goths in Spain, which paved the way to the absolute conquest of most of the provinces of that kingdom. Roderic, being informed, that the Moslems had landed a powerful army in Spain, and made terrible havock in several parts of his dominions, assembled his whole force, and resolved to bring the enemy to a general action, that should determine his fate as well as that of his subjects. Coming up with them, therefore, at Affidona, he attacked them with such bravery, that, notwithstanding the Goths had been enervated by a long peace, the victory hung in suspense for eight whole days. The king himself, dressed in his royal robes, with a golden crown upon his head, in an ivory chariot, after the manner of the Gothic princes, appeared at the head of his army, and so animated his troops by his presence and valiant behaviour, that they really performed wonders; though at last the Arabs, being continually reinforced with fresh troops, forced them to give way, and even betake themselves to a precipitate flight. To this the sons of Vitiza, according to some writers, not a little contributed. For, Roderic committing to their conduct the wings of the army, though they had already manifested their sinister intentions towards him, they went over to the enemy in the heat of the action; upon which, a total rout immediately ensued. The Arabs pursued the flying Goths with so much ardour, that the greatest part of them were killed either in the battle or the pursuit. In this fatal engagement, which ended on Sunday the fifth day of July, according to some of the best Spanish historians, all the Gothic nobility were slain; so that all the Spaniards, except the Asturians and Cantabrians, who were the last that submitted to the Romans, were obliged, within a short time, gradually to receive the Moslem yoke. As for Roderic himself, it is not certainly known whether he was killed in the action, or survived the destruction of his army. Some affirm, that he fell in the battle; but others deny this. However, we are told for certain, that this horse Orelia, and ensigns of royalty, were found in a miry place, frequented by swine and other filthy animals, though the enemy sought for his body in vain. With regard to count Julian, he is said to have soon met with the proper reward of his villainy; the Arabs, according to a proverb received amongst us, loving the treason, but hating the traitor. His wife they stoned to death, threw his son headlong from the top of the castle of Ceuta, and stript him of all his possessions. After which, according to some, he miserably expired in irons in a fort or citadel belonging to the territory of Osta; tho' others, it must be owned, are of a different opinion. Be this, however, as it will, the Arabs, who lost sixteen thousand men in the battle of Affidona, reduced the whole kingdom of Spain, except the provinces occupied by the Asturians and Cantabrians, as has been already observed, within the space of eight months, or, according to others, fourteen months, or, lastly, as others will have it, about two years. Nay, there are not wanting those who assert, that the Arabs spent five years in the conquest and intire reduction of the most considerable part of this region. Tarif, who now commanded in Spain, acquired an immense treasure, during this successful campaign; which not only enriched him, but likewise enabled him to reward all his officers, and even the troops themselves, for their bravery in this war. Nor did the Moslem commanders fail afterwards of amassing prodigious riches, with which they were supplied by this most opulent country; tho' these, if we will believe a certain historian, soon occasioned such dissensions amongst them, and so incensed them one against another, that several of them came to violent deaths, insomuch that, within the space of twenty years, there were no less than fifteen Moslem princes, or governors, in Spain. The Arabs were this year likewise formidable in the eastern parts of the world. Masalmes, Moslema, or Moslem, an Arab general that we have formerly mentioned, made several incursions into the imperial territories, and ravaged the whole province of Galatia, carrying off with him many rich spoils, and a great number of prisoners, when he retired into the Khalif's dominions. The Greek emperor, being informed, that Al Walid was making vast preparations to attack him both by sea and land, sent some of his nobles, and, amongst the rest, Daniel Sinopensis, to treat of a peace with that prince. Amongst other instructions with which Daniel was charged, the emperor ordered him to procure as exact an account as possible of the force with which Al Walid proposed to invade the Greek empire. Upon his return from the Moslem court, that nobleman represented both the naval and military preparations of the Arabs against the Christians, and particularly the capital city of the empire, as so stupendous, that it would be next to impossible to oppose them. The emperor therefore finding, that the Khalif intended to lay siege to Constantinople, he caused a very large number of light ships to be built, the walls to be repaired, and, having filled the public granaries, ordered such of the citizens as had not laid up provisions for three years to depart the city. He likewise added some new works to the place on the sea-side, and disposed his military engines on the towers in such a manner as might enable him to give the enemy a proper reception, whenever they should think fit to appear. In the mean time, Al Walid continued his warlike preparations with the utmost vigour, being determined to make himself master of Constantinople, if possible, in one campaign <sup>a</sup>.

The death and character of Al Walid.

IN the 96th year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 715, Korrah Ebn Sharik, Al Walid's governor of Egypt, died at Mesr, where he had erected a large and stately mosque, about three years before his death. He was succeeded by Abd'almalec Ebn Refa'a, who presided over the Egyptians till the accession of Solimān Ebn Abd'almalec Ebn Merwān to the Moslem throne. As for the Khalif Al Walid, he died this year, about the middle of the latter Jomāda, and was buried at Damascus. He reigned about nine years and eight months; being at the time of his death, according to some, forty-eight, or, as others will have it, forty-three, years of age. He was very tall, swarthy, flat-nosed, and pitted with the small-pox. He had a large beard, with some grey hairs in it, was of a strong robust constitution, and a choleric temper. He was subject to intemperate sallies of passion, being by no means capable of bridling his anger. According to Al Makin, he married sixty-three wives, the greatest part of whom he divorced; which, as that author says, was attended with a very considerable expence. He laid out large sums of money upon public buildings, such as the magnificent mosques at Damascus, Jerusalem, and Medina; all which were either erected or enlarged and beautified in his reign. This Khalif appointed Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz his commandant of Medina, and was the first of the successors of Mohammed who founded an hospital for sick people, and a Caravanserai, or public house of entertainment, for poor travellers and strangers. His secretaries, who succeeded one another in the order they are mentioned here, were Korrah Ebn Yezid, Kabida Ebn Dawib, Dahak Ebn Zerik, Yezid Ebn Abikefba, and Abd'allah Ebn Mālec; his chamberlains, Kbāled and Saad, the first his servant, and the other his freed-man; and the captain of his guards Caab Ebn Hazem Al Abāsi. The inscription of his seal was, O AL WALID! you are to die, and to give an account of your actions. The first day of his Khalifat was Friday, and the last Saturday. He is said to have had some skill in architecture, but to have been a very indifferent linguist. The accounts of the public treasury he ordered the clerks, or secretaries, to write in Arabic, and not in Greek, as was the custom before his elevation to the Khalifat. Al Walid, as has been already observed, was more powerful than any of his predecessors; having subjugated, according to the eastern writers, Spain, Sardinia, Majorca, Minorca, part of Gallia Narbonensis, the vast province of Marwarā'lnahr, Little Bukhāria, or the kingdom of Kashgar, and Turkestan. He likewise, if we will believe those authors, rendered that part of India on this side the Ganges tributary to him. The greatest part of the Moslem historians differ widely from those of Syria in their accounts of this prince. The latter represent him as the greatest Khalif of the house of Ommiyah; whereas the former have transmitted him down to posterity as naturally cruel and violent, of much the same disposition with Pharaoh king of Egypt, called also Al Walid by some of the eastern writers. Kbondemir, one of the principal of the Persian historians, tells <sup>b</sup>

S E C T. XIII.

b SOLIMAN EBN ABD'ALMALEC, surnamed Abu Ayub, succeeded his brother Al Walid, and <sup>He is succeeded by his brother Solimân.</sup> was inaugurated the very day on which that Khalîf died. His mother was Waladah, the daughter of Al Abbâs Ebn Harbi Al Abbâsi. He was a prince of fine parts and surprizing eloquence, having been educated amongst his mother's relations in the desert. He redressed all grievances that had happened before his accession, put an end to all disorders, encouraged trade, and released all the prisoners in his extensive dominions, except such as had been incarcerated for capital crimes. In the 96th year of the Hejra, or the first of his reign, Katiba Ebn Moslem, the governor of Khorasân, rebelled against him; but the people of that country were so far from joining with him in his defection, that they rushed upon him with one accord, cut him to pieces, and elected for their leader one Wâkî Ebn Abu Sawid, who c presided over them till Solimân appointed Yezid Ebn Mohalleb Ebn Abu Saфра his lieutenant of Khorasân. Yezid greatly extended the Moslem conquests on that side, reducing Taberistân and Jurjân, Georgiana, or Giurgiana, under the dominion of the Khalîf. In this war he gained many glorious victories, ravaged the enemies territories, killed a vast number of the infidels, and imposed an annual tribute upon the rest. Soon after, Solimân began to make the necessary dispositions for putting his troops in march against Constantinople, and appointed his brother Moslema to command in that expedition. Asamah Ebn Zeid Al Tannukhi collected the tribute at this time for Solimân in Egypt. Nothing very material passed this year in Spain. However, the Arabs, by the assistance of the Jews, surprized the city of Toledo on Palm-Sunday, which had returned from them to the enemy. Mûsa also, the prefect of d Africa, hearing of the great success of Tarif, and of the immense riches he had acquired, landed again with a large body of the Moslem troops in Spain, assumed to himself the spoils taken by that general from the Goths, and then in conjunction with him, notwithstanding the mutual hatred and animosities that subsisted between them, reduced Cæsaraugusta, known at this time by the name of Saragosa, or Saragossa, and several other towns. The inhabitants of those places the Arabs treated with cruelty enough; plundering and pillaging them all without distinction, and even putting many of them to the sword <sup>i</sup>.

THE following year, being the 97th of the Hejra, beginning September 5th, 715, Solimân <sup>A Mikeas built by Solimân.</sup> ordered a Mikeas, Nilescope, or pillar to measure the increase of the Nile, to be erected on an island between Geeza, or Al Jiza, the antient Memphis, according to Dr. Shaw, and Al e Fostât; he having been before informed by Asamah Ebn Zeid Al Tannukhi, his collector of the tribute and customs in Egypt, that the Mikeas built at Holwân by Abd'alaziz Ebn Merwân was become intirely useless. This Nilescope may possibly be still remaining, as that seen and described by the learned Dr. Shaw stands upon the point of an island that lies between Kairo and Geeza; which situation exactly corresponds with that assigned Solimân's Nilometer by Eutychius and Al Makin. For a full and ample description of this column, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to Dr. Shaw's observations in Egypt; where they will meet with the best and most entertaining account of it, that has hitherto been communicated to the world <sup>k</sup>.

f THIS year, the Arabs rather lost than gained ground in Spain. Pelagius, or, as the Spaniards call him, Pelayo, the son of Fafila, or Favila, duke of Cantabria, was proclaimed king of Asturians; and Garfias Ximenius, known amongst the Spaniards by the name of Gar-<sup>for Constantinople;</sup> cia Ximenes, or Gothic extraction, founded a kingdom in the Pyrenean mountains, whither many of the Christians had fled from Saragosa and other towns of Arragon and Navarre, when they were taken by the Arabs. Nor could the Khalîf's forces in Spain reduce these two new princes. The army sent against Pelayo returned, without having effected any thing, to Corduba; and that destined to act against Ximenes, who distinguished himself in several sharp actions with only a body of 600 horse, was not able to seize upon any part of his territories. On the contrary, the latter of these Christian monarchs advanced his frontiers into the enemy's country, and died after a reign of forty-two years. The first of them likewise reigned about nineteen years, as our readers will find more particularly related in the modern history of Spain. About this time, Moslema, who is called by Theophanes and Cedrenus Masalmas, begun his march for Constantinople, with an army of 120,000 men, advanced first to Amorium in Phrygia, and afterwards to Pergamus in Myſia, which he surprized; and then took up his winter-quarters in the Leſſer Aſia. Theophanes ſeems to intimate, that either Solimán himſelf, or a general of the ſame name, commanded a body of the Moslem forces in this expedition; though not the leaſt foundation for ſuch a notion is to be met with in the oriental hiſtorians. Ebn Shobnah writes, that this prince was at Ramla, or Rama, when his brother died, from whence he went to Damaſcus as ſoon as he had received advice of that event, in order to take poſſeſſion of the Khalifat; and that, after a ſhort reſidence there, he commanded his troops to advance to Marj Dabek, near Aleppo, from whence his brother Moslema marched directly to Constantinople, that he might form the ſiege of that important place. Theſe are the moſt material tranſactions of the 97th year of the Hejra, both according to the Chriſtian and the Moslem hiſtorians<sup>1</sup>.

that capital.

THE next year, this is, the 98th of the Hejra, commencing Auguſt 25th, 716, ſeveral remarkable events happened in thoſe parts of the world, that were the theatres of the war between the Chriſtians and the Moslems. The Chriſtians of Spain, who ſubmitted to pay an annual tribute to the Khalif, and choſe to reſide in the Moslem territories, were not diſturbed either in the poſſeſſion of their properties, or the free exerciſe of their religion. As they were intermixed, and in a manner incorporated, with the Arabs, they obtained on that account the name of Mozarabes; and the miſſal then in uſe amongſt them, drawn up by St. Leander and St. Iſidore, and which was followed by all the Chriſtians of Spain till the time of Alphonſus VI. was called the Mozarabic miſſal. This year, Múſa and Tariſ were recalled by Solimán, and not Al Walíd, as we find aſſerted by ſome of the Spaniſh hiſtorians, to give an account of their conduct. Múſa left his ſon Abd'alaziz behind him, to govern Spain in his abſence, who married Egibon, Egilon, or Egilona, Roderic's wife, and fixed his reſidence at Seville, as has been already obſerved. As for Tariſ, before his departure, he appointed Al Khamán, an excellent officer, to command the Moslem forces deſtined to act againſt Pelagius, whom he thought it a ſcandal to him not to have reduced. Al Khamán, before he proceeded directly to hoſtilities, ſent Oppa, or Oppas, the archbiſhop of Seville, to prevail upon him, if poſſible, to take the oath of allegiance to the Khalif. This Oppa attempted, and had a conference with Pelagius, who had taken poſt with 1000 choſen men in a cave on mount Auſena, having diſpoſed his other troops, on which he could not ſo much depend, to the beſt advantage, upon the precipices of that mountain; but without effect, that prince being ſtill determined to aſſert his independency againſt the Arabs. Al Khamán, therefore, finding pacific meaſures ineffectual, marched againſt him with a powerful army, but could not meet with an opportunity of attacking him before the following year. In the mean time, Moslema, having in vain waited for Leo's performance of certain engagements he had laſt year entered into with him, when he perſuaded him to aſſume the purple, and promiſed to ſupport him, left his winter-quarters in the Leſſer Aſia, and reſumed his march for Constantinople. Upon his arrival at Abydus, he made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for paſſing the Hellſpont, and transporting his forces into Thrace; which having done, and ſent orders to Solimán, the Khalif's admiral, to appear with the fleet, he defeated the imperial army that covered Constantinople, made himſelf maſter of the enemy's camp, and cauſed the city to be inveſted on the 15th day of Auguſt. Moslema, or, as the Greek writers call him, Masalmas, having ſoon after opened the trenches in form before the city, and drawn a line of circumvallation round his camp, pushed on the ſiege with great vigour. On the 1ſt of September, Solimán, according to Theophanes, in purſuance of the orders he had received, appeared, with the Arab fleet, conſiſting of men of war of a monſtrous ſize, beſides merchant-men and light veſſels, amounting in all to about 1800 ſhips, before the town, in order to block it up by ſea, and forward the operations of the land-forces. Twenty of the merchant-men, or transports, that, by reaſon of their heavy lading, failed ſlower than the reſt, arriving a few days after the grand fleet, were ſet on fire by ſome fire-ſhips ſent againſt them from the citadel, and reduced it to aſhes; which proved a very conſiderable loſs to the Arabs, as every one of them had 100 ſoldiers on board, armed with coats of mail; all which were either conſumed by the flames, or ſwallowed up by the waves. This greatly animated the gariſon, and ſtruck the enemy with terror and conſternation. It likewiſe prevented an attack on the ſea-ſide of the city, which the enemy propoſed to have made with a great part of a their forces the very day on which this action happened. The following winter was so severe in Thrace, that the ground was covered with the snow frozen upon it an hundred days; infomuch that almost all the enemy's horses, camels, and other beasts of burden, perished with the cold. They lost likewise a vast number of men by the inclemency of the season, and were reduced to great straits for want of provisions. They found themselves, therefore, incapable of making any considerable progress in the siege before the return of the spring; when two fleets, one of 800 ships, with a vast quantity of corn on board from Egypt, under the command of Sofian, and another of 360 merchant-men, or transports, laden with arms, baggage, and provisions, from Africa, under the conduct of Yezid, approached to their relief. But both those admirals having received intelligence of the fatal effects of the liquid or sea-fire, so called because it burnt under water, being the invention of one Callinicus, a native of Heliopolis in Egypt, that had destroyed the twenty transports above-mentioned, they were obliged for some time to stand off to sea. However, at last they ventured to draw nearer the city; but were soon, for the most part, consumed by the artificial fire discharged upon them from certain swift vessels and biremes, on board of which a proper quantity of it had been lodged for that purpose. All the land as well as the naval forces brought by those fleets, to reinforce the Moslem army incamped before Constantinople, and enable it to carry on the siege of that capital with more vigour, were either drowned or reduced to ashes in this action; and the Greeks carried off with them all the enemy's baggage, money, and provisions, that had escaped the flames, triumphantly into the town. About the same time, a detachment of the imperial forces cut to pieces a body of the Arab troops, commanded by one Merdasan, that had ravaged the coast as far as Nicea and Nicomedia; which cleared the opposite shore of the enemy's parties, and enabled the emperor's subjects to supply the besieged with necessaries from thence; the communication between Thrace and the neighbouring parts of Asia being now as open as before the commencement of the siege. The fishing vessels likewise followed their occupation in the Bosphorus and the Propontis, without any disturbance from the Moslems; so that the city, at this juncture, enjoyed a plenty of every thing that was necessary for the support of human life. The Arabs, on the other hand, were so grievously distressed for want of provisions, that a famine ensued amongst them; which obliged them to feed upon horses, asses, and other unclean animals, that died of themselves; nay, upon human excrements, and even at last upon one another. This introduced the plague amongst them, which swept away an infinite number of men; and, to crown all their misfortunes, the Bulgarians attacked their camp, and put 22,000 of them to the sword. However, the people of Constantinople, according to some of the Arab historians, were reduced to such straits, that they offered Moslema a large sum of money, if he would retire. They also intimate, that Leo outwitted Moslema, and deprived him, by one of not the most refined stratagems, both of his ships and provisions. Notwithstanding which, that general, expecting a reinforcement from Solimân, then at Mari Dabek, near Kinnisrin and Aleppo, obstinately persisted in his resolution to continue the siege<sup>m</sup>.

SOME authors affirm, that Solimân began to build the city of Ramla, or Rama, in the Solimân's son 98th year of the Hejra; but this runs counter to what has been advanced by Ebn Shobnah, Ayub dies. who relates, that he was there at his brother's death, as we have already observed. It seems more probable, that he only fortified this city, in order to secure it from the insults of the Arabs of Irâk, who at this time made frequent incursions into Palestine. However, Solimân is said by the Arab writers to have been the first who adorned Ramla with a fine palace, a stately mosque, a proper number of aqueducts, and other public buildings; which might not improbably have induced some to think, that he was the founder of that city. This year died his son Ayub, whom he had obliged the Moslems to acknowledge the heir apparent to the crown; after which, he nominated Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz, a prince of exemplary piety, to succeed him. But this last event is more properly to be ranked amongst the transactions of the following year<sup>n</sup>.

THE 99th year of the Hejra, part of the 717th and 718th of the Christian æra, proved very unsuccessful to the Moslems. Al Khamân ascended mount Ausena at the head of a powerful army, and attacked the cave on the summit of that mountain, where Pelagius had posted himself with 1000 men, being the flower of his troops; but was repulsed with the loss of 20,000 men, according to some of the Spanish historians. This so animated the Christians under Pelagius, that they sallied out of the cave, fell upon the Arabs in their turn, and overthrew them with very great slaughter. Al Khamân himself was killed in the action, and Oppa taken prisoner; though it is not certainly known what afterwards became of him. As for the Arabs, who escaped the carnage on this occasion, they were either obliged to throw <sup>a</sup> themselves down headlong from the precipices of the mountains, or fell into the hands of the Christians, who put them immediately to the sword. In the mean time, Tarif, arriving first at the Khalif's court, accused Músa of such enormous crimes, and supported with such convincing proofs his accusation, that the latter was not only ill received by Solimán, but likewise fined by him in a very large sum of money; which so affected him, that he soon after pined away with grief. One of the crimes laid to Músa's charge was, that he had secreted most of the riches acquired in Spain for his own use, and reserved but a small part of them for the Khalif; upon which, he was not only deprived of the honourable post to which he had been advanced, but likewise obliged him to pay down 2,000,000 dirbems. And because Avúb, of whom we have spoken above, was related to Músa, the Khalif recalled <sup>b</sup> him from Spain, and substituted Alabor, or Alabor, Ebn Abd'alrahmán in his room. All which events are placed by the Spanish writers in the 97th year of the Hejra; whereas, in truth and reality, they happened in the 99th of that æra; and consequently in the Khalifat of Solimán, and not of Al Walid, as those writers pretend. Alabor, upon his arrival in Spain, being informed of the terrible havock made amongst the Arab troops by Pelagius, imputed this to the treachery of Julian, and the sons of Vitiza; whose effects he therefore confiscated, and afterwards put them all three to death. Others, however, affirm, that those traitors met with this fate before Músa's departure out of Spain. Be that as it will, the Moslem throne was occupied by Solimán, the brother of Al Walid, the 97th, 98th, and part of the 99th, years of the Hejra, as we certainly learn from the best of the Arab historians <sup>c</sup>.

Moslema raises the siege of Constantinople, and returns home.

THE Khalif's forces before Constantinople having been so weakened by sickness, desertion, the attack of the Bulgarians, the various assaults they had made, and the sallies of the garison, that they despaired of taking the city either by storm or capitulation; Moslema, the Arab general, found himself at last obliged to raise the siege. The army, therefore, by his order, decamped, and returned into the Lesser Asia, in the 99th year of the Hejra, after having sustained an incredible loss. The soldiers, for a considerable time, were forced to live upon hides, the roots and leaves of trees, the most noisome animals, their own excrements, and even some of their own dead bodies, as has been already observed, before they abandoned the enterprize in which they had been so long embarked. Theophanes and Cedrenus relate, that the Arab fleet, with the shatter'd remains of the land-forces on board, set <sup>d</sup> sail for the coast of Asia, on the 15th of August, the present year; and that, on this very day, that fleet was almost totally destroyed by a dreadful storm of thunder, lightning, and hail, and the artificial fire of the Greeks, ten ships only escaping the common destruction: in which, however, those writers are not supported by the concurrent testimony of any Moslem historian. The calamities suffered by the inhabitants during the siege, which continued, according to some, thirteen months, or, as others will have it, two years, or, lastly, if we will believe Abu'l Faraj, two years and an half, are not to be described; 30,000 of them having perished with hunger, and the like number been swept away by the plague. As for the Arab troops, scarce any of them returned home, tho' the general himself seems to have arrived safe at the Moslem court; so that the Khalif must have lost <sup>e</sup> near 120,000 men in this fatal expedition <sup>f</sup>.

Solimán's

THE same year, Solimán Ebn Abd'almâlec, emperor of the faithful, on the 21st day of the month Safar, departed this life at Marj Dabek, in the district of Kinnisrin, to the inexpressible regret of his subjects. He had so endeared himself to them, by releasing from their confinement all the prisoners in his dominions, and other acts of clemency, that they gave him the surname of Mestab Al Kbaïr, or the key of goodness; by which it plainly appeared what a high regard they had for him. When he was on his death-bed, he sent for Raja, his Wazîr, or Vizir, and ordered him to write down on a piece of paper, that he had nominated Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz, his cousin-german, to succeed him, on condition, nevertheless, that Yezid Ebn Abd'almâlec, his brother, should, after that prince's decease, <sup>f</sup> be called to the succession. This writing having been signed and sealed in form, Raja, by his command, assembled all the nobles and grandees of his court, and made them take an oath to recognize the authority of the person named Khalif therein after his death. The Moslem lords then, in pursuance of another order, came all to Solimán's bed's head, and confirmed in his presence, by word of mouth, what they had before obliged themselves by their own hand-writing, as well as by oath, to perform. Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz, one of them, soon after meeting Raja, desired him to inform him who the Khalif designed for his successor; telling him he might safely do this, as he knew himself to be excluded from the succession, as he was perfectly easy in that matter, and as he should sincerely congratulate

- a the new Khalif upon his nomination. But Raja, being a man of great prudence and discretion, begged to be excused from revealing that secret, reassembled the noblesse, as soon as the breath was out of Solimân's body, and made them all, without exception, repeat the oath they had formerly taken: after the conclusion of which ceremony, he opened the paper wherein the successor's name was written, by Solimân's order, and immediately proclaimed Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz emperor of the faithful. Solimân was forty-five, or, as others say, thirty-nine, years old at the time of his death, and reigned two years and eight months, wanting only five days. As to his person, he was tall, of a fair complexion, had a black beard, and seemed to tread upon his heels. With regard to his disposition, he was mild and merciful, as appears from what has been already observed of him, and a great lover of
- b women. He died, according to some, of a pain in his side, or, as others will have it, of an indigestion. Nor is this to be wondered at, if what some of the Arab writers relate of him to be true, viz. that he could eat three lambs roasted for breakfast, and afterwards dine very heartily in public; or if, according to others, he used to devour no less than an hundred pounds weight of meat every day. However, an historian, followed by Al Makin, seems to intimate, that he lost his life by drinking a draught of milk, into which some poison had been infused, given him by an Arab, sent by his brother Yezid out of Palestine for that purpose. Which, if it be true, seems to imply, that this prince knew, or at least suspected, and was displeased with, Solimân's manner of settling the succession; as taking himself to have an incontestable right to the Khalifat, after his brother's decease. We are told
- c by some of the eastern historians, that Jaasar Al Barmeki, one of Solimân's principal counsellors, advised him to coin money of a better alloy, and a higher standard, than that struck in the reign of his father Abd'almâlek; so that the finer gold and silver money, ever current amongst the Moslems after this event, from this Jaasar received the name of Jaasarian. In confirmation of which article, it may be observed, that the writer of this history has a dirhém, consisting of silver, sufficiently fine, struck at Cûsa in the 134th year of the Hejra, being the 3d of Abu'l Abbâs Al Saffah, the first Khalif of the house of Al Abbâs, of which we shall give our readers hereafter a more particular account. That article will, however, perhaps, render suspicious the antiquity of the dirhém above-mentioned, belonging to the university of Oxford, supposed to have been coined at Wâset upon the Tigris about
- d nine or ten years before the elevation of Solimân to the Moslem throne (that also exhibits another mark of a later date) the silver of which is likewise sufficiently fine <sup>9</sup>.

THE Arab writers inform us, that Solimân had many wives; and that one of these pre- dicted his death not long before it happened. Yezid Ebn Moballeb, Abd'alaziz Ebn Al Hâreth Ebn Al Hakem, and Fadl Ebn Moballeb, served that prince in the capacity of secre- taries of state; Mohammed Ebn Haram in that of Kâdi, or judge; Caab Ebn Khâled Al Abâsi in that of captain of the guards; and Abu Obeidah, his freed-man, in that of chamberlain. The first day of his Khalifat was Sunday, and the last Friday. His successor, Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz, said the funeral prayers over him, at the time of his interment. The inscription of his seal was, I believe in God our Saviour. Many particulars relating to him may e be met with in the Persian writers, that have been wholly omitted by all the Arab historians <sup>1</sup>.

S E C T. XIV.

- f I N obedience to Solimân's will, Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz was proclaimed Khalif the day on which his predecessor died, that is, the 20th, or 21st, of the month Safar, in the 99th year of the Hejra, answering to the month of February, in the year of CHRIST 718. The Greek writers likewise make this event to have happened about the same time; so that their authority, in the present case, supports the concurrent testimony of Al Makin, Abu Jaasar Al Tabari, Abu'lfeda, Abu'l Faraj, Ebn Arrabe, Euty chius, and all the other best Arab historians. His mother Omm Afem was the daughter of As, the son of the Khalif Omar. He suppressed the solemn malediction pronounced by the Khalifs of the house of Ommiyah, after the conclusion of divine service, from the accession of Moâwiyah I. to the death of Solimân, against the name of Ali, and that of all his family; every member of which was
- g cursed and excommunicated, during that interval, in all the mosques throughout the empire. Omar, according to Abu'l Faraj, made a speech to the people from the pulpit, which he ascended immediately after his inauguration, on this occasion; wherein he endeavoured to inspire them with sentiments of piety and moderation; telling them he bore not the least ill-will to any Moslem; and that the wicked only had reason to be apprehensive of meeting a with any severity from him. After which, he gave the robe he had on to the poor, and came down from the pulpit. But the abolition of this custom, however right in itself, by no means pleased many of his subjects; who, after the dismissal of the assembly, cried out, The law is neglected! the law is neglected! He likewise caused fruits of various kinds to be distributed amongst his servants, being afraid of an assassination. We are told by Khondemir, that, as soon as Omar was saluted Khalif, the most beautiful and finest horses were brought him out of his predecessor's stables; all which he refused; and that, mounting the horse he usually rode upon, when a private person, he went directly to his own house; being unwilling to incommode, in any respect, the last Khalif's family, which then resided in the palace. Nor could he, according to that author, be prevailed upon to take possession of any of the apartments assigned him as Khalif, till Solimân's domestics and relations, shamed by his superior modesty, had withdrawn themselves from thence. However, notwithstanding his virtuous disposition, if we will believe the Greek historians, he persecuted the Christians this and the following year; putting to death those who persisted in the profession of their religion, and remitting the tribute of those who became converts to Mohammedism. He is also said to have written, about the same time, a letter to the emperor Leo, containing an exposition of his faith, in order to make a proselyte of that prince. About this time, that is, the 100th year of the Hejra, Alabor, or, as Roderic of Toledo calls him, Alabor, sent a body of troops to ravage Gallia Narbonensis, and the hither part of Spain, into which great numbers of the Christians had retired, where they committed dreadful devastations; and, according to the last-mentioned author, imposed an annual tribute upon those provinces, as well as some other parts of Spain that had not yet been plundered by the Arabs. Alabor also treated with extreme severity the Christians settled at Corduba, and even the Moslems themselves that first came into Spain; whom he oppressed with famine, imprisoned, and put to various kinds of tortures, to compel them to discover the treasures they were supposed to have concealed. Abd'alaziz, the son of Mûsa, who married Roderic's widow, and fixed his residence at Seville, is also said to have been assassinated this year. It is likewise intimated by some of the Spanish historians, that, before the conclusion of it, there happened a very remarkable solar eclipse, which continued three hours, and was visible all over Spain; during a considerable part of which, the stars, as in the night, very clearly appeared.

Who discovered on several occasions a great affection for the family of Ali.

Tho' Omar did not distinguish himself in a military capacity, he discovered a most humane and benevolent disposition, and a remarkable affection for the house of Ali, on several occasions. The suppression of the solemn malediction above-mentioned was the first incontestable proof of this. The principal circumstances preparatory to, and attending, that unexpected event, have been related in the following manner by Khondemir, the Persian historian. Omar, having some conversation with a Jew, said to him, amongst other things, Ask of me one day or other in public my daughter in marriage. This the Jew did, and was answered by the Khalif, How can such a thing be, since you and I are of different religions. To this the Jew replied, Did not Mohammed give his daughter in marriage to Ali? The case there, said Omar, was quite different: for Ali was a Moslem, and has been the commander of the faithful. Why then, returned the Jew, do you curse him publicly in your mosques? Upon which, the Khalif, turning his face towards the principal of his courtiers then present, said to them, Answer this Jew. But finding them greatly embarrassed, and that they had no answer to make, he declared, that for the future, that malediction should be suppressed; and that, in the room of it, there should be pronounced the following verse of the Korân: "Forgive us, LORD, our sins; pardon likewise all our brethren, who make profession of the same faith that we do ourselves." Ebn Shohnab relates, that the verse substituted in the room of the malediction was, "God commands us to observe justice, and do good." Which formula, however, according to that author, did not fully take place before the 100th year of the Hejra. That year likewise Omar constituted Ayub Ebn Serjabil governor of Egypt. This Khalif also, about the same time, as a mark of his regard for the race of Ali, ordered restitution to be made to his descendents of the territory of Fidak, given Ali by Mohammed, when he bestowed his daughter upon him in marriage; and appointed a particular receiver to collect the revenues of that district, and distribute them amongst those that deduced their origin from the children Ali had by Fâtema, from time to time, by equal portions. 'Tis no wonder, therefore, that many of the Moslems, at this juncture, should have declared openly, that the house of Al Abbâs had more right to the Khalifat than that of

- a Ommiyah; as being descended in a direct line from Abd'almotaleb, the grandfather of Mohammed, as well as that of Ali himself, which had no other advantage over them, than that their great progenitor had espoused Fâtema, the daughter of the prophet. For, that the subjects of the Moslem empire began actually to talk after this manner, in the 100th year of the Hejra, we learn from some of the best oriental historians<sup>1</sup>.

- THE following year, being the 101st year of the Hejra, and commencing July 24th, 719, one Shûzib having revolted against Omar, under divers religious pretexts, the Khalif wrote to him, that, if his intention was only to reform religion and the state, whose interests he took to be inseparable, he might come to court, where they would concert together the most proper measures for settling all points according to his desire. Soon after Shûzib received the Khalif's letter, he sent two deputies to represent to him, that he had no subject of complaint against his person, as he could not but acknowledge him to be a very just and equitable prince; but that since, by his own conduct, he had visibly condemned that of the Khalifs of his house and family, he ought to cause them to be cursed publicly in the mosques, as they had done to Ali and his posterity, during their respective reigns. The deputies having executed their master's orders, Omar answered them in the following terms: "As what you require of me relates to another world, and not to this, I should think myself guilty of a very great sin, if I complied with your request. For, we do not find, that God has commanded his prophet to curse any one; nor are we authorized by his word to treat a person in that manner, on account of his wicked life; since Pharaoh himself, who, with so much impudence arrogated to himself divine honours, was never formally cursed for his enormous crimes. Much less can I order a solemn malediction to be publicly pronounced against the house of Ommiyah, my relations, who pray constantly at the usual times, observe the stated fasts, and perform all the other religious duties of the Moslems." The deputies, not being able to make any reply to so obvious a truth, opened to him another of their griefs, and said, "But, Sir, ought so just and equitable a prince, as your majesty is, to leave his crown to an impious and abandoned successor?" The Khalif told them, that such a case as this might possibly happen, and perhaps not; and that therefore they ought to leave to Providence the disposal of future events. To which they instantly replied, that "they knew Yezid Ebn Abd'almâlec, who had been declared his successor, to be possessed of all the bad qualities that could be inherent in the most flagitious prince." At these words, Omar could not forbear shedding tears, and desired three days time to think of a proper answer to what on this occasion they had suggested to him. The members of the house of Ommiyah, having been apprized of the particulars of this conference between Omar and Shûzib's deputies, were afraid lest the Khalif should change the order of succession, and transfer the Khalifat to another family. For this reason, they resolved to dispatch him; and therefore bribed a slave to poison him; which villainous design was carried into execution this present year. He died the 25th of Rajeb, after a short reign of two years five months and fourteen days, being then either 33, 37, 39, or 40, years of age, and was interred in the monastery of St. Simeon, situated near the little town of Mabarât, one of the dependencies of Hems; tho' his sepulchre was in the monastery of The Cow, at Maarra Noomani, according to the common opinion. We must here beg leave to inform our readers, that Maarra Noomani, or Maarra Al Nooman, was a very large city of Syria, between Hamath and Aleppo, in the province of Hems, that derived its name from Al Nooman Ebn Bafbir Al Sakabi, and had annexed to it a territory of a very considerable extent. This district abounded with olives, figs, pistachos, and various other kinds of fruits. It stood near to the river Kowaik, that washes the suburbs of Aleppo; and a little to the south of it there was formerly a sepulchre, in which some of the Syrian Arabs ridiculously imagined the remains of Joshua, the son of Nun, to have been deposited; which might possibly have occasioned the vulgar error mentioned by Al Makin, relating to the situation of the Khalif Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz's tomb. But, for a particular description of Maarra Al Nooman, or Maarra Noomani, and its territory, we must refer our curious readers to the oriental geographers, who, in this point, will give them full and ample satisfaction<sup>2</sup>.

THE Christians of Damascus being perfectly well acquainted with the mild and equitable disposition of this Khalif, complained to him of the violence offered them by his predecessor Al Walid, when he took from them by force the church of St. John in that city; and at the same time shewed him the instrument signed by Khâled Ebn Al Walid, when Damascus was taken; by which the free exercise of their religion, and the possession of all their churches, was to be effectually secured to them and their posterity. They, therefore, humbly petitioned Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz, that the said church of St. John might, in consequence of that writing, be then restored to them. But the Khalif, apprehending that such a restitution might excite commotions amongst the Moslems, begged, that, in lieu of their church, they would accept of the sum of money that had been offered them by Al Walid on the same occasion, namely, 40,000 dinârs, and with it build a new church in some other part of the town. The Christians absolutely refusing this, they were told by Abu Edris Al Holwâni, that, by virtue of the instrument mentioned, they were, indeed, intitled to the possession of all their churches in that part of the city, which was taken by capitulation; but that all those in the other part, which was carried by storm, by right of conquest, belonged to the Moslems. In order, therefore, to settle this affair to the satisfaction of both parties, he proposed, that the church of St. John, which the Khalif had ordered to be restored to them, upon their refusal of the money offered, should be ceded by the Christians to the Moslems; and that, upon this condition, the former should remain in possession of all the churches in that part of the town, and the territory belonging to it, laid claim to by the latter. This, after much wrangling and altercation, was agreed to on both sides, and confirmed by Omar, who wrote out an instrument, or schedule, with his own hand, to prevent any future incroachments. But, notwithstanding the uprightness and integrity of the Khalif, this must be allowed to have been an iniquitous decision. For, as Khâled Ebn Al Walid, who took one part of Damascus sword in hand, granted by the aforesaid schedule, that he signed, and which was the result of the Khalif's own particular decision, the possession of all the churches in that quarter to the Christians, and their posterity, through every future period of time; so the validity of this schedule ought not to have been denied, nor even called in question by any succeeding Khalif, or Moslem power, whatsoever <sup>a</sup>.

in his last sickness.

WE are told by Mohammed Ebn Emir Khoandshab, that when the poison taken by Omar began to operate upon him, and he was very ill in bed, his friends represented to him, that he ought to make use of some remedy for the recovery of his health. But he told them, that he was so perfectly resigned to the will of God, and so firmly persuaded of the fatal and inevitable term of human life, that he would not so much as rub the tip of his ear with a little oil, in order to be cured of his present indisposition. The same author adds, that he was so extremely frugal, that he took no more than two dinârs a day out of the royal treasury, for the subsistence of himself and his domestics; that he never wore any rich or sumptuous apparel; and that his Divan was generally held in a place but little illuminated, where he sat always upon the ground <sup>b</sup>.

A farther instance of his great humility
and frugality.

As a farther instance of this Khalif's great humility, it has been observed by Abu'l Faraj, that when he was visited by Moslema Ebn Abd'almâlec, in his last sickness, he lay upon a bed made of palm-tree leaves, supported by a pillow formed of beasts skins, and covered with a common ordinary garment. His lips appeared flaccid and of a livid colour, and he had on a dirty shirt. Moslema could not forbear blaming his sister Fâtema, who was Omar's wife, for suffering the emperor of the faithful to be exhibited to any person's view in so mean and sordid a condition. But, in order to justify her own conduct on this occasion, she assured Moslema, that the Khalif had never another shirt to put on; which, after thanks had been returned to God, for enduing so great a prince with such a meek and humble disposition, drew tears from that general. This writer has farther remarked, that the daily expence of Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz did not amount to above two dirhems <sup>c</sup>.

vision.

ONE of the principal Moslem doctors, named Majûshûn, falling into a trance, and being looked upon as dead by all the people about him, was accosted by an angel, that carried his soul to the gate of the first heaven; which was immediately opened to them. From thence they continued their journey to the seventh heaven, where Mohammed is supposed to reside. Upon their entrance, the angel, that conducted Majûshûn's soul thither, being asked who he had brought with him? answered, Majûshûn. He is not, said another angel, to be admitted into this place, before the expiration of a certain period of time. The Moslem doctor, therefore, was reconducted to the planet from whence he came by his celestial guide. However, Majûshûn informed his friends, (for he himself, it seems, published this account of his pretended vision) that he had a transient view of the inhabitants of the seventh heaven, and particularly of Mohammed, who had on each side of him Abu Becr and Omar, and held Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz in his bosom, and between his arms. Majûshûn, being surprized that the latter should have a more honourable situation assigned him in heaven than the former, asked the reason of this, and received for answer, that Abu Becr and Omar had been eminent for their justice and good works at a time when the Moslems were distinguished by their <sup>d</sup> <sup>e</sup> <sup>f</sup> a piety and zeal for the true religion; but that Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz surpassed them in this, that he possessed all their virtues in an age of injustice and corruption <sup>2</sup>.

WITH regard to his person, Omar was swarthy, as most of the Arabs are, lean, had a Omar's handsome face, and in it the scar of a wound he had received from a wild beast in his character. younger years. Notwithstanding his youth, he had a considerable number of grey hairs, which probably made him appear something older than he really was. As to his disposition, he was extremely just, religious, and devout; and had fixed his mind, in a manner from his infancy, intirely upon the other world. He seems to have been the brightest ornament of the Moslems in that wicked and degenerate age. After his death, the house to which he used frequently to retire, being then shut up, was opened; the Arabs hoping to discover a considerable treasure in it: but, upon examination, they found only there a close thick riding vest, that he sometimes wore, and a sort of rope or cord hung up, with which he now-and-then amused himself, after his spirits had been exhausted by long and fervent prayer. His secretaries of state were Raja Ebn Yakya Al Kendi, Solimân's visir, and Ebn Abi Rakia; his judge, or Kâdi, Abd'allâh Ebn Sa'id Al Ansâli; the captain of his guards, Rawab Ebn Yezid Al Saksâki; and his chamberlains, Hobaisb and Raja, his servants. The inscription of his seal was, OMAR the son of ABD'ALAZIZ believes in GOD. The first day of his Khalifat was Saturday, and the last Friday. The reason why Solimân preferred him to his own children was, because they were too young to ascend the Moslem throne, as may be inferred from Abu'l Faraj. The authors followed by Al Makin make his mother to have been the daughter of the second Khalif Omar, who, they say, before his death, declared, that his daughter should bring forth a son, who would fill the world with justice. We have a particular history of the life and actions of this Khalif, composed by Mohammed Ebn Hosein Al Ajari, a writer of considerable note, who died in the year of the Hejra 360 <sup>a</sup>.

d AS Yezid Ebn Abd'almâlec, by his brother Solimân's late settlement of the succession; Yezid Ebn was to ascend the Moslem throne after the death of Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz, he was Abd'almâlec saluted Khalif the same day that his predecessor died. His mother Atecab was the daughter succeeds Omar. of Yezid Ebn Moâwiyah Ebn Abu Sofiân, and the surname usually applied to him Abu Khâled. 'Tis worthy observation, that the Arab historians have transmitted down to posterity the names of their emperors mothers, in the same manner as some of the sacred writers have done those of the mothers of the kings of Judah and Israel. Nor is this to be wondered at; the customs of the Arabs, as well as their phrases, proverbs, and manner of expression, having all along, in most particulars, agreed with those of the Hebrews, who flourished even in some of the earliest periods of the world <sup>b</sup>.

e As soon as Yezid Ebn Abd'almâlec came to the crown, he removed all the governors of Moslema re- provinces, who had been promoted to their respective posts by his predecessor Omar; which duces the rebel undoubtedly excited several commotions in the empire. These, however, were probably Yezid, and soon extinguished, as we scarce find any mention made of them in history. But the rebel- drives the lion of Yezid Ebn Al Mohalleb Ebn Abu Safra, which happened in the year of the Hejra Turks out of 101, created a good deal of trouble to the Khalif. Yezid, knowing that this prince, by his ill qualities, had rendered himself extremely disagreeable to the Moslems, renounced his allegiance to him; and, having drawn together a strong body of troops at Basra, advanced to Cûfa, the capital of the Arabian Irâk, where he met with a considerable reinforcement. Yezid Ebn Abd'almâlec, being informed of Ebn Al Mohalleb's defection, sent his brother Moslema and Al Abbâs Ebn Al Walid against him, at the head of a powerful army; who, coming up with the rebels, fell upon them with such fury, that they slew a great number of them upon the spot, and put the rest to flight. Yezid Ebn Al Mohalleb himself having been killed in the action, Moslema ordered his head to be cut off, and sent it immediately to the Khalif. However, Ebn Al Mohalleb's son Moâwiyah, with some of his father's troops, made his escape to Hormûz, where the rebel Yezid had before built a fortress, that was deemed impregnable, in order to serve him for a retreat, in case any misfortunes should happen to him. But his governor there refusing to open the gates to Moâwiyah, he was pursued by the Khalif's generals, after several other successive defeats, as far as the Indus.

The writers followed by Al Makin, however, give us a different account of Moâwiyah's motions. After his father had been overthrown, according to them, he fled with great precipitation to Wâset, where he found Adi Ebn Artab, the Khalif's governor of Basra, whom he ordered, with thirty-two of his men, to be put to the sword. From Wâset, if we will believe these authors, Moâwiyah and his troops made the best of their way to Basra, and afterwards endeavoured to reach Sindia; but, being overtaken by a body of the Khalif's forces, under the command of Halal Ebn Akbûr Al Mazâni, sent in pursuit of them by Moslema, they were all either cut to pieces or taken prisoners; and the latter being conducted to Damascus by the general's order, Yezid caused them all to be put to death. Moslema, for his eminent services, was appointed by the Khalif governor of Irâk, and had the lieutenancy of Khorasân also conferred upon him: but, upon some disgust, as it should seem, he was soon deprived of both those posts, and succeeded in them by Omar Ebn Habira Al Fozari; tho', according to Abu'l Faraj, Omar presided over Khorasân, as well as both the Persian and Arabian Irâk, before the extinction of the late rebellion. Nor does it appear from that author, that Moslema had ever the direction or management of affairs in any of those provinces. Omar, being settled in his government, sent a body of the Moslem troops, under the conduct of Al Farab Ebn Abd'allab, either to make an irruption into the Turkish territories, or to force the Turks to abandon the Moslem provinces. Al Farab executed his orders with great bravery, made himself master of a fortress called Meltabar, or Meltahara, placed in Al Turk, or Turkestan, by Al Makin, and drove Ebn Hâf, the Turkish Khân, or Kbâkân, before him from place to place. But notwithstanding this, the Khân, having received a reinforcement, waited for Al Farab at Ardebil, in the province of Aderbijân, engaged him there, and, after a vigorous action, intirely defeated him, putting both him and the greatest part of the troops he commanded to the sword. However, Moslema, in a short time, advancing against Ebn Hâf with another Arab army, at last came up with him, overthrew him in a pitched battle, and forced the enemy to abandon not only the province of Aderbijân, but every other part of the Khalif's dominions. About the same time, Yezid deprived Ayub Ebn Serjabil of the government of Egypt, to which honourable post he had been advanced by Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz, and substituted in his room Basbar Ebn Safwân Al Calbi; who was afterwards sent to Africa, and succeeded by his brother, Handalah Ebn Safwân, in Egypt. But, upon his being deposed in the 104th year of the Hejra, Mohammed Ebn Abd'almâlec Ebn Merwân, by the Khalif's appointment, assumed to himself the lieutenancy of that country. All which events, according to the eastern historians, were some of the transactions of the 101st, 102d, 103d, and 104th, years of the Hejra.

Little said of this Khalif by the Greek writers.

WE find little said of this Khalif by the Greek writers. Theophanes only observes, that Izid, the name he gives Yezid, succeeded Umar, or Omar, who reigned but two years and four months; that this Izid, at the instigation of a Jew of Laodicea, who promised him a reign of forty years, as a reward for his impiety, published an edict against images, injoining his subjects to destroy all those erected by the Christians in their churches throughout the Moslem empire; that he slew Izid, the son of Mualab, that is, Yezid Ebn Al Mohalleb, who had rebelled against him, and reduced the provinces he had seized upon to his obedience; and, lastly, that he died, after he had sat upon the Moslem throne about four years, before his infernal edict, relating to the destruction of images, could either be sufficiently promulged, or put in execution. Cedrenus speaks of him in much the same terms. Dionysius Telmarenensis relates, that this Khalif commanded his subjects to exterminate white dogs, white pigeons, white cocks, and, in short, all other animals of the same colour; and that he issued the decree relating to this extermination in the year of our LORD 725. He also raised a persecution against the Christians, forbade a Christian to be admitted an evidence against a Moslem, and fixed the value or price of the latter at double that of the former, according to this author, the same year.

ABOUT the time of Yezid Ebn Mohalleb's defection in Irâk, one Zama had the command of the Moslem forces in Spain. He introduced some innovations, relating to the disposition of the tribute exacted of the Christians in that country, which probably rendered him more unacceptable to many of the Arabs there than even the worst of his predecessors. Zama, having received orders to extend the Moslem conquests in those western parts of the world, passed the Pyrenees with a powerful army, took the city of Narbonne, the capital of Gallia Narbonensis, and laid siege to Tolosa, at present known by the name of Tbolouse, or Toulouse.

- a But here he was deserted by the good fortune that had hitherto attended him. Eudo, called by some of the French writers count Eudes, general of the Franks, or the French, came to the relief of the besieged, attacked Zama in his camp, killed him and a great number of his men upon the spot, and forced the rest to abandon the siege. Not content with this victory, he marched afterwards to Narbonne, retook that place, and of course obliged the enemy to retire out of the province to which it belonged. Yezid, having received advice of what had happened, sent Azam, or Adham, Ebn Malec, with a body of troops, into Spain, to protect the Arab conquests there from the insults of the French, and enable the Moslems to repair the loss they had sustained. He reduced several fortified places in Spain, that had
- b not before submitted to the Arabs, extended the tribute to be paid into the Khalif's coffers, built the famous bridge at Corduba, in the 102d year of the Hejra, and was at last assassinated by his own people at Tortosa. Some of the Spanish writers make Zama and Azam to have been the same person; nor does such a notion appear to us at all improbable. Be that as it will, after the defeat and death of Zama, the Arabs chose one Abd'alrahman for their leader, who presided over them in Spain till the arrival of a new governor from the Moslem court. The Khalif being informed of the murder of Azam, constituted one Ambiza his lieutenant in Spain, about the year of the Hejra 103; who made several incursions upon the territories of the French; tho' he rather meditated, than was directly engaged in, a war against that people. Towards the conclusion of his government, he proposed to invade
- c that part of the enemy's country bordering upon the frontiers of Spain: but soon after he had begun his march, in what manner we have not been told by any of the Spanish writers, a period was put to his days; and, before his death, he resigned to one Odra the command of the Moslem army destined to act against the French, which, after that unexpected event, immediately returned home. We must not forget to observe, that, during this interval, Pelagius wrested the city of Leon out of the hands of the Arabs, and gained several other very important advantages over them. This prince is said to have been the first who took for his coat of arms a red lion in a white field, in which he was afterwards followed by his successors in the kingdom of Leon. Some of the Spanish writers inform us, that, at this time, there were several Arab princes, or Emirs, in Spain; and that the chief of these,
- d who was properly the Khalif's governor, or viceroy, had the title of the king of Corduba. But those writers have by no means given us, in their relations of what happened during the period immediately following the first settlement of the Arabs in Spain, a clear and distinct account either of their own or the Moslem affairs*.

- As Yezid Ebn Abd'almalec was much addicted to pleasure, even in the Khalifat of his brother Solimân, he then bought a singing girl, named Hababah, of whom he was passionately fond, for 4000 dinârs; but Solimân, thinking this a disgrace to him, obliged him to part with her, and she was afterwards purchased by an Egyptian. Saada, Yezid's wife, being desirous of ingratiating herself in a more particular manner with her husband, once asked him, when he was Khalif, whether there was any thing in the world that he yet desired, after
- e his elevation to the Moslem throne? He answered, Yes, Hababah. Upon which, Saada procured her for him; which wonderfully conciliated his affections to her. He had likewise another concubine called Salamah, that he tenderly loved. Being in that part of Palastine, called Belad al Arden, or Belad al Ordonna, that is, the country, or plain of Jordan, and diverting himself in a garden with Hababah, whom he loved to distraction, there; he was served at his collation with some of the most excellent fruits of that charming country. During this little repast, he threw a grape at her, which she immediately took up, and put to her mouth, in order to eat it; but being too large, and passing across her throat, it stuck in the passage without a possibility of being removed; so that she lost her breath and was suffocated in an instant. So we find this matter related by Kbondemir. But the grape stuck
- f some time in her gullet, and only occasioned a disorder that at last terminated in her death, according to Abu'l Faraj. Be that as it will, this melancholy accident so affected Yezid, that he fell into an excess of grief, and was inconsolable for the loss of so amiable an object. Nay, the transport of his love and of his sorrow carried him so far on this occasion, that he would not suffer the body of his deceased mistress to be interred for a week, according to Kbondemir, or three days if we will believe Abu'l Faraj. Nor would he have permitted it then to be inhumed, had it not been for the repeated instances of his domestics, who could no longer bear the intolerable stink of the dead carcase. However, the sepulchre itself was not able to cure his frenzy. He ordered that to be opened, and the body to be exposed once more to his view. In fine, being incapable of moderating his grief, he survived his dear Hababah
- g only fifteen days; and, before he expired, he ordered his remains to be deposited in a grave near her tomb. This sorrowful event happened in the 105th year of the Hejra, after he had reigned a little above four years. With regard to his person, he was a man of a fair complexion, had good features, and a round face. As for his character, he was extremely indolent, squandered away vast sums of money upon his wives, concubines, and diversions of various kinds, and was a slave to his passions; as in some measure appears from what has been already observed, and might be farther confirmed by other stories related of him, were it in any manner necessary. His secretaries were successively Omar Ebn Habira, Ibrahim Ebn Habla, and Asama Ebn Zeid Al Sclibi; his judges, or Kâdis, Abd'abrahmân Al Hasbâbâsh and Sa'id Ebn Abu Wafâd; the captain of his guards, Caab Ebn Khâled Al Abâsi; and his chamberlains, Sa'id, his servant, and Khâled, his freedman. He died, according to some of the eastern writers, in Palestine; or, as others will have it, at Harrân in Mesopotamia, on the 23d day of the month Shaaban; being then about 29, 31, 33, or 37, (for so much do authors differ amongst themselves) years of age. Nay, some historians write, that he died of a consumption, after he had declared his brother Heshâm Ebn Abd'al-mâlec his successor, when he was about forty years of age. Yezid, a little before his death, sent one Yabya Ebn Solimân to take upon him the command of the Moslem forces in Spain. This Yabya was a person of great sagacity, discernment, and penetration; but had something of cruelty in his temper. However he was a lover of justice, and obliged the Arabs to restore to the Christians all the effects of which they had unjustly deprived them in time of peace. It may not be improper to remark, that the name, or surname, Miramolin, or Amiramomen, frequently applied by the Spanish writers to the Khalîfs, is only a corruption of the words Amiro'l Mumenin, Amiro'lmumenin, or Amir Al Mumenin, emperor of the believers. The most exact of the Moslem authors inform us, that the first day of Yezid's reign was Saturday, tho' in this they are not perfectly consistent with themselves, and the last Tuesday; and that the duration of his Khalîfat was precisely four years and twenty-nine days<sup>f</sup>.

HESHAM EBN ABD'ALMALEC, upon his brother Yezid's decease, was elevated to the Khalîfat, towards the close of the month Shaabân, in the year of the Hejra 105. He was surnamed Abu'l Walid, and his mother was Fâtema, surnamed Omm Hâshem, the daughter of Hâshem Ebn Ismael Ebn Hâshem Ebn Al Walid Al Makhzumi. His uncle Yezid nominated Heshâm his successor a little before his death, on condition that his own son Al Walid, after the demise of that prince, should be called to the succession. When Yezid died, Heshâm was at Rusâfa, a city in the neighbourhood of Rakka upon the Euphrates; but as soon as he received advice of his advancement to the Khalîfat, he mounted his horse, and came directly to Damascus. Soon after his promotion, he appointed Khâled Ebn Abd'allah Al Karli his lieutenant of Irâk, and removed his brother, Mohammed Ebn Abd'al-mâlec, from his government of Egypt; substituted in his room his cousin, Hasan Ebn Yusuf Ebn Yabya, of the house of Ommiyah, who continued in that post till the year of the Hejra 108. Nothing very material happened in the Moslem empire, an account of which has been handed down to us by the Arab historians, during the first year of Heshâm's reign<sup>e</sup>.

It seems, however, to be intimated by Theophanes, that Heshâm planted gardens and orchards, cultivated the fruitful parts of his territories contiguous to the emperor's dominions, and built palaces in several of the provinces subjugated by the Arabs, in the 105th and the 106th years of the Hejra. This writer likewise gives us to understand, that, about the same time, he undertook an expedition against the Greeks; but was obliged to retire with shame, after he had lost a great number of men, into Syria. Cedrenus is silent as to the Arab affairs, during the 106th year of the Moslem æra. Dionysius Telmarenensis only observes, that Heshâm succeeded Yezid; and that the following year, or the 106th of the Hejra, Abib, bishop of Edeffa, whose successor was named Constantine, departed this life. Nor does it appear, from the Spanish historians, that any thing remarkable, during the latter of those years, happened in Spain<sup>h</sup>.

HOWEVER, before we conclude our account of the events of the year 105, it may not be improper to observe, that some dirhems were coined in the mint that had been set up either at Rusâfa, or Rufaka, this year; as may be inferred from one of those dirhems found at Stegen, a village near Dantzick, the 2d day of June, 1722. On the reverse of this piece is exhibited

- a the following inscription, in the Câfic character, MOHAMMED is the apostle of God, he is the perfect gift; and on the other side, these words, Ber Refukata, or Rusafata, the letters of which the second word here is composed being but indifferently preserved, chamsan wameaten; i. e. at Rufaka, or Rusâfa, in the year 105. By which we are informed, that this dirbêm was struck either at Rufaka, or Rusâfa, in the 105th year of the Hejra, and, as it should seem, the first of the Khalîf Heshâm. This we learn from M. Kehr, who, tho' he is not able precisely to determine in which of those places the piece was coined, is inclined to think, that it must have been sent out of the mint erected in the latter of them, as such a notion is not only countenanced by the letters themselves, but likewise by that part of the Arab history we are now upon, which informs us, that Heshâm was proclaimed Khalîf at Rusâfa the very year in which this dirbêm was struck. To what has been advanced on this occasion by M. Kehr, we must beg leave to add, that the piece in view could not have been coined at Rufaka, or, as 'tis called by *Goli*us, Rafika; because that city was founded by Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr, who did not mount the Moslem throne till the 136th year of the Hejra, and consequently did not exist 31 years before M. Kehr must, therefore, have been mistaken when he supposes, that the dirbêm might have been struck at Rufaka, as well as Rusâfa, in the year of the Hejra 106; and that it is something difficult to determine to which of those cities it belongs. Rusâfa and Rufaka were both of them cities of Mesopotamia, seated at a small distance from Rakka, upon the eastern bank of the Euphrates. The former of them seems to be the Rhescipha of Ptolemy, (Ῥεσκιφα) and is frequently mentioned by the
- b Syriac writers <sup>h</sup>.

In the 107th year of the Hejra, beginning May 19th, 725, Moslema, or Masalmas, as The Arabs he is called by the Greek writers, took Cæsarea in Cappadocia; and Moâwiyah Ebn Heshâm, make several another of the Arab generals, made an irruption into the Christian territories, doing irreparable damage in the provinces through which he moved. This year likewise, Aner one of the Moslem commanders invaded Nicea in Bithynia with a body of 15,000 men; after which, Moâwiyah, coming up with an army of 85,000 men, formed the siege of that city. The Arabs battered the walls with such fury, that they levelled a great part of them with the ground, and made several general assaults; but were every time beaten off with incredible loss, and at last forced to abandon the siege. Dionysius Telmarenfis relates, that Moslema, or Masalmas, made himself master of Neocæsarea this year, and carried away all the inhabitants with him prisoners, except the Jews, who betrayed the place into his hands. The Spanish writers make no mention of any military operations this year in Spain; but only inform us, that Heshâm permitted both the Arabs and Christians in that country to enjoy the sweets of peace, and sent one Ibabea, or Tabya, an Arab of note, to govern his subjects there <sup>i</sup>.

The following year, being the 108th of the Hejra, commencing May 8th, 726, the Heshâm Arabs, under the conduct of Moâwiyah, invaded the imperial territories, carried a fortress there by assault, and then returned home. About the same time, Hafas Ebn Al Walid, upon the abdication of Hasan Ebn Yusuf, was appointed governor of Egypt. Nothing material passed this year in Spain; the Moslem commanders there being wholly employed in amassing treasures for Heshâm, who was richer, as well as more covetous, than any of his predecessors. According to Eutychius, one Constantine was constituted patriarch of Constantinople either this or the preceding year <sup>k</sup>.

The next year, being the 109th of the Hejra, beginning April 28th, 727, Moslema Ebn Abd'almâlec attacked the Turks, or, as they are called by some of the eastern writers, the Huns, that is, the subjects of the Khâkân, who had made an irruption into Armenia, and forced them to conclude a treaty of peace with him. He also penetrated the same year to the defile called the Portæ Caspiæ by the ancients, not far from the Caspian sea; which had served as a sort of barrier to the Moslem empire on that side, before the late irruption; the Turks, or Huns, having been long shut up by it in the country that properly appertained to them. This affair is, however, differently related by Theophanes, who tells us, that the son of the Khâkân invaded Armenia and Aderbijan with a powerful army, overthrew Garach, or Al Jarah, the Arab general, who pretended to oppose him, committed dreadful devastations in that province, and then returned home. But Dionysius Telmarenfis, to whom we are indebted for the former relation, living at no great distance from the scene of action, not much above forty years after this campaign, and agreeing better with what we find recorded of the reign of Heshâm by the Arab historians than the Greek writers, we shall not scruple to prefer his authority to that of Theophanes, whose inaccuracy with regard to the Moslem affairs has already been a touched upon, in the point before us <sup>1</sup>.

The Arabs
France ;

SOME of the French and Spanish authors maintain, that Eudo, duke of Aquitain, called by the later French writers count Eudes, being about this time defeated and put to flight by Charles Martel, demanded assistance of the Arabs, who had possessed themselves of Spain, against that conqueror. The Moslems, continue the same authors, accepting of this invitation, passed the Pyrenees, and advanced into Gascoign, to the number of 400,000 souls, women, children, and slaves, included, under the command of one Abd'alrahmán ; imagining, that they should make themselves masters of that province without striking a stroke. They committed dreadful ravages in their march ; pillaging every place, both sacred and profane, without distinction, through which they moved. This expedition is, however, b placed some years later by Roderic of Toledo, who seems to have reason on his side. He also gives us to understand, that, about the year we are now upon, this prince's avarice occasioned commotions in several parts of the empire ; which were not without great difficulty, and a very copious effusion of human blood, appeased <sup>m</sup>.

and are defeated by
tel.

IN the 110th year of the Hejra, beginning April 17th, 728, Moslema Ebn Abd'almálec advanced with a body of Arab troops to the coast of the Caspian sea, restored the fortifications of the afore said defile that had been destroyed by the Turks in their late irruption into Armenia, seized upon Derbent at the foot of mount Caucasus, together with the district belonging to it, and obliged the Turks to take an oath never to pass their own frontiers, in order to disturb the repose of the Moslem territories. But they soon violating that oath, and c invading Armenia, he attacked them with such bravery, that he forced them to retire into their own dominions. After which, he appointed Merwán Ebn Mohammed governor of Armenia, and then returned into Syria. Theophanes, therefore, deserves little regard, when he intimates, that Moslema was worsted this year by the Turks in a general action, and, after having sustained a very great loss, obliged to fly into the Khalif's territories with the utmost precipitation. About this time, Abd'almálec Ebn Refa'a succeeded Hafas Ebn Al Walid Al Hadrami in the government of Egypt. Some of the French and Spanish writers relate, that Eudo, being vastly terrified at the approach of such a multitude of Arabs, as that above-mentioned, who laid waste the country through which they marched, joined Charles Martel with all his forces, and, in conjunction with him, attacked the infidels this year near d Tours with so much courage, that they were overthrown with incredible slaughter ; no less than 375,000 of them, amongst whom were Abd'alrahmán, the Arab general himself, and almost all the officers and persons of distinction that served under him, having been killed in the action. Of the Christians no more than 1500 are said to have been missing, after the end of the engagement. This blow, however, was not given the Moslems, according to Roderic of Toledo, so early as the 110th year of the Hejra. That author scruples not to affirm, that not only Gallia Narbonensis and Gascoign, but likewise Calabria and part of Apulia, if not Sicily itself, about this time, tho' before the overthrow at Tours, acknowledged the sovereignty of the Khalif.

The Jacobites
dispossessed of their churches
in Egypt.

THE following year, being the 111th of the Hejra, commencing April 6th, 729, one e Cosmas, of the Melchite persuasion, was constituted patriarch of Alexandria ; who, if we will believe Eutychius, could neither write nor read. Be that as it will, upon his arrival at Damascus, he met with a gracious reception from Heshám, who after he had a conference with him, wrote to Abd'allab Ebn Al Jibán Al Sakwi, his lieutenant of Egypt, to put the Melchites, under Cosmas's government and direction, in possession of all the churches that had been occupied by the Jacobites in Alexandria for the space of ninety-seven years ; that is, from the third year of Omar Ebn Al Khattáb to the seventh of the Khalif Heshám ; during which interval, the Jacobites had remained masters of all the Christian churches in Egypt, except that of St. Saba at Alexandria, and that of St. Michael in Kafr Al Shama', to which the Melchites had been confined. Nor did the Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria only supply f Egypt with bishops for so long a term, but he likewise sent many others into Nubia ; the people of which kingdom, till the seventh year of Heshám, were almost intirely of the Jacobite persuasion. This uncommon favour was, however, not granted Cosmas by the Khalif without the interposition of several learned men, and even many valuable presents, which he brought with him to Damascus, to facilitate the execution of his project, according to Al Makín. That historian, nevertheless, seems to this advance last particular without pro-

- a per authority to support it, as not the least mention has been made of it by Eutychius, the author followed by him on this occasion, tho' he represents Cosmas as a master of needless before his elevation to the patriarchate of Alexandria, and altogether illiterate; and seems to imply, that either a rich present, or a good round sum of money, was necessary to influence the Khalif in his favour. Be that as it will, the former author is most certainly mistaken, when he affirms this event to have happened in the third year of the Khalifat of Heshâm; since the latter, whom he pretends to have transcribed on this occasion, asserts, in express terms, that Cosmas was advanced to the patriarchial dignity in the seventh year of that prince's reign. As this point of conduct in the Khalif, whatever was the motive to it, produced a sort of ecclesiastical revolution amongst the Christians in Egypt, we could not prevail upon
- b ourselves to omit inserting an account of so remarkable a transaction, tho' not immediately relating to the history of the Arabs, here °.

ABOUT the same time, as we are told by the eastern writers, Heshâm ordered several towns The Moslems and villages to be built on the river Zaitun, which seems to have derived its name from invade Cap- Zaita, or Zeita, a town about sixty stadia, or furlongs, from Karkisia, or Kirkisia, the Cer- padocia.

- c cusium, or Circesium, of the antients, in that part of Mesopotamia called by the Arabs Diyar Rabia, or rather Diyar Moder, according to Golius. This place has been taken notice of by Zesimus, the historian. Moslema Ebn Abd'almâlec, the Khalif's brother, and general, is also said to have erected at this time some towns and castles on the river Beth-Calas; but with what view or design the Arabs built any forts there, we are not told by any author.
- c That general afterwards, with a body of the Moslem forces, made an irruption into Cappadocia, and reduced there a fortress of considerable strength. This year the Khalif's governor of Africa sent a new lieutenant, named Odoysâ, into Spain; who, being a person of great levity and inexperience, by no means proved acceptable to the Arabs there. Him, therefore, Heshâm thought fit soon to remove from that post, and to substitute Yaman Ebn Abinaza, in his room. Yaman continued in his government about five months, and, after the expiration of that short term, was succeeded by one Autuman, or Othmân, of whom we scarce find any thing said by the Arab historians; so that nothing remarkable, through the whole course of this year, seems to have happened in Spain °.

- d THE next year, being the 112th year of the Hejra, the first day of which was March The Moslem 26th, 730, Moslema, according to Theophanes, undertook an expedition against the Turks, affairs in and penetrated to the coast of the Caspian sea; but, being intimidated by the forces of the Spain, during Khâkan, returned home, without effecting any thing. That this was really the case, we are the year of the more inclined to believe, from the silence of the Moslem writers in relation to any advantage gained by the Khalif's army this year in those parts, than from the authority of Theophanes, which, in such points as this, is frequently not to be depended upon. Autuman, or Othmân, Heshâm's lieutenant in Spain, was displaced, after he had remained at Corduba about four months, and succeeded by Al Hatam Ebn Obeid. Against this new governor a conspiracy was soon formed; several of the principal Arabs holding private cabals, in order to discover a proper method of deposing him. But they being seized, before they could carry their design
- e into execution, he ordered some of them to be publicly whipt, and others to be beheaded. Amongst the former there was one Zath, or Zeid, an Arab of great eloquence and noble extraction; who after he had been treated in a very ignominious manner, made his escape out of Spain, and took a journey to Damascus, where he and one Mahimen, another Moslem of distinction, gave the Khalif a full account of everything that had happened. They also desired, that Al Haytam might be recalled, and Abd'alrahmân appointed king of Corduba, or governor of Spain, in his room; which Heshâm readily granted. Upon their arrival in Spain, Mahimen, who had been invested with full power and authority by the Khalif for that purpose, ordered Al Haytam to be publicly whipped, carried with his hands bound behind his back, and loaded with irons, upon an ass, through the streets of Corduba, and then to be imprisoned for life. As for Abd'alrahmân, he not being then to be found, Mohammed Ebn Abd'al-
- f lab was constituted governor of Spain, and acted in that capacity about two months; at the end of which term, Abd'alrahmân himself appeared. The French annals, according to Joannes Vascus, pretend, that, about this time, the Arabs, at the instigation of Hunold and Waisar, Ludo's sons, made another irruption into France, and penetrated as far as Burgundy with a numerous army, laying waste all the country through which they moved; but were driven again by Charles Martel into their own dominions, after they had lost a very considerable part of their troops. In the mean time, Pelagius still maintained himself in the possession of all the posts he had so long occupied upon the Moslem frontiers; nor could he be dislodged from thence by all the efforts of the enemy °.

Heshâm's
troops gain
some advantages over the Christians.

IN the 113th year of the Hejra, Moslema marched at the head of a powerful army <sup>a</sup> against the Khâkân, took several of that prince's towns, and carried off a great number of his subjects into slavery, together with an immense quantity of plunder. Makkyab, the Khalîf's son, also penetrated into Paphlagonia, took many of the Christians in that province prisoners, and returned home loaded with the spoils he acquired in this expedition. Solimân, another of Heshâm's sons, advanced with a body of troops into another of the imperial provinces, reduced the castle of Pelczonium, laid waste the neighbouring tract, defeated a Greek army that pretended to make head against him, and then returned home with inconsiderable loss. Some of the Arab writers affirm, that the Greek emperor himself, whom they call Constantine, was present in the action, and fell into the hands of Solimân; but, as Leo Isaurus, or Isauricus, sat then upon the imperial throne, and was prob- <sup>b</sup> ably at Constantinople when that engagement happened, this last article merits not the least attention <sup>c</sup>.

Abd'alrah-
mân constituted governor
of Spain.

ABD'ALRAHMAN, if we will believe Roderic of Toledo, was this year constituted the Khalîf's lieutenant in Spain; but was scarce settled in his government, when one Muniz assembled a body of troops in order to depose him. Muniz, however, not being able to take the field against Abd'alrahmân, was obliged to shut himself up in the principal city of the Cerretani, where he was straitly besieged by the governor's forces. At last, finding himself incapable of defending the place any longer, he endeavoured to make his escape; but, being closely pursued by one of Abd'alrahmân's detachments, he was forced to throw him- <sup>c</sup> self headlong from off a precipice, and miserably perished. His wife, who was count Eudo's daughter, and one of the most celebrated beauties of the age, fell into the hands of the victors, and was sent by Abd'alrahmân to Damascus, as a present to the Khalîf. The death of Muniz, whose head was cut off, and brought to the governor, proved the total extinction of this rebellion; which, had Muniz been reinforced by a body of French troops, Eudo at first seeming to favour him, might have been attended with fatal consequences, both to Abd'alrahmân and all the Khalîf's other subjects in Spain. It seems to be intimated by some of the Spanish writers, that the famous Pelagius, who had so signalized himself in his wars against the Arabs, died either this or the following year <sup>d</sup>.

by the Greeks.

THE next year, being the 114th year of the Hejra, Solimân Ebn Heshâm penetrated, with an army of 90,000 men, into the imperial territories. He advanced as far as Tyana in Cappa- <sup>d</sup> docia, and had four generals to serve under him in this expedition. Mûlec Ebn Shabib and Abd'allah Ebn Batal, two of those generals, being arrived at Synnada in Phrygia, with 50,000 men, were met and engaged there by an imperial army, under the conduct of the emperor Leo himself, and his son Constantine Copronymus, according to Theophanes, which gave them so complete an overthrow, that they had above 45,000 of their men killed upon the spot, and the rest with great difficulty made their escape. That author affirms this glorious event to have happened in the 23d year of Leo's reign, about the 122d of the Hejra; but Dionysius Telmarenensis seems to place it in or near the present year; and him we chuse to follow, for the reasons above assigned <sup>e</sup>.

Syria.

ABOUT the same time, an impostor appeared in Syria, who gave out, that he was Moses <sup>e</sup> risen from the dead, and seduced great numbers of the Jews, whom he defrauded of considerable sums of money, and then fled into another province. But being pursued and taken, he was brought before the Khalîf, who delivered him up the Jews, that they might inflict what punishment they should think fit upon him. Which event is placed by Theophanes, wrongly, as we apprehend, in the fifth year of Leo Isauricus's reign; but by Dionysius Telmarenensis, with greater accuracy and precision, as we believe, in or about the present year <sup>f</sup>.

French.

ABD'ALRAHMAN, suspecting that count Eudo had favoured his son-in-law Muniz's rebel- <sup>f</sup> lion, which he had so happily extinguished, resolved to follow his blow, and carry the war into the heart of France. Having, therefore, assembled a powerful army, he entered that kingdom, and advanced to Arles upon the Rhofne; where he attacked and defeated a large body of the Franks, or the French, that attempted to obstruct his march, killed many of them upon the spot, and pushed a great number of them into the Rhofne, who not being able to gain the opposite bank, were every one of them drowned. He afterwards passed the Garonne and the Dordonne, overthrew count Eudo, who endeavoured to stop the progress of his arms, and penetrated into the interior part of France. In fine, he pursued that count through several provinces, ravaged the country through which he moved, in a dreadful manner, and at last arrived with his numerous forces at Tours. That city likewise he made a scene of blood, ravages, and confusion, reducing to ashes the church and all the

- a palaces there, and laying waste the whole district belonging to it with fire and sword. Charles Martel, being informed of these devastations, and reinforced by a body of Germans and Gepidæ, came up with those plunderers near Tours, engaged them for seven days together, and at last gave them a total overthrow; making himself master of their baggage, and took from them spoils of an inestimable value. The shatter'd remains of Abd'alrahmân's army, after this memorable defeat, with great difficulty, reached the frontiers of Spain, and left the French in peaceable possession of the whole tract that had been delivered by their victorious general. This is the account of Abd'alrahmân's fatal French expedition handed down to us by Roderic of Toledo; which, as our curious readers will at first sight perceive, differs not only in point of time, but likewise in several other particulars, from that already
- b given. Some authors tell us, that the Moslem general took Avignon by surprize this campaign; and that it was afterwards retaken by the French. They also relate, that, the following year, Charles Martel overthrew the Arabs, marching, under the command of one of their generals, to the relief of Narbonne, then besieged by a body of the French forces, at Illiberis, with incredible slaughter; scarce any of them escaping into Spain. Which of these seemingly jarring relations approaches the nearest to truth, we shall not take upon us to determine, as a certain author, with very little judgment, has done; but leave it to our more sagacious and intelligent readers to chuse which of them they please <sup>w</sup>.

- c ABOUT the 115th year of the Hejra, Heshâm sent an army under the command of Kalîn <sup>The Khalîf's</sup> and Zobair, two of his generals, to reduce Atikh, who had rebelled against him, and drawn <sup>forces routed by Atikh.</sup> together a considerable force to support him in his defection. Atikh, receiving advice of their approach, advanced to Sigara, fell upon them there by night, intirely defeated them, and put many of their men to the sword. However, as we find nothing afterwards said of him by any good author, it is probable that, in a short time, he thought fit to submit to the Khalîf. About the same year, according to Theophanes, Moâwiyah Ebn Heshâm, with a body of the Moslem troops, ravaged several of the imperial provinces in Asia, without any considerable loss. A very large and resplendent comet, if we will believe that writer, likewise appeared at this time there <sup>x</sup>.

- d IN the 116th year of the Hejra, Solimân Ebn Heshâm advanced into the imperial Armenia, <sup>His arms successful against the Khakân.</sup> committed some ravages there, and then returned into the Moslem territories. This we learn from Theophanes, who gives us no account of any farther operations during the remainder of the campaign. However, there is some reason to believe, that, about this time, Affad Ebn Abd'allah, another of the Khalîf's generals, gained several victories over the troops of the Khakân, and killed that prince himself in single combat. We are told by an author often cited here, that Heshâm sent one Abd'almâlec, an Arab of noble extraction, in the 116th year of the Hejra, to preside over the Moslems in Spain; who, by his tyranny, rendered himself extremely disagreeable to them. He found himself incapable of protecting the country under his government from the insults of the French; and having once attempted to pass the Pyrenees, in order to take vengeance of that nation, he was driven back into the plains of Celtiberia with very great slaughter. Cedrenus seems to intimate, that Solimân Ebn Heshâm took many prisoners in his Armenian expedition, mentioned by Theophanes; but neither of those historians has handed down to us the particulars of that expedition <sup>y</sup>.

- e THE following year, Moâwiyah Ebn Heshâm made an irruption into the imperial territories; but the Greeks soon assembling a considerable force, he could not long maintain himself there. He, therefore, returned into Syria, without having effected any thing considerable; and, according to Theophanes, in his march, was killed by a fall from his horse. <sup>Moâwiyah makes an irroad into the imperial territories.</sup> Nothing material happened this year in Spain, under Abd'almâlec's oppressive administration there. We must not forget to observe, that Ali Ebn Abd'allah, the grandfather of Abu'l Abbâs Al Saffâh, the first Khalîf of the house of Al Abbâs, died in the 117th year of the Hejra, in the 73th year of his age, and left two-and-twenty children behind him <sup>z</sup>.

- f ABOUT the 119th, or the 120th year of the Hejra, Solimân Ebn Heshâm ravaged some of the imperial provinces contiguous to the Khalîf's dominions, and carried off with him a vast number of prisoners. Amongst these there was a Pergamenian, who pretended to be Tiberius, the son of the emperor Justinian. This pretended prince Heshâm, in order to do his son Solimân, who had taken him prisoner, the greater honour, as well as to strike a terror into the imperial court, treated with the highest marks of distinction, as though he had been really a member of the imperial family; sending him to Jerusalem, and all the other principal cities of Syria, escorted by a numerous body of troops, and attended by a very splendid retinue. But however his subjects might be pleased with such ostentation and a parade, it does not appear, the Khalif himself reaped any remarkable advantage from this preposterous conduct. In the 118th year of the Hejra died Abd'almâlec Ebn Refa'a, Heshâm's governor of Egypt, and was succeeded by Abd'alrahmân Ebn Khâled Ebn Mosaffir Al Fakâmi. The following year, the Khalif removed the tyrant Abd'almâlec, to the unspeakable joy of the Moslems there, from his government of Spain <sup>a</sup>.

Account of the
in Spain.

THE next year, Solimân Ebn Heshâm fell again into the imperial territories, where he committed dreadful depredations. Amongst the captives he carried into slavery, there was one Eustathius, the son of Marianus, a Greek of distinction, whom he took with him to the Khalif's court, in order to set off the success that had attended him in this expedition. After Heshâm had dismissed Abd'almâlec, to the great joy of the Arabs there, from the b honourable post he had so unjustly enjoyed a considerable time in Spain, he appointed one Ocha, or rather Okba, to preside over the Arabs of that province in his room. Okba, upon his arrival at Corduba, imprisoned his predecessor, loaded him with irons, and deprived of their offices all the judges and governors of cities, that owed to him their elevation. He likewise obliged the Arabs under his government to observe strictly the ceremonies, as well as the moral duties, enjoined by their religion, collected the tribute exacted of the Christians with the utmost rigour, took all opportunities that offered of filling the Khalif's coffers, and brought all the most enormous offenders to condign punishment. However, as he governed exactly according to law, the Moslems could not with any colour of reason complain of the iniquity of his administration. He meditated an expedition against the French, but was not c able to carry his design into execution. Being arrived at Saragosa with his fleet, he received advice from the coast of Africa, that the Moslems of Spain had an intention to depose him; upon which, he posted away with all possible celerity first to Corduba, and afterwards to the continent of Africa, where he assembled a body of troops, with which he returned to Spain, put the ringleaders of the projected revolt to death, and settled himself once more in his former post. Afterwards growing very infirm, he resigned the government to his predecessor Abd'almâlec in the 124th year of the Hejra, with the unanimous approbation of all the Khalif's subjects in Spain, a little before he died. We must not forget to observe, that Abd'alrahmân Ebn Khâled Ebn Mosaffir Ebn Tabit Al Fakâmi was removed from the government of Egypt, after he had resided there about a year, and Handala Ebn Safwân Al d Calbi substituted in his room <sup>b</sup>.

Abnakhayyal constituted patriarch of Alexandria.

IN the 120th year of the Hejra, Heshâm removed Khâled Al Karli from the lieutenancy of Irâk, and appointed Yusef Ebn Omar Al Thakîfi to preside over that province. It appears from some of the authors followed by Al Makîn, that one Abnakhayyal was about this time constituted patriarch of Alexandria, and afterwards persecuted by Abd'almâlec Ebn Mûsa Ebn Nasr, originally a Jew, at that time governor of Egypt; who first imprisoned him, and then extorted from him a large sum of money, which he was obliged to beg of the Christians settled in Egypt and some of the neighbouring provinces. But as the facts touched upon in this relation have not been mentioned by Eutychius, or Sa'id Ebn Batrik, who has written the fullest and most particular account of the affairs of the church of Alexandria, during c this period, we will not take upon us to determine whether Al Makîn, or rather the authors he followed, are absolutely to be depended upon in the point before us <sup>c</sup>.

Zeid rebels
against the Khalif, and is defeated by Yusef Ebn
Omar.

THE following year, being the 121st of the Hejra, Zeid Ebn Ali Ebn Husein Ebn Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb assembled an army of 14,000 men at Cûfa, and obliged the inhabitants of that city to take an oath of fidelity to him. But, upon the approach of Yusef Ebn Omar, the governor of Basra, with a body of troops to extinguish this rebellion, they asked him what were his sentiments of Abu Becr and Omar? He replied, he had always entertained a good opinion of them. Upon which, they renounced their allegiance to him, rescinded their former oath, and immediately deserted him; so that he found himself obliged to stand an engagement with only fourteen men. He could not, therefore, forbear observing, that the f Cûfans, by their infamous conduct on this occasion, had acted in character, and played over again the game of Husein. In fine, Yusef easily defeated him, pierced his brain with an arrow, and consequently killed him upon the spot. Of the few Cûfans that attended him, not one escaped. After the end of the action, Yusef ordered his head to be cut off, and sent it to the Khalif; by whose command it was fixed upon one of the gates of Damascus. His body was deposited in a sepulchre the same night he died, out of which it was taken the next morning, and affixed to a cross or gibbet erected for that purpose; but soon after reduced to ashes, by an express order of the Khalif. His son, in order to avoid meeting with the same fate, fled to Balkh, the metropolis of Khorasân, said to have been built by Loraspes,

- a the father of Hydaspes, king of Persia, about the time that Nebuchadnezzar made himself master of Jerusalem. Some believe that it was built by Alexander the Great, and from him at first denominated Alexandria; but Goliuz, with a greater degree of probability, takes it to answer to the Babtra of the ancients. Be that as it will, it is situated in a very pleasant and fertile country, upon the Debâsh, a fine river that passes by its suburbs, and, about twelve parasangs from the city, discharges itself into the Oxus. Soon after the extinction of the preceding rebellion, Moslema Ebn Abd'almâlec, the Khalîf's brother, penetrated into the imperial territories, and made himself master of Catamana, a city of considerable note. Merwân Ebn Mohammed Ebn Merwân, surnamed Himar, subdued also this year Serir Al Dheheb, or rather Serir Al Theheb, that is, the throne of gold, a province situated between the
- b Euxine and Caspian seas, in which the city of Derbent stands, called by the Turks Demir Capi, the iron gate; and imposed upon the Khân, or prince of that country, after he had plundered and pillaged the inhabitants of it, an annual tribute. Theophanes also seems to intimate, that Solimân Ebn Heshâm conquered that tract this very year; which not a little supports what has been advanced on this head by the Arab historians <sup>d</sup>.

THE next year, being the 122d of the Hejra, Moslem Ebn Abd'almâlec Ebn Merwân, Moslema ânc. Heshâm's brother, departed this life. He was the greatest general of the age, and had distinguished himself on many occasions above the other Arab commanders, both by his

c courage and conduct. This year the Khalîf ordered a bridge to be built over the Euphrates, the construction of which began on the Syrian bank of that river, opposite to the city of Callinicum in Mesopotamia <sup>e</sup>.

IN the 123d year of the Hejra, commencing November 26th, 740, the Khalîf Heshâm, as A blending far we find asserted by Theophanes, ordered a very considerable number of Christian captives, appears. taken by his generals in their irruptions into the imperial territories, to be put to the sword. Which article, however, seems too repugnant to the civil and religious constitution of the Moslems, as here before described, to be admitted as a certain and indubitable truth. Either this or the following year, about the beginning of January, a remarkable comet, or blazing-star, is said to have appeared <sup>f</sup>.

- d THE next year, being the 124th year of the Hejra, Heshâm sent Handala Ebn Safwân, A rebellion in the governor of Egypt, into Africa, and appointed Hafas Ebn Al Walid to preside over the Africa. people of Egypt. In this post Hafas continued till the death of Heshâm; but was removed from it by Al Walid Ebn Yezid Ebn Abd'almâlec, the Khalîf's successor, who substituted Isa Ebn Abi Atâ in his room. This year the bridge over the Tigris at Amida having received great damage from an inundation, Heshâm ordered it to be repaired, or rather rebuilt, and procured a considerable number of architects, who met together at Amida for that purpose. The construction of this bridge was, however, a work of so much difficulty, that it was not finished before the Khalîf's death. About the same time, according to Dionysius Tel-
- e marenfis, most of the inhabitants of Edessa were destroyed by an inundation of the Desanes, which laid almost all the houses there under water; tho', if we will believe Theophanes, that inundation happened on the 28th day of the month Peritius, or February, in the preceding year. About the year we are now upon, if Roderic of Toledo may be attended to, there was a rebellion in the western part of Africa, which probably extended itself into Nigritia, or at least to the frontiers of that country, as the rebel army, according to him, consisted of Moors, some of whom, in their complexions and frizled hair, resembled the Negroes, or Blacks; and were men of such determined courage and resolution, that they defeated an army of 100,000 men sent against them by the Khalîf. Nay, their general, flushed with this success, if that author may be credited, meditated the conquest of Spain; which excited even many of the Khalîf's subjects there to a revolt. However, Abd'almâlec, Heshâm's
- f governor of that province, proved superior to the rebels, drove a large body of them from Toledo, after they had besieged that city twenty-six days, cut many of them to pieces, dispersed the rest, and obliged two other bodies of them to return to their duty. But, notwithstanding this, the rebel general, who had set up for himself in Africa, according to Roderic, still continued to assert his independency there. Nay, he not only baffled all the Khalîf's efforts to reduce him, but likewise found himself in a condition to extend his frontiers. For, he sent an army, under the command of Abd'ahrahmân, one of his generals, to invade Spain; which advanced to Corduba, reduced that place, took Abd'almâlec alive in it, and put him to a cruel death. Could this relation of Roderic be intirely depended upon, it would seem to imply, that, before the commencement of this rebellion, the Kha-

if's arms had penetrated into the interior part of Africa, and reduced at least a considerable part of the country of Gætulia, if not Nigritia, to the obedience of that powerful prince; tho' the time when that conquest was made has not been clearly pointed out to us by any of the Arab historians <sup>a</sup>.

IN the 125th year of the Hejra, commencing November 4th, 742, on the sixth day of the latter Rabî, Heshâm Ebn Abd'almûlec died at Rusûfa, after he had sat nineteen years seven months and eleven days upon the Moslem throne. He was fifty-three, or according to Abu'l Faraj, fifty-five, or, as others will have it, fifty-six, years of age, at the time of his death. With regard to his person, he was of a fair complexion, tho' his hair was of a reddish, or sandy, colour. Some of the Arab historians relate, that he was squint-eyed, and had a very ugly face; tho', according to others, that blemish, or defect, in him was not all unbecoming. He tinged his beard with Al Henna and Al Catam, in the same manner as did the prophet himself, and his immediate successors. In relation to his character, it has been observed by some of the eastern writers, that he governed without any prime minister; tho', being of a covetous and rapacious disposition, he greatly harassed his subjects. He had many wardrobes, which cannot be said of any of his predecessors, and therein an infinity of garments; tho', having sealed them all up, his successor Al Walid could not find a winding-sheet to wrap his body in after his decease, till a servant brought him one for that purpose. His secretaries of state were Sa'id Ebn Al Walid Al Abrash Al Calbi, his principal favourite, and Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Hârîta; the captain of his guards Caab Ebn Hâmed; his judge, or Kâdi, Mohammed Ebn Safwân Al Jamjani; and his chamberlain Gâleb, his freed-man. The inscription of his seal was, Wise judgment is a fat beast of burden. The first and last days of his reign are said to have been Wednesday. One of his sons assigning once as a reason for not attending divine service in the mosque, that he had no beast to carry him thither; the Khalîf forbade him the use of either horse or camel for a whole year. One of his subjects having been accused of drinking wine, as well as keeping singing girls, and playing on a lute, and brought before him with the instrument he was so much delighted with, the Khalîf said, Beat that drum about the rascal's ears. Upon which, some of his domestics beat the fellow with the lute, and he shed tears plentifully. Being then advised to take his punishment patiently, and not disgrace himself by weeping, he said, I weep not because I am treated in this manner, but because he so contemptuously calls my lute a drum. We are told by Theophanes, that Heshâm permitted the Christians of Antioch to chuse for their patriarch, after they had been deprived of one forty years by the Arabs, Stephen, a monk of uncommon sanctity and austerity of life, and one with whom he had contracted a particular intimacy; which they considered as a blessing derived to them immediately from heaven. This article, though passed over in silence by other Christian writers, has likewise been handed down to us by Cedrenus in almost the same terms. Heshâm has been represented by Khondemir, who tells us, that he would not trust any person with the keys of his coffers in which his treasures were deposited, as one of the most avaricious princes that ever lived; which, indeed, perfectly agrees with the character given of him by other historians. Nevertheless, he loved horses extremely, of which he kept at least 4000 in his stables. After his death, 700 coffers full of moveables, linen, and garments, or habits, of various kinds; amongst which 1000 breeches and 10,000 shirts were found, locked and sealed up with his proper seal. The distemper of which he died was the quinsy, according to Abu'l Faraj. His body was interred at Rusûfa, a city supposed to have been either founded or rebuilt by him; and, for that reason, in order to distinguish it from other places of the same name, some of the eastern writers stile it the Rusûfa of Heshâm. But, notwithstanding what may have been insinuated to the contrary by several of the Moslem authors, Rusûfa could not have been founded by Heshâm, as he resided there before he was Khalîf, and consequently before he was capable of attempting such a foundation. However, he afterwards probably repaired and enlarged this city, which was the Rescîpha (Ῥεσκήφα) of Ptolemy, as has been remarked above, and is frequently mentioned by the Syriac writers. It has been already observed, that Constantine, surnamed Copronymus, Leo Isauricus's son, was attacked, defeated, and taken prisoner, according to the authors followed by Al Makîn, by one of Heshâm's sons; but that this was utterly inconsistent with what has been related of that prince by the Greek and Latin historians. We must beg leave farther to remark, that Abu Abd'allah Mohammed Ebn Sirin, who wrote a treatise concerning the interpretation of dreams, upon the principles of the book composed by Abu Ishâk Al Kermâni, flourished in the reign of this prince; and that Heshâm had two small lordships, called Al Haba and Al Mara, in the district of Rakka, that brought him in an annual revenue of 10,000 dirkêms <sup>b</sup>.

S E C T. XVII.

- <sup>a</sup> UPON the death of Heshâm, Al Walid, in pursuance of his father Yezid's last will and testament, mounted the Moslem throne. He was surnamed Abu'l Abbâs, and pro-<sup>He is succeeded by Al Walid.</sup> claimed Khalif the very day that his uncle Heshâm died; being then about forty years of age. His mother Omm Al Hejâj was the daughter of Mohammed Ebn Yusef Ebn Al Hakem Ebn Abu Okail Al Thakîfi. He had been treated with great kindness, and even marks of distinction, by Heshâm, till he had totally given himself up to a most dissolute course of life. But at last, by spending his time in drunkenness, and discovering an absolute disregard for all the religious observances and institutions of the Moslems, he incurred the displeasure of that prince; who, finding his nephew's life to be little better than one continued scene of debauchery, first reprov'd him for the enormities he was guilty of, and then, upon his remaining still incorrigible, altered the whole course of his conduct towards him. Al Walid, not being able to bear the rigorous treatment he met with from Heshâm, retired,
- <sup>b</sup> with his friends and domestics, to Azrak, where he remained till his uncle's death; of which being apprized by two couriers, he posted away with the utmost celerity to Damascus, in order to take possession of the Khalifat. During his residence at Azrak, according to some of the eastern writers, Al Walid behaved not only in an irreproachable, but even an exemplary manner; though, after his elevation to the Moslem throne, he soon relapsed into his former excesses, and abandoned himself to all sorts of debaucheries. Upon the arrival of the aforesaid courier, he immediately issued an order to those who presided over Heshâm's treasures, which were immense, to secure every thing for his use: upon which, Ayyad, Al Walid's secretary, being released out of the prison where he had been confined by Hâshem, affixed the new Khalif's seal to all the doors of the treasuries, and would not suffer
- <sup>c</sup> any person to approach them before his master had taken upon himself the government. Hence, according to Abu'l Faraj, it came to pass, that Gâleb, Heshâm's freed-man, was obliged to wrap up that prince's corpse in a winding-sheet, nothing better being at that time to be found. Al Walid is said to have treated his predecessor's friends and domestics with extreme severity; telling them, that this was the very same treatment he and his adherents had met with from their master. The lame and the blind of Damascus he clothed and supplied with plenty of provisions, and distributed a vast quantity of perfumes and costly apparel amongst the women of that city, soon after his accession. In fine, he was prodigal to a surprising degree; never refusing any favour to a person who put up a petition to him. Having increased with a tenth part the pay of all the troops within his vast and
- <sup>d</sup> most extensive dominions, he wonderfully conciliated the affections of the soldiery to him; so that he easily prevailed upon them, and of course the whole body of his subjects, to agree to the settlement of the succession upon his two sons Al Hakem and Othmân, in such a manner that the survivor was destined, after the death of the other, to ascend the Moslem throne. It appears from the eastern writers, that Yabya Ebn Zeid Ebn Ali Ebn Hosein, who, after his father's death, had made his escape to Balkh, the metropolis of Khorasân, was defeated and put to the sword by a body of Al Walid's troops at Jurjân, Jurjâna, or Georgiana, in the 125th year of the Hejra, not long after Heshâm's death. The body of this Imâm (for so he is called by the followers of Ali) was first affixed to a gibbet, or cross, and afterwards reduced to ashes, which were thrown into the Euphrates, according
- <sup>e</sup> to Abu'l Faraj. But this last particular seems to be a mistake, as the city of Georgiana, the metropolis of a province of the same name, is said by some to belong to Khorasân, by others to Taberistân, and by others to Khowarazm, not far from the coast of the Caspian sea, and consequently at a very considerable distance from the Euphrates. This year, that is, the 125th year of the Hejra, the repose of the Arab dominions in Spain, according to Roderic of Toledo, was disturbed by civil dissensions. Al Walid sent one Abu'l Katar to take upon himself the government of that province; but he was opposed by the Arabs there, under the conduct of Ismael and Toban, two of their countrymen, who at last found an opportunity of cutting him off: after which event, Toban was unanimously declared the commander in chief of the Moslems in Spain. The same year the Khalif's forces made an irruption into the
- <sup>f</sup> imperial territories, where they committed dreadful depredations, and carried off with them an incredible number of Christians prisoners. About the same time, the emperor Constantine, surnamed Cepreninus, sent Andreas Spatharius his ambassador to Damascus, to solicit succours of Al Walid; and Artabasdus, his competitor, dispatched Gregorius Logotheta, as his minister, on the same occasion, to the Khalif's court. It has been remarked by Theo-

THE following year, being the 126th of the Hejra, beginning October 25th, 743, Al Walid openly professed Zendicism, a species of infidelity nearly resembling Sadducism amongst the Jews, and perhaps not very remote from the Deism of some of our modern unbelievers, if we will believe the Persian historians; which, together with his flagitious and abandoned course of life, the genuine consequence of the impious principles he maintained, gave such offence to the people of Syria, that they unanimously resolved to depose him. In order to which, they chose Yezid, the son of Al Walid I. his cousin-german, for their leader, and inaugurated him Khalif. Yezid was no sooner placed on the throne, than he assembled a body of troops, and marched against Al Walid, who then resided in the territory of Boheira, at a small distance from Damascus. The mutineers easily dispersed the Khalif's forces, and besieged him in his palace. At their first appearance before the gates, he expostulated with them, and reproached them with ingratitude; telling them, that "he had eased them of their taxes, relieved their needy, and been more generous to them than any of his predecessors." To which they replied, that "though they were by no means strangers to his good qualities, yet they at the same time knew, that his bad ones vastly preponderated; that he had frequently inebriated himself with wine, kept up an illicit commerce with his father's concubines, and been guilty of almost every kind of criminal excesses." After which, ten of the most resolute of them forcing their way into the palace, Waja Al Fanin, their leader, or, according to others, Abd'allah Ebn Abd'alnâs, or, lastly, as others will have it, Wabmâl Ebn Al Walid, dispatched him with very great ease; he not attempting to make the least resistance. After his death, one of his hands and his head were cut off, carried in triumph through the streets of Damascus, and at last affixed to one of the gates of that city. The funeral prayers were said over him by Ibrahim Ebn Al Walid, at the time of his interment, in the usual manner. His two sons, Al Hahem and Othmân, surnamed the Rams, were immediately imprisoned, as soon as Yezid had communicated to the Moslems the news of his assassination. With regard to his person, Al Walid was of a middle stature, had a handsome face, though his hair began to grow grey, and a fair complexion. He was of a very wicked disposition, being extremely addicted to gaming, drunkenness, and every species of sensuality. He kept company only with the younger and more abandoned part of his subjects. He ravished a girl in one of his drunken fits, and afterwards obliged her to repeat some prayers to the multitude, with a veil over her face. He is likewise said to have carried wine and dogs with him to Mecca, being vastly fond of hunting, and to have ordered an iron tomb to be made for him, which he proposed to have placed in a certain part of the Caaba. Notwithstanding his life was one continued scene of debauchery, he had quick parts, and was a tolerable good poet; though he exercised his genius chiefly on the most obscene and lascivious subjects. A specimen of his poetical performances has been preserved by Al Makin; who informs us, that he ordered Ma'bad, a singer in favour with him, to repeat two or three verses, and then precipitated himself thrice into a sort of basin, or reservoir, formed of wine and water for that purpose; which proved a great diminution of his authority, and paved the way to his destruction. Eutychius represents him as a person of considerable eloquence, though this did not turn out of the least advantage either to himself or his subjects. To his other enormous crimes he added that of gluttony, according to Al Makin. He was assassinated towards the close of the latter Jamâda, after he had reigned a year and three months, being then about forty-two years of age. He had thirteen children, some of which were boys, and others girls. His secretary of state was Al Abbâs Ebn Moslema; his judge, or Kâdi, Mohammed Ebn Safsân Al Jamjani; the captain of his guards Abd'alrahmân Ebn Homaid Al Calbi; and his chamberlain Katri, his freed-man. The first day of his reign was Thursday; and the inscription of his seal was, O WALID, fear death! The untimely end of this Khalif proved a mortal wound to the house of Ommiyah, and of course not a little contributed to the advancement of the family of Al Abbâs to the Moslem throne. Al Walid is farther said, by the Persian historians, to have been so impious a prince, that he tore to pieces, and trod under foot, several copies of the Korân<sup>2</sup>.

S E C T. XVIII.

- a YEZID, the son of Al Walid I. who succeeded Al Walid II. in the Khalifat, was, according to Abu'l Faraj, a just and virtuous prince. He was generally surnamed Abu Khâled, and sometimes, by way of derision, Al Nakes, the diminisher, and Ebn Al Nakes, the son of the diminisher, or the son of the diminished, because he found himself obliged, by the emptiness of his coffers, to diminish the pay that had been allowed the soldiery by the Khalifs. His mother was Mah Afrid, or Shahferend, according to the Arab historians, the daughter of Firûz, the son of Yezdegerd. He became, therefore, sovereign of Persia by hereditary right; and was so far from thinking himself above claiming the title derived to him from his mother, even after he was Khalif, that he constantly styled himself the son of Khosrû, king of Persia, the descendant of the Khalif Merwân, and a prince amongst whose
- b ancestors, of the mother's side, were the Roman emperor and the Kbâkân. Soon after his inauguration, he caused the Moslems to acknowledge his brother Ibrahim the heir apparent of the crown, and, after him, the succession legally to devolve upon Abd'alaziz Ebn Al Hejjj Ebn Abd'almâlec; and then obliged them to take the oath of allegiance, or fidelity, to those princes. Upon the divulgation of the news of Al Walid's violent death in the provinces, great commotions happened there. The people of Hems demanded the blood of the Khalif, or, in order words, insisted that vengeance should be taken of his murderers for the effusion of that blood. To extinguish this rebellion, Yezid sent an army against them; which they soon defeated, and put 300 of his men to the sword. Solimân Ebn Heshâm, who had been loaded with irons, made an irruption into the district of Al Maarra Al Nooman, or Maarra Nemani, ravaged it, and then advanced to Damascus. The people of Palestine rose against their governor, and killed him. During these troubles, Yezid removed Yusef Ebn Omar from the lieutenancy of Irâk, and substituted Mansûr Ebn Jamhûr in his room. About the same time, Merwân Ebn Mohammed, surnamed Himar, rebelled against Yezid in Armenia; giving out, that his design was to revenge the death of Al Walid. He assembled a very considerable force, but was pacified by Yezid, who conferred upon him the government of Mesopotamia, Mosul, Armenia, and Aderbijân, on condition that he should take the oath of allegiance to him. The Greek writers seem to intimate, that he was a friend to the family of Al Walid II. and desirous of taking the sons of that Khalif under his protection; which is likewise confirmed by some of the Arab historians. We are told by Theophanes and
- c Cedrenus, that a comet appeared in the northern part of the hemisphere towards the close of the Khalifat of Al Walid; and that the people seated on the coast of the Caspian sea were greatly alarmed by several violent shocks of an earthquake about the same time. It cannot be inferred from Roderic of Toledo, that any thing remarkable happened, during the reign of Yezid Ebn Al Walid Ebn Abd'almâlec, in Spain<sup>1</sup>.

- Soon after the conclusion of the pacification between the Khalif and Merwân Ebn Moham- Yezid dies of med, surnamed Himar, at Harrân in Mesopotamia, the former died of the plague at Damascus, the plague, on Wednesday the 18th of the month Dbu'lhajja, in the 126th year of the Hejra, after he had after he had reigned five or six months, and was, at the time of his death, forty, or, as others say, reigned six forty-six, years of age. His funeral service was said by Ibrahim Ebn Al Walid his brother, months.
- e who succeeded him. As to his person, he was of a thin habit of body, a moderate stature, and a swarthy complexion. His mustaches, or whiskers, were not so thick and large as those of the Arabs generally are. With regard to his disposition, he is said to have been ostentatious, eloquent and proud. He was, however, after his elevation to the Moslem throne, looked upon as an honest, just, and good-natured prince. He hath been represented as a favourer of the Kadarians, a sect denying absolute predestination; saying, that evil and injustice ought not to be attributed to God, but to man, who is a free agent, and may therefore be rewarded or punished for his actions, which God has granted him power either to do or to let alone. Some, therefore, imagine, that they are denominated Kadarians, because they deny Al Kadr, or God's absolute decree; though others, thinking it not
- f so proper to affix a name to a sect from a doctrine which they combat, will have it to come from Kadr, or Kodrat, i. e. power, because they assert man's power to act freely. Some pretend, that the Kadarians are the Magians of the Moslems, as admitting a good principle, viz. God, and an evil one, viz. man; and that the first author of this sect was Alâbad Ebn Khâled Al Jolani, who was put to death by the famous Al Hejjj at Basra<sup>m</sup>.

Some farther
particulars relating to him.

WE are told by Al Makin, that the body of Yezid, which, as well as that of his predecessor Al Walid, seems to have been buried at Damascus, was dug up, and affixed to a cross, or gibbet, by order of Merwân Ebn Mohammed, surnamed Himar, the last Khalif of the house of Ommiyah, after he had ascended the Moslem throne. Yezid's secretary of state was Tâbit Ebn Solimân; his judge, or Kâdi, Othmân Ebn Omar Ebn Mûsa Al Timi; the captain of his guards, Yezid Ebn Al Shammakh Al Lakhmi; and his chamberlain, his servant, Fatan. The first day of his reign was Friday, and the last Wednesday. The inscription of his seal was, O YEZID, persist in that which is right! The Greek writers inform us, that he was surnamed Leipsos, or diminished; which pretty nearly corresponds with the Arabic Nakes, or Al Nakes, a nickname sometimes given him by the Moslems. We must not forget to observe, that Ebn Arrabeb and Abu'l Walid, as well as Eutychius, or Ebn Batrik, and Abu'l Faraj, assert Al Walid II. to have reigned precisely one year and three months. It appears from Dionysius Telmarenensis, that Yezid, who succeeded him, his brothers Ibrahim and Abbâs, together with Abd'alaziz Ebn Al Hejâj Ebn Abd'almâlec, contrived and effected the destruction of that Khalif; and that he was assassinated at the city of Core. Dionysius likewise relates, that Yezid sat six whole months upon the Moslem throne. It may be inferred from Abu'l Faraj, that the friends of the house of Al Abbâs, at Merû in Khorasân, began to put themselves in motion this year<sup>a</sup>.

Ibrahim Ebn
Al Walid ascends the
throne;

IBRAHIM EBN AL WALID EBN ABD'ALMALEC EBN MERWAN EBN AL HAKEM, in consequence of the settlement of the succession in the preceding reign, was declared Khalif the same day that his brother Yezid died. His mother's name was Naama, or, as others will have it, Hafsefa. His subjects sometimes dignified him with the title of Khalif, sometimes with that of emperor of the faithful, and sometimes they considered him only as a private person. His reign was so short, that it has scarce been mentioned by Eutychius; nor have Dionysius Telmarenensis and Theophanes taken any farther notice of him, than barely to observe, that he succeeded his brother Yezid. According to the former of those writers, about the time that this prince first took upon himself the government, a grievous famine and pestilence raged all over the east<sup>c</sup>.

IN the beginning of the year of the Hejra 127, commencing October 13th, 744, Merwân Ebn Mohammed Ebn Merwân Ebn Al Hakem, surnamed Himar, the governor of Mesopotamia, Mawfel, Armenia, and Aderbijân, who had rebelled against Yezid, under the pretext of revenging the murder of Al Walid II. marched first to Edeffa, and afterwards to Kinnisrîn, with a powerful army, in order to lay siege to Damascus, and depose Ibrahim. Basbar and Masrûr Ebn Al Walid, who then commanded the Khalif's forces at Kinnisrîn, being apprized of Merwân's approach, advanced at the head of their troops to give him battle; but they were deserted by their men, who went over in a body to the enemy, and delivered up their generals into Merwân's hands. Basbar and Masrûr were therefore thrown into prison, and there for some time straitly confined; after which, Merwân advanced to Hems, the inhabitants of which city immediately took the oath of allegiance to him. Here he reinforced his army with such an additional number of troops, that he found it to consist of 80,000 effective men. With this force he marched against Solimân Ebn Hesbâm, Ibrahim's general, who was in motion with an army of 120,000 men. As soon as the two armies came in sight, Merwân invited the Khalif's forces to join, in order to take vengeance of the murderers of Al Walid II. But this they refusing to do, a fierce and bloody conflict ensued; in which Solimân was overthrown, with incredible slaughter, and forced to fly with the remains of his shatter'd troops to Damascus. Merwân took many prisoners likewise in this decisive action; all which he released, upon their taking the oath of fidelity to Al Hakem and Othmân, Al Walid's sons, who had remained in a state of confinement ever since their father had met with his tragical fate, at Damascus. But this, in reality, proved not of the least service to those unfortunate princes. For, Solimân being well assured of Merwân's intention to fix one of them upon the Moslem throne, he no sooner arrived at Damascus, than he and Ibrahim ordered both of them to be put to death; after which, he plundered the imperial treasury, and then, notwithstanding the measures concerted to intercept him, made his escape. However, Al Hakem and Othmân, foreseeing what would happen to them, before a their deaths, took care to transfer their right to Merwân, and declared to their fellow-prisoner Abu Mohammed Al Sbeibâni, that, in case they should be destroyed, Merwân ought to be considered by all the Moslems as lawful Khalif and Imâm. Soon after Solimân's departure, the citizens of Damascus opened their gates to Merwân, who caused the bodies of the two young princes to be decently interred, and was saluted Khalif by Abu Mohammed Al Sbeibâni, now released from his confinement, in consequence of the declaration that to him had been formerly made. Ibrahim Ebn Al Walid, the deposed Khalif, and all the people of Syria, at the same time recognized his authority; so that there was no person in the empire capable of disputing his title, or in any respect of standing in competition with him <sup>p</sup>.

b As Ibrahim so readily acknowledged Merwân emperor of the Moslems, he survived this revolution, and lived to the year of the Hejra 132; when, as some say, he was assassinated by one Nû'ûn; or, according to others, was drowned; or, lastly, as others will have it, was murdered by Merwân's son, who is said afterwards to have affixed his body to a gibbet, or cross; so that we have no certain account of the circumstances attending the death of this prince. With regard to his person, he had small whiskers, or mustaches, not unlike those of his predecessor Yezid, and two pretty remarkable locks of curled hair. He was, according to the same authors followed by Al Makîn, of a stupid and imprudent disposition. His secretary of state was Dukas Ebn Sarah Al Lakbmi; his judge Othmân Ebn Omar Al Timi; and his chamberlain, Katri, Al Walid's servant. The inscription of his seal was, I trust in the living God. He reigned, according to Al Makîn and Abu'l Faraj, only sixty-nine or c seventy days; so that, by some writers, he is not ranked amongst the Khalifs, or Moslem emperors, as has been already observed. The first day of his Khalifat was Thursday, and the last Tuesday. We are told by Ebn Shobnah, that this Ibrahim was surnamed Al Makblû, or the deposed. He has likewise been mentioned by Khondemir, as a person intirely reduced to a private station. Another of the Persian historians relates, that he was cut off about three months after he was driven from the throne; tho', in our opinion, a greater degree of credit is due to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, who extends his life, as has been hinted above, to the 132d year of the Hejra <sup>q</sup>.

S E C T. XX.

d S O O N after Merwân Ebn Mohammed Ebn Merwân Ebn Al Hakem's accession, he took his predecessor Ibrahim Ebn Al Walid Ebn Abd'almâlec, and Solimân Ebn Heshâm, at their request, under his protection; tho' the latter, with several others of the house of Ommiyah, not only refused to assist at his inauguration, but even at first opposed, to the utmost of his power, every step taken by the people of Damascus in favour of the new Khalif. His mother's name, according to Abu Jaafar and Al Makîn, who make her the daughter of one Ibrahim Ebn Asir Al Nakba'i, was Liana. She was, as Eutychius informs us, Mosab Ebn Zobeir's widow, when Mohammed, Merwân's father, took her to wife. The Khalif was surnamed Abu Abd'almâlec, and denominated, from his undaunted courage, by some of his subjects, Himar Al Jézirab, i. e. the ass of Mesopotamia, or the warlike ass; the asses of that country being, in his days, remarkable for their unparalleled fortitude and intrepidity. He had e likewise the appellation of Al Jaadi, which is said to have been derived from his uncle Al Jaad Ebn Darham. He was scarce settled on his throne, when he conferred the government of Egypt upon Hasan Ebn Abahia; whom he removed from that honourable post in about sixteen days time, and substituted Hafas Ebn Al Walid in his room <sup>r</sup>.

f THE same year, that is, the 127th of the Hejra, the people of Hems rebelled against Merwân; who marched against them at the head of a powerful army. Upon his arrival before the town, he desired to know what could excite them to such a defection, and summoned them to surrender. In answer to which, they assured him, that they were disposed to obey his orders; and, opening one of their gates, immediately admitted him, with 300 of his men, into the town. The troops that entered with him they instantly cut to pieces; and the Khalif himself escaped, with great difficulty, out of the gate of Tadmor. However, he afterwards overthrew them in a pitched battle, put a great number of them to the sword, dismantled their city, and affixed to crosses, erected for that purpose, the bodies of about 600 of those who had been the most active in this rebellion <sup>s</sup>.

The Damas-
cenes likewise declare against him.

THE people of Damascus, following the example of the citizens of Hems, soon after a declared against the Khalif, and deposed the governor he had left to preside over them. But, after the extinction of the former rebellion, Merwân, moved with great celerity towards Damascus, entered the city by force, and brought to condign punishment the ring-leaders who had excited the Damascenes to a revolt. This effectually appeased all commotions, and restored the capital of the Muslem empire to its former tranquillity <sup>1</sup>.

The Basrans
also revolt.

Soon after the re-establishment of the public tranquillity at Damascus, in the 127th year of the Hejra, Solimân Ebn Heshâm set up for himself at Basra, where he was proclaimed Khalif by the people of that city. In order to support his pretensions to the imperial dignity, he raised an army at Basra, consisting of 10,000 effective men; with which he advanced to Kinnisrîn, where he was joined by a vast number of the Syrians, who flocked to him from all parts. Merwân, receiving advice of the rapid progress made by Solimân, marched against him with all the forces he could assemble at Damascus, and in the neighbourhood of that city; and, at last coming up with him, gave him battle, and intirely defeated him, with the loss of 30,000 men. Solimân's affairs being in a manner ruined by so terrible an overthrow, he fled to Hems, and was joined there by a body of 900 men, who engaged themselves by oath to stand by him to the last drop of blood. With these troops he posted himself in ambuscade at Telmair, on mount Al Zaitân, in the district of Al Maarra Al Nooman, in order to surprize Merwân; who, he knew, must pass over that mountain in his way to Hems, to which place he took for granted the Khalif would pursue him without delay. As soon as Merwân's forces appeared, the rebels rose out of their ambuscade, and fell upon them with incredible fury. But Solimân, after a very vigorous action, was again overthrown, had the greatest part of his men killed upon the spot, and found himself obliged to retire with precipitation to Hems. But, being closely pursued by the victors, he constituted his brother Sa'id Ebn Heshâm commandant of the place, leaving with him the shattered remains of his troops that survived the late carnage, and fled to Tadmor. Soon after his departure, Merwân appeared before the town, invested it, and besieged it seven months; during which term, he battered it incessantly with above eighty catapults. The inhabitants, as well as the garison, being at length reduced to the last extremity, surrendered to the Khalif, and delivered up Sa'id Ebn Heshâm into his hands. In consideration of which submission, Merwân pardoned the rebellious inhabitants of this city, and took them all under his protection <sup>2</sup>.

at Cûfa.

ABOUT the same time, Abd'allah Ebn Moâwiyah Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Jaasar Ebn Abu Tâleb asserted his right to the Khalifat at Cûfa. But Abd'allah Ebn Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz, Merwân's governor of that city, having been apprized of the intended revolt, took his measures so well, that he dispersed Abd'allah Ebn Moâwiyah's adherents without any great effusion of blood, drove him into the mountains, and found means to extinguish this rebellion before it could arrive at any considerable height <sup>3</sup>.

of the house of Al Abbâs begin to be in motion.

BUT notwithstanding the success Merwân hitherto had met with, in rendering abortive all his enemies designs and machinations, the partisans of the house of Al Abbâs began now to grow powerful in some of the interior provinces of the empire. The first of that family, who made any considerable figure, was Mohammed Ebn Ali Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Abbâs, who flourished in the time of Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz, and was nominated the chief of that house in the 100th year of the Hejra. When this honourable post was offered him, he resided at Al Homaima, and his father Ali was still living. Amongst the persons who formed the deputation sent him on this occasion, by those who were inviolably attached to the interests of the house of Al Abbâs in Kherasân, the principal were Solimân Ebn Kotbair, Melec Ebn Al Hatim, and Kabtaba; who brought many valuable presents with them, and a sum of money amounting to 400,000 dirhems. At the first conference between them and Mohammed Ebn Ali Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Abbâs Ebn Abd'almotalleb, the latter is reported to have said, "I shall soon die, and my son Ibrahim will be your leader, till he shall be slain. After his death, my other son Abd'allah, surnamed Abu'l Abbâs Al Saffâb, shall preside over you, and settle the government of the Moslems upon a solid and lasting foundation. He shall likewise cut off all the members of the house of Ommiyah; a family that have maintained themselves so long on the throne by repeated acts of violence, and an incredible effusion of Muslem blood." They were then introduced to Abd'allah, as their future sovereign, and had the honour to kiss his hands and his feet. As for Mohammed, he departed this life in the 125th year of the Hejra, and was succeeded in the honourable post assigned him by his son Ibrahim; who, immediately after his father's death, dispatched Abu Hishâm, a person he could intirely confide in, to Merû in Kherasân, then the residence of the principal friends of the house of Al Abbâs, to notify to his adherents there that tragical event, and to animate

- a them to a perseverance in their attachment to his person and family. Abu Hâshem succeeded in the execution of his commission, according to his desire, and received from the Moslems at Merû a large sum of money, collected there for his master's service. It appears, however, from Abu'l Faraj, that Abu Hâshem was not the first ambassador sent to the people of Khorasân in the interest of the house of Al Abbâs; since, if any credit may be given to that author, Ziyâd was dispatched in that capacity to Khorasân by Mohammed Ebn Ali himself, in the 109th year of the Hejra. To which he adds, that this Ziyâd, upon his arrival at Merû, probably the Maruca of Ptolemy, a city of Khorasân, for a description of which we must refer our curious readers to the eastern geographers, made great complaints of the dissolute lives and iniquity of the members of the house of Ommiyah; and that he was put to death by Asad,
- b Heshâm's governor of Khorasân, who had received a full and ample account of the whole affair, together with ten of the Cûfans, who were privy to his intrigues. The same author likewise relates, that, in the 118th year of the Hejra, Ammân Ebn Yezid, a person of very loose and impious principles, came into Khorasân, and engaged great numbers of the people there to declare for Mohammed Ebn Ali Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Abbâs. It must here be observed, that this Mohammed Ebn Ali was sixty-three, or, as others will have it, sixty-seven years of age at the time of his death; and that he left eleven sons, besides his successor Ibrahim, behind him *.

- In the 127th year of the Hejra, Ibrahim Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ali nominated Abu Moslem, <sup>And defeat the Khalif's forces sent against them.</sup> a youth about nineteen years of age, of the family of Isfandiâr, whose true name was Abd'alrahmân, to go as his representative into Khorasân. But Soliman Ebn Kotbair, the chief of the friends of the house of Al Abbâs there, believing that Abu Moslem, on account of his youth, was by no means qualified for so arduous a post, and fearing lest his rawness and inexperience should prove the total ruin of their affairs, refused at first to receive him with such marks of distinction as were required by Ibrahim, and even to obey any of his orders. However, to set Ibrahim right in his notions, Selimân Ebn Kotbair, Labar Ebn Korait, and Kabtaba, took a journey to Mecca, then the residence of Ibrahim; and, having deposited in one of his servant's hands a present, for his master's use, consisting of many valuable effects, besides 20,000 dinârs and 200,000 dirhems in ready money, they had a conference with him; the result of which was, that they should acknowledge Abu Moslem,
- d Ibrahim's governor of Khorasân; which they accordingly did. In the mean time, Nasr Ebn Sayâr, Merwân's lieutenant of Khorasân, having received advice of these commotions, assembled a body of horse, and sent them to disperse the rebels before they were joined by the reinforcements they expected from Syria and the peninsula of the Arabs. On the other hand, Abu Moslem having erected his standard, and raised a considerable army, advanced at the head of his forces to attack Nasr Ebn Sayâr; upon which a fierce conflict ensued, in which Nasr was intirely defeated, lost the greatest part of his men, and was obliged to betake himself to a precipitate flight. This blow proved extremely prejudicial to the interests of the house of Ommiyah, and not a little contributed to the elevation of that of Al Abbâs to the Moslem throne †.
- e It may not be improper to observe here, that some dirhems were struck this year in the mint erected at Wâset; of which one was found on the coast of the Baltick, near a village called Stegen, at a small distance from Dantzick, in June 1722. This dirhém exhibits a passage in the Cûfic character, taken out of the 112th sûra, or chapter, of the Korân, asserting the unity, eternity, &c. of God, on the reverse; and, on the other side, the words, Be-Wafeta seb'en wa'eshchaina wameäten, i. e. At Wâset, in the 127th year. By which we are to understand the 127th year of the Hejra, or Mohammedan æra, corresponding with the first of the Khalif Merwân, surnamed Himar Al Jezirab, or the ass of Mesopotamia. This dirhém has been particularly described by M. Kebr, in the piece here mentioned, to which we shall beg leave to refer our curious and inquisitive readers ‡.

- † THE following year, being the 128th of the Hejra, Merwân removed Hasas Ebn Al Merwân Walid from the government of Egypt, and substituted Joweirab Ebn Sabl Al Ajlâni in his room. He also the same year, which was the second of his reign, made vast military preparations to oppose the rebels of Khorasân, who now began to alarm several of the provinces of the Moslem empire, and even to threaten the house of Ommiyah with utter excision. After the late victory, they declared Merwân an usurper, and took the oath of allegiance to Ibrahim Ebn Mohammed, whom they asserted, by right of succession, to be lawful Khalif and Imâm. Many of the Syrians likewise secretly favoured the pretensions of the house of Al Abbâs; having been disobliged by Merwân, who, after the defeat of his predecessor

Ibrahim Ebn Al Walid, had transferred the imperial treasury from Damascus to Harrân in Mesopotamia. Some of the Christian writers relate, that Merwân gained two victories over Ibrahim's forces the preceding year; having first overthrown, in a great battle, Nekaim Ebn Tebith, in the plains of Gara, and afterwards Solimân Ebn Heshâm, upon a spot of ground at a small distance from the river Lita. After this last defeat, Merwân, according to one of these writers, made himself master of Hems, affixed Yezid's body, which he ordered to be taken out of the tomb where it had been interred, to a gibbet or cross, and extorted from a wealthy Jew an immense sum of money, amounting to 400,000 dinârs. Merwân also, if we will believe Roderic of Toledo, sent one Thoaba, an Arab of distinction, this year to preside over the Moslems in Spain <sup>a</sup>.

Abu Moslem IN the 129th year of the Hejra, beginning September 22d, 746, Ibrahim Ebn Mohammed <sup>b</sup> sent Abu Moslem a banner, which he called Al Thell, or the shadow, and a royal or imperial standard, stiled by him Al Sahab, or the cloud. These Abu Moslem fixed upon two lances, and ordered them to be carried before him, whilst he proclaimed his master rightful emperor of the faithful, and Imâm; and published in the principal places of Khorasân the title and pretensions of the house of Al Abbâs to the Khalifat. Of the names shadow and cloud he assigned to the people of Khorasân this interpretation, viz. "That as the earth <sup>c</sup> would never be uncovered by the clouds, nor quite void of shade; so the world would never henceforth be without a Khalif of the house of Al Abbâs." In fine, Abu Moslem brought this year such a formidable force into the field, that the Khalif's troops could not make head against him; so that he obliged all Merwân's commandants of fortresses in Khorasân either to take an oath of fidelity to Ibrahim, or within a limited time to quit that vast province <sup>a</sup>.

Merwân ex- THE next year, being the 130th of the Hejra, one Dachac, or rather Dakhâk, together <sup>d</sup> with one Yâcup, or Jacob, Kaibari, and Sakasbi, according to Dionysius Telmarenfis, rebelled against Merwân in Mesopotamia. These rebels assembled such a powerful army in the neighbourhood of mount Izla, that they engaged the Khalif's forces sent against them at Telmâsrita; but were overthrown with prodigious slaughter, leaving the greatest part of their men behind them dead upon the spot. Theophanes relates, that this Dakhâk was prince of the Arurite, an Arab nation settled in Mesopotamia, who, in their wars, left their wives and children, and all their effects, behind them, that they might march with the greater <sup>e</sup> expedition, and be the more at liberty to engage the enemy, as being then quite free from all impediments. And this, indeed, the name Arurita itself sufficiently points out to us; it having been undoubtedly deduced from the Syriac word Arurojuto, or rather Hiruto, which denotes liberty or freedom in the Syriac language. Nor is it to be wondered at, that some Syriac terms should be used by the Arabs, who were now in possession of Mesopotamia; since the language of that country was at this time a mixture of the Syriac and Arabic. Theophanes also writes, that one Thebit, or Ebn Tebith, had a great hand in exciting the Arabs of Mesopotamia to this revolt; and that both he and Dakhâk, together with 12,000 of their men, were cut to pieces by the Khalif's troops in the territory of Hems. He farther observes, that Merwân permitted the Christians of Antioch, upon their application to him for this <sup>e</sup> favour, to elect for their patriarch Theophylact, a presbyter of Edeffa, in the room of their former patriarch Stephen, who died this year. The Khalif also commanded his subjects to treat with all possible marks of respect the new patriarch, if we will believe Cedrenus and this author. It likewise appears from Theophanes, that Merwân, about this time, ordered one of his executioners, an Ethiopian, to suffocate Aba, or Abas, a magician, who had destroyed many of the Christians, been accessory to the murder of the Khalif Al Walid II. and committed dreadful depredations in several of the provinces, in a sack of unslaked lime; which act of justice he accordingly performed. It is also said, that Merwân ordered 120 Calbites, or Arabs of the tribe of Calb, called Chalbanians by Theophanes, probably on account of their attachment to the house of Al Abbâs, to be hanged at Hems. We are told by Roderic of Toledo, <sup>f</sup> that Thoaba died, and was succeeded by one Tufes, towards the conclusion of the last, or the beginning of the present year, in Spain <sup>b</sup>.

The friends of THE same year, Abu Moslem entered Merû with his army, and seized upon the imperial <sup>a</sup> palace there. He also obliged all the troops posted in and about that city, as well as in other parts of Khorasân, to take an oath to support the interests of the house of Hâshem, Abbâs make a farther progress.

- a without naming any particular person. As Abu Moslem had found means to cut off almost all the officers who served under Nasr Ebn Sayâr, and intirely ruined the troops he commanded in the general action, which proved so fatal to the partisans of the house of Ommiyab, Merwân's governor of Khorasân found it impossible to bring another army into the field against the rebels before the present year. But Nasr having now assembled his forces, he advanced to Naisabour, in order to attack Kabtaba, who had taken upon himself the command of Ibrahim's troops. The vicinity of the two armies, as neither of them was disposed to continue long in a state of inaction, brought on several very fierce engagements, wherein Nasr was generally worsted, and lost 30,000 men, killed and taken prisoners; which still more and more animated the partisans of the house of Al Abbâs. From Naisabour Kabtaba
- b marched to Jurjân, Jurjâna, or Georgiana, the capital of a province of the same name, attacked Banâna Ebn Hantbala, who had posted himself with a body of troops near that city, overthrew him with great slaughter, made himself master of his camp, and took a very considerable quantity of plunder. As for Banâna himself, he was killed in the action; which still farther embarrassed the Khalîf's affairs. With regard to the province and city of Jurjân, or Jurjâna, some of the eastern geographers make them to appertain to Taberistân, others to Khorasân, and others to Khowarazm; they being situated upon the frontiers of all those countries. But Abu'lfeda, with whom we are disposed to agree in this particular, asserts them to be separated and distinct from every one of those regions; and is followed herein by most of the oriental geographers of a later date. For a farther description of the province of Jurjân, or Jurjâna, and its capital, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to Golius, who in this point, as well as many others of a similar nature, will give them full and ample satisfaction <sup>c</sup>.

- It may not be improper to observe here, that, according to Theophanes, Dakhâk's rebellion was extinguished, in the fifth year of Constantine Copronymus; tho', in this, he runs counter to what has been advanced by Dionysius Telmarenis. The former of those authors has likewise, as well as Cedrenus, remarked, that the emperor Constantine Copronymus, encouraged by the dissensions that then reigned amongst the Arabs, made an impression upon Syria and Dulichia, with a powerful army, the same year: though neither of those writers has handed down to us the particulars of that expedition. There happened several insurrections, if we will believe Roderic of Toledo, this year in Spain; many of the Arabs there being highly dissatisfied with the conduct of Yusef, who had succeeded Thoaba, a warlike and magnanimous commander, in the government of that fertile and opulent region. This, as the same writer observes, occasioned a vast effusion of human blood; tho' the differences that had for some time prevailed amongst the Moslems there were at last amicably composed, and the public tranquillity in every part of that country perfectly restored <sup>d</sup>.

- In the year of the Hejra 131, Nasr Ebn Sayâr, in order to avoid falling into the hands of Abu Moslem, fled to Raya, a town, according to some of the eastern geographers, belonging to Deylam, but, as others will have it, to Khorasân. Soon after his arrival there, he fell sick, and was carried to Sâwa, near Hamedan, or Hamadan, where he expired. About this time, Ibrahim Ebn Mohammed, attended by his brothers, Abu'l Abbâs and Abu Jaafar, his son, his uncle, and a considerable number of servants, went on pilgrimage to Mecca. As he and his retinue rode on thirty camels richly caparisoned, appeared in splendid attire, attended by a more than ordinary quantity of baggage, and made a very considerable figure; this journey could not long be concealed from Merwân, then in the territory of Damascus; the inhabitants of the deserts of Sham, as well as those of Mecca and Medina, giving the Khalîf immediate intelligence of it. Besides, Ibrahim's intentions being already sufficiently made manifest by what had lately happened in Khorasân, it was impossible that his pilgrimage to Mecca, which was performed with so much pomp and parade, could long remain a secret either to Merwân himself, or his governors in Syria and Irâk. This journey, therefore, being soon discovered, the commandant of Damascus, by the Khalîf's order, sent a detachment of horse to pursue him; which came up with him near Harrân, seized him, carried him to that city, and confined him in prison loaded with irons, where he soon after died. Authors, however, are not perfectly agreed with regard to the circumstances attending his death; some of them asserting, that he was destroyed by drinking a poisonous draught, others by the fall of an old ruinous building, and, lastly, others by placing his head upon a poisoned pillow. But whichever of these accounts may be true, he had, some time before he was taken, ordered his brother Abu'l Abbâs to retire to Cûfa, and commanded all those that attended him to acknowledge him Khalîf after his decease. Abu'l Abbâs, therefore, in consequence of this order, had made the best of his way, with his brother Abu Jaafar, his uncle, and several of his friends, to that place. There he, with his family, lay concealed, till the troops, who had declared in favour of the house of Al Abbās, to whom Ibrahim had written and recommended him in the strongest terms, advanced to his support. According to Dionysius Telmarenensis, several violent shocks of an earthquake were felt this year in Syria; one of which overthrew St. Mary's church in the city of Mebug, or Manbij, and destroyed the bishop, and a great number of Christians, who were buried under the ruins of that church, whither they had retired for shelter. It seems to appear from Theophanes, that Merwān, either towards the beginning of this or the close of the preceding year, dismantled the city of Heliopolis in Syria, and put all the principal men of that place to the sword. The same author likewise, as well as Ceareus informs us, that there happened about this time a dreadful earthquake in Palestine, and particularly that part of it bordering upon the Jordan, which overturned many churches, monasteries, and towns, and destroyed vast numbers of people. Nay, it appears from those writers, that the shocks of this earthquake, which was probably the same with that mentioned by Dionysius Telmarenensis, were perceived in almost every district of Syria. It may be inferred from the Greek writers, that the imperial fleet surprized that of the Arabs, consisting of a thousand ships, in one of the ports of Cyprus, about the year we are now upon, and so intirely defeated it, that only three of them escaped. After the extinction of the late rebellions in Spain, Ujef, tho' of a libidinous and petulant disposition, conducted affairs to the satisfaction of the Moslems of that country, according to Roderic of Toledo, the present year. We must not forget to observe, that Ibrahim Ebn Mohammed, and his family, held their residence at Hunain, or Homaima, a town of the Arabian Irāk, before the late catastrophe happened to him<sup>a</sup>.

Abu'l Abbās
proclaimed Khalif, and defeats Merwān's forces.

THE following year, being the 132d of the Hejra, commencing August 20th, 749, Abu'l Abbās Ebn Mohammed, surnamed Al Saffāb, on Friday, the 12th of the former Rabi, went from Abu Mosleme's house at Cūfa, after evening prayer had been performed in the mosque of the Banu Ayūb, to his own palace there. The next day, all the officers of the troops cantoned in and about that city, each of them cloathed in black, and mounted on a good horse, with a sword by his side, formed a sort of military cavalcade, and paid their duty to him. Soon after which, Abu'l Abbās, with that whole train of the military men attending him, went from his own palace to the citadel, or imperial palace, where he first harangued them, and then received their oath of allegiance to him. This ceremony being over, he sent his uncle Abd'allah, with a powerful army, to attack Merwān's forces that were incamped near Tubar, at a small distance from Marusl, or Mosul, where that Khalif was then waiting for an account of the success of the body of troops he had ordered to march against Kahtaba, one of the greatest generals of the age, consisting of 20,000 men, under the command of Yezid, his governor of Irāk. Kahtaba receiving advice of Yezid's approach, immediately advanced against him, at the head of his troops, in order to give him battle, soon brought him to a general action, intirely defeated him, and obliged him to fly to Wāset. Early the next morning, Kahtaba's forces passed the Euphrates, in pursuit of the vanquished enemy; but the waters of that river being then swelled to an uncommon height, both he and his horse were carried away by the rapidity of the current, and, according to some of the Arab writers, never met with; tho', if others of them may be believed, his body was afterwards found. Be that as it will, this tragical event by no means cooled the ardour of his troops, who, under the conduct of his son Hamid, continued to pursue the fugitives with so much vigour, that they soon dispersed them in such a manner, that they found it absolutely impossible to rally. After the end of the action, Hamid returned with his victorious army to Cūfa, and Abu Mosleme Ebn Al Halal was declared privy-counsellor to Abu'l Abbās. A body of troops was afterwards sent to block up Yezid Ebn Omar Ebn Hobeira in Wāset; which formed a camp at Najila, before they entered upon any farther military operations. The new Khalif, Abu'l Abbās, whose mother Rabta, or Radiab, was the daughter of Abd'allah Ebn Abid, was cloathed in black at the time of his inauguration, and retired, a month after the conclusion of that ceremony, to Anbār, a city of Irāk, upon the Euphrates, which he made the seat of the Khalifat, and consequently the capital of the Moslem empire, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari<sup>c</sup>.

Abd'allah

Soon after Abd'allah, with his army, had taken post near Tubar, Merwān received advice of the defeat of his forces under Yezid, in the neighbourhood of the Euphrates. This bad news greatly afflicted him; tho' he in a short time recovered himself, and resolved to give the enemy battle. A general action, therefore, immediately ensued; in the beginning of a which the Khalif found himself obliged to dismount, in order to make water. But now a second misfortune happened, of much worse consequence to his affairs than the former. For, he had no sooner set his foot on the ground, than his horse took fright, and ran with great swiftness into the midst of his men; who, seeing the beast without his rider, imagined that the Khalif was slain at the first onset; and therefore, without taking any care to inform themselves farther in this matter, left their ranks, and betook themselves to a precipitate flight. Nor could the Khalif, though he made all possible efforts to rally them, bring them again to the charge; so that the only expedient he could pursue at this melancholy juncture, was to fly to Damascus, then the capital of his empire. But the inhabitants of that city, finding his condition desperate, treated him with contempt, and abandoned him; which b unexpected desertion obliged him to leave that place, and fly into Egypt; over which country he had appointed Abd'allah Ebn Al Magbarah, one of his favourites, after the dismissal of Yoweirah Ebn Sakl, to preside, the preceding year. Here he maintained himself for some time; but was at last attacked, and put to death, by Abd'allah Ebn Ali's brother Saleh, who was sent against him at the head of a strong detachment, in a town or village of Sa'id, or Thebais, called Bûsir Kûridas, on Sunday the 27th of the latter Jomâda. At the battle of Tubar, an incredible number of Merwân's soldiers were killed upon the spot, and many more drowned in the Euphrates; amongst the latter of which the Khalif Ibrahim Ebn Al Walid Ebn Abd'almâlec, who had formerly been deposed, is said to have been by some of the Arab writers. After that decisive action, Abd'allah, Abu'l Abbâs's general, made him-c self master of the enemy's camp, where he found an immense quantity of plunder, and pursued Merwân first to Kinnisrîn, and afterwards to Hems. From the latter of those places that Khalif fled to Damascus, where he met with the reception already mentioned; which obliged him to make the best of his way through Palestine into Egypt. As Abu'l Abbâs's troops continued the pursuit, without the least interruption, a vast multitude of the partisans of the house of Ommiyah perished on this occasion; which, as Abd'allah Ebn Ali himself was pleased to observe, completely revenged the death of Hosein. As for the citizens of Damascus, tho' they had so shamefully deserted Merwân, they refused to open their gates to the victors; upon which, Saleh Ebn Ali, who was sent against them by Abu'l Abbâs with a body of troops, entered their city by force, and gave it up to the soldiery to be plundered for three whole days. He also put to the sword Al Walid Ebn Moâwiyah Ebn Merwân Ebn Al Hakem, Merwân's governor of the place, and then pursued his route into Egypt. However, before his departure, if we will believe Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, and Abu'l Faraj, he intirely dismantled that city, and caused the bones of the princes of the house of Ommiyah, interred there, to be dug out of their graves, and ordered them all to be burnt. The latter of those authors likewise relates, or at least seems to intimate, that Abd'allah Ebn Ali himself pursued Merwân into Egypt, and not his brother Saleh, as the former of them is pleased to assert; as also, that Merwân was killed with a lance in the mosque at Bûsir, on the last day but one of the month Dhu'l hajja. After which, his head was cut off, and sent as a present to Abu'l Abbâs; who, at the first sight of it, adored God in a d most devout manner, distributed 10,000 dinârs amongst the poor, and, in conjunction with Abd'allah Ebn Ali, his general, returned thanks to the Deity for delivering into his hands his formidable competitor, or, as he was nicknamed by Abd'allah, the Ass of Mesopotamia.

WITH regard to Merwân's character, he is said by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari to have been Merwân's a valiant and magnanimous prince, endued with great prudence and thoroughly versed character. in all the arts of government. He sat upon the throne a little above five years, and was sixty-nine, or, as others say, fifty-nine, or, lastly, as others will have it, fifty-six, years of age, at the time of his death. He left behind him two sons, Abd'allah and Abd'al-laziz; the former of which was afterwards taken, and thrown into prison, where he f remained till the Khalifat of Harûn Al Rashîd. He was then released from his confinement, tho' loaded with irons for some time after that event, died childless, and was buried at Baghdâd. The first day of Merwân's reign was Sunday, and the last Thursday. His secretary was Abd'alhamid Ebn Yabya; the captain of his guards Al Kawthar Ebn Al Afwad Al Anawi; his chamberlain his freed man Saklâb, or Saflat, as he is called by Al Makîn; and his judge Othmân Al Timi. The inscription of his seal was, O wise man, remember death. The Arabs express the date of the catastrophe that befell the house of Ommiyah, in the person of Merwân, who was the last Khalif of that house, by the word Kalb, which consists of three letters, Kâf, Lâm, and Ba, denoting 132, the number of the year of the Hejra in which Merwân was killed, and the Khalifat of the princes of the house of Ommiyah intirely abolished <sup>b</sup>.

Some farther particulars relating to him.

SOME of the Christian Arabs have pretended, that this Khalif, when in Egypt, attempted to violate the chastity of a religious there. That saint, continue they, in order to defend herself from the violence with which she was threatened, and preserve her virtue inviolate, offered to give Merwân an unguent, which would render the part rubbed with it invulnerable; and begged, that he would first try the experiment upon her. To this the Khalif readily agreed, anointed her neck with it, and then with one blow of his scymitar cut off her head; making in this manner undesignedly a martyr of her. Merwân is said by some of the eastern writers to have been a greater eater than most of his time. Tho' the Khalifs of the house of Al Abbâs endeavoured to destroy all the descendants of this prince, yet we are told, that one of them escaped first into Egypt, afterwards into Africa, and last of all into Spain, where he founded the second dynasty of the Ommiyah princes, who assumed the title of Khalif there. We learn from Theophanes, Dionysius Telmarenfis, Cedrenus, and Abu'l Faraj, that the last battle, the loss of which proved the total ruin of Merwân's affairs, was fought upon the banks of the Zab, a river that has its source between the cities of Irbil, or Arbela, and Mawfel, or Mosul, and seems to answer to the Lycus of Strabo. As Abu'l Abbâs Al Saffâb's troops had not only swarthy complexions, but were likewise dressed in black, they were termed by the Arabs Mesûadi, by the Syrians Uchama, which words denoted black in the Arabic and Syriac languages, and Maurophori by Theophanes and Cedrenus. As the gross of Abu'l Abbâs's army was formed of the natives of Khorasân, whose country bordered upon Persia, they are likewise called Persians by several authors. Theophanes denominates the spot on which the two armies engaged Zaba, and Dionysius Telmarenfis Beth Zabe; probably because Merwân, as we are informed by Abu'l Faraj, had, for some time fixed his residence there, or, at least, in the neighbourhood of that place. After the defeat of his forces, that prince fled to Harrân; from whence, a bridge having been before thrown over the Euphrates, probably near Batn, Batân, or Bettân, he made his escape into Syria, and afterwards gradually into Egypt, where he met with the above-mentioned fate: notwithstanding which, the Moslems still continued, according to Roderic of Toledo, to be governed by his lieutenant Iusef, in Spain <sup>c</sup>.

THE same year, the new Khalif Abu'l Abbâs Al Saffâb ordered Abu Moslema Ebn Al Halâl to be put to death, for forming a design to transfer the Khalifat to the house of Ali, or Abu Tâleb, from that of Al Abbâs. He also cut off Yezid Ebn Omar Ebn Hobeira, though he had before promised to take him under his protection, because he had entered into some machinations to fix Abd'allah, the son of Hasan Ebn Hosein Ebn Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb upon the Moslem throne. After these executions, he conferred upon his brother Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr the government of Aderbijan, as well as that of Armenia and Mesopotamia; upon his brother Yahya that of Mosul; upon his uncle David that of Hejâz and Yaman; upon his uncle Isa that of Cûsa; upon Sofân Ebn Moâwiyah Al Mohallebi that of Basra; upon Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmân Ebn Al Asba'b that of Persia; upon Mansûr Ebn Jambûr that of India and Sindia; upon Abu Moslem, who had brought about the revolution in favour of the race of Al Abbâs, that of Khorasân; upon his uncle Abd'allah Ebn Ali that of Syria; and, lastly, upon his uncle Saleh Ebn Ali that of Egypt. The last of which governors chose for his deputy Abu Awn Ebn Abd'almâlec Ebn Yezid. Abd'allah Ebn Ali Ebn Al Abbâs, after his return from Ramla, made a public entry into Damascus, in order to take possession of his new government, and exercised unheard of cruelties upon the members of the house of Ommiyah there. Some of them he tortured in a most barbarous and inhuman manner, and others he burnt to death. At Rusâfa, he ordered Heshâm Ebn Abd'almâlec to receive 120 stripes upon his bare back; which separated the flesh from the bones in such a manner, that it all fell to the ground, and was reduced to ashes, by this cruel governor's command; who, at the same time said, "This is done by way of retaliation for the barbarous treatment met with by my father from him, who told me, that he received formerly 60 stripes for no crime at all." By the preceding list of governors and provinces, it clearly appears, that the Moslem empire

- a empire was of a vast extent, when Al Saffâb, the first of the Khalifs of the family of Al Abbâs, ascended the throne*.

THE following year, being the 133d of the Hejra, commencing August 9, 750, the people of Chalcidene, a district of Syria separated by the province of Chalybonitis from the Euphrates, took up arms in favour of the house of Ommiyah, and advanced into the neighbourhood of Hems; but were overthrown there by the Khalif's troops, called Macrophori by Theophanes, who put four thousand of them to the sword. About the same time, a body of Arabs of the faction of Kais, under the command of one Burikba, formed a conspiracy against the Khalif, and cut off a considerable number of the partisans of the house of Al Abbâs; but they were at last dispersed, with very great loss, by Al Saffâb's forces. As the

- b Arabs on this occasion appeared in white cloaths, and the Khalif's men in black; hence arose the two different factions of the Whites and the Blacks in Syria, that have been taken notice of by several of the eastern writers. However, Merwân's head having been cut off, after the last defeat of that prince's forces, in Egypt, it was embalmed, and exposed to publick view in the principal cities of the empire; which effectually appeased all commotions. One of the Greek historians informs us, that Merwân's army, overthrown at the battle of Zaba, consisted of 300,000 men; and that he escaped with only 3000 slaves into Egypt. Theophanes relates, that the Arabs were divided at this time into two powerful factions, which he calls the Kaisians and the Imanites (A); the latter of which seem to have been either the people inhabiting the province of Ontân, or that branch of the Shiites denominated Imâmians by some of the Moslem writers. These Imanites, according to the same author, were superior in fortitude to the Kaisians, had before destroyed great numbers of them, and then joined the forces assembled by Kabtaba to act in favour of the house of Al Abbâs. Yusef, Merwân's lieutenant, notwithstanding the late revolution in Syria, continued this year to preside over the Moslems in Spain<sup>1</sup>.

IN the 134th year of the Hejra, and part of the preceding year, the emperor Constantine Copronymus made an irruption into Armenia and the neighbouring provinces, reduced the cities of Melitene, Theodosiopolis, and Jezira, carried part of the inhabitants off with him into Thrace, and seized upon the greatest part of Armenia. It appears from Theophanes, that the Khalif's officers, about this time, butchered vast numbers of the Christians in Palestine. The principal events in the Moslem empire during the year of the Hejra 134.

- d Dionysius Telmarenis relates, that considerable commotions happened at Maiphercat, Maipherchin, Maipherasta, or Mayafarkin, a city of Mesopotamia, this year. One Cyrus Ebn Tebitb advanced from thence at the head of a body of troops into a district called Culab, and put seven of the principal men of that district to the sword. Of which the inhabitants of a neighbouring territory, named Phis, receiving advice, they fortified their capital, raised what forces they were able, and made the proper dispositions, under the command and direction of one John, a Syrian, to give the enemy a warm reception, if they should think fit to appear. But, notwithstanding these dispositions, one Severus, a native of Phis, endeavoured to bring his countrymen under a foreign yoke, and went over to the Arabs. However, John routed the troops sent against them under the conduct of this Severus, and killed the greatest part of them upon the spot. He also defeated Cyrus's governor of Culab, who had rebelled against his master, and possessed himself of Elul and Phasphasat; driving him from thence with considerable loss. He afterwards advanced to Hadar, escaped an ambuscade laid for him by one Stephen, who had been reinforced with a body of Arab troops commanded by Awf, a Moslem general, and intirely dispersed that corps. Gregory, an Iberian, likewise, at this juncture, moved at the head of a detachment against the people inhabiting the banks of the river Hara, and put many of them to the sword; which induced the members of the canton seated on mount Say to flock to John, who commanded the forces of Phis in no small numbers, in order to enable them to expel from their country the barbarians. The eastern part of Mesopotamia, at the same time renounced all allegiance to the Khalif, and sent up Burikba, who had been defeated the preceding year by Al Saffâb's troops, in opposition to him. At Edeffa, Abd'allah Ebn Boktr assumed the supreme command, after he had destroyed the monasteries of Cuba, Resmat in Taisapha, Catara, Hesma, St. Lazarus, Beth Maada, St. Abel, St. Milles,

(A) Perhaps our learned readers will be better pleased with what has been advanced by Abu'iseân, concerning the Kaisians and Imanites, than with either of the notions laid down here. "The Syrians," says, this historian, "were then divided into two opposite factions. The Al Yamanians, or Imanites, who adhered to Merwân

"and the Kaisians, so denominated from the Dabâk Ebn Kais, their leader, who strenuously espoused the interest of Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir." For, that the Al Yamanians and Kaisians of Abu'l Faraj were the Imanites and Kaisians of Theophanes, cannot well be denied (1).

and Senin, in the neighbourhood of Edeffa, Harrân, and Tela. The winter this year in Mesopotamia, and the neighbouring provinces, was extremely severe; the ground being covered a long time with snow, and the waters with ice. This, in conjunction with several large swarms of locusts, which intirely consumed all the corn, produced a dreadful famine in Media, Armenia, and Mesopotamia, especially the last of these provinces, into which a prodigious multitude had retired out of the others, for the sake of a subsistence. We must here beg leave to observe, that the city of Tela, the Constantia, Constantina, Antipolis, and Antiochia, of the antients, was, according to Theophanes, fifty-six stadia east of Nisibis, and about the same distance, in a southern direction, from Amida; and that Maipheraëta, called by the Arabs Mayafarkîn, and sometimes, by way of contraction, in the days of Abul'feda, Barbi, was a city of Mesopotamia, about seven or eight days journey from Mosul, denominated, as it should seem, by Ammianus Marcellinus Macepraëta, and taken, without any just foundation, by Renaudot to be Tagrit, or the Martyropolis of Procopius. It must likewise be remarked, that Roderic of Toledo is undoubtedly mistaken, when he asserts Abd'allah Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ali, surnamed Abul' Abbâs Al Saffâb, to have been inaugurated this year; since he runs counter herein to the whole stream of Moslem antiquity, as well as to the authority of the best Greek and Syrian writers <sup>m</sup>.

As also during

THE next year, being the 135th of the Hejra, the rebel Burikka, having raised a powerful army, advanced to Dara; where he was met and engaged by the Khalif's forces, who overthrew him with very great slaughter. The partisans of the house of Ommiyah received likewise two other notable defeats at Mosul and Akula; the former of which places, called sometimes New Nineveh, and by the Arabs Mawfel, was a city of Mesopotamia, seated upon the Tigris, about six days journey from Maipheraëta; and the latter, supposed by Bar Hebraeus to have been the same with Cûfa, was seated, according to Sharif Al Edrisi, upon the Euphrates, about six stations from Baghdâd. It was denominated by Abul'feda, who makes it to have been a small town in his days, Dair Al Akûl, and placed by him at no great distance from Baghdâd, about ten parasangs from Al Madâyen upon the Tigris; tho' he takes it to be a different city from Cûfa. After these defeats, in which the rebels lost abundance of men, the Khalif appointed John, the general of Phis, who had signalized himself so much on many occasions against the Arabs of Maipheraëta, governor of a considerable extent of territory in that part of his dominions, and loaded him with presents. His brother Abd'allah Ebn Mohammed, who commanded the forces employed in the reduction of the rebel Burikka, Al Saffâb had before constituted governor of Mesopotamia. Salikh Ebn Sabikh, another of the Khalif's generals, undertook an expedition into Armenia, and obliged the principal cities of that province to deliver hostages into his hands, as pledges for their future fidelity to the Khalif; all which he conducted to Maipheraëta. Some of these John, the general of Phis, soon after came to release; upon which the people of Maipheraëta would have persuaded Salikh to cut him off by treachery; but he escaped by the favour of Abd'allah Ebn Mohammed, who took him under his protection. Stephen, one of the Ommiyah commanders already mentioned, died suddenly this year at Harrân. It appears from Abu Jaasar Al Tabari and Abul Faraj, as well as from Dionysius Telmarenensis, who has been followed herein by M. Bayer, that Abd'allah Ebn Mohammed, who acquired so much glory by the defeat of the rebel Burikka, must have been Al Saffâ's successor, the Khalif Abu Jaasar Al Mansûr, who had been appointed by his brother in the beginning of his reign, the governor of Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Aderbijân. For, that his name, as well as Al Saffâ's, was Abd'allah, may be inferred from all those authors. It may not be amiss to inform our readers here, that dirhems were still struck at Cûfa; the author of this history having one of them, in excellent conservation, with the following legend and inscription, according to the learned Dr. Hunt, in the Cûfic character, upon it: There is no God, but the one only God: He has no companions. This dirhém was struck at Cûfa in the 134th year. By which we are given to understand, that this piece was coined at Cûfa, in the 134th year of the Hejra, or Mohammedan æra, and the third of the Khalifat of Abd'allah Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ali, surnamed Abul' Abbâs Al Saffâb. The unity of God, and his superiority over all other beings, intimated by the expressions, There is no God but the only one God, and He has no companions, by which the Mohammedans exclude the Son and the Holy Ghost from a participation of the divine nature, are points deducible from the 4th, the 5th, and the 112th, chapters, of the Korân. It cannot be inferred from Roderic of Toledo, so often cited here, that any thing remarkable happened this year, under Yusef's administration, in Spain <sup>n</sup>.

- a In the 136th year of the Hejra, commencing July 7th, 753, Abd'allah Ebn Mohamimed Al Saffâh's Ebn Ali Abu'l Abbâs Al Saffâh, the first Khalif of the house of Al Abbâs, departed this life, <sup>death and character.</sup> either at Anbâr, according to Eutychius, or, as Abu Jaafar Al Tabari will have it, at Al Hasbemiya, a city erected by himself, at a small distance from the former, if not adjoining to it, on Sunday, the 12th, or 13th (for about this authors differ) of Dhu'lhajja, the very day that he completed his 33d year. Some writers have, however, related, that he was but 32 years and an half old at the time of his death. He died of the small-pox, and reigned about four years and nine months, according to the best of the Arab historians. He was, as to his person, tall, handsome, and of a fair complexion. His nose was a little distorted; but he was portly, and of a very good size. With regard to his disposition he
- b was discreet and munificent, had good parts, and was extremely averse to shedding of blood; though he was obliged, contrary to his natural inclination, in order to preserve himself upon the throne, to massacre a prodigious number of the friends and adherents of the house of Ommiyah, besides those he slew in the different engagements he had with Merwân's forces, upon the Euphrates, at Damascus, and in Egypt. Isa Ebn Mûsa, his nephew, said the usual prayers over him at the time of his interment. As a proof of his singular munificence, we are told, that he made a present to Abd'allah Ebn Hasan Ebn Hosein Ebn Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb of 2,000,000 dirhems at once; which exceeded every thing of that kind that had been done by any of his predecessors. He was the first of the Khalifs who created a privy-counsellor, namely, Abu Moslema Ebn Al Halil, whom he caused to be executed for
- c an intention to transfer the Khalifat from his family to that of Abu Tâleb, and afterwards Khâled Ebn Barmâc; those of the house of Ommiyah making use of their secretaries of state as counsellors, whom they consulted on all emergent occasions. His judge, or Kâdi, was Abu Leili of Medina, and afterwards Abu Yahya of the same city; the captain of his guards was Abd'al Jabâr Ebn Abd'alrahman Al Azdi; and his chamberlains Abu Othmân Ebn Saleh and Ebn Ghassân. The inscription of his seal was, God is the trust of ABD'ALLAH, who believeth in him. The first day of his reign was Friday, and the last Sunday. He had a very tender affection and high regard for the family of Mohammed; and was a prince of very pious sentiments. Being one day viewing himself in a glass, and perceiving himself in the flower of his age, he addressed himself to God in the following terms: "O God! I will not say
- d " what Solimân Ebn Abd'almâlec, a Khalif of the house of Ommiyah, used to say; I am the king and prince of youth; I pray thee to preserve my life only for thy service, and to grant " that I may enjoy a greater share of health than of any other blessings." The words were scarce out of his mouth, when he heard one of his slaves in his antichamber say to his comrade, " By what I see, there is only five days difference between your age and mine." The Khalif was immediately struck with the expression, as much as if he had heard the divine decree intimating to him the certain period of his days; which, in effect, those words did, as he was in a short time after attacked by the small-pox, which carried him off about two months and five days after they were spoken. We are told by a Persian historian, that this Khalif was surnamed Al Saffâh, because he did not obtain possession of
- e the Khalifat without an incredible effusion of human blood. In this prince's reign, as we are informed by the Christian writers, the emperor Constantine Copronymus constituted one Ishak, a Christian bishop, and his particular favourite, patriarch of Antioch, and the east, and put to death one Matratinus, for not receiving him in that character. That emperor likewise sent an order to the patriarch of Alexandria to admit Ishak in the aforesaid capacity, or, in case of refusal, to repair immediately to Constantinople; with which he did not think fit to comply. But Ishak and Athanasius, who succeeded him, dying soon after, one George was advanced to the patriarchate of Antioch; and removed afterwards from that honourable post by the following Khalif, Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr, who substituted in his room a Christian bishop, that was one of his most intimate friends. In the beginning of the Khalifat of Al
- f Saffâh, several conflicts happened between his forces and those of Merwân in Egypt; before he could make himself absolute master of that country. The latter of those princes is said to have been extremely cruel to the Christians in Egypt, frequently threatening to cut off the patriarch of Alexandria's head, and ordering a scymitar to be brought him for that purpose; but receiving advice, that Al Saffâh's forces, under the command of Saleh Ebn Ali, had entered Egypt, he immediately passed the Nile, took post in the city of Geeza, or Al Jizab, the antient Memphis, and laid Mesr, then the capital of Egypt, in ashes; together with all the corn and provisions at that time in the place. After which, he seized upon a nunnery, at a small distance from Geeza, made all the religious therein prisoners, and, amongst the rest, a beautiful nun, whose chastity he offered to violate, in the manner already related. Abu Jaafar Al Tabari seems inconsistent with himself, in relation to the year of Merwân's death; intimating in one place, that it happened in the 132d year of the Hejra, and in another the following year. Some of the Arab authors inform us, that this Merwân was a monstrous glutton, and so extremely fond of sheep's kidneys, that he could not forbear wrapping his hand in the corner of his vest, whenever he saw a sheep, and tearing out of it that part; which he devoured immediately. To this they add, that after the ravenous operation, he threw off his vest, and put on another; and that he left above ten thousand such greasy vests behind him. With regard to Al Saffâb's age, at the time of his death, though, according to the Arab writers, this did not exceed thirty-three years, as has been already observed; yet he was forty-two years old, when that tragical event happened, if we will believe Kondemir, the celebrated Persian historian °.

Abu Jaafar
Al Mansûr
succeeds Al
Saffâb.

UPON the death of Abd'allah Abu'l Abbâs Al Saffâb, his brother Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr, who, in Al Saffâb's life-time, had been declared the presumptive heir of the crown, was proclaimed Khalif in the imperial city of Anbâr, then the capital of the Moslem empire. His brother, who lodged the will made in his favour in the hands of his uncle, Isa Ebn Ali, with orders to him to open it, and oblige the people to take an oath of fidelity to the new Khalif, as soon as he was dead, had appointed Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr chief of the caravan of pilgrims visiting Mecca this very year; so that the latter was on his journey to Mecca when the former expired. This happened in the month of Dbu'lhajja, which as its name imports, is peculiarly set apart for the celebration of the grand solemnity there. Upon the arrival of the news of Al Saffâb's death, he immediately dispatched Abu Moslem to Cûfa, to take care of his affairs. When Abu Moslem arrived there, in order to oblige the inhabitants to take the oath of allegiance to Al Mansûr, and proclaim him Khalif, he found that his nephew, Isa Ebn Mûsa, had been attempting to usurp the Khalifat. But the appearance of this great general, who was soon followed by Al Mansûr himself, put an end to all the towering projects of Isa, and obliged him to ask pardon of the new Khalif for his temerity and presumption; who granted him his life, upon condition that he should always remain in a private station. However, his uncle Abd'allah Ebn Ali, then governor of Syria, was not intimidated by this success; but set up for himself in that country, where he gave Al Mansûr much more trouble than his nephew Isa had done, as will hereafter very clearly appear <sup>p</sup>.

the houses of Al Abbâs and Ommyyah.

IT may be inferred from Dionysius Telmarenensis, who lived about the time that the first Khalif of the house of Al Abbâs ascended the Moslem throne, or very soon after, that several encounters at least, if not bloody battles, happened in Syria between the partisans of that house and the adherents of the family of Ommyyah, in the last year of Abu'l Abbâs Al Saffâb. The particulars of these actions, however, have not been handed down to us; though we may conclude, from the general account given us of them by the aforesaid writer and Theophanes, that the troops on both sides committed dreadful devastations in that rich and opulent province. The Persians, however, as Dionysius calls the friends of the house of Al Abbâs, proved superior to their enemies in this war, and dismantled all the fortified towns of Syria, except Antioch, whose fortifications they left intire. According to Roderic of Toledo, three suns, or two parhelia, were seen either this or the preceding year at Corduba in Spain. It has been observed by Rases, that no rain fell there, either this or the following year; which occasioned a great scarcity of provisions, if not a downright famine, in that fertile region, over which Yusef still continued to preside <sup>q</sup>.

Al Hishemiyah.

THE following year, being the 137th of the Hejra, which commenced June 27th, 754, Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ali Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Abbâs was inaugurated at Al Hishemiyah, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, with all possible demonstrations of joy on the part of his subjects there. His mother Salma, the daughter of Basbar, who had been a only his father's concubine, was born at Basra. He was first saluted Khalif at a place called Al Saffâb, i. e. the famous, the bright, the illustrious, &c. from whence he took occasion to predict, that his reign would be glorious, and distinguished by many actions of éclat. His uncle Ijâ Ebn Ali assembled all the members of the house of Hâshem at Anbâr, in order to support his interest before his arrival there. This, at that juncture, he judged a necessary precaution; being apprehensive, that his nephew's title to the Khalifat would be disputed by a powerful faction; and that, in consequence of such a contest, new troubles in the interior part of the empire must immediately ensue<sup>r</sup>.

b In the mean time, Abd'allah Ebn Ali, Abu'l Abbâs's uncle, having been apprized of his nephew's death, and that his other nephew, Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr, brother to the deceased, had been proclaimed Khalif at Cûfa, came to a resolution not to recognize his authority; and, in consequence of this resolution, caused himself to be acknowledged in the same quality at Damascus. In vindication of his conduct on this occasion, he thought fit to allege, that when Abu'l Abbâs Al Saffâb, the first Khalif of the house of Al Abbâs, sent him to attack Merwân, the last Khalif of the race of Ommiyah, he declared, that in case he could deliver him and his family from all future apprehensions of that dangerous enemy, who disputed the empire with him, he should be called to the succession immediately after him; and having executed that prince's orders, in relation to Merwân, he thought he had a right, in pursuance of the aforesaid declaration, to aspire to the Moslem throne. To support his pretensions to the Khalifat, he raised a powerful army in Arabia, Syria, and Mesopotamia, and advanced with great expedition to the banks of the Masius, at a small distance from the Nisibis, where he encamped. Abu Jaafar, receiving advice of this rebellion, sent Abu Moslem against Abd'allah, with all the forces he could assemble in Persia, Khorasân, and Irâk; who, having harassed him, without intermission for five months together, at last brought him to a general action, intirely defeated him, and forced him to betake himself to a precipitate flight. This battle was fought on Tuesday, the 26th of the latter Tisri, a Syrian month, answering to our November, in the 137th year of the Hejra, and of our LORD 754. Theophanes pretends that this engagement happened at Tyana, in Cappadocia; in which he must be greatly mistaken, as running counter in this point to Dionysius Telmarenfis, and all the most celebrated Arab historians. He likewise seems to intimate, that the victory gained by Abu Moslem was in a great measure owing to the bravery of the Sclavonian and Antiochian troops, that served in Al Mansûr's army. He farther gives us to understand, that the Syrian troops attacked several bodies of the Khalif's forces this year in Palestine, Hems, &c. and cut great numbers of them to pieces. After the end of the action upon the Masius, Abu Moslem seized upon the enemy's camp, and made himself master of all the baggage; but, considering them in the light of Al Mansûr's subjects, and Moslems, he did not put many of them to the sword. As for Abd'allah, his affairs being intirely ruined by this blow, he left the shattered remains of his army to shift for themselves, and made the best of his way to Basra<sup>s</sup>.

e It will be proper to observe here, that tho' the house of Al Abbâs owed their elevation to the Khalifat almost intirely to Abu Moslem, there had for some time been a considerable misunderstanding between that general and Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr. The latter perceiving the former, in his brother's life-time, to be so revered by the people of Khorasân, over whom he then presided, that he seemed to be independent even on the Khalif himself, would have persuaded Al Saffâb to put him to death; but that prince, not being willing to push his ingratitude so far, could by no means be prevailed upon to follow his advice. However, he refused him the post of Mirhaje, or chief of the caravan of pilgrims visiting Mecca, which he solicited for himself, and conferred it upon his brother Abu Jaafar, in the last year of his reign. This not a little chagrined Abu Moslem, who thought his important services to the house of Al Abbâs gave him a right to any employment he should think fit to demand. Leaving, therefore, the Khalif's court in disgust, he could not forbear saying, "that, as the house of Al Abbâs were members of the prophet's family, and had possession of the gates of Mecca, they might have left him the honour he desired." In order likewise to manifest his discontent, he set out for Mecca a day before Abu Jaafar, and carried an immense quantity of provisions with him upon the backs of 200 camels, with which he regaled twice a day the principal pilgrims of the caravan; and, after the end of every entertainment, made each of them a present of a vest. The affront offered on this occasion to Abu Jaafar, which was highly resented by that prince, afterwards cost him dear. For, as soon as he came to the throne, tho' he retained Abu Moslem in his service, as has already been seen, in order to extinguish Abd'allah's rebellion, no one of his other governors of provinces being able to assist him with a sufficient body of troops at this perilous conjuncture, he seemed in earnest to meditate his destruction. Having received <sup>a</sup> advice of the total overthrow of Abd'allah, the Khalif, who was naturally of a covetous disposition, sent an officer that was not present in the action to the army, to bring him a faithful and exact account of the plunder that was taken. This conduct appearing very strange to Abu Moslem, he said to the officer with some emotion, "I have hitherto given so good an account to the Khalif of the lives and blood of so many thousand men, who have passed over the edge of my sword, since it has been drawn for his service, that he ought not to have doubted of my fidelity with regard to the spoil." Nor was he content with expressing his resentment in this manner. For, instead of marching into Syria and Egypt, after the defeat of Abd'allah, as by his orders he was obliged to do, he retired into Khorasân, where he lived for some time in a sort of independency, tho' without any formal renunciation of his allegiance to the Khalif. However, at last, either by the artifices of his enemies, or too great a presumption of his own merit, he was drawn to court, and met with a most gracious reception there; though a few days after, he was assassinated by four persons posted in his chamber by Al Mansûr, for that purpose. The following detail of the circumstances preceding and attending this horrid action have been handed down to us by Abu'l Faraj. Abu Moslem, by his distribution of vests among the Arab pilgrims that attended him to Mecca, and his reparation of the roads, as well as of the fountains and wells of water, so necessary for the refreshment of those pilgrims, had acquired such a reputation as excited the jealousy of Al Mansûr, and induced him to resolve upon his destruction. To which he was farther prompted by a letter brought to him by Abu Moslem, who set out from Mecca before him, and received advice of the decease of Al Saffâr upon the road, in which he condoled with him for his brother's death, without congratulating him upon his accession; which extremely irritated the new Khalif. Nor did he either stop upon the road till that prince came up, or return to him, as in point of duty he ought to have done; which greatly aggravated the affront, and made Al Mansûr more sensible of the contumelious treatment he had received. From that moment he not only hated Abu Moslem, but was afraid of him, and could enjoy no sort of rest till he had formed a scheme for his destruction. Abu Moslem, on the other hand, was very well apprized, that he had incurred the displeasure of the Khalif, and therefore consulted one of his friends at Raya, whether or no it would be proper for him to go to court? That trusty confidant advised him by no means to see the Khalif, but to retire instantly into Khorasân. This he refusing to do, and making the best of his way to Al Mansûr's residence, it was told him, "that he had left his counsel behind him at Raya;" which afterwards passed into a proverb amongst the Arabs. Al Mansûr, upon his arrival, at first treated him with great marks of distinction, and ordered him to refresh himself that night in a proper manner; which he did, without delay. But, the next day, when he returned to court, he was assassinated by four of the Khalif's guards, who had placed themselves behind a curtain for that purpose, and, as soon as Al Mansûr clapped his hands, which was the signal agreed upon between them, they rushed upon him, and, amidst his outcries for mercy, and loud professions of loyalty to Al Mansûr, immediately dispatched him. Upon his first appearance before the Khalif that day, after he had sent for him, he upbraided him with the disrespect he had shewn him, and particularly with having inserted his own name before that of his sovereign in one of his letters, as well as with ridiculing, in conjunction with Mâlec Ebn Al Haitham, a letter that he himself had sent him. In answer to which accusations, Abu Moslem endeavoured to excuse his former conduct, and, in order to move the Khalif's compassion, prostrated himself before him; but without effect, that prince wishing God might destroy him, if he did not instantly put him to death. He then clapped his hands, and the assassins appeared; upon which, Abu Moslem cried out, Preserve me, O emperor of the faithful, from your enemies. To whom the Khalif replied, What more deadly enemy have I than yourself? We find it intimated by Abu Ja'afar Al Tabari, that Al Mansûr vowed Abu Moslem's ruin, because he had calumniated him; but that for some time he in vain attempted to get him into his power, tho' at last he decoyed him to court, where he met with his tragical fate. The same author also relates, that he was massacred on the 25th day of the month Skaabân, in the 137th year of the Hejra; and that, after the perpetration of this horrid fact, his body was thrown into the Tigris. Some writers pretend, that this great general had an intention to transfer the Khalifat from the house of Al Abbâs to the descendants of Ali, or rather at first to have settled the latter upon the Moslem throne; and that this was the principal cause of his destruction. Be that as it will, he is said to have killed six hundred thousand men in the various battles he fought for the house of Al Abbâs, and on other occasions, or, as some will have it, that number, besides those he destroyed in his military expeditions. He is also said to have been a great glutton and epicure; to have consumed every day 3000 cheese-cakes, or tarts, and 1000 sheep, besides oxen and fowls; and to have had 1000 cooks, and as much kitchen furniture as would load 1200 beasts of burden. He had three wives, with every one of which he lay only once a year. He was one of

- a of the most jealous and suspicious of mortals, and kept his wives confined in a castle, into which no one but himself was permitted to enter. They were supplied with necessaries through the windows of that prison; and whenever any of them was introduced to his embraces, she rode on a beast that was afterwards killed, and the saddle on which she sat burnt the night after it had been used, in order to prevent any man's ever making use of them for the future. He was indisputably valiant and brave, tho', with regard to his intellectual abilities and humanity, authors are not perfectly agreed; some of the eastern historians representing him as prudent, merciful, and discreet, whilst others of them have characterized him as an officer of a fierce, merciless, and intractable disposition. A certain Moslem being once asked, whether Abu Moslem or Al Hejâj was the better man? he replied,
- b I will not say, that Abu Moslem was better than any other man, but that Al Hejâj was worse than him. Some pretend, that he was born in a village belonging to the territory of Merû, a famous city of Khorasân; others suppose him to have been an Arab, extremely well versed in the writings of the antient poets of his own nation, as well as in the moral traditions of the sayings and actions of Mohammed; and, lastly, others maintain, that he was originally a slave, and of Curd extraction. But however this may be, as he had the principal share in that surprising revolution, which fixed the house of Al Abbâs upon the Moslem throne, and makes so great a figure in the Arab history, we thought it would be highly proper to oblige our curious readers at least with the preceding short sketch of his life and character, as well as a circumstantial account of his tragical exit, here<sup>1</sup>.
- c AFTER the death of Abu Moslem, one Sinan, a Magian, or adorer of fire, of Naifabour, Sinan, the the metropolis of Khorasân, who had made himself master of Abu Moslem's treasures, excited the people of that country to a revolt against the Khalif Al Mansûr; but he was soon defeated, Magian, rebels against the Khalif; and is overthrown by though at the head of 100,000 men, and the province reduced to the obedience of the Khalif, in the year of the Hejra 137, by Jamhûr Ebn Morad, who had been sent against him by Al Mansûr with a powerful army. That general having acquired an immense quantity of spoil in this expedition, the Khalif was prompted by his avaricious temper to send a person express to the army, to seize upon it; which so disgusted Jamhûr, that he immediately turned his arms against his master. But Al Mansûr having ordered a formidable army to march against him, he abandoned the city of Raya, where he had cantoned his troops, at the
- d approach of the Khalif's forces, and retired to Ispahân, in order to possess himself of that city and its dependencies. We must beg leave to remark here, that Dionysius Telmarenensis is guilty of a mistake, when he asserts Al Saffab to have died this year; such an assertion running counter to what has been advanced on this head by Abu'l Faraj, Eutychius, Abu Jaafar, Al Tabari, and all the rest of the most celebrated Moslem historians<sup>2</sup>.
- e THE following year, being the 138th of the Hejra, the Khalif's forces, under the command of Mohammed Ebn Asbâat, pursued Jamhûr to Ispahân, where he had taken post with a body of troops; but, upon the approach of Mohammed, he retired with great precipitation into Aderbijân. Here, for some time, he maintained himself; but the Khalif's army at last coming up with him, attacked him with incredible bravery, and intirely defeated him. Jamhûr Ebn Morad is defeated by the Khalif's forces.
- f Dionysius Telmarenensis seems to intimate, that an engagement happened this year in the neighbourhood of Mesopotamia, between the governor of that province's son and one of the imperial generals, who had made an irruption into the Moslem territories; though we meet with no account of this action in any of the Arab writers. On the 9th day of March, either the present or the following year, several shocks of an earthquake were felt in Palestine and Syria, which did very considerable damage. About this time, Theodorus, patriarch of Antioch, was banished into an obscure part of Palestine by the Arabs, for holding an illicit correspondence with the emperor, and discovering to that prince several secrets relating to the present situation of the Moslem affairs. On this occasion, the Christians were forbidden either to build or repair any churches, to expose publicly the cross in any part of the Khalif's dominions, or to enter into any religious disputes with the Arabs. Salim, one of Al Mansûr's generals, according to Theophanes, invaded Cappadocia the same year with an army of 80,000 men; but was obliged to retire out of that country with considerable loss, and without any other advantage than the acquisition of a few Armenian deserters, whom he conducted into the Moslem territories. John patriarch of Antioch, Michael patriarch of Alexandria, Timothy bishop of Edeffa, Constantine bishop of Samosata, Dionysius bishop of Harrân, Serguna bishop of Marde, and David bishop of Dara, who was afterwards created patriarch, all Monophysite prelates, flourished in the year we are now upon; and Aibanafus Sandalensis, bishop of Maipheraeta, erected a monastery on mount Telbesine, Tela-d-Besine, or

Tel-Befmai, called afterwards the monastery of Mar Abbanasius, about the same time. Aba a also, who belonged to the monastery of Mar Alib, was promoted to the see of Amida in Mesopotamia, in the room of Severus, who resigned. The synod of Mabag seems likewise to have been held in the church of St. Thomas, without the town, the present year; at which assisted John bishop of Callinicum, Timoth bishop of Edeffe, David bishop of Dara, Aba bishop of Amida, Serguna bishop of Marde, Atardin, or Maradin, Stephen bishop of Chabura, Constantine bishop of Samosata, Cyriac bishop of Tur-Abdin, Dionysius bishop of Harrân, Elius bishop of Sigar, Paul bishop of Tagrit, Jonas bishop of Be Nuhadra, Neadra, Necrde, or Neardea, and several other Syrian and Mesopotamian prelates of considerable note. The result of which synod was a schism, occasioned principally by the influence of a monk named John, at whose instigation the eastern Mesopotamian clergy chose John bishop of Callinicum b for their patriarch; whilst those seated at Mosul, and in the western parts, elevated one George, not then upon the spot, to that honourable post. It seems to appear from Roderic of Toledo, that the Angli, or English, laid waste, about the 134th year of the Hejra, the borders of the Moslem conquests in Spain w,

In the 139th year of the Hejra, Abd'alrahmân Ebn Moâwiyah Ebn Heshâm Ebn Abd'almallec Ebn Merwân, after the intire ruin of his family in Asia, arrived in Spain. The fugitive prince, at this time about twenty-eight years of age, was recognized by the Arabs of that country for lawful Khalif of the west, and is said to have reigned thirty-two years and several months; leaving his crown, according to some of the eastern writers, to his son Heshâm, in the 172d year of the Hejra. He erected the great mosque at Corduba, or Cordova, about two years before his death; and founded a monarchy, that remained near 200 years. The Spanish chronicle informs us, that he was surnamed Al Adel, or the Just; and that he left eleven sons and nine daughters behind him. We must not forget to observe, that Rases has placed Abd'alrahmân's arrival in Spain in the preceding year. That prince assumed to himself the title of Emir Al Mûmenin, or emperor of the faithful, of Spain, and king of Corduba; and, after the defeat of Yusef, in the year of the Hejra 142, asserted his independency, and refused to pay any tribute to the eastern Khalif. Abu Jaafar Al Tabari is undoubtedly guilty of a mistake, when he affirms Moâwiyah Ebn Heshâm himself, the father of Abd'alrahmân, to have been the first Khalif, or Moslem emperor, of Spain; as, in this point, he runs counter to the whole stream both of Spanish and Arab antiquity. Al Man- d sûr imposed about this time, according to Theophanes, an additional tribute upon the Christians in his dominions, which even the monks and religious were obliged to pay, sealed up the furniture of their churches with his own seal; and, that it might be the more easily disposed of, put it into the hands of the Jews. Some authors pretend, that the Khalif this year issued an order for the reparation and enlargement of the temple at Meca; but that this was ever carried into execution, does not from an Arab author appear. On Tuesday, March 3d, a terrible earthquake happened in Jezira, or Mesopotamia, which, according to Dionysius Telmarenis, demolished three considerable towns *.

THE next year, being the 140th of the Hejra, beginning May 25th, 757, the Khalif Al Mansûr sent Abd'al Wahab, his brother Ibrahim Ebn Mohammed's son, with an army of 70,000 c men, to Malatia, or Melitene, a city of Armenia, or, as others will have it, of Cappadocia; where he incamped, during the space of six months, and in that time refortified the town, that had a little before been dismantled by the Greeks. He also made it a place of arms, deposited a great part of his treasures there, and left in it a garison of 4000 men. He likewise built a castle, or citadel, at Claudias, or Claudiopolis, a neighbouring city of Cappadocia, according to Abu'l Faraj. But the most remarkable event that happened this year, was the rebellion, or insurrection, of the Rawandians, an impious sect, who, according to Ebn Shok-nah, held a metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls, in the city of Al Hasshemiyah; of which we shall here beg leave to give our readers a short and succinct relation. The Rawandians were descended, or at least received their name, from one Al Rawand; and have been repre- f sented by several of the eastern historians as some of the first who strenuously promoted the interest of the house of Al Abbâs in Khorasân. But Abd'allah, the son of this Al Rawand, having been engaged in some disputes with Abu Moslem, who was very powerful in Khorasân, he came to an open rupture with him; the consequences of which were by no means favourable to Abd'allah Ebn Al Rawand, and his adherents, who were intirely defeated and dispersed, and obliged to hide themselves in the most obscure parts of that province.

- a From this time to the present year, after Abu Meslem had been put to death by the Khalif's order, Abd'allah lay concealed; but being now freed from all apprehensions of his most formidable enemy, he assembled all his followers in the city of Al Hasbemiya, then the residence of the Khalif, and, at the head of them, went in procession round Al Mansur's palace there, in the same manner as the religious Moslems did round the Caaba. By this they gave him to understand, that they invoked him as their deity, and scrupled not to pay him divine honours. The Khalif being extremely incensed at such an open and bare-faced impiety, ordered an hundred of the principal of them to be imprisoned. This severe treatment so irritated the rest, that, since Al Mansur would not be looked upon as a divinity, they were resolved to assassinate him, and substitute another in his room. In order to facilitate the execution of which design, they took an empty coffin to the prison where their companions were confined, under the pretext of carrying from thence a dead body, and released them all. After which, they went in a body to the Khalif's palace, with a resolution to murder him; but he, being a person of uncommon bravery, though he was surprized, with very few people about him, instantly mounted a mule, never a horse in this hurry and confusion being at hand, and immediately advanced towards the mutineers, with an intention to sell his life as dear as possible. In the mean time, Mu'an Ebn Zaidat, who had kept himself concealed, in order to avoid the Khalif's resentment, he having been one of the chiefs of the Omniyan faction, seeing the imminent danger Al Mansur was in, sallied out of his retreat, put himself at the head of that prince's attendants, and charged the rebels with such fury, that he intirely defeated them. This generosity of Mu'an was so signal and unparalleled, that it passed into a proverb amongst the Arabs. The Rawandians were treated so rudely on this occasion, that they were all, to the number of 6000 men, killed upon the spot; and the Khalif delivered from instant death, when his case seemed to be absolutely desperate. However, the affront that had been offered him in his capital city so chagrined him, that he resolved to build a new city upon the banks of the Tigris, and fix his residence there. The foundations of which city, known from that time to the present by the name of Baghdad, were laid five years after Abd'allah Ebn Al Rawand's revolt, and consequently in the year of the Hejra 145<sup>r</sup>.

- d THE same year, Al Mansur removed his uncle Saleh Ebn Ali from the government of Egypt, and appointed Abd'almalec Ebn Yezid to succeed him in that post. Theophanes seems to have had the Rawandians in view, when he informs us, that some of the Persians, or Maurophori, that is, of the faction of the house of Al Abbās, after they had dissipated their substance, threw themselves headlong from off the tops of towers, and other high buildings, in order to fly from thence to heaven; which strange and amazing conduct he attributes to demoniacal obsession. Some other actions he also relates of them, which to him seemed to proceed from the same source. The ringleaders of this infatuated faction, or sect, to the number of six, he farther tells us, the Khalif ordered to be put to death, after they had been discovered, at Berxa and Chalcis. It appears probable, from what has been observed by Roderic of Toledo, that Abd'alrahman Ebn Moawiyah reduced this year Malaga, Seville, and some other places of note in Spain<sup>2</sup>.

- f THE following year, being the 141st of the Hejra, the Khalif deposed Abd'almalec Ebn Yezid, whom he had the preceding year constituted governor of Egypt, and appointed Musa Ebn Caab to preside over the people of that country in his room. About this time, the Moslems forbade the Christians to write the public accounts of the tribute paid the Khalif by the several provinces of his empire; though afterwards, finding themselves incapable of penning such accounts, they were obliged to repeal the order that had been made. The same year, a body of the Arab troops made an irruption into the imperial territories, defeated a strong detachment of the Armenian forces, under the command of one Paulus, that pretended to oppose them near the river Melas, and then retired, with a considerable number of captives, after they had put many of the emperor's subjects to the sword, into their own dominions. This year, Abd'alrahman Ebn Moawiyah seems to have gained several advantages over Yusef in Spain, and to have assembled a powerful army of Spanish Arabs at Seville, in order to support his pretensions to the Khalifat there<sup>3</sup>.

IN the 142d year of the Hejra, Abu Jaafar Al Mansur deposed Musa Ebn Caab, who had been advanced to the government of Egypt the year before, and appointed Mohammed Ebn Asad to rule the Egyptians in his stead. Some disputes are said to have arisen amongst the eastern Christians about the time of celebrating Easter, this present year. At the same time also, or the following year, according to Theophanes, one Theodorus, a Syrian, in the district of Heliopolis, rebelled against the Arabs, and brought a considerable army into the field.

But the Khalif's forces at last came up with him, intirely defeated him, and cut the whole a body of the rebels he commanded to pieces. In the year we are now upon, Abd'abrahmán Ebn Moáwiyab likewise overthrew Iusef at Corduba, pursued him to Toledo, and formed the siege of Veia, or Beia. In fine, this Iusef was attended by a series of misfortunes, and at last slain at Toledo, by some from whom he expected, and perhaps deserved, a better fate. This we learn from some of the best of the Spanish historians. When Abd'abrahmán, after the great success he had met with, marched with his army to besiege Valencia, the Christians, according to Rases, being struck with terror, applied themselves to the body of St. Vincent, then in their possession, that had wrought many miracles, for its protection, and carried it with them in their flight to the sea-side. These unhappy wretches were afterwards discovered by one Alibokaces, an Arab of distinction, as he was hunting, and the people accom- b panying him, on the sea-coast of Algarve. The men and women the Arabs put to the sword, carried the children away into captivity, and left the body of the saint upon a narrow tract projecting into sea, denominated Promontorium Sacrum by the antients, and by the moderns, as is said, from this event, the Cape of St. Vincent. As for Abd'abrahmán Ebn Moáwiyab, after the death of Iusef, he seized upon Corduba, as well as the famous garden in Arabic termed Razafa, and made himself master of all the Moslem territories in Spain. He also cut off Jirát Al Hadra, Beye, and other Arab commanders, who had revolted against him, and assembled a considerable force, in order to drive him from the throne. Of their followers he slew great numbers in battle, hanged some, and put many others to various kinds of deaths; by which means, he perfectly settled himself in the Khalifat of the west, restored c the public tranquillity, that had been so long disturbed, and intirely appeased all commotions in the Moslem part of Spain b.

THE next year, being the 143d of the Hejra, Mohammed Ebn Asad was removed, by the Khalif's order, from his post, and Hamíd Ebn Kabtaba appointed to govern the Egyptians in his room. About this time, the repose of a considerable part of Africa was disturbed by some tumults and commotions, which were preceded by a solar eclipse that happened on Friday, August 15th, at ten o'clock in the morning. Theophanes seems to intimate, that the Rawandians, about the same time, committed some disorders in several parts of the Moslem empire, and particularly in the neighbourhood of Basra. It appears likewise from the same author, as well as from Dionysius Telmarchsis and Cedrenus, that a very remarkable comet, d resembling a fiery beam, and therefore called by the Greeks docites (δοκίτης) was seen ten days together in the eastern, and twenty-one days in the western, part of the hemisphere, in the month of March, the present year e.

THE following year, being the 144th of the Hejra, commencing April 11th, 761, Hamíd Ebn Kabtaba was ordered by the Khalif Al Mansúr to retire from Egypt, and succeeded in the government of that fertile and opulent province by Yezid Ebn Hátem Ebn Abu Saffra Al Mohab- lebi. The same year, Al Mansúr got into his hands Abd'allah Ebn Al Hasan Ebn Al Hosein Ebn Ali Ebn Abu Táleb, and some others of the sons of Hasan; as he also did Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Omar Ebn Othmán Ebn Affán, surnamed Al Diybáj Al Motbbab, whom he likewise found means to decoy. Being informed, that Mohammed and Ibrahim, the sons of e Abd'allah Ebn Al Hasan, had formed a design to dethrone him, he sent out several parties in quest of them; and, in order to discover the place of their retreat, he took with him Abd'allah, their father, and all his domestics, loaded with irons, into Irák, examined them there, and afterwards commanded them all to be closely confined. He also treated Mohammed, surnamed Al Diybáj Al Motbbab in the same manner, and ordered him to be scourged with so much severity that he died in prison. After his death, his head was cut off, and exposed in all the principal towns of Khorasán; the populace there being at the same time given to understand, that this was the head of Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah; which step was judged requisite, in order to make them believe that Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Hasan was destroyed, and thereby cut off all hopes from this prince's faction, which was then f very powerful in that country. Theophanes seems to intimate, that the Rawandians occasioned this year some commotions in Syria. Dionysius Telmarchsis relates, that Al Mansúr sent Ebn Wabab with a formidable army, attended by a proper number of workmen, to rebuild the city of Melitene in Cappadocia, in the 144th year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 761, after it had lain in ruins about eight years; though that city was rebuilt, or rather refortified, by Abd'al Wabab Ebn Ibrahim Ebn Mohammed, if we will believe Abu'l Faraj, four years before, as has been already observed. The latter of these historians likewise informs us, that the Khalif carried twelve of the sons of Hosein (Hasan it must have undoubt-

The little air, therefore, they were allowed to breathe, soon becoming tainted by the excrements of these unhappy men, with which they were obliged daily to conspurcate and contaminate one another, they in a short time expired. It does not appear either from the Spanish or Arabic writers, that any thing material happened this year in Spain <sup>a</sup>.

In the 145th year of the Hejra, the Khalíf Al Mansúr laid the foundations of Bagdád, <sup>The Khalíf</sup> the capital of the Babylonian, or Chaldean, Irák, as has been already remarked: To this <sup>Al Mansúr</sup> he was excited by the affront offered him, or rather the assassination intended him, by the <sup>lays the founda-</sup> Rawandians, in the city of Al Hasbemiya; where they rebelled against him, and besieged <sup>tions of</sup> Baghdád.
b him in his palace. Another reason assigned by Abu'l Faraj for the erection of this metropolis, was, because the place pitched upon for its situation was at a greater distance from Cúfa; the inhabitants of which city had never been faithful to him; but always debauched his army, and promoted to the utmost of their power a desertion amongst his troops. Besides, the people of Irák, who had persisted in their fidelity to him, represented, that, by building his capital on a spot of ground near the confluence of the Sorat, or Sbat Al Arab, the Euphrates, and the Tigris, it would be in a great measure secured from the insults
c and attacks of those who should ever have an intention to dispute the Khalifat with him; and that, by being situated, as it were, in the middle of the tract comprehending the districts of Basra, Cúfa, Wáset, Mawfel, or Mosel, and Sawáda, and at no great distance from those cities, it would be plentifully supplied with all sorts of provisions from thence, by means of the aforesaid rivers. Having, therefore, chosen, for the site of his new city, a delightful plain on the western bank of the Tigris, and the horoscope of a lucky day and moment, by the unanimous consent of his astrologers, he ordered the workmen, assembled on this occasion, and drawn from all the politest parts of the Moslem empire, to begin to dig for the foundations of Baghdád. The Persian geographer places this metropolis in his third climate, and informs us, that Khosrú, named Anushirwán, gave the plain on which d it stands to one of his wives. This princess, who kept great numbers of sheep there, erected on the very spot where Baghdád was afterwards built, a chapel, or oratory, which she dedicated to her principal and favourite idol, called Bagh; and, according to the last-mentioned author, from this event, gave to all the open country forming that particular district the name of Baghdád, i. e. in the Persian tongue, the gift, or present, of Bagh. In process of time, continues the Persian writer, this chapel came to serve for an oratory and retreat to an hermit of uncommon sanctity and austerity of life; who accidentally met with one of the Khalíf's officers, that, whilst his master was riding on the banks of the Tigris, full of his new scheme, had strayed a little from the rest of that prince's attendants, and approached the antient structure raised by the princess above-mentioned in honour of Bagh. This officer e soon discovered to the hermit Al Mansúr's design; upon which, the holy man told him, that, according to a tradition which had long prevailed in the circumjacent territory, a city was to be built there by a person named Moclas; but that he could not perceive any affinity between this name and those by which the Khalíf was called. However, the officer, rejoining his companions, communicated to Al Mansúr what he had learned of the hermit, in relation to the erection of a city upon the spot he had chosen; and the Khalíf thereupon alighted from his horse, prostrated himself on the earth, and returned God thanks for being pleased to destine him to be the author of so grand a work. All the Moslems then present being vastly surprized at this action, as not being able to discover any similitude or resemblance between the names, or rather surnames, of Abu Jaafar and Al Mansúr, applied to f the Khalíf, and that of Moclas, mentioned by the hermit; Al Mansúr, in order to put them out of their pain, immediately told them, that having in his younger years taken one of his nurse's bracelets, to buy with it some provisions for himself and his brothers, who were all then in very necessitous circumstances, she ever after called him Moclas, which was the name of a famous thief, or highwayman, very well known in Khorasán. To this he thought fit to add, that, as God had been pleased to appoint him by this name to carry into execution the design he had formed, he would not chuse any other situation for his new city than the spot he at present found himself upon <sup>e</sup>.

g BUT, notwithstanding the authority of the Persian geographer, the Arab writers give a <sup>a farther ac-</sup> very different account of this matter. The spot on which Baghdád at this time stands was <sup>cent of the</sup> a fine verdant plain, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, and had nothing, before the founda- <sup>tion of</sup> Baghdád.

dation of that city, upon it, but the cell of a Christian monk, called Baghdâd. From him, therefore, if this author and Eutychius may be credited, the new city received the name of Baghdâd. Others, however, inform us, that this monk, whom they call Dâd, possessed a beautiful garden, adjacent to his cell, of a very considerable extent; and that the town, whose foundations occupied this, was from thence denominated Baghdâd, or the garden of Dâd. The first city that went by this name was erected by Al Mansûr on the western bank of the Tigris; from whence he detached a body of the Moslem troops, under the command of his son Al Mohdi, to the opposite bank. Here the young prince took post, and fortified the place on which he had incamped with a wall, in order to cover his troops, as well as the workmen employed by his father on the other side of the river from the incursions of the Persians, who seemed to have taken umbrage at the erection of a new metropolis so near their frontiers. Hence it came to pass, that the city, or rather that part of the city, soon after built upon the eastern bank of the Tigris, received the name of the camp, or fortress, of Al Mohdi; and, in conjunction with the other, on the opposite bank, formed the city of Baghdâd. The former of these, as having its streets paved with stones, was also denominated Rusâfa; a name that was likewise applied to other places of note in Jezîra and Irâk. The Khalîf had a superb and magnificent palace both in the eastern and western parts of the town, which went under the appellation of the house of the Khalîfat, or the imperial palace; though the former, which, by way of eminence, was styled the garison, or the royal inclosure, was much more grand and stately than the latter. The eastern palace was surrounded on the land-side by a semicircular wall, that had six gates; the principal of which seems to have been that called the gate of the prefects, whose entrance was generally kissed by the princes and embassadors that came to the Khalîf's court. Some writers are greatly mistaken, when they make Baghdâd to have occupied the spot on which the ancient Babylon stood; since the former seems to have been erected upon the foundations of Seleucia, and to have been divided by the Tigris in the same manner that the latter was by the Euphrates. Besides, there is a village, according to the oriental geographers, upon the Euphrates, called Babel, considerably to the north of Baghdâd, near which the traces of a very large city, supposed with greater reason to have been Babylon, are still to be seen; whereas nothing of that kind appears in the neighbourhood of Baghdâd. The deflection of the gates of the interior from those of the exterior city induced the Arabs, according to Abu'lfeda, to denominate the place Zauraa, that is, oblique, crooked, &c. tho' others pretend, that the obliquity of the Kebla of its principal mosque gave this metropolis that name. For, the city, at least that part of it erected on the western bank of the Tigris, was intirely round; the Khalîf's palace being, as it were, in the centre of it, and having annexed to it the great mosque, whose Kebla was oblique, infomuch that the Moslems performing their devotions here turned their faces towards the gate of Basra. With respect to the eastern part of Baghdâd, we find it intimated by the oriental writers, that it consisted of an interior and exterior town; each of which was surrounded by a wall; and consequently, that the eastern city, or principal part of Baghdâd, had appertaining to it both an interior and exterior wall. For some time, after the foundations were laid, the work went on but slowly. For, Abu Jaafar, intending to demolish Al Madâyen, that had formerly been the residence of the kings, or Shâhs, of Persia, surnamed Khosrû, and to make use of the materials of the buildings in the erection of his new city, upon consideration, found that he could not advance very briskly in that demolition; as the stones were of so wonderful a size, and the towers and walls of so surprising a height, that it would require much time, as well as a very large expence, to level with the ground all the fabrics there, and transport all the materials, of which those noble edifices were composed, from thence to Baghdâd. Besides, he considered, that it would be no small reproach to him to have it said, that he could not finish the metropolis upon which his workmen were then employed, without destroying such a pile of buildings as could scarce be paralleled in the whole world; and this induced him at last intirely to abandon his first design. To which we may add, that the demolition of Al Madâyen, had he finally resolved upon it, would have been not a little retarded by the commotions that happened in his empire this very year; of which we have been obliged with the following accounts by some of the best Arab historians<sup>f</sup>.

Soon after the Khalîf Al Mansûr began to lay the foundations of Baghdâd, in the 145th year of the Hejra, Mohammed Ébn Abd'allah Ébn Al Hasan Ébn Al Hosein Ébn Ali Ébn Abu Tâleb, whose head the partisans of the house of Al Abbâs had pretended to expose in all the principal places of Khorasân, the preceding year, was proclaimed Khalîf at Medina, and assumed the surname of Al Mohdi. In order to support his pretensions to the Khalîfat, he

- a assembled an army of 100,000 men; but, upon the approach of Isa Ebn Mûsa, whom Al Mansûr sent against him, the greatest part of his forces dispersed of their own accord, and the rest retired to the deep ditch, or intrenchment, which the prophet himself had ordered to be dug round Medina, by the advice of Salmân, the Persian, for the security of the city, and which Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Hasan, on this occasion, caused to be immediately repaired. However, receiving advice, that Isa was marching against him, he drew his troops out of the intrenchment, dismissed as many of them as were unwilling to engage, and with the rest, amounting to about 300 men, came to a general action with the Khalîf's forces; but being overthrown, he was so closely pursued by Isa, that the latter, at the head of his horse, entered the town, and, without much difficulty, made himself master of it. He also put Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Hasan himself to the sword, and cut off his head; which he sent as a present to Al Mansûr, who immediately ordered it to be carried in triumph through the principal provinces of the empire. Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Hasan, who pretended to dispute the Khalîfat with Al Mansûr, is said to have lost his life at Medina, the present year, in the month of Ramadân <sup>e</sup>.

THE same year, Ibrahim Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Hasan Ebn Al Hosein Ebn Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb caused himself to be saluted Khalîf at Basra, and obliged the people of that city to take an oath of fidelity to him. He likewise seized upon Persia and Abwâz; and, in order to maintain himself in the possession of the provinces that had submitted to him, he also took the field with an army of 100,000 men. But the Khalîf's nephew, Isa Ebn Mûsa, at last, after the defeat of Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Hasan, coming up with him, engaged him, put his forces to flight, and dispersed them in such a manner, that they could never afterwards rally, nor make head against him. As for Ibrahim himself, he perished in the action; after the end of which, his head was cut off, and sent by the general to Al Mansûr, who received it with all possible demonstrations of joy. Thus the Khalîf, by his prudence and bravery, or rather the valour and conduct of Isa, appeased those commotions that threatened destruction to his family, in the year of the Hejra 145, which enabled him to resume the great work he had begun on the banks of the Tigris, and to give law to all his domestic enemies that had for some time been meditating a revolt <sup>h</sup>.

- WE must not forget to observe, that the great success which attended Al Mansûr's arms in this glorious campaign, has been mentioned by Theophanes; who informs us, that the troops employed by that prince in the reduction of the rebels to his obedience, whom he calls inhabitants of the desert, amounted to about 80,000 men. He likewise relates, that the Turks, passing the Caspian straits, made an irruption into Armenia, killing many of the natives of that country, and taking a considerable number of them prisoners, this present year <sup>i</sup>.

- THE following year, being the 146th of the Hejra, commencing March 21st, 763, there was a profound calm almost throughout the whole Moslem empire; which enabled the Khalîf, through the course of this year, to continue, without interruption, the building of Baghdâd. However, if we will believe Theophanes, the Turks, in the beginning of it, made a second irruption, through the Caspian straits and Iberia, into the Moslem territories; but being met by a body of Arab troops, an engagement ensued, in which many on both sides were slain. We are likewise informed by the same writer, that Isa Ebn Mûsa, having been before appointed to succeed the Khalîf, was, by the following artifice, deprived of his reverfional right to the Khalîfat. Al Mansûr bribed his physician to give Isa a violent and soporiferous sternutatory medicine, in order to cure him of the megrim and vertigo, with which he was grievously troubled. This, continues our author, produced the desired effect; depriving Isa, for three days, of his senses, and rendering him intirely incapable of holding the reins of government; which being observed by the Moslem nobles and generals, who had been assembled by Al Mansûr for that purpose, they unanimously agreed to call Al Mohdi, the Khalîf's son, to the succession, after his father's death. However, Isa, afterwards coming to himself, and recovering the use of his reason, received a large quantity of gold from the Khalîf; which he considered as a sort of recompence for the injury that had been offered him. That some particular circumstances mentioned in this story might have really happened, we shall not take upon us absolutely to deny; but that the whole relation is strictly true, we are by no means disposed to believe, since we are assured by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, that Isa was removed from the succession after the death of Al Mansûr, the right to which had before been granted him, and declared the apparent heir to the crown after Al Mohdi, the following year, not without much squabbling and altercation. Dionysius Telmarenfis writes, that there was a dreadful inundation of the Tigris, which almost intirely

THE next year, which was the 147th of the Hejra, Al Mansûr got Abd'allah Ebn Ali, his uncle, who had rebelled against him, and been overthrown by Abu Moslem near Nisibis, in Mesopotamia, into his hands, and destroyed him in the following manner. The Khalif invited him to his court, swearing at the same time that he would not hurt him. This induced Abd'allah to leave the city of Basra, whither he had retired, and lived in obscurity with his brother Solimân, and come immediately to Al Mansûr's residence. Soon after his arrival, the Khalif ordered a house to be built for him, whose foundations should consist chiefly of salt. Which being done, a vast quantity of water was, by his order, poured upon them. This occasioned the fall of that house upon Abd'allah Ebn Ali, who was b thereby crushed to pieces soon after he had taken possession of it <sup>l</sup>.

Other contingencies about the same time.

THE same year, according to Theophanes, some disturbances happened in the desert of Palmyra; tho' the particular circumstances attending these troubles he has not handed down to us. The Khalif likewise, if we will believe this writer, ordered all the crosses upon the tops of churches to be taken down; would not permit the Christians to hold nightly meetings, nor to teach their children to read, and discovered a strong disposition to have proceeded to a formal persecution. About the same time, according to Dionysius Telmarenfis, there was a grievous murrain in Mesopotamia, that proved fatal to vast numbers of cattle there. Soon after the death of Abd'allah Ebn Ali Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Abbâs, Abu Abd'allah Jaafar Ebn Ali Ebn Al Hosein Ebn Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb died at Medina. It has been already c observed, that Al Mansûr called his son Al Mohdi, after him, to the succession, in prejudice to his nephew Isa, who had been before declared his immediate successor, but was now appointed to mount the throne after Al Mohdi, though not without some difficulty, likewise this year <sup>m</sup>.

The workmen
still employed
at Baghdâd.

IN the 148th year of the Hejra, the workmen employed in the erection of Baghdâd continued their operations; and that with so much diligence and success, that they had well-nigh put the last hand to the new city. This year, six stars seemed to fall from heaven, in the month of the latter Canun, according to Dionysius Telmarenfis; who likewise informs us, that Severus, bishop of Amida, died on the 14th day of the month Adar, and was buried in a monastery where he had resided a considerable time. We must beg leave to observe d here, that the Syrian month called the latter Canun answers to January, as does Adar to March. Nothing remarkable seems to have happened this year either in Africa or Spain <sup>n</sup>.

finished.

THE following year, being the 149th of the Hejra, the famous city of Baghdâd upon the Tigris, the capital of the Moslem empire, was finished. That part of it, situated upon the western bank of the Tigris, is said to have cost the Khalif 4,000,000 dinârs; tho', according to Abu'l Faraj, he actually demolished part of the White Tower, or citadel, at Al Madâ-yen, and ordered the materials procured from thence to be carried to the spot he had marked out for the site of his city. However, finding that the demolition of all the buildings of Al Madâ-yen, and the transportation of the materials belonging to them to Baghdâd, would be more expensive than he at first apprehended, he abandoned the design he had formed. e The city, when finished, was perfectly round, shut up by a double wall, and flanked with a considerable number of towers. The castle, or citadel, was in the middle of it, and commanded every part of the town. Its gates were disposed in such a manner, that those of the first wall were in a sloping and oblique position in respect of those of the second; which disposition, according to some authors, gave this place the name of Zaura, or Zauraa, i. e. oblique, crooked, &c. tho', if others may be credited, it received that name from the obliquity of the Kebla in its principal mosque. It seems to be intimated by Sbarif Al Edrisi, that the eastern city was not built till the Khalifat of Al Mohdi; tho' we are of opinion, with the celebrated Goli, that this town was begun, and even in a manner finished, before the death of Al Mansûr. The palace in the western town was called the palace of Al f Mansûr, as that in the eastern city went under the denomination of the palace of Al Mohdi. The Khalif styled his new metropolis Medinat Al Salam, the city of peace, either by allusion to the name of Jerusalem, or because, at the time when it was finished, all the commotions in his empire were appeased, and almost every nation in Asia had submitted, or was become tributary, to him <sup>o</sup>.

a THE Persian historians pretend, that the city of Baghdâd, as well as that of Babel, or Who the founder of it, according to the Persian historians. Babylon, was built by the Persian kings of the first dynasty, who were no other than the antient kings of Assyria; that Zobak, who was the Nimrod of the Jews, first founded this city; and that Afrasiâb, king of Al Turk, or Turkestân, and conqueror of Persia, aggrandized it, and named it Baghdâd, that is to say, the garden of Dâd, or the idol that he worshipped. To which they add, that Kaikaus, the second king of Persia of the second dynasty, who could have been no other than Cush, the son of Nimrod, according to these authors, constructed the temples, and the other most antient public buildings, of the place <sup>p</sup>.

WE are told by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, who has been followed herein by Eutychius and Whence it derived its name, according to the Arab writers. Al Makîn, that this city received its name from that of the monk, or hermit, Baghdâd, in whose garden, and part of the territory adjoining to it, the foundations were first laid; tho' others pretend, that this monk's name was not Baghdâd, but Dâd. Be this, however, as it will, Baghdâd seems to have been raised out of the ruins of Ctesiphon, as well as those of Seleucia, and was not only denominated by Al Mansûr, after the erection of it, Medinat Al Salam, or Medinat Assalam, but likewise Dar Al Salam, or Dar Assalam; which appellation was plainly of the same import with the former. Hence it was frequently called by the Syrians Medinat Selama, and by the Greeks Irenopolis; both of which are equivalent to the Medinat Assalam of the Arabs. We find two opinions concerning the reason of the name Baghdâd mentioned by Abu'lfeda. According to the first, Bagh, in the Persic language, signified a garden, and Dâd was the proper name of the man on whose garden was erected Al Mansûr's new metropolis; of both which words the name Baghdâd is apparently formed. If we will pay any regard to the second, the spot on which this city stood was denominated Baghdâd by an eunuch, sent by Khosrû king of Persia thither, from an idol named Bagh, worshipped in those parts of the east, and the present made him by that prince of the ground on which his temple stood; a gift, or present, in the Persic tongue, being expressed by Dâd. The same author observes, that Al Mansûr derived the appellation of Medinat Assalam, which he conferred upon his new capital, from Vadi Assalam, the torrent of peace, a name frequently applied by the orientals to the Deglata, or the Tigris, on whose banks that capital stood. The Nestorians, who were in great favour with the Khalîfs, transferred their patriarch's see, fixed before at Ctesiphon and Seleucia, to Baghdâd; and the Greeks, likewise, according to Nilus Doxapatrius, had a patriarch there. But Abraham, surnamed Abraza, the Nestorian patriarch, prevailed upon the Khalîf to expel John, the Greek metropolitan, from thence, in the year of the Hejra 300. And John, the Nestorian patriarch, prevented Ignatius Bar-chichi, the Jacobite Mafriân, from settling at Baghdâd, about 94 years after; tho' the Khalîf then permitted a bishop, subject to the Mafriân, to reside there. However, Bar Hebræus, the Jacobite Mafriân, relates, that he spent the summer at Baghdâd, and ordained four deacons and a bishop there, in the year of CHRIST 1265; as likewise, that Jacobite bishops were before that time permitted to fix their residence in this city; and that Lazarus, one of them, was deposed by Dionysius, the Jacobite patriarch, whose conduct in this particular was approved of by the Khalîf Al Mamûn, in the year of our LORD 829. This great city was the seat of the Khalîfs of the house of Al Abbâs, excepting only two or three, from its foundation to the year of the Hejra 656, when it was taken by the Tartars. Of which surprising revolution, and the principal circumstances attending it, our readers will meet with a full and ample account in the sequel of this history <sup>q</sup>.

BAGHDAD, the capital of the Moslem empire for near 500 years, remained in the hands Baghdâd possessed at different times by the Tartars, Turks, Persians, and of the Tartars, or Moguls, to the year of the Hejra 795, or of CHRIST 1392, when Timur Begh, or Tamerlain the Great, took it for the first time from Soltân Ahmed Ebn Arwis, or Sultân Ahmed Ebn Weis; who, being incapable of making head against the numerous forces brought by Timur, after he had subjugated Persia, to form the siege of this city, found himself obliged to send all his baggage over the Tigris, to cross that river with all his troops, and, in fine, to abandon his capital to the conqueror. He was, however, hotly pursued by one of the enemy's detachments to the plain of Kerbela, where several skirmishes happened, and a considerable number of men on both sides were killed. Notwithstanding which, he at last, by his conduct and bravery, escaped the fury of his pursuers, took refuge in the territories of the Greek emperor, and afterwards found means to repossess himself of the city of Baghdâd. There he remained till the year of the Hejra 803, when the city was taken a second time by Timur; who, nevertheless, restored it to him, and he continued sovereign of the place, till he was driven from thence by Miran Shâb, that prince's son. a However, afterwards returning, he was chased from thence by Kara Yusef, the Turkman, in the year of the Hejra 815; who likewise reduced Baghdâd a second time, and finally expelled from thence Abu Becr, the son of Miran Shâb; securing that capital to his family, in which it remained till the time of Hasan, or Hassan, surnamed Ūzun, which, in Turkish, signifies long, commonly called by the Europeans Ūsun Cassan, a Turkman prince, who drove the descendants of Kara Yusef from thence, in the year of the Hejra 875, or of our LORD 1470. The princes of this family maintained themselves in possession of Baghdâd till the year of the Hejra 914, or of CHRIST 1508, when Shâb Ismael, surnamed Sîsî, or Sôfî, the first prince of the royal family that reigned in Irân, or Persia, till the dethroning of the late Shâb Hofsîn, made himself master of it. From that time, for above an hundred years, b this city continued to be a bone of contention between the Turks and the Persians, having been the subject of several bloody wars between those two powerful nations. It was taken by Solimân I. surnamed the Magnificent; and retaken by Shâb Abbâs, king of Persia; but being at last besieged by Amurath, or Morad IV. with a formidably army, it was finally obliged to surrender to him, in the year of grace 1638, and has remained in the hands of the Turks to this very day <sup>1</sup>.

 remarkable
 particulars
 relating to that city, and the present
 state of it.

IT may not be amiss farther to observe here, that this city, which has always been so celebrated amongst the Moslems, had several other names besides those already taken notice of. That part of it erected on the western bank of the Tigris was called Medinat Al Mansûr, the city of Al Mansûr, as owing its origin intirely to the prince whose name it bore; whilst c that on the opposite bank went amongst the Moslems under the appellation of Asker Al Mohdi, the army, or camp, of Al Mohdi, for the reason above assigned. As the Moslems of Syria sometimes denominated it both Medinat Selama, and Medinat Selomo, the city of peace, so it received the appellation of Medinat Slama, denoting the same thing, from the Syrian or Chaldæan Nestorians. The western part of Baghdâd, which in after-ages was considered as a sort of suburb, went also under the denomination of Karkh; tho' this name seems to have been more particularly applied to that part of the western town to which Al Mansûr commanded the market, that had before been kept in the neighbourhood of his palace, in order to remove the rabble to some spot at a greater distance from him, to be transferred. Here he likewise had a bridge constructed over the Tigris, to keep open more effectually a com- d munication between this and Al Mohdi's part of the town. The name of Karkh was afterwards rendered famous by the aforesaid market, which occasioned the erection of a considerable number of buildings there. The Dar Al Khalîfa, that is, the house, or palace, of the Khalîf, in the western town, called Kasr Al Mansûr, the palace of Al Mansûr, as well as the other named Kasr Al Mohdi, the palace of Al Mohdi, made a very good figure. There was likewise a palace in Baghdâd sufficiently grand, known by the name of Kasr Al Hasan Ebn Zohal, the palace of Hasan Ebn Zohal, besides several public buildings erected by the Khalîf Al Mostanser Billa, and particularly the famous college founded by that prince, denominated by the Arabs Al Madrasah Al Mostanseriah, which, for the beauty and elegance of its structure, the number of students it contained, as well as the learned men it produced, e and the ample revenues settled upon it, has been represented by Abu'l Faraj as excelling, in his time, every other house of learning in the then known world. Amongst other students here, there were 300, who applied themselves intirely to the study of the Moham- medan law, according to the decisions of the authors of the four chief sects of the Sonnites, or orthodox Moslems; every one of which sects had a professor in this college, who had a monthly salary settled upon him, for instructing 75 young men committed to his care in the principles of the sect to which he belonged. Every one of those students had likewise a very handsome daily allowance of all kinds of provisions assigned him. There was also a bath set apart for the use of the students here, and a physician maintained at the Khalîf's expence, who visited them every morning, to see whether any of them stood in need of f his assistance. The college had also a kitchen, a cellar, and an apothecary's shop, belonging to it, that the prelectors, and the young men educated therein, might be taken proper care of both in sickness and in health. With regard to the four orthodox sects above-mentioned, it may not be improper to remark, that, notwithstanding some differences as to legal conclusions in their interpretation of the Korân, and matters of practice, they were generally acknowledged to be orthodox in radicals, or matters of faith, and capable of salvation, and had each of them their several stations, or oratories, in the temple of Mecca.
 The founders of these sects are still looked upon as the great masters of jurisprudence, and a are said to have been men of great devotion and self-denial, well versed in the knowledge of things which belong to the next life, and to man's right conduct here, and directing all their knowledge to the glory of God. This is Al Ghazali's encomium of them, who thinks it derogatory to their honour, that their names should be used by those who, neglecting to imitate the other virtues which make up their character, apply themselves only to attain their skill, and follow their opinions in matters of legal practice. Besides Al Mesanser Billa's college, there was another famous college and gymnasium at Baghdad, founded by Moez-addin Abu'l-feta Malec Shab, the third Sultan, or Soltan, of the Seljuks of Iran; and another erected by his prime minister, or Wazir, Nezam Al Molk; the first of which was called Al Madrasah, or Al Madrasat Al Hanafiat, and the other Al Madrasat Al Neze'miat. In the vast

b number of learned men born at Baghdad, may be reckoned the famous Abmed Ebn Hanbal, the author of the fourth sect of the Sunnites, of whom we shall speak more fully hereafter. Amongst the persons famed for literature, educated here, may be ranked Kawam-addin Tusef Ebn Hasan Al Hoseini Al Rumi, who wrote a treatise in Persic concerning the power and prerogatives of princes; Abmed Ebn Skanfi Al Hadi, who wrote in Turkish the lives of several oriental poets; Abu'l Abbās Ebn Hamdān Al Kāteb, who obliged his countrymen with a choice collection of historical narrations, and various elegancies, in Arabic; Moaffek-addin, who published a commentary upon Aristotle's piece de auditione naturali, in Arabic; Mohammed Ebn Solimān Fodkūli, the author of a poem in Persic concerning cordial friendship; Ebn Najjār Meheb-addin Mohammed Ebn Mahmūd Al Baghdādi, who composed a history that bore the title of Tarikh Ebn Najjār Al Baghdādi; Ebn Haithemab Ebn Zehr Al Neffai; Abu Sabal Haithem Ebn Femil Abu'l Barakat, a physician of Baghdad sent for by the Khan of Khwarazm; Abu Kerim Sa'id Ebn Al Talmith, a Christian physician of Baghdad, who obtained from the Khalif Naser, or Nasr, the title of Amino'ddawla; besides many others, whose names we are not permitted to enumerate by the limits prescribed us here. From what has been

c said, we may conclude, that, for several ages, Baghdad must have abounded more with Moslem doctors, and other learned men of various kinds, than any other place in the Mohammedan dominions, except Mecca and Medina. It was also extremely populous, and contained several forts, or castles, capable of making a tolerable defence, that derived their names from their founders; such were Tak Al Harani, Tak Al Atrif, Tak Al Aki, and d others; the principal of which was Tak Al Asma, so called from Asma, the Khalif Al Mansur's daughter, erected on the eastern bank of the Tigris, in that part of the city to which was more particularly applied the name of Rusafa, or Al Rusafa. One of the gates likewise of Baghdad, that was fortified in a peculiar manner, received the appellation of Tak, or Taka. The language spoken here was one of the most polite and elegant dialects of the Arabic, as there was a greater concourse of nobility and learned men, that excelled in many branches of literature, for several ages, in this city, than in almost any other of the east. After what has been said of the flourishing state of Baghdad, for so considerable a period of time, it will not appear strange, that there should have been a mint here, in which a vast number of dirhems and dinars were struck. At present, tho' it groans under the Turkish

e yoke, Baghdad is a celebrated emporium and frontier of the Ottoman empire on the side of Persia, to which not only many merchants, but likewise an incredible number of passengers, travelling from Natolia, Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, into Persia, continually resort. It is the seat of a Pasha, to whom every one of those passengers pays a sort of tribute, or toll, which, in the whole, amounts to a very large annual sum. The religion professed here is the Mohammedan, tho' various sects of Christians are tolerated, of which the Nestorians, who have a church, bear the greatest sway. The Jacobites and Armenians have no place of public worship, but go to the convent of the Capuchins, who administer the sacraments to them. There are several Jews likewise that reside constantly at Baghdad, but many more who come thither annually, in order to visit the sepulchre of the prophet Ezekiel, which is f said to stand about a day and a half's journey from the city. The Pasha of Baghdad is generally a Vizir. The proper garrison, about the middle of the last century, consisted of only 300 Janisaries, commanded by an Aga; tho' the Pasha, whose house stood then upon the bank of the river, and made a good appearance, had under his command a body of 6 or 700 horse. There were also then about 3 or 400 Spahi's, commanded by two Aga's, besides another body of horse, under two Aga's, that went under the denomination of men of courage. In fine, the Ottoman troops at that time in and about the town amounted to about 3000 men. The city then was 1500 paces long, 7 or 800 broad, and about three miles in circumference. The walls were of brick, and strengthened with towers that resembled bastions; upon which the Pasha had mounted 60 pieces of cannon; the largest of which g were not above five or six pounders. There were four gates, three on the land-side, and one upon the river; over which there was a bridge of thirty-three boats, or rather pieces of timber, brought from Musul and other places, fastened together on goats skins, blown like bladders. The castle, or citadel, was in the city, near one of the gates called Al Maazan,

on the north side; standing partly on the river, and surrounded by a single wall; adorned with turrets; upon which were planted, tho' without carriages, about 150 pieces of cannon. The Pasha was assisted, in the civil government of the place, by a Kâdi, who represented the Musti, and a Tefterdar, who collected the revenues of the Grand Signor. There were five mosques, of which two were tolerably well built; and adorned with Duomo's, covered with varnished tiles of different colours; ten caravansera's, or inns, two of which were proper enough for the reception of travellers; and several Bazars, or market-places, arched, to enable the merchants to bear the heats, and watered three or four times a day, for the same purpose. Commerce then flourished to a considerable degree here, tho' not so much as when the city was in the hands of the king of Persia; Sultân Amurat IV. upon his making himself master of it, having put most of the richest merchants settled there to death. Many of the Shiites, or followers of Ali, were settled there, being so simple as to believe, that their great Imâm lived at Baghdâd. The pilgrims that visit Mecca by land are obliged to pass through Baghdâd, and every one of them pays a tribute, or toll, equivalent to four piastres, to the Pasha; which branch of the revenue brings annually a very considerable sum into the coffers of the Grand Signor. Tavernier informs us, that the Rafedi's, or heretics, here, who seem to have been a branch of the Shiites, in his time, were so rigid and strict, that they would by no means either eat or drink with a Christian, and scarce with a Sonnite himself. In his time, the inhabitants of Baghdâd consisted of about 15,000 souls. The latitude of this city was defined by the astronomers, who lived in the days of the Khalîf Al Mamûn, to be  $33^{\circ} 20'$ ; and by some of the modern geographers and astronomers,  $33^{\circ} 15'$ . But, for a more particular description of the present state of this celebrated city, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to the last-mentioned author, who, in that point, will give them full and ample satisfaction <sup>a</sup>.

Abd'alrah-

begins to erect a mosque in Spain.

ABOUT the 149th year of the Hejra, as we learn from Dionysius Telmarenfis, the Manichees, or Manichæans, settled at Harrân in Mesopotamia, having been guilty of most execrable superstition, were treated with great severity by Al Abbâs, the Khalîf's governor of that province. The same year, Abd'alrahmân Ebn Moâwiyah, the grandson of Heshâm, who had settled himself upon the Moslem throne in Spain, and been acknowledged lawful Khalîf of the west by the Mohammedans there, began to erect the great mosque at Cordova, or Corduba; which, after it was finished, during the continuance of this monarchy, was highly revered by all the Moslems in that part of the world. Al Mansûr's arms having been attended with all imaginable success, the preceding years, his subjects, through the whole course of this, enjoyed the sweets of peace, without the least discontinuance or interruption <sup>b</sup>.

The famous
dies.

THE next year, being the 150th of the Hejra, beginning February 6th, 767, the famous Abu Hanîfa Al Nooman Ebn Thâbet, the founder of the first of the four chief sects of the Sonnites, who was born at Cûfa in the 18th year of the Hejra, departed this life. He died in prison at Baghdâd, where he had been confined, because he refused to be made Kâdi, or judge; on which account he was very hardly dealt with by his superiors, yet could not be prevailed on, either by threats or ill treatment, to undertake the charge; choosing rather to be punished by them than by God, says Al Ghazâlî; who adds, that when he excused himself from accepting the office, by alleging that he was unfit for it, being asked the reason, he replied, If I speak the truth, I am unfit; but if I tell a lie, a liar is not fit to be a judge. It is said, that he read over the Korân, in the prison where he died, no less than 7000 times. The doctrine, or tenets, propagated by him, as well as the sect of which he was the author, went amongst the Sonnites by the name of Hanîfiyah, or Hannîfiyah. The Hanîfites are called by an Arabian writer the followers of reason, and those of the other three orthodox sects followers of tradition; the former being principally guided by their own judgment in their decisions, and the latter adhering more tenaciously to the traditions of Mohammed. The sect of Abu Hanîfa heretofore obtained chiefly in Irâk, but now generally prevails amongst the Turks and Tartars. His doctrine was brought into great credit by Abu Yûsef, chief justice under the Khalîfs Al Hâdi and Harûn Al Rashîd. We must not forget to observe, that Abd'allah Bathalmiûs wrote a treatise concerning the divisions, or different sentiments, of the Hanîfites; which, amongst the admirers of that sect, is held in good repute <sup>c</sup>.

died of a dan-

ABOUT the 151st year of the Hejra, as should seem from Abu'l Faraj, who makes this event to have happened a little after the Khalîf Al Mansûr had fixed his residence at Baghdâd,

- a Jaynjesus, or George, Ebn Bakhtishua Al Jondisābūri, a famous physician, and a Christian, <sup>gaveus illius</sup> was brought to court, in order to cure the Khalif of a want of appetite and indigestion, <sup>by a Christian</sup> under which he at that time laboured. The physician, attended by his scholar, or pupil, <sup>physician.</sup> Isa Ebn Shablātha, being introduced to the Khalif, discoursed with him both in Persic and Arabic, with great fluency and elegance; assuring him at the same time, after he had received from him an account of his disorder, that, with the divine assistance, he could cure him. The Khalif, charmed with the gracefulness of his person, the politeness of his language, and, above all, the assurances he had given him, ordered a sumptuous and costly vest to be put upon him, assigned him one of the best apartments in his palace, and commanded his chamberlain Rabī to treat him with the highest marks of respect. George having in a short time effected a cure upon him, Al Mansūr one day asked him whether he was married? To which the physician replied, that he had for his wife an old woman, who was extremely infirm, and not able to rise from her seat. Upon this, the Khalif ordered Salem, one of his eunuchs, to take with him three beautiful Greek girls, and a present of 3000 dinārs, to George's apartment; who, not finding him at home, left them with Isa Ebn Shablātha, his scholar, there. But George, upon his return, after reprimanding Isa for receiving them, returned them to the Khalif; who sending for him, and asking him, with great surprise, the reason of so strange and unparalleled a conduct, the physician told him, without any scruple or hesitation, that it was not lawful for a Christian to have more than one wife at a time. This increasing Al Mansūr's astonishment, he dismissed him with uncommon expressions of esteem, and afterwards heaped his favours with greater profusion upon him. About the same time, the Khalif sent three bodies of his troops, under the command of his brother Al Abbās, governor of Mesopotamia, Hasan Ebn Kahtaba, and Ebn Asad, to penetrate into the imperial territories. These forces were composed of Sindians, Alans, Khozars, Khazars, or Khazarites, Medes, Persians, Akulites, Arabs, Khosanites, Turks, and others; but did not meet with great success in their expeditions. The Khalif himself, at the head of a powerful army, consisting of 80,000 men, moved from Amida, Amid, or Edeffa, Tur-Abdin, and Tela-Kom, in the beginning of the campaign; and made an irruption into the northern parts of the Roman empire. He advanced to a fortress called Kemach, or Kamakb, upon which he continued his attacks the whole summer; but without effect: so
- d that he found himself at last obliged, after he had lost an incredible number of men, shamefully to abandon the siege<sup>v</sup>.

THE same year, a complaint being brought before Al Mansūr against the patriarch George, <sup>Some other</sup> by the bishops who had been deprived by him of their authority at the synod of Sarug, and <sup>events of the</sup> he being by them accused of exercising tyranny upon the Syrian clergy, the Khalif ordered <sup>year 151.</sup> him to be put in irons, and gave his accusers leave to substitute another patriarch in his room. Upon which, by their unanimous suffrages, they advanced to that high dignity David bishop of Dara; whose lenity and moderation might justly have intitled him to the profoundest respect and veneration of all the Mesopotamian clergy, over whom he presided; though none of them, except those by whom he had been elected, paid any regard to his

e orders and decisions; he having been not a little blamed for being so active against his predecessor. Hence a schism arose amongst the Jacobites; some of whom considered David as their patriarch, others George, and others acknowledged no patriarch at all. With regard to Tur-Abdin, mentioned above, it may not be improper to remark, that the natives call it simply Tur, which in their language signifies a mountain; and that it is a considerable tract in the neighbourhood of the Tigris, which formerly contained a pretty large number of towns and monasteries, all under the jurisdiction of a bishop, called the bishop of Tur-Abdin. His diocese was, in process of time, split into several others, viz. Salacha, or Salakh, Beth-Mancēm, &c. and especially after Saba was translated from the see of Salacha to the patriarchate of Tur-Abdin, and set up in opposition to Ignatius VI. the lawful patriarch of the f Jacobites; which produced a schism that continued from the year of CHRIST 1364 to the year 1494. We must also beg leave to observe, that the Nestorian convent on the Curd, or Gordyean, mountains was reduced to ashes, together with all the people therein, as they were celebrating their annual festival on the spot where Noah's ark had rested, in the usual manner, by lightning, the preceding year<sup>x</sup>.

THE following year, being the 152d year of the Hejra, the celebrated Christian physician, George Ebn Bakhtishua Al Jondisābūri, who had been so serviceable to the Khalif Al Mansūr in the recovery of his health, was himself taken extremely ill, and his life thought to be in no small danger. Upon which, he asked the Khalif's leave to return home, in order to see his son and family, and to be buried with his brothers, in case it should please God to put a period to his days. Al Mansûr desired him first, by way of reply to his petition, to embrace Mohammedism; and, in that case, promised him a certain admission into paradise, after his death: to which George made answer, "O emperor of the faithful, I am determined to go to the place where my ancestors reside in the other world, whether that be paradise or hell." This excited the Khalif's laughter, who thereupon returned, "But since you have been with me, I have been free from the maladies with which I was before afflicted; how, therefore, can I part with you?" To this the physician replied, that he should leave behind him his scholar Isa, who was a very skilful professor of physic, and would take all possible care of his majesty's health. The Khalif then dismissed George, with a present of 10,000 dinârs, and sent an eunuch with him, to conduct him to his friends and relations, with orders to have his body conveyed to them, in case he should die upon the road. However, he arrived at home safe, under the eunuch's conduct. After his departure, Al Mansûr sent for Isa, whom, upon conversing with him, he found to be a person of profound erudition, and therefore substituted him in his master's place. Isa, after his advancement, began to grow contentious, and to behave in a very insolent manner, particularly to the Christian bishops and metropolitans, of whom he would have exacted large sums of money. Attending the Khalif once to Nisibis, or Nisîbîn, he had the assurance to write to the metropolitan of that city to send him the most valuable part of his consecrated vessels, or church-plate; threatening him with his resentment, in case of refusal; and, in his letter, making use of the following remarkable words: "Are you ignorant of my interest with the Khalif? Do not you know that on me his health intirely depends, so that I can make him sick or well as I please?" This letter Cyprian, the metropolitan of Nisîbîn, found an opportunity of reading first to Al Rabî, Al Mansûr's chamberlain, and afterwards to the Khalif himself. Al Mansûr, after he had received this intelligence, finding how he was abused, first deprived Isa of all the valuable presents he had made him, and then, after a proper castigation, discharged him his service. The same year, that is, the 152d year of the Hejra, died Yezid Ebn Hâtem, who had been made by Al Mansûr governor of Egypt. He was succeeded in his post by Abd'allah Ebn Ali Ebn Abd'alrahmân Ebn Moâwiyah Ebn Hadij. About the same time, likewise died Maan Ebn Zâyada, an Arab of so brave and generous a disposition, that, amongst his countrymen, it passed into a proverb. The Khalif first appointed him his lieutenant of Taman, afterwards of Aderbijân, and lastly of Kberasîn. Al Mansûr is also said by Dionysius Telmarenfis to have erected a new fortress, called by that author Arsamosata, upon the river Arsanias, either this or the preceding year. But Dionysius, in what he advances here, must undoubtedly be mistaken. For this town, which likewise went under the name of Armosata and Arsamote, has been taken notice of by Pliny, Ptolemy, Tacitus, and Polybius, as well as by a coin of M. Aurelius, in the Medicean collection at Florence, struck several hundred years before the Khalifat of Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr, which has been published by the learned Lucas Holstenius. The Arabs, therefore, did not found, but rebuild, or rather repair, the place at present under consideration. However, it may be fairly inferred from Dionysius, that Cellarius is guilty of a mistake, when he places Armosata, or Arsamosata, at a great distance from the Arsanias. The Khalif's workmen, soon after they begun their operations, were struck with terror at the sight of a body of the imperial troops incamped on the other side of the river, and immediately abandoned their work; which gave the enemy an opportunity of demolishing what they had done. However, the Arabs soon returned, resumed their work, and finished the fortress in such a manner as to put it out of danger of any future insult. Abd'alrahmân Ebn Moâwiyah still maintained himself, notwithstanding the power of Al Mansûr, and the success that had attended his arms in the east, upon the Moslem throne in Spain.

In the 153d year of the Hejra, commencing January 3d, 770, one Banaka, or Ebn Aka, a Moslem general, according to Theophanes, undertook an expedition against the Christians, in order to revenge an irruption which the imperial forces had made into Armenia the preceding year. He advanced first into Isauria, and from thence marched to a fortress called Syce, which he straitly besieged. Advice of this being brought to the emperor, he sent orders to Michael, Manes, and Bardanes, three of his commanders, to move with a body of Bucellarians and Armenians, and other troops drawn out of some of the eastern provinces, against the Arabs, and force them to raise the siege. The imperial generals, in pursuance of the orders they had received, assembled their forces, and, in conjunction with a fleet fitted out by the citizens of Cibyra, that had entered the port of Syce, immediately advanced to the relief of the place. Banaka, being apprized of their approach, made the necessary

- a dispositions to engage them; which at last he did, and gave them a total overthrow, putting a great number of them to the sword. 'Tis remarkable, that the Arabs, in this action, made the first onset with the same outcries and howlings that the Turks do, in order to intimidate the enemy, when they begin the attack, at this day. After this defeat, Banaka, who had made himself terrible to the Christians, by the depredations he had committed in the imperial territories, and the captives he had carried off from thence, the foregoing year, ravaged all the neighbouring district in a dreadful manner. However, he could not reduce the fortrefs he had for some time so straitly besieged, but was obliged to return home, without having made any considerable conquest; tho' he acquired some valuable spoils, and took several prisoners, in this expedition. About the same time, Al Mansûr dismissed Nubakht, his astrologer, who was a Persian, and extremely well versed in every branch of his art, on account of his ill state of health; filling the post become vacant by his dismissal with his son Khorshadmab Wâtîmâdab Khosîr Wâabakashâd, whose name the Khalîf converted into that of Abu Sabl. In the 151st year of the Hejra, or the 768th of CHRIST, Dionysius, bishop of Harrân, departed this life, and was succeeded by a person of the same name, taken out of the monastery of Zuchenin, or Zokhenûn; as did likewise Stephen, bishop of Chabura, or A' Khabûr, Zacharias, bishop of Edeffa, and Jannes, bishop of Tela, the following year; the two last of whom were succeeded by Elias, a cruel and flagitious person belonging to the monastery of Cartamina, or Kartamin, and one Sabinus. At this time, David, the patriarch, Serguna, bishop of Marde, Abas, bishop of Amida, or Amid, Constantine, bishop of Samosata, or Someisât, and Paul, bishop of Tagrit, or Tacrît, were in great repute. A comet was seen in the month of May, between the eastern and northern parts of the hemisphere; and soon after it rained black stones, some of which were preserved to the time that Dionysius Telmarenensis wrote the annals here referred to. Zeid, one of the Khalîf's generals, is likewise said by that author to have exacted a capitation-tax of the Scythians, or Tartars, the same year<sup>2</sup>.

- THE next year, being the 154th year of the Hejra, the Khalîf sent one of his commanders, called Mualabitus, or Al Moballebi, by Theophanes, with a numerous army into Africa; but what he did there this campaign, we are not told by that author. Al Fadl,<sup>The transactions of the year 154-</sup> surnamed Barinar, another of that prince's generals, made an incursion into the Christian territories, and carried off with him from thence about 500 prisoners. The people of Mopsuestia, or Al Masîsa, in Cilicia, receiving intelligence of this, detached a body of troops, levied amongst themselves, in order to cut off his retreat; but Al Fadl defeated this detachment, and put the Mopsuestians to flight, with the loss of a thousand men. The Khalîf went this year to Jerusalem, where he kept the great fast of Ramadân; and obliged many Christians to retire from thence into the dominions of the Greek emperor. Either this or the preceding year, Mûsa Ebn Mosaab, the Khalîf's governor of Mosul, raised a violent persecution against the Christians of the Jacobite persuasion there; which, by means of his deputies, or inferior officers, whom he had appointed to preside over several considerable cities of Mesopotamia, he extended to other parts of that province. One of these was Adam Ebn Têzid, the lieutenant of Amid, Arzan, Al Rûm, and Mayafarkîn, who, in cruelty and barbarity, seems to have surpassed all the rest. One Zoaras, or Zoara, a monk belonging to the convent of St. Matthew at Mosul, having conceived an invincible aversion to, and borne an implacable hatred against, his brethren there, accused them to Jaafar, Al Mansûr's son, of having concealed the treasures of Heshâm, Merwân, and other Khalîfs, besides an immense quantity of gold and silver of their own. Upon which, that prince sent a detachment to plunder the convent, and strip the religious there of every thing valuable belonging to them; which being done, he issued an edict to oblige the Christians to transmit him an exact account of all the rich furniture contained in the churches and monasteries of Mesopotamia. But Jaafar dying soon after, that edict was revoked, and the valuable effects taken out of the convent of St. Matthew restored. At this time, a body of 500 slaves, being chiefly Sindians and Khazars, or Khazarites, attempted to seize upon the imperial treasury in Harrân; but being repulsed by Al Abbâs, the governor, they were soon dispersed, and several of them executed for being concerned in so villainous an attempt. Al Mansûr sent officers likewise, this year, to collect the capitation exacted of the Christians settled in Armenia, Syria, and Mesopotamia, with the utmost rigour and severity; and to impress the mark of slavery upon the foreheads, necks, arms, breasts, and shoulders, of that unfortunate people; which drove many of them into the imperial territories. Hence probably arose the custom of having certain marks and characters painted on the arms and other parts of those who visited Jerusalem, which in some measure prevails at this very day. The Khalîf also ordered the walls and fortifications of Callinicum to be repaired. The same year, a notorious villain, born in a village called Rama, in the neighbourhood of Tacrit, after he had acted the monk for several years in the convent of St. Matthew at Mosul, put off the monastic habit, and declared himself a convert to Mohammedism. This man, however, afterwards returned to the Christian faith, assumed the name and character of a prophet in the territory of Dara, where he pretended to foretell future events, and to threaten destruction to the Christians of Mesopotamia, unless they speedily repented of their sins; and had the impudence to place himself in the episcopal chair belonging to the cathedral church of Dara. Here likewise, though he was only a deacon, he took upon him to communicate to presbyters the benediction, to consecrate oil mixed with spittle, and to distribute potions of this amongst the populace, as a remedy that would effectually cure all disorders; by which he amassed vast sums of money. The news of which proceedings being brought to Cyriacus, the bishop, he had the impostor carried immediately before David the patriarch, who ordered him to be conducted to Harrân, and thrown into prison there. We must not forget to observe, that, about this very year, flourished Theophilus Edessenus, by nation a Maronite, and by profession an astronomer. He wrote a history, in which he makes 5197 years to have elapsed between the creation of the world and the commencement of the æra of Seleucus. He also translated the Iliad of Homer into the Syriac language. But, for a farther account of this learned author and his works, we must beg leave to refer our readers to some of the writers cited here; who, on that head, we doubt not, will give them full and ample satisfaction <sup>a</sup>.

seize upon some districts of Assyria and Mesopotamia.

THE following year, being the 155th year of the Hejra, Abd'aliab Ebn Ali Ebn Abd'al-rabmân Ebn Moâwiyah Ebn Hadij died in Egypt, over which country he had been appointed to preside by Al Mansûr; who sent Mûsa Ebn Ali Ebn Riyâb Al Lakbmi thither to succeed him. Mûsa continued in that post, which he filled with credit and reputation, till the death of the Khalîf. There was a great drought this year, according to Dionysius Telmarenfis, in Mesopotamia. The Arabs of Al Tbalabiya and Maad, with their flocks, camels, and other beasts of burden, made an irruption into Assyria and Mesopotamia; possessing themselves of the districts of Musal, Beth-Garme, or Bajarma, Heza, Marga, Canisapor, Resin, Kok, or Cocha, and Salakh, or Salacha. With regard to Beth-Garme, or Bajarma, we must beg leave to remark, that it was a tract of Assyria, containing the cities of Dakuka, Shabar-Kadta, Buazicha, and others that we find enumerated by Elias Damascenus, the Nestorian bishop, and called Germa by Agathias Scholasticus. It was a bishop's see, and had one Constantine for its bishop in the year of our LORD 969. Marga was a town, or pretty large village, in the territory of Mosul. Bar Hadbeshaba, one of the bishops of Marga, has been mentioned by some of the eastern writers. Kok, or Cocha, may possibly have been the same city with the Cochæ of Arrian, Ammianus Marcellinus, and Eutropius, seated upon the Tigris, at a small distance from Ctesiphon and Seleucia, erected on the opposite bank of that river; though Assēmanus seems to be of a different opinion. Salakh, or Salacha, was a town of Tur-Abdin, that stood likewise at no great distance from the Tigris, and a bishop's see, as may be inferred from Gregory Bar-Hebræus. The convent of St. James here was the seat, or residence, of the patriarchs of Tur-Abdin, from the year of CHRIST 1364 to the year 1494. The other places taken by the Arabs this year have not been so particularly described by the oriental geographers and historians <sup>b</sup>.

The Khalif
returns from Jerusalem to Baghdâd.

IN the 156th year of the Hejra, Paul, bishop of Tagrit, or Tacrit, Zachæus, bishop of Charma, and Jonas, bishop of Nearda, departed this life. The same year the Khalîf Al Mansûr returned from Jerusalem to Baghdâd, and constituted Mûsa Ebn Mosaab, in the room of Al Abbâs, his governor of Mesopotamia. He also ordered the inhabitants of Akula to repair the walls and fortifications of their city at their own expence. Having by treachery cut off Patricius, the lieutenant of the Greater Armenia, he seized upon all his immense treasures, and put them into his own coffers. At such a pitch of impiety did the Arabs, or Moslems, arrive, that they opened a great number of sepulchres in Mesopotamia, in order to discover gold and silver there. About the same time, according to Theophanes, 280 heads were brought from Africa into Syria, and exposed to public view, by way of triumphal parade, in several places. The schism amongst the Christians of the Jacobite persuasion in a Mesopotamia, some of whom adhered to David, as their patriarch, and others to George, who had been imprisoned by the Khalif at Baghdâd, still continued <sup>c</sup>.

THE next year, being the 157th of the Hejra, a grievous famine made terrible havock <sup>A famine and plague in Mesopotamia.</sup> in every part of Mesopotamia; insomuch that the Christians were obliged to live upon flesh in Lent. This was followed by a plague, which swept away the greatest part of the inhabitants of that province. Mûsa Ebn Mosaab, the Khalif's governor, treated the Christians of all denominations, not excepting the religious of every kind, with the utmost rigour and severity, this year; throwing into prison all who could not pay the enormous tribute he demanded of them. Such treatment as this they had likewise met with from the present Khalif, or at least the person he appointed to preside over them, in the beginning of his reign <sup>d</sup>.

THE following year, being the 158th of the Hejra, commencing November 11th, 774, Al Mansûr's <sup>death and character.</sup> set out from Baghdâd, in order to perform the pilgrimage to Mecca. But he was taken ill upon the road, and found himself so bad at the castle of Abdawaya, where he lodged one night, that he sent for his son Al Mobdi, who attended him in this pilgrimage, in order to take his final leave of him. As soon as Al Mobdi came into his apartment, perceiving his end to approach, he gave him some salutary advice in relation to his future conduct, when settled upon the Muslem throne, and laid his last commands upon him; which, according to Abu'l Faraj, were delivered in the following terms: "I command you," said he, "to treat publicly your relations with the greatest marks of distinction, since this will reflect no small degree of honour and glory upon yourself: but this," added he; "I believe you will not do. Increase the number of your freed-men, and treat them all with kindness, as they will be of great service to you in time of adversity; but this," continued he, "I am apt to think you will not do. Inlarge not that part of your capital erected on the eastern part of the Tigris, as you will never be able to finish it: but this," said he, "I know you will attempt. Never permit any of your women to intermeddle in affairs of state, nor to have too much influence over your councils: but this," subjoined he; "I know you will not fail to do. These are my last commands, or, if you please, my dying advice; and to God I now recommend you." Then he took his leave of him, and they were both drowned in tears. From Abdawaya he went to Cûfa, and then continued his journey, tho' he grew worse and worse every station, till he arrived at Bir Maimûn, that is, the well, or fountain, of Maimûn, where he expired, on the 6th of Dbu'lhajja, very early in the morning; and was carried from thence to Mecca, where, after an hundred graves had been dug, that his sepulchre might be concealed, he was interred. He lived sixty-three, and reigned twenty-two lunar years, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, Eutyckius, or Sa'id Ebn Batrîk, and Abu'l Faraj. Ebn Batrîk makes him to have been sixty-eight years of age at the time of his death. With regard to his person, he had a thin long beard, was tall, lean, and of a swarthy complexion. He is also said to have tinged himself with something that gave him a darkish hue, and to have changed the colour of his grey hairs every month with two thousand drachms of musk. As to his disposition, he was of a most sweet temper in private; and could bear even with the impertinences of boys; but when he appeared in public, arrayed in his royal robes, even all the senior part of his subjects stood in awe of him. He was a prince of vast prudence, integrity, and discretion, and of a very winning and amiable conversation. He was also magnanimous and brave, and extremely well versed (having improved his natural genius by long experience) in all the arts of government. But these good qualities were not a little sullied by some of a contrary nature. For, he was covetous to such a degree, that several very ridiculous stories have been told of him. He was likewise, on some occasions; truculent and cruel, of a fierce aspect, loaded some of his subjects with irons on bare suspicion, and butchered others of them with greediness and pleasure. He left behind him, in his treasury, 600,000,000 dirhems, and 24,000,000 dinârs. We are told by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, that he paid his cook, by assigning him the heads and legs of the animals dressed in his kitchen for his own use; and that he obliged this servant to procure all the fuel and vessels he had occasion for at his own expence. The following story of him is too remarkable to be passed over in silence here. Whilst he remained in a private station, and before he was elevated to the sovereign dignity of Khalif, he ranked amongst his most familiar friends one Azhar Babeli, a man of great merit, and considered as one of the most authentic doctors in all points relating to traditions. This person observing that Abu Jaafar, when settled upon the throne, did not vouchsafe to enter into any particular conversation with him, as formerly, he resolved to present himself before him at one of his public audiences; which he accordingly did. As soon as the Khalif perceived him, he demanded of him what he wanted there. Azbar answered, that he was come to congratulate him, and to rejoice with him, upon his elevation to the Khalifat. Abu Jaafar immediately ordered him a purse with a thousand dinârs in it, and then dismissed him with the following words: "Don't give yourself the trouble to come here any more." Notwithstanding which, the following year, Azbar presented himself again before him. The Khalif looked upon him with a very sour countenance, and asked him what brought him thither? Azbar replied, "I was informed that your majesty was greatly indisposed, and came hither, as one of your most faithful slaves, to inquire after your majesty's health." Upon which, Abu Jaafar ordered him another purse with the same sum in it; and said to him roughly at parting, "Don't come to teize me here any more for the future." But this did not hinder Azbar from appearing before him again, the following year. The Khalif, as soon as he saw him, said to him, in great wrath, "Will you never cease to importune me?" Azbar answered, "Formerly I never received any thing but civilities from your majesty; I come therefore now to learn what has occasioned such an alteration in your conduct." To which the Khalif answered, "As the civilities you mention had no manner of foundation, so they left behind them not the least impression in my mind; because, by not seeing you as I used to do, I have contracted a habit of not seeing you at all." In fine, Al Mansûr dismissed him, without giving him any thing. This story has been handed down to us by Yafei, who tells us, that the Khalif, by the patience and liberality exhibited on this occasion, deviated from the general course and tenor of his conduct; as he was, for the most part, both very sordid and avaricious, and of a hasty and passionate temper. He ordered a tax to be levied upon the people of Cûfa of a dawanek, or obole, a small inconsiderable brass coin, a head, to defray the expence of digging a ditch, or intrenchment, round the town, for the security of the place; for which reason, he was surnamed, by way of contempt, Abu Dawanek, the father of the dawanek, or obole, by the inhabitants of that city.

Some other particulars relating to him.

SOME of the eastern writers relate, that a dysentery, or bloody-flux, put a period to this Khalif's days, and that he died at Mecca; though the latter notion, however positively asserted, was undoubtedly a mistake. Khondemir reports, that, a few days before he was attacked by the malady that carried him off, he found four Arabic verses inscribed upon a wall, which gave him great uneasiness; the purport of which was to the following effect: "O Abu Jaafar, the time of your death is come! Your days are determined, and God's irrevocable decree is arrived. Consult as many augurs, soothsayers, diviners, and astrologers, as you please; your time is soon to expire, and the thread of your life to be cut by the distemper that is to prove fatal to you." These verses mentioned astrologers, because the Khalif, who was himself well versed in the knowledge of the stars, had always some philosophers and mathematicians about him. According to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, Al Mansûr discovered, written upon the wall of a caravansera, or inn, four other verses in Persic, the sense of which was as follows: "The kingdoms and riches of this world are not given, but only lent us. Let no one, therefore, think himself sure of them, or value himself too highly upon account of them. Whoever fixes his heart upon them, and places his chief confidence in them, will be covered with shame, when he is obliged to return them to him from whom he received them." Some authors inform us, that this Khalif's governors of Egypt exacted such enormous sums of money, by way of tribute, of the people of that country, not sparing even the poorest artificers and meanest mechanics, that they were reduced to the extreme poverty, and forced to feed upon dogs and dead bodies. Al Mansûr and Constantine Copronymus, the Greek emperor, are both said to have died within the course of the same year. The former understood the Mohammedan law better than most of his age, having been instructed therein by some of the most celebrated Moslem doctors, whom he greatly honoured, and did not think it beneath him to be looked upon as their scholar, even after his elevation to the Khalifat. Notwithstanding the aversion that reigned between the houses of Al Abbâs and Ommiyah, Al Mansûr frankly owned that the Khalifs of the former family had three advantages over him; first, in finding such a general, and governor of a province, as Al Hejâj; secondly, in being served by such a secretary as Abd'al Hamid; and, thirdly, in meeting with such a Muedhdhin, or crier, as Al Baalbeki. This Khalif's counsellors were Abu Atiya Al Bâbeli, Ayûb Al Marzabâni, whom he put to death for assuming to himself too much power, and his servant Rabî. The captains of his guards were Abd'al Jabâr Ebn Abd'alrahmân Al Azdi, Ebn Caab Ebn Mûsa Al Tamini, and Al Mofaiyeb Al Zakiri; his judges Abd'allah Ebn Mohammed Ebn Safwân, Sharîk Ebn Abd'allah, Al Hasan Ebn Amâra, and Al Hejâj Ebn Artab; his chamberlains

The first day of his reign was Monday, and the last Saturday. The most illustrious actions of this prince, according to some of the oriental historians, were the conquests of Armenia, Cilicia, and Cappadocia; to which others add the erection of the famous city of Baghdâd. We are told by Ebn Shobnah, that when he took his final leave of his son Al Mohdi, he made use of the following terms: "I was born," my son, "in the month of Dhu'lhajja; I was proclaimed Khalîf in the same month; and I am strongly inclined to believe that I shall die in it; for which reason, I am now endeavouring to perform my last pilgrimage, in order to be rendered a proper object of the divine mercy."

S E C T. XXIII.

- c WHEN Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr expired at Bîr Maimûn, he had only his domestics, Al Mohdi and Rabî, his freed-man, with him. The latter of these, for some time, kept his death concealed, and pretended to have a conference with him; in which, as he gave out, the Khalîf commanded him to exact the oath of allegiance to Al Mohdi, his son, as his immediate successor, and to Isâ Ebn Mûsa, his cousin-german, as the next apparent heir of the crown, of all then present: which having done, he dismissed them, and, soon after the conclusion of that ceremony, communicated to them the news of Al Mansûr's death. He also dispatched a courier to Al Mohdi, with advice of that event, and of the first step that had been taken at Bîr Maimûn in his favour. Upon the arrival of the courier at Baghdâd, then the residence of this prince, he was unanimously proclaimed Khalîf by the inhabitants of that city. This courier was Monâra, one of the late Khalîf's servants.
- d Some of the eastern writers inform us, that Omm Mûsa, Mohammed Al Mohdi's mother, was the daughter of Al Mansûr Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Sabar Al Hamyari, or of the tribe of Hamyar. Isâ Ebn Mûsa, as soon as the news of Al Mansûr's death was imparted to him, began to entertain thoughts of setting up for himself at Cûfa, where he then resided; and, in order to facilitate the execution of his scheme, fortified himself in that city. But Al Mohdi, having been apprized of his intended defection, sent Abu Horeira, with a detachment of 1000 horse, to bring him to Baghdâd; which being done, Al Mohdi not only prevailed upon him to recognize his authority, but likewise persuaded him to relinquish his right to the succession, in favour of his son Mûsa Al Hâdi, for the sum of 10,000, or,
- e according to some of the MS. copies of Abu'l Faraj, 10,000,000, dinârs. Soon after the new Khalîf's accession, one Yusef Ebn Ibrahim Al Yazam, declaring against Al Mohdi, assembled in Khorasân a body of troops, in order to dispute the Khalîfat with him. This impostor, pretending to act the prophet, seduced a great number of Al Mohdi's subjects at Busa, or Besa, probably the Fesa of Abu'lfeda, an antient city of Persia, about ten parasangs almost east of Estakr, or Istakbra, where he first set up his standard. The Khalîf, therefore, sent an army against him, which intirely defeated him, dispersed all his followers, and brought him bound to Al Mohdi; by whose order he was publicly crucified at Baghdâd. According to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, this Yusef Ebn Ibrahim Al Yazam was governor of Khorasân; tho', if we will believe Abu'l Faraj, he first set up for a prophet at Busa, and
- f was overthrown by Yezid Ebn Yezid, one of Al Mohdi's most experienced generals. We must not forget to observe, that Al Mansûr's name at length, with his whole surname annexed to it, was Abd'allah Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ali Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Abbâs. Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr; though the first part of his name, Abd'allah, has been denied him by Pagias. It must also be remarked, that Busa, Besa, or Fesa, was in the earlier times a city of a very considerable extent <sup>g</sup>.

- g IN the 159th year of the Hejra, Al Mohdi appointed Mohammed Ebn Solimân, the Syrian, governor of Egypt; but presently removed him from that exalted post, and substituted Mûsa Ebn Ali in his room. It appears from Theophanes, that a body of Al Mohdi's troops made an incursion into the imperial territories, and carried off with them some Moslem prisoners, that had been confined in a cave called Causis, the present year <sup>h</sup>.

as likewise another, the following year. THE following year, being the 160th of the Moslem æra, the Khalif sent Isa Ebn Lok-mân Al Yamjami to govern in Egypt, in the room of Mûsa Ebn Ali, dispatched thither for the same purpose the preceding year, whom he thought fit to depose. The Arab forces, under the command of Othmân Ebn Kaka, one of the Moslem generals, according to Theophanes, made another irruption into the dominions of the Greek emperor, plundered in a dreadful manner the country through which they moved, and conducted from thence several prisoners into the Moslem territories; likewise this year <sup>i</sup>.

The Christians invade Syria. THE next year, being the 161st of the Hejra, the Christians, if we will believe Theophanes, invaded Syria with an army of 100,000 men, and defeated a body of Arabs that pretended to oppose them; of whom they killed five Emirs, or principal officers, and 2000 men, upon the spot. At this time, several dirhems came out of the mint erected at Basra; one of which was found in the neighbourhood of Dantzick, on the coast of the Baltick, in the year 1722; a particular description of which has been given us by the learned M. Kehr. This dirhem exhibits on the anterior part the following words, Bel Basrata abdayni wasettina wameaten; that is, At Basra, in the 161st year of the Hejra; and, on the reverse, Mohammedon rasûlo-llabi, falla-llabo alayhi wasallama; Mohammed is the apostle of God; may God be propitious to him, and make him happy! After which come the words, Al Khalifat o-l' Mohdiyyo Mohammed, In the Khalifat of Al Mohdi, or when Al Mohdi Mohammed was Khalif. With regard to Basra, it may not be amiss to remind our readers, that this city was built by Atbâ Ebn Arâr, at the command of the Khalif Omar, in the 15th year of the Hejra, and consequently cannot be deemed a place of very high antiquity. It is at present a very famous emporium of the east, and stands upon a thick stony soil, as the word Basra itself denotes, about a day and half's journey from one of the mouths of the Tigris, by which that river empties itself into the Persian gulph, denominated likewise from this town the bay of Basra. It is situated between Persia and Arabia, in the extremity of the deserts of Irâk, a little to the west of the Tigris, and was first founded for the sake of carrying on more commodiously an extensive commerce between the Syrians, Arabians, Persians, and Indians. The circumjacent tract is looked upon by the Arabs as one of the most delightful spots of Asia, and even as one of the most beautiful gardens in the world. However, the hot burning winds, that frequently blow there, are very troublesome to travellers, and sometimes overwhelm them with mountains of sand, driven by the force of these winds out of the neighbouring deserts. The city is inhabited by Jacobites, Nestorians, Catholics, Jews, Mohammedans, and Chaldean Christians, commonly called Christians of St. John, who are pretty numerous here. The Arabs, according to Abu'lfeda, resorted to a street of Basra, denominated Mirbad Al Basra, in his days, from all parts, in order to repeat both their prosaic and poetical performances. Basra has sent out many persons of profound erudition; some of the principal of which were Al Hariri, whose style in elegance is supposed to excel even that of the Korân; Hasan Al Basri, who was servant to Omm Salma, one of the prophet's wives, who gave him her own breasts to suck, whilst his mother was employed in her service, a famous scholastic divine, that kept a school at Basra, and wrote a piece, intitled, Noble Traditions; containing all the principal traditionary precepts of the Moslem law; Abu Isbak Ismael, who penned a treatise concerning the law and statutes of the Korân; Yacûb Ebn Ibrahim, chancellor to the Khalifs Al Hâdi and Harûn Al Rashîd, who composed a piece concerning the qualities requisite to form a Kâdi, or judge; Abu Becr Mohammed, who left behind him a collection of narrations, or antient histories; Helâl Ebn Yakya, who published a piece upon the ecclesiastical laws of the Moslems, relating to mosques and hospitals, founded for the benefit of travellers and strangers; and Abu Sa'id Omar, who composed a treatise upon the Arab poetry. There is also at Basra a famous college, or academy, founded by Nezâm Al Molk, the Visir, or Wazîr, of Moezaddîn Abu'lfetah Mâlec Shab, the third Soltân of the Seljuks of Irân, called the college, or academy, of Nezâm. At this time, the city we are speaking of is said to be a flourishing seat of literature, tho' inferior in number of academics to Demashk, or Damascus, and Kairo, or Al Kabirah; the latter of which places, if we will believe a certain writer, contains no less than 12,000 Mohammedan students. Basra stands, according to the calculation of the Arabic tables, in long. 74° 00', and lat. 31° 00'. The city of Baghdâd, though so lately erected, flourished greatly this year. Besides Ebn Najjâr's history of Baghdâd, intitled Tarikh Ebn Najjâr Al Baghdâdi, there is also another history of this capital, to which we find prefixed the title of Tarikh Baghdâd, that is, the history, or annals, of Baghdâd, consisting of no less than ten volumes. The Tarikh Al Abbâs also mentions it in several places, as do in like manner all the Persian and Arabian geographers. To the learned men produced by this metropolis, already taken notice of, we may add Ahmed Ebn Ahmed Al Baghdâdi Khattâb Al Hafedh, Mamar Ebn Almothâni Al Bagh-

a dâdi Al Obeidah, Al Imâm Mohammed Al Baghdâdi, and others; an enumeration of whose names our readers will not expect to meet with here <sup>k</sup>.

In the 162d year of the Hejra, the Khalif Al Mohdi removed Isa Ebn Lokmân Al Jam-jami from the government of Egypt, and substituted Wadib Ebn Al Mansûr in his room. About the same time, he commanded Hasan, one of his generals, to march into Phrygia, at the head of a powerful army, to revenge the loss he had sustained, when the imperial forces broke into Syria the last year. Hasan, in pursuance of his orders, advanced to Dorylaeum in that country, invested it, and attacked it for seventeen days with incredible fury. But finding himself, at the end of that term, greatly distressed for want of provisions, and all his forage consumed, he was obliged to decamp from thence, and retire to Amorium; which town likewise for one whole day he closely besieged. But being informed, that the place was amply furnished with all kinds of provisions and military stores, besides a numerous garison to defend it, he thought fit to raise the siege, and return home. The imperial troops were not strong enough to harass him in his retreat; notwithstanding which, he lost a very considerable number of men, without the least advantage gained, this unfortunate campaign <sup>l</sup>.

THE following year, being the 163d of the Hejra, Al Mohdi sent his son Harûn Al Rashid, who was afterwards Khalif, with a formidable army, to undertake an expedition against the Greeks. The Khalif attended his son Harûn part of the way, and then took his leave of him; appointing Tabya Ebn Kbâled Ebn Barmac, his counsellor, to assist him with his advice. However, he afterwards joined him in the neighbourhood of Haleb, or Aleppo; tho' it does not certainly appear, that he was present at any of the military operations. On the contrary, we find it intimated by Theophanes, that he left the army and went to Jerusalem, before the opening of the campaign. Harûn, after he had conferred with his father in the plains of Dabek, advanced to Samalek, battered that fortress with his catapults, and made himself master of it after 38 days siege; tho', when he entered the place, he found it little better than a heap of ruins. After the reduction, or rather destruction of this town, Harûn returned home; contenting himself with the glory he had acquired. We learn from Theophanes, that the Khalif raised a violent persecution against both the Christians and Jews settled at Hems, and in other parts of his dominions, this year <sup>m</sup>.

d ABOUT the same time, there happened another event, that, according to Abu'l Fariaj, not a little embarrassed the Khalif's affairs. One Hakem Ebn Hâsbem, originally of Merû, in Khorasân, who had been an under secretary to Abu Moslem, the governor of that province, and afterwards turned soldier, passed thence into Mawarâ'lnahr, where he gave himself out for a prophet. He is generally named by the Arab writers Al Mokanna, and sometimes Al Borkai, that is, the veiled, because he used to cover his face with a veil, or a gilded mask, to conceal his deformity, having lost an eye in the wars, and being otherwise of a despicable appearance; tho' his followers pretended he did it for the same reason as Moses did, viz. lest the splendor of his countenance should dazzle the eyes of the beholders. He made a great many proselytes at Nakhsab and Kash, deluding the people with several juggling performances, which they swallowed for miracles, and particularly by causing the appearance of a moon to rise out of a well for many nights together; whence he was also called, in the Persian tongue, Sâzendeh mah, or the moon-maker. This impious impostor, not content with being reputed a prophet, arrogated to himself divine honours, pretending that the Deity resided in his person: and the doctrine whereon he built this was the same with that of the Gholaïtes, who affirmed a transmigration, or successive manifestation, of the Divinity through and in certain prophets and holy men, from Adam to these latter days (of which opinion was also Abu Moslem himself); but the particular doctrine of Al Mokanna was, that the person in whom the Deity had last resided was the aforesaid Abu Moslem, and that the same had, since his death, passed into himself. The faction of Al Mokanna, who had made himself master of several fortified places in the neighbourhood of the cities above-mentioned, growing daily more and more powerful, the Khalif was at length obliged to send an army to reduce him; at the approach whereof Al Mokanna retired into one of his strong fortresses, which he had well provided for a siege, and sent his emissaries abroad to persuade people that he raised the dead to life, and knew future events. But being straitly besieged by the Khalif's forces, when he found there was no possibility for him to escape, he gave poison in wine to his whole family, and all that were with him in the castle, and, when they were dead, he burnt their bodies, together with their cloaths and all the provisions, and cattle; and then, to prevent his own body's being found, he threw himself into the flames, or, as others say, into a tub of aqua fortis, or some other preparation, which consumed every part of him, except only his hair : so that when the besiegers entered the place, they found no creature a in it save one of Al Mokanna's concubines, who, suspecting his design, had hid herself, and discovered the whole matter. This contrivance, however, failed not to produce the effect which the impostor designed amongst the remaining part of his followers ; for he had promised them that his soul should transmigrate into the form of a grey-headed old man, riding on a greyish beast ; and that, after so many years, he would return to them, and give them the earth for their possession : the expectation of which promise kept the sect in being for several ages after under the name of Mobeyyidites, or, as the Persians call them, Sefid jamehghian, i. e. the clothed in white, because they wore their garments of that colour, in opposition, as is supposed, to the Khalifs of the family of Al Abbās, whose banners and habits were black. We must not forget to observe, that Al Mobdi removed Al Mansūr Ebn Tezid Al Ragbbi, who b succeeded Wadib Ebn Al Mansūr in that post, from the government of Egypt, and substituted Abu Sāleh Ebn Abd'allah Al Jawnani in his place."

Harūn Al
Rashid
invades the territories
of the empress Irene.

THE next year, being the 164th of the Hejra, after Abu Sa'id, Al Mobdi's general, had reduced Al Mokanna's faction to the obedience of the Khalif, Israhim Ebn Sāleh Ebn Ali Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Abbās was sent to preside over Egypt. The same year, the Khalif ordered his son Harūn Al Rashid to penetrate into the Christian territories, with an army of 95,000 men. Harūn, having entered the dominions of the empress Irene, defeated one of her commanders, that had advanced at the head of her forces to oppose him ; tho', according to Theophanes, the Greeks gained the advantage in that action. After this overthrow, Harūn c laid several of the imperial provinces waste with fire and sword, spread a terror over the rest, and alarmed even the city of Constantinople itself. This induced the empress Irene to purchase a peace of the Khalif, by agreeing to pay him an annual tribute of 70,000 pieces of gold ; which, at least for the present, delivered her subjects from the courtes and depredations of the Arabs. After the signing of the treaty, Harūn returned home, loaded with spoils, and covered with glory. We must not forget to observe, that Al Mokanna, or Hakem, of whom we have spoken so largely above, is denominated Hakem Ebn Alha by one of the eastern historians. It has been remarked by some of the oriental writers, that, one day in the last Arab month of this year, the sun, a little after his rising, totally lost his light, in a moment, without being eclipsed ; when neither any fog, nor any cloud of dust, appeared to obscure him. This frightful darkness, occasioned by this surprizing event, continued till d noon, to the great astonishment of the people settled in the counties where it happened. The same authors likewise observe, that no account of any prodigy like this has been transmitted down to us by any of the historians of former ages °.

Abu Hanifa's

IN the 165th year of the Hejra, commencing Aug. 26th. 781, the Hanifites, or Hanofites, of whose founder Abu Hanifa Al Noomān Ebn Thābet we have already given our readers a distinct account, made a considerable figure in and about the city of Baghdād. To what has already been said of that celebrated Sunnite doctor, we shall here beg leave to add the following particulars. Mālec Ebn Ans, the author of the second orthodox sect of the Moslems, who was born at Medina, being once engaged in conversation with Abu Hanifa, who was a native of Cūfa, told him, that Ali had observed the Cūfans to be quarrelsome and seditious ; to which e Abu Hanifa replied, that the people of Medina were taxed with hypocrisy by the Korān : which little raillery, that passed between two such great men, has been taken notice of by one of the more reputable Moslem writers. Another of them informs us, that, according to the sentiments of this doctor, those points that have been imparted to us by God and his prophet Mohammed, are to be received with intire submission ; of those that have been handed down to future ages by the COMPANIONS, or contemporaries, of the prophet, the best are to be chosen ; but that with regard to the tenets and opinions of the doctors who followed them, men are at liberty either to admit or reject them, as the persons from whom they come were weak and fallible like ourselves. Hosain Waz, in his commentary upon the Korān, relates, that Abu Hanifa, having once received a box on the ear, said to the f person who had the temerity to give it him, " I could return you injury for injury. but that " I will not do ; I could carry my complaint to the Khalif, but such a part as this I shall " not act ; I could at least represent to God in my prayers the outrage you have offered me, " but against this I shall take care to be upon my guard ; lastly, at the day of judgment, " I could demand vengeance of God for this violence, but far be it from me to pursue such " a vindictive conduct : if that great and terrible day should this moment arrive, and my " intercession could take place, I would not enter paradise without you." The principal

- a of his works are the Mefnad, that is, the prop, or support, wherein he establishes all the essential points of Islamism upon the authority of the Korân and the most received traditions; a treatise, intitled, Filkelam, that is to say, scholastic divinity; and a sort of catechism, or instruction, that bears the title of Mcallem, or the master. In the last of these pieces he maintains, that as long as a Moslem continues in the faith, he cannot become an enemy to God, tho' he may fall into enormous sins; that such sins cannot destroy the validity of faith; and that grace is by no means incompatible with sin. These and such-like propositions induced Vazai to attack his notions; which he did in a book, intitled, Ekbtelef ABU HANIFA, or the contradictions of ABU HANIFA. The Sonnite doctor, of whom we are speaking, is greatly celebrated by Al Zamakhshari, Korderi, Marghinani, Dainuri, Sabakazmuni, and
- b others, whose authority is of no small weight with the orthodox Moslems. In fine, all the principal eastern historians agree, that Abu Hanifa excelled all the learned Mohammedans of his age, not only in the knowledge of their law, but in the practice of all the duties it enjoins; that his life was extremely austere, and intirely detached from the things of this world, on which account he has always been considered by the Sonnites as the chief and first Imâm of the Moslem law; and that his sentiments have been rejected by none but the Shiites, or followers of Ali, who are looked upon as schismatics by the orthodox Mohammedans. We shall conclude what we have to say on this head with observing, that Mûlee Shâh, third Soltân of the Seljuks of Irân, erected a superb mausoleum in honour of Abu Hanifa at Baghdâd, and joined to it a college for the use of the youth educated in the principles of his
- c sect, in the year of the Hejra 485, or of CHRIST 1092 <sup>p</sup>.

THE following year, being the 166th of the Hejra, Harûn Al Rasbid, the Khalif's son, Harûn Al Rasbid arrives at Baghdad. arrived from the neighbourhood of Constantinople, where he had concluded a peace with Irene sword in hand, and imposed what terms he thought fit upon that princess, at Baghdâd. One of those terms was, that the Moslem troops should be supplied with provisions, and furnished with all proper accommodations, as long as they remained in the empress's dominions; as also that they should be conducted from thence to the Khalif's territories by some of her subjects who knew the roads, by the best way they could shew them, and not that narrow defile limited on one side by a steep mountain, and on the other by the Sagaris, or Sangarius, a noted river of Bitlynia, through which the Arab army had marched to the coast of the d Propontis, where they had struck a terror into the imperial court. The conclusion of this treaty with Irene is placed by Abu'l Faraj, who seems in this point to be supported by Theophanes, in the 165th year of the Hejra; tho' that event appears to have been fixed by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari in the preceding year. Had not the empress been intirely governed by her fears, she might have cut Harûn Al Rasbid and all his troops to pieces, or starved them to a surrender, since they were in a very distressed and calamitous situation, when the treaty was signed, as we find intimated by Abu'l Faraj. Harûn entered Baghdâd in the month of Al Mobarram, and was attended by a considerable number of Christians, who had been restored to their liberty by virtue of the preceding treaty. The peace concluded between the Greek empress and the Khalif continued about three years. Soon after Al Rasbid's arrival at Baghdâd, e he was declared the next heir to the crown after his elder brother Mûsa Al Hâdi. About the same time, Al Mobdi caused diligent search to be made after all his subjects who were infected with Zendicism, and put to death as many of them as fell into his hands. Amongst the rest, he ordered Saleb Ebn Abd'allah and Tasir Ebn Yarad to be executed, under the pretext of their having been suspected of favouring those who professed that species of infidelity. But Tasir Ebn Yarad is supposed to have suffered the punishment inflicted upon him, for publishing some satirical verses upon Al Mobdi and his counsellor Takûb Ebn Dawud, which have been handed down to us by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari <sup>q</sup>.

THE next year, being the 167th of the Hejra, Al Mobdi removed from the government of Egypt Ibrahim Ebn Saleb, and appointed Mûsa Ebn Mashaab, or Moses the son of Musaab, Ibrahim Ebn Saleb removed from the government of Egypt. as he is called by Dionysius Telmarenfis, who had formerly been the Khalif's governor of Mesopotamia, to succeed him. Every part of that prince's vast dominions seems to have enjoyed an uninterrupted repose, no military operations having been mentioned as happening during the course of it, in any of the provinces of the Moslem empire, by the oriental historians, the present year <sup>r</sup>.

IN the 168th year of the Hejra, Musa Ebn Mashaab was assassinated in Egypt. This tragical event happened in the month of Shawâl, and was probably occasioned by a tyrannical and oppressive administration. His deputy Amer Ebn Omar took upon him the government of Egypt, and Egypt, till the arrival of Fadl Ebn Saleh Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Abbās, who was sent by the Khalif from Baghdād to succeed Mūsa Ebn Mafsaab in his lucrative and exalted post<sup>a</sup>.

THE following year, being the 169th year of the Hejra, and beginning July 14th, 785, Al Mohdi sent to his son Harūn Al Rashīd, then in the province of Jorjān, to repair immediately to court; he having formed a design to secure to him the Moslem throne immediately after his death, and intirely to exclude his eldest son, Mūsa Al Hādī, from the succession; but Harūn, looking upon this as an iniquitous step, would not comply with his father's order; so that the Khalif found himself obliged to undertake a journey into Jorjān, in order to have a conference there with his younger son Al Rashīd. When he arrived at Arud, or Al Rud, in the district of Māfabdād, one of his favourite mistresses, whom he had commanded to attend him, gave him a poisoned pear, which had been presented to her by another of the Khalif's concubines, named Hafana, who thought she had too great an ascendant over him, and therefore resolved to destroy her; which, appearing very beautiful to him, he could not forbear eating it, not in the least suspecting that any noxious quality was inherent in it. But it had no sooner entered his stomach than he found himself in most exquisite torture, and in a very short time expired; which greatly afflicted Hafana, tho' she had no intention to hurt him, when she communicated the poisoned fruit to her hated rival. This tragical accident happened on the twenty second day of the month of Al Moharram; and, after it, the Khalif was buried near a walnut-tree, under whose boughs he used sometimes to repose himself. He was near forty-three years of age at the time of his death, and reigned ten years, one month, and fifteen days. His son Harūn Al Rashīd, who was with him when he expired, said the prayers over him at the time of his interment. Some writers pretend, that, one day, as he was hunting, he pursued a wild beast into an old ruined house; where, being obliged to make a great effort to pass through a low door, his horse carried him with such force against it, that he broke his back; so that, no assistance being at hand, he expired upon the spot. This Khalif, in imitation of his father Abu Jaafar Al Mansūr, is said to have performed a pilgrimage to Mecca, tho' with more pomp than devotion; as he spent in that journey about 6,000,000 dinārs. Amongst other things with which he loaded the camels that attended him, he carried such a prodigious quantity of snow, that it served not only to refresh him and all his retinue in the burning sands of Arabia, but likewise to preserve all the delicious fruits he took with him in their natural freshness, and to afford him ice water to drink, during his abode at Mecca, the inhabitants of which place had scarce ever seen any snow before. Whilst he was there, according to some authors, he enlarged the portico of the Caaba, and issued orders for demolishing many houses at Medina, to give a greater extent to the mosque containing Mohammed's tomb; which was by no means approved of by the superstitious followers of the Moslem law. It was at this time also that a Moslem brought to him one of the prophet's slippers, and received from him for it a present of 10,000 dirhēms; after which, turning himself towards some of his principal courtiers, he said, "Mohammed never saw this slipper; but, if I had refused accepting of it, the people would have believed that it had really belonged to Mohammed, and that I had despised it; for they are naturally prejudiced in favour of the weak against the strong." This prince often changed the governors of his provinces, and their ministers, lest some of them should usurp too great a degree of power, and even assume to themselves the supreme authority. He likewise restored large sums of money that his father had extorted from his subjects, released a vast number of prisoners, and dispatched most of the affairs of state himself with great diligence and application. He frequently held his bed of justice, in order to punish the violences and oppressions exercised by the grandees upon the lower part of the people, and to make the latter amends for the losses they had sustained. He appointed persons of great gravity and discretion, and such as were extremely well versed in the Mohammedan civil law, to assist in the courts of justice, that, by their presence, they might prevent all illegal decisions. Having one day, by way of reprimand, said to one of his civil officers, How long will you be guilty of these faults? the other very sagaciously replied, As long as it shall please God to preserve your life for our good, so long shall we commit faults, and your clemency will pardon them<sup>1</sup>.

Who were his principal counsellors, or prime ministers.

His first principal counsellor, or prime minister, was Moāwiyah Ebn Abd'allah Al Asbari; but he did not continue long in that exalted station. After his dismissal, he advanced to that sublime post Yākūb Ebn Dawūd Ebn Tabmar, surnamed Tabamasb, a person of great wit and a most charming conversation, who was in such high favour with the Khalif, that he did not only trust him with the management of all his affairs, but likewise permitted him to partake of all his diversions. This excited the envy of the principal courtiers, who entered into several cabals against him, and at last found an opportunity of accusing him to Al Mohdi of favouring the partisans of the Alidæ, or family of Ali, and consequently of being an

- a enemy to the house of Al Abbās. This accusation, tho' it did not gain intire credit with the Khalif, made nevertheless some impresson upon him. In order, therefore, to try him, Al Mohdi commanded Yakūb to put to death one of the descendants of Ali, whom, he pretended, he could not permit to live any longer; and, to induce him to obey with the greater alacrity this command, he made him a present of 100,000 dirhēms, and bestowed upon him in marriage one of the most beautiful ladies of his seraglio. Yakūb having communicated to the person destined to suffer the order he had received, he was addressed by him in the following terms: Give me the life which it is now in your power to take away, and you will by that means avoid the confusion which you must necessarily be in at the day of judgment, when you appear before my great ancestor Ali, if you spill my blood which he regards as his own. These words
- b so sensibly touched Yakūb Ebn Dawd, that he gave the person devoted to destruction the money he had received from the Khalif, and enabled him to make his escape. But this having been discovered to Al Mohdi by Yakūb's new wife, such strict search was made after the prisoner, that he was retaken in a short time, and confined in an apartment fitted up for him in the Khalif's palace. After which, Yakūb was summoned to appear, and charged with forwarding his escape; which that nobleman denying, and swearing by the head and life of the Khalif, that he had put the prisoner to death, the Shiite, who had been seized, and put under arrest in the palace, was immediately produced before him. Yakūb, being confounded at
- c the sight, had nothing to urge in his vindication, and was therefore immediately ordered by the Khalif, who was irritated to the last degree at the perjury he had been manifestly guilty of, to prison, where he remained till the sixth year of the Khalifat of Harūn Al Rashīd. But that prince having released him, he retired to Mecca, and resided there till his death. After Al Mohdi had removed him from the honourable post he for some time filled, he substituted Kabād Ebn Saleh, a person of uncommon abilities, in his room<sup>a</sup>.

- HASANA, to whom Al Mohdi's death has been ascribed by some of the eastern writers, Theophilus Edessenus dies a little before the Khalif. having been commanded by the Khalif to attend him in his journey to Jorjān, imagined that his intended conference with his son Harūn Al Rashīd was owing to the advice of Theophilus of Roha, or Edeffa, the son of Thomas Edessenus, a Christian, and his chief astrologer,
- d whom he consulted on all emergent occasions. She, therefore, sent him an insolent message; upbraiding him with his past conduct, and wishing that God would soon deliver them from him, by putting a period to his days. To which he replied, that he had never attempted to persuade the Khalif to undertake the journey she mentioned; that, with regard to the time of his death, the approach of which she so earnestly desired, he knew it was fixed, and at hand; but that nevertheless this was not owing to her prayers, and that as soon as she should be informed of it, she ought to cover her own head with dust. The meaning of the latter part of this answer she did not understand till twenty days after the astrologer's death, when that of Al Mohdi himself likewise happened; but then she easily comprehended the purport of his prediction, which stood in no need of any farther interpretation. To what
- e has been already observed of this Theophilus Edessenus we shall here beg leave to add, that the style of the Syriac version of the Iliad is reckoned very elegant and polite by some of the Arab writers; and that he seems to have translated the Odyssey, as well as the Iliad, into that language, according to Abu'l Faraj<sup>w</sup>.

- AL MOHDI had another great favourite besides his principal astrologer, or rather astronomer, Theophilus Edessenus, and that was Isa, his physician, surnamed Al Sidalāni, or the apothecary, because he was originally of that profession, and did not pretend to any great skill in physic. Al Khizarān, one of Al Mohdi's best-beloved concubines, a native of Medina, being indisposed, sent a maid with some of her urine, to a physician, in order to learn the cause of her distemper; giving her a strict charge at the same time not to discover the person
- f from whom she came. The maid went directly to the shop of Abu Koreish (for so likewise was Isa called) and shewed him her lady's urine; telling him, that it belonged to a poor woman, who stood in great need of his assistance. A poor woman! said he; no, this came from an illustrious princess, who is with child of a king. The maid immediately reported this to Al Khizarān, who afterwards made Isa a present of two sumptuous vests and 300 dinārs, and promised to procure him admission into the Khalif's family, if the latter part of what he had told the maid should prove true. This vastly astonished Abu Khoreish, who publicly declared, that what he had said must have proceeded from a divine impulse, since he spoke at random, and in reality knew nothing of the grand personage by whom the maid had been sent on this occasion. However, Al Khizarān being brought to bed of a prince, afterwards named Mūsā Al Hādi, who succeeded his father in the Khalifat, in due time, she communicated the whole affair to the Khalif; who was so well pleased with it, that he sent a for Abu Koreish, made him his physician, tho', upon examination, he found him not to understand much of physic, and heaped many favours upon him. But notwithstanding his good fortune, Abu Koreish, or, if we please, Isa Al Sidalâni, was never honoured with a place amongst the principal physicians by the Arabs <sup>x</sup>.

*A description
of Al Moh-di's person and
character.*

As to his person, Al Mohdi was tall, handsome, though he had a white speck in his right eye, and, like the generality of the Arabs, of a swarthy complexion. With regard to his disposition, he was liberal and munificent, or, according to others, prodigal and profuse, as he dissipated in a very short time the immense treasures left him by his father Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr. He was also magnanimous and brave, and extremely beloved by his subjects, on account of his impartial administration of justice, and the aversion he always discovered b to an effusion of human blood. He has likewise been considered by some of the Arab writers as religious and devout; though others of them have not been so willing to admit that part of his character. Being once in the mosque at Cûfa, and upon the point of beginning the public prayers, one of the rabble said to him, I have not yet performed the ablution, and yet I would willingly join with you in the public prayers. Upon which, the Khalif stopped in the middle of the mosque, till the Arab had washed and purified himself in a proper manner. In his pilgrimage to Mecca, he was attended by a person of great sanctity, named Al Mansûr Al Hajani, who being with him in the Caaba, when he distributed large sums amongst the people there, the Khalif said, Do you, Al Mansûr, desire nothing of me? The other replied, I am ashamed to desire any thing in the house of God but God himself. Al Mohdi, c upon his return from the pilgrimage, found himself so touched by the pious sentiments inspired into him by that devout expression, that he threw himself upon the ground, and addressed himself to the Deity in the following terms: If I, O LORD, am to be punished, I shall cheerfully undergo whatever chastisement I deserve; but, O LORD, look upon none of the faithful as thine enemies on my account. After which, he made Al Mansûr Al Hajani, for the reproof he had given him, by suggesting, that he ought never to confound earthly with heavenly things, a present of 10,000 dinârs. It has been regarded likewise as an instance of this Khalif's liberality, as well as of his inclination to encourage learned men, that he ordered Merwân Ebn Abu Hafas, one of his subjects, for seventy distichs of Arabic verses that he had composed, the sum of 70,000 dirhems. The following remarkable story, that d has been told of him by Ahmed Mohammed Abd'aljaafar Al Kazwîni, may also be considered in a similar light, and is too entertaining to be omitted here <sup>y</sup>.

*A pleasant ad-
Khalif.*

AL MOHDI, being one day engaged in a hunting-match, strayed from his attendants, and, being pressed with hunger and thirst, was obliged to betake himself to an Arab's tent that he discovered, in order to meet with some refreshment. The poor man immediately brought out his coarse brown bread and a pot of milk to the Khalif. Al Mohdi asked him if he had nothing else to give him; upon which, the Arab went directly to fetch a jug of wine, and presented it to him. After the Khalif had drunk a good draught, he demanded of the Arab whether he did not know him? The other having answered, that he did not; I would have you know then, replied Al Mohdi, that I am one of the principal lords of the Kha- e lif's court. After he had taken another draught, he put the same question to the Arab as before; who thereupon answering, Have not I already told you that I know you not? Al Mohdi returned, I am a much greater person than I have made you believe. Then he drank again, and asked his landlord the third time, whether he did not know him? To which the other replied, that he might depend upon the truth of the answer he had already given him. I am then, said Al Mohdi, the Khalif, before whom all the world prostrate themselves. The Arab no sooner heard those words than he carried off the pitcher, and would not suffer his guest to drink any more. Al Mohdi, being surprized at this action, asked him why he carried off his wine? The Arab replied, Because I am afraid that, if you take a fourth draught, you will tell me you are the prophet Mohammed; and if by chance a fifth, that you are God f ALMIGHTY himself. This gentle wipe so pleased the Khalif, that he could not forbear laughing at it; and being soon rejoined by his people, he ordered a purse of silver, and a fine vest, to be given the poor man, who had entertained him in so hospitable a manner. Upon which, the Arab, in a transport of joy for the good fortune he had met with, said to the Khalif, I shall henceforth take you for what you pretend to be, even though you should make yourself two or three times more considerable than you have done <sup>z</sup>.

particulars

WE have already observed from an Arab author of good repute, that Al Mohdi died in a village called Al Rud, in the territory, or district, of Masabdan; and that he was buried in the same place. He also affirms this Khalif to have been but 39 years of age at the time a of his death; which runs counter to what has been advanced on that head by other writers. Another historian, or rather annalist, informs us, that Madi (for so he calls Al Mobdi) had also the name of Mohammed, and was succeeded by his son Moses, or Mûsa. The first day of his reign was Sunday, and the last Wednesday. The captain of his guards was Nasr Ebn Nofair Ebn Mâlec Al Khozâ'i, and, after him, Hamzah Ebn Mâlec Ebn Abd'allah; his judges Mohammed Ebn Aba'allah Ebn Alafa and Afiya Ebn Yezid, who exercised their function together in the great mosque at Baghdâd; and his chamberlains Salâm Abwasb, Fadl Ebn Al Rabia, and Al Hosein Ebn Râshed. Lastly, the inscription of his seal was, God is my sufficiency, or My sufficiency is of God <sup>a</sup>.

S E C T. XXIV.

b HARUN AL RASHID, Al Mobdi's second son, being with his father at the time of his death, obliged all the people about him, and particularly those who were members of the house of Hâshem, to take the oath of allegiance to his brother Mûsa Al Hâdi, and sent advice of this into all parts of the empire; upon which, he was unanimously proclaimed Khalîf by the inhabitants of Baghdâd. Harûn likewise dispatched an express to his brother Al Hâdi, then in Jorjân, with an account of what had happened, and advised him to make all possible haste to Baghdâd; where, after his arrival, he constituted Al Rabî, or Rabia, his prime minister, or Visir. The same year, according to Abu'l Faraj, he massacred great numbers of his subjects who had embraced Zendicîsm, because they ridiculed the pilgrims who went in procession round the Caaba. The Arabs, who professed Zendicîsm, if we will believe Ebn Kassef, were a sort of Sadducees, or rather Manichees, who maintained the existence of two principles, LIGHT and DARKNESS, and permitted marriage to be contracted between the nearest relations. At first, the Zendicees taught, that men ought to preserve themselves from sin, applied their thoughts intirely to the other world, despised the good things of this, and abstained from all animal food. But, in process of time, they introduced the worship of the two principles above-mentioned, denied that the first degrees of consanguinity prohibited marriage, and despised all the other religions of the country where they lived. Amongst others infected with Zendicîsm, Al Hâdi put to death Yacûb Ebn Al Fadl Ebn Abd'alrahmân Ebn Al Abbâs; whose daughter Fâtema, after her father's death, confessed that she had been got with child by him. It appears from some of the eastern writers, that Al Hâdi undertook an expedition into the provinces of Jorjân and Mazanderân, or Tabaristân, in his father's life-time; and that he was in the former of those provinces when that prince died. It also may be inferred from some of those authors, that Al Mobdi, a little before his death, sent him with a body of troops in quest of the Zendicees, in order to bring them to a condign punishment; which orders he executed with honour, and to the Khalîf's entire satisfaction. We must not omit observing here, that M. D'Herbelot is guilty of a great mistake, when he asserts Al Mobdi, in direct contradiction to all the best Arab historians, to have died at Baghdâd <sup>b</sup>.

c THE same year, that is, the 169th of the Hejra, Al Hâdi, by his brother Harûn Al Rashîd's influence, was inaugurated, without any opposition, at Baghdâd. Here he arrived from Jorjân and Mazanderân, called sometimes by the Arabs Tabaristân, the inhabitants of which provinces he had reduced to the obedience of the Khalîf Al Mobdi; who, from the measures he intended to have pursued at the time of his death, in favour of Al Rashîd, seems to have been jealous of him. Soon after his arrival at Baghdâd, Al Hâdi removed Al Fadl Ebn Saleb from the government of Egypt, and substituted Ali Ebn Solimân Ebn Ali Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Abbâs in his room. The courier dispatched by Harûn Al Rashîd to his brother Al Hâdi, after his father's death, was Salmat Al Wasîf, Al Mobdi's freed-man. The person who headed the rebels of Mazanderân, or Tabaristân, was Madâr, the lord of Hormuz, or Hormaz. It has been already observed, that the mother of Al Hâdi was called Khizarân by Abu'l Faraj. She was the daughter of Atâ, one of Al Mobdi's servants, and has been denominated Hinzarân by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari <sup>c</sup>.

f SOON after his accession, Hosein Ebn Ali Ebn Hasan rebelled against Al Hâdi, and caused himself to be proclaimed Khalîf at Medina; the inhabitants of which city declared openly for him. From thence he marched to Mecca, and put to the sword all the pilgrims there known to be members of the house of Al Abbâs. This revolt, nevertheless, cost the family Hosein Ebn Ali Ebn Hasan rebels against him.

of Ali very dear. For the Khalif, having defeated Hosein, cut off his head, as well as those of a great number of his adherents, and deprived his family of all the pensions and appointments that they had enjoyed by a particular privilege. Hosein had the character of a valiant and very liberal prince. He is said to have distributed 40,000 dinârs, which the Khalif had one day given him, amongst the citizens of Baghdâd and Cûfa, and afterwards to have retired to his house at Medina in a furred vest only, without so much as a shirt under it. Before he took up arms against the Khalif, he ordered a proclamation to be made, whereby he manumitted all the slaves who should desert their masters, and take on in his service. By this means he formed a considerable army, which he flattered himself would enable him to dispute the Khalifat with Al Hâdi, and even enable him to mount the Moslem throne. But he was not a little mistaken in this; for his forces were overthrown by a handful of disciplined and regular troops sent against them by the Khalif. Theophanes calls this prince Moses, and his father Mohammed, as well as Madi; but he says not a word of Hosein's defection, nor of the decisive action consequent thereupon <sup>d</sup>.

THE next year, being the 170th of the Hejra, Mûsa Al Hâdi, finding himself now settled upon the throne, formed a design to exclude his brother Harûn Al Rashîd, notwithstanding the good offices he had done him, from the succession. His view herein was to advance his own son Jaafar to the Khalifat, who was not yet arrived at the age of puberty. But Yabya Ebn Khâled Ebn Barîmac, a person of great reputation for his prudence, and who filled the important post of Visir, endeavoured to dissuade him from carrying such a design into execution, by representing to him, that the Moslems would not be satisfied with a Khalif, who could not perform divine service in the mosque, conduct them in their pilgrimage to Mecca, and march at their head against an enemy. The Khalif pretended to be convinced by his reasoning, and to approve of his advice; but he gave Harthamah, a person in whom he could intirely confide, private orders to kill his brother Harûn, and Yabya his Visir. For that purpose, he kept him one night concealed in his palace. But, about midnight, Harthamah heard the voice of Khizarân, the Khalif's mother, calling him by his name, and bidding him come see Al Hâdi dead upon his bed. That prince died suddenly of a cough, which seized him after he had drank a glass of water. He was jealous of his brother Harûn, and the more so, as their mother had discovered a greater affection for the latter than the former on several occasions. But she prevented his project from taking effect, by giving him a subtle poison that carried him off by coughing and sneezing. Assadi, a Perfian poet, composed a distich upon this tragical event, wherein he says, that the blood of two brothers is the same, as being formed of the same milk, and that the brother who sheds this is a homicide of his mother as well as of his brother. We are informed by an Arab writer, that when Yabya attempted to persuade Al Hâdi not to alter the order of succession, he told him, that if he prevailed upon the people to violate their engagements to his brother Harûn, this would give them a mean opinion of public faith; but that their veneration for such engagements would be heightened by a contrary conduct; that the noblesse, of whom he named a considerable number, would never come into such a scheme; and that consequently this would pave the way to his son Jaafar's exclusion from the Moslem throne. Some of the Arab historians relate, that he first endeavoured to destroy his mother, by sending her a poisoned goose; but that this not meeting with success, she soon after smothered him with a pillow, as she attended him in a fit of sickness. Be that as it will, he died at Baghdâd, or rather Isabâd, a place a little without the city, on Friday the 14th day of the latter Rabî, after he had reigned one year, two months, and twenty-two days. He was buried near the spot where he died, and his brother Harûn Al Rashîd performed the funeral service over him. He is said by some authors to have been, at the time of his death, twenty-four, by others twenty-five, and, lastly, by others, twenty-six, years of age <sup>e</sup>.

Al Hâdi's mother, according to some of the Arab writers, accessory to his death.

WHEN Al Hâdi commanded Harthamah to assassinate his brother Harûn Al Rashîd, and Yabya his Visir, he assigned the following reason for that order, viz. because the latter was his declared enemy, and had, by his seditious discourses, attempted to alienate the affections of his subjects from him, as well as used his utmost endeavours to engage them in favour of the former. He also commanded him, after that double execution, to put to the sword all the descendant of Ali that could be found in any part of his dominions, and then, with a body of his troops, to surprize the city of Cûfa; to which, after he had drawn from thence all the partizans of the house of Al Abbâs, he was to set fire, and reduce it intirely to ashes. Harthamah would have excused himself from being concerned in so bloody a scheme, by alleging, that he had not a number of troops sufficient to execute such a grand design. But the Khalif threatened him with death if he did not comply with his orders, left him abruptly, and retired into the private apartments of his palace; from a whence a few moments after arrived the news of his expiring suddenly in the manner already related. We are told by Abu'l Faraj, that Khiazarân, who governed with an arbitrary sway, having one day pressed Al Hâdi, with an unusual warmth, to grant her a favour she had promised to obtain for one of her dependents, which he refused to do, she went off in a heat; declaring she would never for the future put up any petition to him. Upon which, he said to her, in an angry tone, "Keep within your doors, and mind your own business; if I should hereafter be informed, that any of my officers apply to you for favours, I will order his head to be cut off. How comes it about, that my courtiers attend your levee, from morning till evening, in such crouds? What is the meaning of this? Have you not a wheel and a distaff wherewith to employ yourself, or a book to put you in mind of your duty, or, lastly, a house to reside in?" This infuriating her to the last degree, she instantly vowed revenge; and accordingly ordered the maids she sent to attend him, in a fit of sickness that soon ensued, to suffocate him, as related above. As soon as he was dead, she commanded Harthamah to apprize her younger son Harûn of what had happened, that he might have an opportunity of immediately asserting his right to the Meslem throne. Hence it appears, that different accounts of this prince's death, as well as the true cause of it, have been handed down to us by the best oriental historians <sup>f</sup>.

With regard to his person, Al Hâdi had a large mouth, contracted his upper lip, was tall, corpulent, and of a fair complexion. He was likewise extremely robust, and an excellent horseman. As to his disposition, he was magnanimous and brave, as well as liberal on some occasions; though he has not been represented by any of the Arab writers as very profuse of his favours. He one day repeated an Arabic verse, and desired Yusef Al Sokail, a pretty noted poet, to produce some others of the same sort; which he did, and received for a reward no more than ten dirbêms. However, we are told by another author, that Merwân Ebn Abu Hâfedh, a very celebrated Arab poet, having once presented some of his pieces to him, this prince, who was a good judge of such performances, as evidently appears from some of his poems still extant, discovered such beauties in them, that he was extremely pleased, and said to him, Chuse for your trouble, by way of recompence, either to receive immediately 30,000 dirhêms, or 100,000, after you have gone through all the delays and formalities of the exchequer. The poet answered pleasantly, Give me 30,000 now, and 100,000 hereafter. Which repartee was so well taken by Al Hâdi, that he ordered the intire sum of 130,000 dirbêms to be immediately paid him. The captain of his guards was Abd'allah Ebn Hazem Ebn Hozaimah Al Tamimi, and, after his abdication of that post, Abd'allah Ebn Mâlec Al Khozâ'i; his counsellors Rabî Ebn Yûnas and Omar Ebn Al Rabî; his judges Abu Yusef Yakûb Ebn Ibrahim, a person intimately acquainted with Abu Hanîfa, who went, as we may term it, the western circuit, and Sa'id Ebn Abd'alrahmân, who went the eastern; and his chamberlains Al Rabî and Al Fadl, his son. In the first year of his Khalîfat, Abuna Yabya was elected patriarch of the Jacobites at Alexandria, and continued in that post thirteen years. He is said to have been born, elected patriarch, and died, on the same day of the month. The church at Alexandria enjoyed an uninterrupted repose during the time he presided over it. He was very charitable, and distributed amongst the poor of that city a vast quantity of corn, when a grievous famine raged there. At Antioch died, in Al Hâdi's reign, Dawd, or David, bishop of Dara, who had by violence intruded into the patriarchate there; which enabled George, the lawful patriarch, who had been incarcerated at Baghdâd many years, to exercise his patriarchal function at Antioch, in the same manner as before the commencement of the aforesaid schism. George was succeeded by a person named Syriacus, or Cyriacus, a man of uncommon sanctity and austerity of life. The first day of Al Hâdi's reign was Thursday, and the last Friday; and the inscription of his seal, God is my Lord. It has been already remarked, that the followers of Abu Hanîfa acquired a great degree of reputation, by being taken under the protection of Abu Yusef, his chief justice, in the Khalîfat of this prince <sup>g</sup>.

S E C T. XXV.

g AL HADI's death was no sooner known than Harûn Al Rashîd was saluted emperor of Al Hâdi as the faithful, in the night between the 14th and 15th of the latter, according to Abu Ja'far Al Tabari, or, if we will believe Eutychius and Abu'l Faraj, the former Rabî, by the inhabitants of Baghdâd; and those of the provinces soon followed their example. Al Rashîd was at the same time about twenty-two years of age, and a great favourite of his mother

Khizarân, who not a little contributed to his accession. One of the first things he did was, a to order some divers to search for a ring given him by his father, worth 100,000 dinârs, that, to prevent its falling into his brother's hands, he had thrown into the Tyrris; which being found, without much difficulty, he was highly pleased. The night that Al Hâdi died, Khozaima Ebn Hâzem rushed into his son Jaafar's bed-chamber, dragged him out of bed, and threatened immediately to cut off his head, if he did not instantly acknowledge Harûn
Al Rashîd for his sovereign; which, to save his life, he was glad to do. As Jaafar's recognition of the new Khalîf's authority was attested by some Moslems of distinction, that Kho- zaima had brought with him for this purpose; the service done Harûn Al Rashîd, on this occasion, proved extremely acceptable to that prince. Yahya Ebn Khâled Ebn Barmac, being b informed of Al Hâdi's death, came to Al Rashîd to acquaint him with the news, soon after his brother expired; and, before his departure, another of the new Khalîf's friends arrived, to congratulate him upon the birth of a son, called first Abd'allah, and afterwards Al Maimûn, who, after his brother Al Amîn, ascended the Moslem throne. So that the same night was famous for the death of one Khalîf, the accession of another, and the birth of a third. Al Rashîd had likewise another son, named Mohammed, and afterwards Al Amîn, born in the month of Shawâl this year; who, though he was younger than Al Maimûn, succeeded his father in the Khalîfat. This young prince's mother was Zebeida, the daughter of Jaafar, the son of the Khalîf Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr. Al Rashîd called Yahya Ebn Khâled Ebn Bar- mac his father, and, for his close and faithful attachment to him, constituted him his prime minister, or Visir <sup>h</sup>.

The new Kha-
lif appoints
Mûsa Ebn Isa
to preside over Egypt.

In the 171st year of the Mohammedan æra, beginning June 22d, 787, Al Rashîd conferred the government of Egypt upon Mûsa Ebn Isa Ebn Mûsa Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ali Al
Hâshemi, as a person every way qualified for so important a post. The surname Al Rashîd denotes the righteous, the director, or the just. We are told by some of the eastern writers, that when Harûn was apprized of his brother's death, and consequently of his own exaltation to the Khalîfat, he gave himself up intirely for some time to the reading of the Korân.
As the night of Al Hâdi's death was so remarkable for the relation it bore to three Khalîfs, it has been denominated by some of the Arabs, the night, or rather the day, of the family of Hâshem. It appears from Abu'l Faraj, that Al Rashîd, being extremely troubled with the head-ach, commanded Yahya Ebn Khâled Ebn Barmac, his Visir, to send for Bakhtishua, the d son of George above-mentioned, from Naisabûr; whom, after his arrival at Baghdâd, he presented with a sumptuous vest, besides many other things of great value, and made him the chief of his physicians, the present year <sup>i</sup>.

The western Khalîf dies.

THE following year, being the 172d of the Hejra, commencing June 11th, 788, the Khalîf Al Rashîd appointed his younger son, Al Amîn, his successor in the empire; and, after him, settled the right of succession upon his elder son, Al Maimûn. He also made the latter of those young princes the prefect of Khorasân, and all the adjacent regions, extending as far as Hamadân; and committed to Jaafar Ebn Yahya Ebn Khâled Ebn Barmac the care of his education. About the same time, the daughter of the king of the Khazars, or Kha- zarites, known likewise by the name of the Khâkân, being brought to Fadl Ebn Khâled Ebn e Barmac, died at Barthaa; and her attendants returned to her father's court, where they gave out that she was poisoned. This induced that prince to make preparations for a war with the Khalîf. Soon after, a body of the Moslem forces made an irruption into the imperial territories, and penetrated as far as Ephesus. Al Rashîd also removed Mûsa Ebn Isa, during the time of this irruption, from the government of Egypt, and substituted Moslema Ebn Yahya in his room; appointing Amru Ebn Mabran collector of the tribute there. But he soon deposed Moslema, and sent Mohammed Ebn Zahar to succeed him. We must not forget to observe, that Abd'alrahmân Ebn Moâwiyah Ebn Heshâm Ebn Abd'almelec Ebn Mer- wân, the western Khalîf of the house of Ommiyah, died this, and not the preceding, year, as we find asserted by Roderic of Toledo, after he had reigned about thirty-three years, in f
Spain <sup>k</sup>.

A civil war
in Spain.

THE next year, being the 173d of the Moslem æra, the Khalîf deprived Mohammed Ebn
Zahar of the government of Egypt, and conferred upon Yezid Ebn Hâtem that honourable and lucrative post. In the month of September, this year, the Arabs made another irruption into the territories of the Greek emperor, and defeated a Christian army sent by that prince to oppose them. Diogenes, an imperial officer of great merit and bravery, together with several other commanders, and a vast number of foldiers, perished in the action. About a this time, a civil war broke out between Heshâm, Abd'alrahmân's eldest son, who succeeded him in the western Khalifat, and his brother Solimân, who presided over the principality of Toledo, in Spain. The armies commanded by those two princes came to a general action near a fortress called Bulche; where, after a sharp engagement, Solimân was overthrown, with very great slaughter, and Toledo obliged to open its gates to the victor, after it had sustained a pretty vigorous siege. The battle of Bulche, according to Roderic of Toledo, so often cited here, seems to have been fought towards the close of the present year <sup>1</sup>.

In the 174th year of the Hejra, Al Rashîd sent a powerful navy, with a strong body of land-forces on board, to invade the island of Cyprus; which was met and attacked by the Christian fleet, under the conduct of Theophilus, duke or prince of Cibyra, off the Chelidonian promontory. The Christians, after a vigorous action, were intirely defeated, and Theophilus himself taken prisoner. Being brought before the Khalif Harun Al Rashîd, called Aaron by Theophanes, and refusing to embrace Mohammedism, he was put to death, by that prince's order, according to this author; which, we must own, to us appears by no means probable, as being directly repugnant to one of the principal Moslem institutions. Solimân, after the blow he had received at Bulche, fled to Murcia, where he resided the greatest part of this year. He also sold to his brother Heshâm his pretensions to the principality of which he had been deprived, for 70,000 dinârs; after which, he crossed the sea, retired into Barbary, and was not seen for some years afterwards in Spain <sup>m</sup>.

The following year, being the 175th of the Hejra, the Khalif sent Mûsa Ebn Isa Ebn Mûsa Al Hâsbemi into Egypt, to take upon himself the government there. About the same time, Jaasar Ebn Yabya Ebn Khâled Ebn Barmac being taken extremely ill, the Khalif sent his own physician Bakhtishua to attend him; who having cured him, Jaasar chose the doctor's son Gabriel for his physician, and made him many very valuable presents. Gabriel soon after cured Jaasar of another disorder, by which he acquired no small degree of reputation. One of Al Rashîd's concubines stretching out her hand, in yawning, it immediately grew stiff, and remained extended in such a manner that she could not draw it back. Nor could the application of all sorts of liniments and unguents to it, as prescribed by the most able physicians of the court, relieve her. Gabriel, therefore, being recommended by Jaasar to her, he waited first upon the Khalif, and desired him to command her to appear publicly at his levee; which being done, he immediately approached her, and began, before the whole circle of courtiers, to undress her. This threw her into such confusion, that she made a violent effort with her whole body to prevent him; and, in the hurry and surprize this occasioned, seized upon the garment he seemed to be going to take off with the part affected: upon which, turning to the Khalif, he immediately cried out, "O emperor of the faithful, she is cured." Then she was ordered to move her hand upwards and downwards, backwards and forwards, and in all directions, several times; after which, she found the use of it perfectly restored. This not a little pleased Al Rashîd, who thereupon made Gabriel a present of 500,000 pieces of money. He also desired to know what might be the cause of so strange and unaccountable a disorder. To which Gabriel replied, that, during the time of coition, a thin humour, being agitated by the motion and extension of heat, attending this, had diffused itself over all parts of her body, and, upon the sudden cessation of that motion, was congealed in the interior part of the nerves; which had obliged him to make use of the foregoing artifice, in order to dilate the heat, dissolve the humour that was congealed, and restore a perfect soundness to the limb whose use had been lost. This answer wonderfully pleased the Khalif, and procured the doctor that prince's perpetual esteem. At this time, Al Rashîd had likewise for his physician Tobana, or Yabya Ebn Masawiyah, a Syrian, of the Christian religion, who, at the Khalif's request, interpreted, or explained, the writings of the antient physicians, and served him and his successors in the same capacity till the reign of Al Motawakkel. He was greatly honoured at Baghdâd, and composed several physical treatises in a very elegant style. He likewise founded a sort of school, or gymnasium, there, wherein he instructed his scholars, or young students, who were very numerous, in every branch of literature, but especially physic. He was a person of considerable humour, and several of his facetious sayings have been preserved by Abu'l Faraj. Contemporary with this Yabya was Saleb Ebn Nabala, an Indian, who performed several remarkable cures, and made no mean figure at Al Rashîd's court. But for a farther account of this physician, as well as of Gabriel, Bakhtishua's son, our readers may have recourse to the author last-mentioned, who, in that point, will give them full and ample satisfaction <sup>n</sup>.

The same year, that is, the 175th of the Hejra, Al Rashîd declared Mohammed Al Amîn Al Amîn his immediate successor, according to Abu Jaasar Al Tabari; tho' that event seems to have been placed three years higher by Abu'l Faraj. The poet Salem Al Hâshber made some verses <sup>a</sup> on this occasion, which highly pleased Al Amîn's mother Zebeida, the grand-daughter of the Khalif Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr; who thereupon ordered him many valuable presents. We are told likewise, that Zebeida founded this very year the city of Tauris, in the province of Aderbijân, as her husband had before done another, from him named Harûnia, on the confines of Cilicia, Syria, and Armenia. About the same time, some disputes, that had arisen between Heshâm, the western Khalif, and his brother Abd'allah, were terminated, by the retreat of the latter, who passed over the sea into Africa; which restored peace and tranquillity to the Moslem provinces in Spain <sup>o</sup>.

extinguished.

THE next year, being the 176th of the Mohammedan æra, beginning April 29th, 792, Yabya Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Hasan Ebn Husein Ebn Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb set up for himself, in <sup>b</sup> opposition to the Khalif Harûn Al Rashîd, in the province of Deylam, and raised a powerful army to support him in his defection. To extinguish this rebellion, Harûn sent an army of 50,000 men, under the command of Fadl Ebn Yabya Ebn Khâled Ebn Bermac, whom he had appointed to preside over Ray, or Raya, Jorjân, Al Jebâl, in the Persian Irâk, and Tabaristân. Fadl, being arrived in Khorasân, wrote a kind letter to Yabya, and persuaded him to submit to the Khalif; who, upon Fadl's application to him, promised to take him into his protection. Upon which, Yabya disbanded his troops, and went with Fadl to Baghdâd; where he at first met with a gracious reception from Al Rashîd, but was afterwards put in irons, and closely confined. The same year, the Khalif removed Mûsa Ebn Isa Ebn Mûsa from the government of Egypt, and appointed Ibrahim Ebn Saleh Ebn Ali Al Hâshemi to suc- <sup>c</sup>ceed him in that post. It may be proper to inform our readers here, that Deylam was bounded on the E. by the region of Tabaristân and the district of Ray; on the S. by the districts of Ray, and Kazwîn, and the province of Aderbijân; on the W. by Aderbijân; and on the N. by the Hyrcanian sea. It is divided into two parts, one of which is mountainous, going properly under the name of Deylam, and the other almost one continued plain, known at this time by the name of Ghilân. The inhabitants of this province are called Dolomites by Procopius, and Dilinmites by Cedrenus. But, for a more copious description of it, our curious and learned readers may consult the authors here referred to <sup>p</sup>.

Khalif Heshâm's exploits
in the year

IN the 177th year of the Hejra, the Khalif made Amru Ebn Makhrân governor of Egypt, in the room of Ibrahim Ebn Saleh, whom he thought fit to depose; but, in a month's time, <sup>d</sup> restored him to his former post. However, Ibrahim seems to have been not a little affected with his disgrace, the reason of which has not been handed down to us, as he died soon after. Abd'allah Ebn Zabar Ebn Almeit, who came after him, was soon removed, and succeeded by Ishak Ebn Solimân Al Hâshemi, whom Al Rashîd sent to preside over Egypt. In the month of September this year, a body of the imperial forces advanced to Tarsus in Cilicia, with an intent to invade the Moslem territories; but were obliged to retire from thence the following month, without accomplishing their design. Abd'almâlec, one of Heshâm's generals in Spain, likewise marched at the head of a formidable army as far as the cities of Narbonne, or Narbonna, and Girona, made himself master of them, as well as of all the other places of strength situated between them and the Moslem frontiers, and acquired such a <sup>e</sup> large quantity of plunder in this expedition, that the fifth part of it, which fell to Heshâm's share, amounted to the value of 45,000 dinârs. With this that prince finished the great mosque at Corduba, which had been founded by his father; and obliged the Christian inhabitants of the country he had conquered, and many others of their brethren settled in the neighbouring provinces, to whom he was grown extremely terrible, to carry materials for that purpose to Corduba, where he then resided. Heshâm also erected several new mosques, and repaired some old ones that were falling to ruin, in other places. He likewise built the famous bridge at Corduba, that remained as a monument of his magnificence for several ages. This prince consulting a skilful astrologer, in order to know the length and fortune of his reign, he was told by the artist, that he should not preside over the Moslems of Spain <sup>f</sup> eight complete years; but that his Khalîfat there should be prosperous, and he always prove superior to his enemies. This prediction at first greatly affected Heshâm, who remained silent for some time after it was delivered, though he amply rewarded the astrologer for the trouble he had given him. He afterwards also applied himself to the exercise of all political virtues, administered justice to the poor with so much impartiality, and treated the people in general, both Moslems and Christians, that he governed, with such affability and beneficence, that he was almost adored by the whole body of his subjects. He first invaded Galicia in the 175th year of the Hejra, where he then committed dreadful devastations; but, on his return home, was met and attacked by Veremund, or Bermudo, though with what a success we are not told by any good author. Some of the Spanish writers, however, inform us, that, after the reduction of Narbone, Girona, and the other places above-mentioned, he made an irruption into Biscay and Asturias, laying waste all the country through which he moved; but that at last he received a signal overthrow from the forces commanded by Alphonfus, or Alonzo, II. who drove him from thence with the slaughter of 70,000 men. It must nevertheless be owned, that this last article has not been so much as mentioned by any of the most authentic Arab historians <sup>a</sup>.

THE following year, being the 178th of the Hejra, Al Rashîd ordered Ishak Ebn Solimân Al Hâshemi to retire from Egypt, and made Hazima Ebn Ayan his lieutenant there. But Hazima did not long remain in possession of that honourable post; being soon after banished by the Khalîf into Africa. He was succeeded by Abd'almâlec Ebn Saleh Ebn Ali Al Hâshemi, who appointed Abd'allah Ebn Al Mosabbib to collect the tribute imposed on those who refused to profess Islâm, and the customs there, and on some occasions to officiate for him in the mosque. We must not forget to remark, that when Mûsa Ebn Isa Ebn Mûsa Al Hâshemi was governor of Egypt, he repaired and enlarged the great mosque at Mesr, and put it into the form wherein it remained to the time of Euty chius. It appears from Theophanes, that some commotions happened in Armenia; and that the people of that country delivered the fortrefs of Camach, or Kamakb, into the hands of the Arabs, the present year <sup>b</sup>.

THE next year, being the 179th of the Hejra, Al Rashîd consulted all the principal doctors of the law at Baghdâd, to know whether he was obliged to undertake a journey on foot to Mecca, in consequence of a vow he had formerly made. That prince being in great perplexity and distress, and even almost overwhelmed with the afflictions he found himself obliged to sustain in the Khalîfat of his brother Al Hâdi, vowed to perform the pilgrimage to Mecca on foot, if it should please God ever to deliver him out of those troubles. However, after his elevation to the Khalîfat, many of his courtiers remonstrated to him, that he was under no obligation to visit the Caaba in the manner he had proposed. Upon which, he thought fit to apply to the aforesaid doctors for their decision in so momentous a point; and they being unanimously of opinion, that his former vow was obligatory, he set out from Baghdâd for Mecca, went on pilgrimage thither, and returned to his capital on foot, this present year; which was never afterwards performed by any future Khalîf, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari. We are likewise told, that the roads through which he passed were covered with rich carpets, and a variety of stuffs of very considerable price. About the same time, Al Rashîd also appointed his brother Abd'allah Ebn Al Mobdi, after the dismissal of Abd'almâlec Ebn Saleh, to preside over Egypt; but, in a short time, he removed him from that post, and substituted Mûsa Ebn Isa Al Hâshemi in his room <sup>c</sup>.

THE same year, that is, the 179th of the Moslem æra, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, tho' others are of a different opinion, died Abu Abd'allah Mâlec Ebn Ans Al Asbehi Al Medini, the founder of the second orthodox sect, who is said to have paid great regard to the traditions of Mohammed. He went amongst the Arabs by the name of the Imâm of the city of the flight, as he was a native of Medina. He was born in the year of the Hejra 90, 93, 94, or 95, (for so much do the Moslem writers differ about the year of his birth) and consequently attained to a very old age. Some of those writers pretend, that he was three whole years in his mother's womb. In his last illness, a friend going to visit him, found him in tears, and asking him the reason of it, he answered, "How should I not weep; and who has more reason to weep than I? Would to God that for every question decided by me, according to my own opinion, I had received so many stripes! then would my accounts be easier. Would to God I had never given any decision of my own!" Al Ghazâlî thinks it a sufficient proof of Mâlec's directing his knowledge to the glory of God, that, being once asked his opinion as to forty-eight questions, his answer to thirty-two of them, was, that he did not know; it being no easy matter for one who has any other view than God's glory, to make so frank a confession of his ignorance. A certain person having once demanded of him whether it was lawful to use a porpoise, or sea-hog, for food, he answered in the negative; and, in support of his decision, observed, that, tho' it was really a fish, yet the name it bore made it pass for a hog, which every Moslem was absolutely forbidden to eat. Nor is this to be wondered at; the imposition of names being, according to a tradition that prevails amongst the Mohammedans, of divine original. It may not be improper to observe, that the doctrine of Mâlec is chiefly followed in Barbary and other parts of Africa. The Moslems of the west are said to have waged war with Alonso II. in Galicia, <sup>d</sup> this year, with very bad success; the forces of that prince having sallied out upon them from the mountains, intirely defeated them, cut many of them to pieces, taken a considerable number prisoners, and driven all the rest out of the province. Soon after which event, Heshâm departed this life, in conformity to the foregoing prediction, before he had completed the eighth year of his reign. He was succeeded by his son Hakem, who sat twenty-six years, ten months, and twenty days, upon the Moslem throne in Spain <sup>a</sup>.

In the 180th year of the Hejra, beginning March 16th, 796, Al Rashid removed Mîsa Ebn Isa Al Hâshemi from the government of Egypt, and made his brother Abd'allah Ebn Al Mohdi the lieutenant of that country a second time. He also entered the dominions of the Greek emperor either this or the following year, with a formidable army, took the city of Thebasa in Lycaonia, called Al Safsâf by some of the Arab writers, ravaged the neighbouring territory, in a dreadful manner, and then returned home with an immense quantity of plunder, and without having sustained any considerable loss. This year also, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, died Heshâm Ebn Abd'alrahmân, of the house of Ommiyah, and was succeeded by his son Hakem Ebn Heshâm in the kingdom, or Khalifat, erected by the Moslems in Spain. Hakem, or Al Hakem, was a prince of great prudence and resolution, and attended in most of his enterprizes with good success. His guards du corps, or life-guards, consisted of 5000 men, 3000 of which, if we will believe Roderic of Toledo, were renegado's, and 2000 of them eunuchs. Part of them were destined for the defence of his person, and other part he placed as a garison in his capital city. He caused justice to be impartially administered to the poorest of his subjects, brought even the greatest to condign punishment for their crimes, and was extremely charitable, liberal, and munificent. We must not omit observing, that the Khalif Harûn Al Rashid excessively regretted the death of Mâlec Ebn Ans, for whom he always entertained the most perfect esteem. That prince one day desiring Mâlec to come to the palace, in order to instruct his sons, the Moslem doctor answered, "Knowledge will not wait upon any person, but is itself to be waited upon." "You are in the right of it," said Harûn; "and therefore they shall attend you in the place to which other children resort for the benefit of your instruction." And he was as good as his word; for he sent them constantly to the public mosque, where many of his subjects children met for the same purpose, to receive the documents of this celebrated sage. Mâlec is reported to have said, that all the masters, whose scholar he had been in his younger years, came to learn of him before their death. The funeral service was performed over him, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, by one of his disciples, or followers, named Ebn Abu Dawib <sup>b</sup>.

The occurrences of the year 181;

THE following year, being the 181st of the Hejra, commencing March 5th, 797, the Khalif recalled his brother Abd'allah Ebn Al Mohdi from Egypt, and sent Ismael Ebn Saleh thither to take the government of that country upon him. About this time, dirhems were struck in the mint that had been set up at Saurai, Sarai, or Sariyah, a very considerable city (A) of Tabaristân, or Tabrestân; one of them coined there the preceding year having been discovered on the coast of the Baltick, not far from Dantzick, in the year 1722. On one side are seen the following words, In the city of Saurai, one hundred and eighty; i. e. Coined in that city, in the 180th year of the Hejra; which answers to part of the years of CHRIST 796, and 797. The reverse exhibits the following inscription, MOHAMMED is the apostle of God, may God be propitious to him, and make him happy! In the Khalifat of AL RASHID JAAFAR. Hence we learn (which not a little enhances the value of this dirhêm) that the Khalif Harûn Al Rashid was surnamed Jaafar, as well as Abu Jaafar and Al Rashid; which cannot be inferred from any of the Arab historians, nor even any of the oriental writers that have supplied M. D'Herlelot with materials for his very valuable work. M. Kebr imagines, that a great number of those pieces were struck in the 180th year of the Hejra by Al Rashid, before he set out from Baghdâd on his expedition against the Greeks, and put into the military chest, in order to animate the soldiery, and induce them to distinguish themselves in an <sup>c</sup> <sup>d</sup> <sup>e</sup> <sup>f</sup>

(A) Some of our learned readers may perhaps take this city, of which M. Kebr has given us no manner of account, to have been either Saura in Mesopotamia, not far from Amid, the Amida of the antients, or the Sourâ of Abu'lfeda, placed by that author between Baghdâd and Cûfa. However, as nothing relative to the situation of the place where the mint was erected can be collected from the coin, we shall pronounce nothing peremptorily on this head (1).

a extraordinary manner; in which, perhaps, he may not be very remote from truth. According to Theophanes, the Arabs received a notable overthrow this year from the Greeks, at no great distance from Ephesus; but the Arab historians have not taken the least notice of this action, of which even the Greek author himself has handed down to us very few particulars. Solimán and Abd'allah, who had been driven by their brother Heshám into Africa, having been apprized of that prince's death, and of his son Al Hakem's accession to the crown, assembled about this time a body of troops, to dispute the western Khalifat with the latter, and made the necessary dispositions for returning into Spain <sup>w</sup>.

THE next year, being the 182d of the Hejra, Al Rashíd appointed Al Leit Ebn Al Fadl, and of the one of his servants, to preside over Egypt. Not long after, the Khalíf sent an ambassador, <sup>year 182.</sup>

b with magnificent presents, to the court of Charlemagne, or Charles the Great, king of France, and emperor of the west, who was admitted to an audience at a place between Vercell, or Vercelli, and Ivrea, the Vercellæ and Eporedia of the antients, and received with great marks of distinction by that prince. It seems to appear from Theophanes, that the Arabs made an impression, about this time, upon the imperial territories, and penetrated as far as Amorium in Phrygia with a very considerable force; but they were soon obliged to retire from thence, if we will believe this author, with some prisoners they had taken, and without having effected any thing of note. We are told by Roderic of Toledo, that Solimán and Abd'allah landed with a body of troops in Spain, and fixed their head-quarters at Valencia, in order to drive their nephew Al Hakem from thence, about the present year. The Moslem empire consisted now of the extensive provinces of Syria, Palestine, Arabia, Persia, Armenia, Natolia, Media, or Adherbiján, Babylonia, Affyria, Sindia, Sijistán, Khorasán, Tabrestán, Jorján, Zablestán, or Sablestán, Mawarâ'lnahr, or Great Bukhâria, Egypt, Libya, Mauritania, and others, that rendered it the most formidable and puissant state in the world. The Moslems were likewise now in possession of most of the provinces of Spain, together with some part of France; tho' the prince that presided over them there seems to have been independent on Al Rashíd, who might, at this juncture, with great propriety, have been stiled the Khalíf of the east <sup>x</sup>.

IN the 183d year of the Hejra, beginning February 12th, 799, the Khákán sent a numerous army through the Caspian straits, called by the Arabs Bâbalabwâb, or the gate of gates, <sup>The Khákán makes an irruption into the Khalíf's territories.</sup> to make an irruption into the Moslem territories. These hostilities were committed against the Khalíf by the Khákán, in order to revenge his daughter's death; who, having been betrothed to Fadl Ebn Yahya Ebn Khâled Ebn Barmac, and coming to Bartha'a, to be married to him, died there a natural death: upon which, the retinue that attended her returned home, and gave out, though without the least appearance of truth, that she was privately destroyed. This greatly incensing the Khákán, that prince's forces, by his order, entered Mawarâ'lnahr, put a vast number of the Khalíf's subjects in that province to the sword, and carried off above 100,000 of them prisoners. Either this or the following year one of Al Rashíd's generals, called Abimelech by Theophanes, with a body of troops ravaged the provinces of Cappadocia and Galatia: upon which, a negotiation was set on foot between <sup>e</sup> the Khalíf and the empress Irene, for an accommodation between the two powers; but without effect. Towards the close of the present year, Mûsa Ebn Jaafar Ebn Mohammed Ebn Hosein Ebn Ali Ebn Abu Táleb, who had been imprisoned at Baghdád, was put to death in the prison where he had been confined, by Al Rashíd's order. He left eighteen sons and twenty-three daughters behind him, and was buried in the western, or old, city of Baghdád. About this time, Solimán and Abd'allah assembled their forces at Valencia, and had several brisk rencounters with some parties and detachments of Al Hakem's troops; tho' nothing decisive happened, during the course of it, in Spain <sup>y</sup>.

IN the 184th, or 185th, year of the Mohammedan æra, Abimelech made another irruption <sup>The Christians defeated by the Arabs, and Al Hakem obtains a complete victory in Spain.</sup> with a body of light-armed troops into the imperial territories, and penetrated to Mangana. From thence he sent a detachment to the stables of Stauracius, which carried off the horses there, and one in particular that the empress Irene herself sometimes used. Another body of the Arabs fell into Lydia, where they committed terrible depredations, and returned home loaded with booty. A third body of troops of the same nation attacked the imperial forces commanded by Peter, a patrician, put them to flight, and made themselves masters of all their baggage, provisions, and military stores. The Christians suffered extremely in the action; Theophanes seeming to intimate, that a vast number of their men, and amongst them many officers of note, were killed upon the spot. In the 184th year of the Hejra, the Khalif Harûn Al Rashid, according to Ebn Shohnah, likewise sent Ibrahim Ebn Aglab into the western part of Africa, to take upon him the government of a tract of very considerable extent there. About the same time, Al Hakem gave his uncles battle, and overthrew them with incredible slaughter. Solimân, one of them, was killed upon the spot; and Abd'allah, the other, with great difficulty made his escape to Valencia, where he was shut up by the victor's troops. This memorable battle, fought in the 184th year of the Hejra, if we will believe Roderic, so often cited here, determined the fate of Spain <sup>a</sup>.

An account of Samarkand,
where some dirhems were struck in 801.

THE next year, being the 185th of the Hejra, commencing January 21st, 801, some dirhems were struck in the mint erected at Samarkand; one of which was found not far from Dantzick, in the year 1722. Samarkand, the capital of Mawara'nabr, seems to be the Maracanda of the antients, said by Arrian to be the metropolis of the Sogdians, and is placed by Ebn Hawkel, or Ebn Hawkal, on the southern bank of the river Sogd. It has always been esteemed as one of the most renowned cities of Asia, being situated in a most delightful tract, denominated the Sogd of Samarkand, on a considerable river, that runs through the town; and twelve parasangs in circumference; at least its walls were of that extent in the time of Soltân Mobammed Khowarazm Shâh, before it was reduced by Jenghîz Khân. From the charming plain, considered by the orientals as one of the four Tempe's of Asia, in the southern part of which this city is situated, and going under the name of the Sogd, i. e. the plain, or valley, of Samarkand, the province in which it stands was called Sogdiana by the antients. The people of the country have a tradition, that this capital was founded by one of the princes of the tribe of Hamyar, settled in Taman, that had the general title of Tobba, or successor, tho' they do not take upon them to determine with any precision the time of its foundation; and, in support of this tradition, they pretend, that an inscription, written in the old Hamyaritic character, was dug up near one of the gates of Samarkand. If this be admitted by the learned, they must likewise allow, that the kingdom of the Hamyarites was formed of several very extensive provinces; the city of Samarkand being, according to Al Berjendi, the geographer, about 1000 parasangs distant from that of Sanaa, the metropolis of Taman. Khondemir and the author of the Leb Tarikh, or Lobb Al Tawârikh, write, that the castle of Samarkand was built by Kishtash, the son of Lorasp, Lobrâsp, or Loborasp, king of Persia, of the second dynasty, called the dynasty of Kay, or the Kayanians; who likewise erected a wall 120 parasangs long, that inclosed the district of Samarkand, and defended it from the courses of the people of Tûrân, or Turkestan. But, notwithstanding this, there is some reason to believe that this city was founded by Alexander the Great; at least if we will pay any regard to the authority of Yakût Ebn Abd'allah, the Syrian geographer. Some authors relate, that the Moslems first made themselves masters of Samarkand, under the conduct of Katiba Ebn Mōslem, in the 88th year of the Hejra, and not the 85th, as we find asserted by M. D'Herbelot; but others believe, that they first reduced that place in the 93d year of the Mohammedan æra, the very year in which Tarif begun his conquests in Spain. It fell afterwards into the hands of the Soltâns, or Khâns, of Khowarazm, and was taken and pillaged by Jenghîz Khân in the year of the Hejra 617. But Timûr Beg, or Timûr Bek, the Tamerlan of the Europeans, restored it, rendered it more flourishing than ever, and made it the seat of his empire in the year of the Hejra 771. After which, it continued to be the residence of his descendants, till they were driven from thence by the Uzbeks, who have remained in possession of it to this day. If Samarkand answers to the Maracanda of the antients, as the affinity between those two names may render something probable, it could not well have been founded by Alexander the Great; since Maracanda was demolished by that prince, as we learn from Strabo. Adjacent to this city, denominated Samaul Han, Sa-ma-ban, and sometimes Han, by the Chinese, is the little hill Cubac, that supplies the inhabitants with large quantities of stones, out of its bowels, with which the streets of Samarkand are paved. The plain, or valley, in the language of this country Sogd, is, according to some modern travellers, about eight days journey in length, and stretches itself out from the district of Bokbâra to the confines of Al Botom; beginning above twenty parasangs above Samarkand. It is composed intirely of most beautiful gardens, and verdant meads; the former of which the neighbouring rivers perpetually refresh with their salutary irrigations. The walls of this city, being twelve parasangs in circumference, had formerly twelve iron-gates, a parasang distant from each other, and between every two of them a centry was posted. The tops of these walls were adorned with galleries and towers, which rendered the place likewise more capable of sustaining a siege. The inner or interior city had four gates only, contained the citadel and other public buildings, and was watered by a river, carried through leaden pipes into the foss or ditch, that entered the <sup>b</sup> <sup>c</sup> <sup>d</sup> <sup>e</sup> <sup>f</sup>

- a town near the gate of Kash. In the days of Ramisso, it was as big as Cairo, or Al Kalirak, the metropolis of Egypt, and could at that time send into the field a body of 60,000 horse. The religions formerly tolerated here were the Christian, as professed by the Nestorians, the Mohammedan, the Magian, and the Sabian; the two last of which have been absurdly confounded by M. Kehr. It stands about seven days journey north of the city of Bokhâra, and falls short at present of being so splendid as in times past; though it is still very large and populous. It is fortified with strong bulwarks of earth, and its buildings are in much the same condition as those of the city of Bokhâra, excepting that more of its houses consist of stone, which is brought from some quarries about the town. The beautiful silk paper made at Samarkand is looked upon to be the best in Asia, and is much esteemed all over the east. The academy of sciences, that flourishes here, is at present one of the most famous seats of literature amongst the Mohammedans. Amongst the learned men produced by this city may be ranked the following: Shams-addin Mohammed Ebn Asbruf Al Hoseini, who wrote some observations concerning the method to be used in disputations, as also concerning figures and the elements of geometry, in Arabic, together with a recension of the commentaries upon the Korân; Abu Ahmed Mohammed Ebn Mohammed Al Omari, who penned a treatise in Arabic upon the art of disputing; Abu'l Kasem, who composed a book upon the deliverance of the mind from error; Mohammed Ebn Mahmûd Ebn Mohammed, who published a treatise in Arabic upon the various readings of the Korân; a MS. copy of which work is said to have been brought out of the east by Signore Pietro Della Valle, a Roman nobleman, and to be still extant at Rome, by Father Marracci; Abu'l Leiths Nasr Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ibrahim, who wrote a commentary upon the Korân, a piece, intitled, Singular cases and allegations of law, Thesaurus Jurisprudentiæ, a beautiful copy of which is preserved in the duke of Sax-Gotha's magnificent library, The instruction of the ignorant, a collection of moral histories, and a treatise bearing the title of Instruction preparatory to prayer; all which were composed and written in Arabic; Rocn-addin Mohammed, a famous lawyer and civilian, as well as the author last-mentioned, who published an Indian philosophical and magical book in Arabic, at Kanuti, or Kanuthi, a city of India, where Soltân Ali Mîrza, of the line of Tamerlan, reigned. To this piece he prefixed the title of The cistern of life. Nâjibaddin Mohammed Ebn Ali, who penned a book, intitled, Synopsis medicinæ practicæ, treating of the causes, symptoms, and cure, of all diseases; Imâm Dawlat Shâh Ebn Alâo'd-dawla Bakhti Shâh Al Ghafi, who wrote the lives of twenty Arabic and six Persian poets. The famous poet Al Nassafi, who composed 2660 distichs upon all the chapters of the Sonna, likewise died at Samarkand. The celebrated lawyer Abu Abd'allah Mohammed Ebn Ismael, born at Bukhâra, or Bokhâra, the capital of the proper Bukhâria, and from thence surnamed Al Bokhâri, who collected the oral traditions of Mohammed, that had been propagated by his followers, and reduced them to a sort of system, fled also from the fury of his enemy into the castle of Kbertenk at Samarkand. This piece has always been intitled by the orientals Al Sahib Al Bokhâri. A most antient, elegant, and rare, MS. copy of it may be seen in the public library at Leipsick, said to have been written in the year of our LORD 1398.
- e The language spoken at Samarkand is a dialect of the Persic, though the Arabic and Mongalico-Tartarian tongues are likewise there very well understood. The Tartars of Bukhâria, or the Uzbeks, now in possession of Samarkand, which was taken from the descendants of Tamerlan by their ancestors, under the conduct of Shaibek Khân, in the year of our LORD 1517, are very fond of learned men, especially those that come amongst them from foreign parts, and greatly admire the calligraphy of the Persians. This M. Kehr learned from M. Justus Samuel Scharfschmid, who had been chaplain to a regiment at Terki, and frequently conversed with the Tartars of Bukhâria. The Uzbeks inhabiting this tract are said to be extremely handsome; for which reason, Arabshah, in his history of Timûr, calls the men moons, and the women suns. They are vastly clean and neat in their attire; and their turbants are looked upon by the people of Aleppo as the finest and most elegant of any in the east. The Bukhârian merchants resort in great numbers to the marts of Syria, and import into that country very considerable quantities of most excellent silk, gold, and other valuable commodities; taking in return cloth, iron, and English tin. The district of Samarkand also supplies Persia, and the territories of the Great Mogul with pears, apples, raisins, and melons, which it produces in surprizing plenty, of a most exquisite and delicious taste. As the province of Mawarâ'nabr has no particular Khân, the castle of Samarkand falls insensibly to ruin. When the Khân of Great Bukhâria comes in the summer to pass some months at Samarkand, he usually incamps in the meadows near the town. The river here, which falls into the Amû about the 92° of longitude, would be of prodigious service to the place, by opening a communication with the neighbouring countries, if the inhabitants had but the industry to make it navigable. Samarkand stands about seven days journey of Khojandab, a city of Mawarâ'nabr, situated upon the Sibân, or the Jaxartes, in a northern direction, and five east of Ofrushanab, one of the principal cities of Mawarâ'nabr.

nabr. Hence it came to pass, that Arabshah placed it between two rivers, that is to say, the Jibûn and the Sibûn, or the Oxus and the Jaxartes. Its latitude has been determined by Ulugh Beigh, or Olugh Bek, to be  $39^{\circ} 17' 23''$ , though with more precision, by later astronomers,  $41^{\circ} 20'$ , and its longitude  $95^{\circ} 00'$ .<sup>a</sup>

of one of those dirhems.

THE dirhém above-mentioned, on the anterior part, exhibits the words, Be Samerkanda chamsen wathfamanina wameaten; that is, In Samarkand, the 185th year; and on the reverse, Mohammedon resûlô'llahi wakkelfatcho'l Emirol' Amîno Mohammedon Ebno'l Emiri l'mo'mennia Jaafara, i. e. Mohammed is the apostle of God, and the Emir Al Amîn Mohammed, the son of Jaafar, prince of the faithful, is his successor. This dirhém, therefore, seems to have been struck by the citizens of Samarkand in honour of Al Amîn, who had before been declared his father's immediate successor, and was this very year acknowledged to have arrived at his majority, according to the custom of the orientals, when he was fifteen years old, and of age to govern the empire; as may very naturally, and without the least torture or violence, be inferred from the inscription preserved on this remarkable coin. As the inscription is written in the Cûfic character, the dirhém under consideration may not improbably have been one of the same sort with those that had Cûfic letters inscribed upon them, and were found, according to Arabshah, in the ruins of old Samarkand. Be that as it will, this dirhém apparently takes notice of a fact that has not been clearly and explicitly mentioned by any of the Moslem historians.<sup>b</sup>

divides the government of his dominions
three sons.

IN the 186th year of the Hejra, beginning January 10th, 802, the Khalif Harûn Al Rashîd performed another pilgrimage to Mecca; which proved very expensive to him. After the performance of all the prescribed ceremonies at Mecca, he went to Medina, and distributed large sums of money in alms amongst the poorer inhabitants of both those cities. He also called his son Al Kasem to the succession, after Al Mamûn, and surnamed him Al Mutaman. After this, he is said, by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari and Khondemir, to have divided the government of his extensive dominions amongst his three sons in the following manner: To Al Amîn, the eldest of them, he assigned the government of the provinces of Syria, Irâk, the three Arabia's, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Palestine, Egypt, and all that part of Africa conquered by his predecessors, extending from the confines of Egypt and Ethiopia to the straits of Gibraltar, with the dignity of Khalif; to Al Mamûn, the second, that of Persia, Kermân, the Indies, Khorasân, Tabrestân, Cablestân, and Zablestân, or Sablestân, together with the vast province of Mawarâ'nahr; and to his third son Al Kasem, Armenia, Natolia, Forjân, Georgia, Circassia, or Tcherkassia, and all the Moslem territories bordering upon the Euxine sea. With regard to the order of succession, it has been already observed, that Al Amîn was to mount the throne after his father, Al Mamûn after him, and then Al Kasem Al Mutaman. About this time, Al Hakem forgave his only surviving uncle Abd'allah, permitted him to reside in the city of Valencia, settled upon him a pension of 1000 dinârs a month, engaged to make him an annual present of 5000 more, graciously received his sons, and gave one of them his own sister in marriage; by which means, peace and tranquillity were intirely restored to the Moslem conquests in Spain.<sup>c</sup>

The house of
graced.

THE following year, being the 187th year of the Hejra, commencing December 30th, 802, Al Rashîd put his favourite Jaafar Ebn Yakya Ebn Khâled Ebn Barmak to death; for which different reasons have been assigned by different authors. Some pretend, that when the Khâlif was determined to incarcerate Yakya Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Hasan Ebn Hosein Ebn Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, he committed him to the care of Jaafar, who suffered him to make his escape by night, and even sent a person with him to conduct him to Fâmîa; which being resented by Al Rashîd, tho' he at first seemed to approve of what Jaafar had done, it was the principal cause of his destruction. Others say, that the Khâlif being so vastly fond both of Jaafar and his own sister Abbâsa, that he could not long be absent from either of them, in order to enjoy their company and conversation together with the less inconvenience to them, he gave her in marriage to him; permitting him to look upon her as much as he pleased, but injoining him never to touch her. Notwithstanding which injunction, Jaafar, being once drunk, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, or rather both of them being young, as is observed by Abu'l Faraj, lay with her, and got her with child.<sup>d</sup>

After

- a After the expiration of the usual term, she was brought to bed of twins; which Jaafar sent to Mecca, in order to avoid the fury and resentment of Al Rashid. But the Khalif being soon acquainted with what had happened, ordered Jaafar's head to be cut off, sent his brother Al Fadl, and his father Yabya, to prison at Al Rakka, where they remained till the day of their death, and commanded his sister Abbasa, who had likewise been confined, together with her two children, to be thrown alive into a well, which was afterwards filled up; tho' he is said to have shed tears a little before this command was carried into execution. Others relate that the Khalif ordered Jaafar to be beheaded, because he had built a house that cost him 20,000 dinars; which his master considered as an evident proof of his having
- b embezzled the public money; and, lastly, others affirm, that Al Rashid having taken a dislike to the house of Barmac, and being afraid of Jaafar and his father Yabya, as having imparted to them all his secrets, he found himself obliged to treat them in the foregoing manner. But whatever was the motive to this surprizing conduct, Jaafar was executed in the palace by Mafrur on Saturday, in the month of Al Meberram, by the Khalif's order, when he had scarce completed the 37th year of his age. Nor could his mother, tho' she had been Al Rashid's nurse, prevail upon the Khalif to release her husband Yabya, and her other son Al Fadl, who had been Harun's counsellors during the space of seventeen years, from their confinement; he persisting inflexibly in his intention to depress that once favourite family, which was now become the object of his aversion, and having written to all the
- c governors of provinces to confiscate the effects belonging to every member of it, that should be found in any part of his dominions. It may not be improper to inform our readers here, that the Barmacide, or Barmecide, called by the Arabs Baramaca, or Barameca, were one of the most illustrious families of the east, being originally descended, according to some authors, from the ancient kings of Persia; tho, if we will pay any regard to the sentiments of Al Zamakhshari, they deduced their origin from the city of Balkh. This writer relates, that the first of this family erected the stately and magnificent mosque at Balkh, called Neu Bahar; which name, in Persic, signifies new spring, or new garden; and that they constructed this noble edifice upon the model of the temple at Mecca. The outside of it, in imitation of what was done to the exterior part of the Caaba, they covered with rich damask, and surrounded the whole with 360 chapels, into which the pilgrims, of whom there was a vast
- d concourse here, usually retired, in order to perform their devotions. As the founders were the proper intendants, or keepers, of this temple, and considered that post as inseparably connected, by the right of patronage, with their family, they assumed from thence the name of Barmac, or Barmec, and ever afterwards retained both the title and the name. A certain author, however, of considerable note in the east, has not scrupled to deduce the appellation of Barmac from a different source <sup>d</sup>.

- THE first who gave a very remarkable lustre to this family, which most eminently distinguished it from many others that had before made a much more considerable figure, was the
- e afore said Yabya Ebn Khaled, named at length Abu Ali Yabya Ebn Khaled Ebn Barmac, a person endued with all civil and military virtues, and chosen by the Khalif Al Mohdi for governor to his son Harun Al Rashid. He had four sons, Fadl, Jaafar, Mohammed, and Musa, who by no means degenerated from their father's virtues, but raised the glory and reputation of their house to the highest pitch. It may not be amiss to remark, that, after this illustrious family had been abandoned by fortune, and fallen under the Khalif's displeasure, the people had a more lively sense than ever of the important services the members of it had done them. The exalted merit and excellent qualities of those great men then appeared in a stronger light than even when they were in the zenith of their power; insomuch that, in after-ages, they found almost as many historians to celebrate their virtues, and write their lives, as did the greatest conquerors and most powerful princes
- f of the east <sup>e</sup>.

THE elevated sentiments their cotemporaries entertained of their rare and uncommon merit, in some measure appears from the following remarkable story, which has been handed down to us by a Persian historian. The Khalif Harun Al Rashid, after he had disgraced the house of Barmac, forbade his subjects ever to mention that family, upon pain of death, on any occasion. But, notwithstanding this, an old man, named Mondir, placed himself one day upon an eminence, that served him for a sort of pulpit, opposite to one of their houses, then deserted, where he entertained all that passed by with a detail of the finest and most amiable actions of those great men; making upon them a panegyric in form. The Khalif, being apprized of his boldness, ordered the man to be brought before him, and condemned him to die for treating with such contempt his prohibition. Mondir received <sup>a</sup> his sentence with pleasure, and only desired leave to speak two words to the Khalif before his execution. This being granted, the two words he mentioned were drawn out into a long discourse; in which he insisted upon the obligations he was under to the family of Barmac with such force, that the Khalif heard him without impatience, was touched with his words, and did not only give him his life, but likewise made him a present of a very rich gold plate, that he himself used. But the most surprizing part of the old man's conduct is still behind. Having received this valuable present from the Khalif's own hand, and being, according to the eastern custom, prostrate on the ground, he said, by way of acknowledgement, to his munificent benefactor, See here a new favour that I have received from the house of Barmac! Which words were so remarkable, that they afterwards passed into a proverb, <sup>b</sup> current in every part of Asia, according to the report of the same historian <sup>f</sup>.

THO' almost all the members of the family, of which we have been giving our readers here some account, as well as their domestics, and other dependents, were involved in the common destruction, yet Mokammed Ebn Yahya did not meet with the least molestation, nor receive even the slightest injury in the minutest particular. From whence it appears, that his conduct gave no manner of umbrage to the Khalif, and consequently that he was not affected by the cause, whatever it might have been, that produced the foregoing alteration in that prince's disposition towards the race of Barmac. With regard to Yahya himself, he is said, by some authors, to have died in prison at Al Rakka, in the year of the Hejra 196, and, by others, in the 193d year of that æra. As for Jaafar, his son, after Mafrûr had <sup>c</sup> struck off his head, his body was cut in pieces, and a part of it fixed upon every one of the gates of Baghdâd. The head also, by the Khalif's order, was exposed to public view on the bridge over the Tigris, in the neighbourhood of that city <sup>e</sup>.

THE same year, that is, the 187th of the Hejra, Al Rashid received a letter from Nicephorus, soon after he had been advanced to the imperial dignity, commanding him to return all the money he had extorted from Irene, though this had been secured to him by the last treaty concluded with that princess, or to expect soon to see an imperial army in the heart of his dominions. This insolent letter so incensed the Khalif, that he immediately assembled his forces, and advanced to Heraclea; laying the country through which he moved waste with fire and sword. For some time, also, he kept that city straitly besieged; which so <sup>d</sup> terrified the Greek emperor, who was afraid lest the Arabs should over-run all the imperial provinces in Asia, that he submitted to pay an annual tribute to the Khalif. Upon this, Harûn granted him a peace, and returned with his army to Al Rakka. But a hard frost soon after happening in those parts, Nicephorus took for granted that the severity of the season would prevent Harûn from making him another visit, and therefore broke the preceding treaty. Of which the Khalif receiving advice, he instantly put himself again in motion, resumed the military operations, and, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, forced the emperor to accept of the terms prescribed him, and to pay the tribute that had formerly been imposed upon him. After which, he retired out of the Christian territories, and sent Ahmed Ebn Ismael Al Hâshemi as his lieutenant into Egypt. It appears <sup>e</sup> from a Persian historian, that Nicephorus, before hostilities commenced, made Harûn a present of several excellent swords, all which the Khalif cut in two with his famous sword Samsamab, as if they had been so many radishes, in the presence of the Greek ambassador, who brought them. This Samsamab was a sword that had fallen into Al Rashid's hands amongst the spoils of Ebn Dakikân, one of the last Hamyaritic princes of Yaman; but is said to have belonged originally to a valiant Arab, named Amru Ebn Maadi Carb, under whose name it generally went amongst the Moslems. By the present of the above-mentioned swords, Nicephorus gave Harûn plainly to understand, that he was more disposed to come to blows with him, than to pay him the tribute that had been exacted of Irene, whom he <sup>f</sup> succeeded in the empire. Some of the eastern writers inform us, that the Khalif, upon this provocation, immediately entered the enemy's frontiers, advanced to Heraclea, took that city, and even flew like an eagle to the very gates of Constantinople itself. The famous sword above-mentioned has been taken notice of by Ahmed Ebn Yusef and Al Jannâbi, in their history of the Hamyarites, as well as by other authors. There did not appear the least flaw in the blade, after the proof Harûn had made of it; which clearly evinced the strength of his arm, as well as the goodness of the sword. It is said, that Amru Ebn Maadi Carb once gave this sword to a certain prince, who complained that it did not produce the desired effect; upon which, that brave man took the liberty to tell him, that he had not sent him his arm with his sword <sup>h</sup>.

THE same year, as appears from one of them found on the coast of the Baltick in the year 1722, several dirbêms were struck at Balch, Balkhe, or Balkh, a city of Khorasân, or rather of Great Bukhâria, situated in the extremity of that province, at no very great distance from the source of the Jikûn, the Amû, or the Oxus, upon a fine river, sometimes denominated by the orientals the river of Balkh. The Persian historians attribute the foundation of this city to Kay-umarrâz, the first king of Persia, and say that he gave it the name of Balkh, because he met his brother upon the spot where it stood, after he had been lost a long time; balkhiden, or balghiden, in the Persian language, signifying to receive and embrace a friend. The first kings of Persia, who resided in the province of Media, or Adherbijân, considered this city, which was in Bactria, as one of their principal frontiers on the side of Scythia, and Loborâsp, Lorâsp, or Lobrâsp, having resigned his crown to his son Kishtâsp, or Hydaspes, made it the place of his retreat, and was afterwards killed by Afrasiab, the king of Turkestan. Hence it came to pass, that Yâkût Ebn Abd'allah, of Hamath in Syria, asserted Balkh to have been founded by this Lobrâsp about the time that Nebuchadnezzar destroyed Jerusalem; though there seems to be no foundation for such a notion. Some of the oriental writers make those two princes to have been the same person; and others pretend, that Lobrâsp conferred the government of Chaldea upon Nebuchadnezzar, whom they therefore consider as his viceroy, or lieutenant, there. The latter take Lobrâsp and Beloch, or Balokh, in the catalogue of Assyrian kings, to have been in reality the same prince, and suppose the last name to have been applied to him, because he fixed his residence at Balkh. Both the name and situation of this place clearly evince it to have been the Bactra of the antients. For, the city of Bactra, called likewise Zariaspa by Pliny and Strabo, was situated under mount Paropamisus, a part of mount Taurus, or Caucasus, on this side the Oxus, according to the old geographers. And that the city of Balkh is seated in a plain about four parasangs from a mountain, and has its suburbs washed by the river Dehâb, the Bactrus of Curtius, Pliny, Polyænus, and Strabo, which, after it has irrigated the gardens and fields in the neighbourhood of this place, discharges itself into the Amû, or the Oxus, about twelve parasangs from Balkh, we learn from Ebn Hawkâl, who had himself very attentively viewed the situation of this city. Nor can any thing be more common amongst the orientals than the promiscuous use and permutation of the letters L and R; from whence it will sufficiently appear, that Bactra and Balkh, Balkhe or Balch, are words extremely similar, if not altogether the same name. The notion here advanced may also be rendered still more probable by several additional considerations, with which we are supplied by Sbarîf Al Edrisî, or the Nubian geographer, Abu'lfeda, and other eastern writers. We say nothing here of the reduction of Bactra by Semiramis, 600 years before the death of Lorâsp, or Lobrâsp, mentioned by Diodorus Siculus; as this historical article intirely depends upon the authority of Ctesias, whom we have elsewhere demonstrated to be a fabulous writer. The fertility of the soil in the territory of Balkh, which, according to Abu'lfeda, was the metropolis of Khorasân, blessed with great plenty of water, and producing large quantities of sugar-canes, likewise very well answers to the surprizing fruitfulness of Bactria, in conformity to the description of that country handed down to us by the antients. The district of Balkh is moreover said to produce hyacinths and rubies, very beautiful to behold, several of which have found their way into Europe at different times. Some of the eastern authors relate, that Lobrâsp's general Raham was no other than Nebuchadnezzar, who subjugated Palestine in the days of the prophet Jeremiah. We are told, that Kishtâsp, or Hydaspes, was crowned at Balkh in the days of the famous Zoroastres, or Zerdusht, at whose instigation he became a convert to Magism, and erected many fire-temples in his kingdom. We are likewise informed, that this monarch afterwards removed from Balkh, and fixed his residence at Estakhr, or Istakbra, the antient Persopolis, in the province of Fars, or Farsistân, that is, Persia properly so called; and that he reigned not only over Persia and Turkestan, or the regions situated beyond the Caspian sea and the Oxus, but likewise the whole kingdom of Habasha, Habessinia, or Ethiopia. Be that as it will, after a series of long and bloody wars between the oriental Turks and the Persians, the latter, under their princes of the second dynasty, are said to have made Balkh the capital of their empire, as its situation enabled them to dispute more easily with the former the passage of the Oxus. The latter kings, however, of the second dynasty, and those of the third, resided constantly at Eftakbr, or Iftakbr, in the province of I'ars, and Tisfer, or Susa, in that of Khūzestān, the Susiana of the antients. Those of the fourth dynasty chose to settle in Jāh, where they built the city of Al Madāyen, upon the eastern bank of the Tigris, in the neighbourhood of Ctesiphon and Selucia. But, notwithstanding this, Balkh always remained the capital of Khorasān, and was actually so, when it was taken by Abd'allah Ebn Amer, in the 27th year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 647, and not by Abnāf Ebn Al Kais, as we find asserted by M. D'Herbelot, in the Khalifat of Otkmān. Some of the Khalifs of the family of Al Abbas, as well as the Seljukian princes, and those of the race of the Samani, having resided in other cities of Khorasān, as Nisabūr and Merū; the Mogul and Tartar princes also, descended from Jenghīz Khān and Tamerlan, having chosen Herāt for their capital; Balkh, Nisabūr, Merū, and Herāt were reputed royal cities, and assumed every one of them the title of capital of Khorasān. Nevertheless, Balkh enjoyed the peculiar privilege of being stiled Kobbat Al Islām, the metropolis of Islamism, and extended its jurisdiction over the territories of Badakhshān, or Balakhshān, Khotlan, and Tekkarestān; which undoubtedly rendered it, in some respects, the most opulent, famous, and conspicuous city of the vast province in which it stood. The established religion here is Mohammedisin, tho' there may possibly be even at present some few Magians, whose sacred rites are performed in the old Persic language, termed Peklawi, or Peh'lewān, amongst the Uzbeks. That the Christian religion was not intirely unknown at Balkh, in the 8th century after CHRIST, appears likewise from an antient monument of stone, dug up at Si-nganfu, the capital of the province of Shen-si in China, in the year of our LORD 1625, with an inscription in Chinese, and another in Syriac, upon it; a copy of which is preserved in the Vatican library, amongst the Chinese books presented by Father Couplet to Innocent XI. The Chinese inscription contains the names of seventy missionaries sent out of Affyria, or Chaldea, and not Palestine, as the Latin translator has falsely remarked, into the empire of China; amongst which we find an historical memoir in the Syriac language, and Estrangelo, or round Chaldean, character, to the following effect: "In the days of the father of fathers Mar Ananjesu, the catholic patriarch, Adam, the presbyter, suffragan, and pope, of the Chinese, in the year of the Greeks 1092 (of CHRIST 781) and Mar Jazedbuzid, the presbyter and suffragan of the royal city of Chumdan, or Khumdān, the son of the blessed Millesius, presbyter, born at Balach, or Balakh, a city of Adatcburistān, or Adatkburistān, erected this monument of stone, upon which is inscribed the dispensation of our Saviour, and the predication of our fathers to the emperor of China." Hence it appears, that several Christian missionaries visited China even in the eighth century, in order to convert the Chinese; and that the city of Balkh was then called Balach, or Balakh. To which we may add, that Abu'lfeda is intirely in the right, when he asserts that Balch, or Balkh, is an Arabic contraction of Balab, Balach, or Balakh, as may be very naturally inferred from this inscription; and consequently, that Dr. Hyde is absolutely in the wrong, when he finds fault with the Arab historian for that assertion, and affirms, that the metropolis of Khorasān was never called Balach, or Balakh. This capital had likewise the name of Bilabj given it by Al Firauzabadi, or Al Firūzabādi, and that of the city of Abraham by the Persians, probably, as is insinuated by Dr. Hyde, because they pretended to be of the Abrahamic religion, and frequently performed a solemn pilgrimage to Balkh, which was considered by them as sacred on that account. Dr. Hyde thinks, that the words Baētra, and Baētria were derived from Bokhāra, and not from Balkh, by the antients; but, for the reasons above assigned, we are by no means disposed to come into his opinion. This author informs us, that Lohorāsb, Lorāsp, or Lobrāsp, erected a most magnificent fire-temple at Balkh, denominated by him, from the name of his son, Adur-Kishtāsb, or Adur Gushtāsp, in which he deposited all the immense treasures he was master of. The same author likewise imagines, that, from its founder, or rather restorer, Lobrāsp, or Labrāsp, this city received the name of Laraspe, or Laraspā, supposed by him to have been corrupted by the Greek copists, or transcribers, into Zariaspe, or Zariaspa; in which, perhaps, he may not be very remote from truth. We must beg leave here farther to observe, that Adam, the deacon, the son of Jazedbuzid, the suffragan, Mar Sergius, the presbyter and suffragan, Sabarjesu, the presbyter, Gabriel, the presbyter and archdeacon, as likewise the ecclesiarch of the cities of Chumdan, or Khumdān, and Sarag, or Sarug, and the emperor of China himself, whose name was written in Chinese characters, are all mentioned in the aforesaid Syriac inscription. But, for a more particular account of this, our readers must have recourse to Sig. Assemani's notes upon Gregorius Bar-Hebraeus, who, in that point, will give them full and ample satisfaction *.

- <sup>a</sup> THE language spoken at Balkh is that most elegant dialect of the Persic called Deri, <sup>Some further particulars relating to Balkh.</sup> which signifies aulic, or belonging to the court; it being the dialect chiefly used by the king and nobility of Persia, and that which principally obtains at the Persian court. The word Der, from whence Deri is derived, denotes a gate, or port, as well as the court; from which ambiguity proceeds the expression of the Ottoman Port, so common in Christendom, equivalent to that of the Ottoman court, the court of the Grand Signor, or the court of the Othmân Soltân. The language styled by the Persians Deri, or aulic, which, according to Ebn Fakhr-addin Andshu, the Indo-Persian, who lived above 200 years ago, in the preface to his work, intitled, Farbângh Jibângbîri, written in Persic, was spoken here in the days of the Persian kings of the second dynasty, some of whom resided at Balkh. 'Tis no wonder, therefore, that this most elegant dialect should be called the language of Balkh, the language of Bâmiyân, a very antient city, which is supposed to have stood upon the spot occupied afterwards by Balkh, or at a small distance from it, and the language of Merâ-Shakjân and Bokbâra. The Mohammedans believe, that either the Arabic, or the Persian Deri will be the tongue spoken in paradise. They also pretend, that, when God speaks gently and mildly to the Cherubim about his throne, he uses the latter, but when in a rougher and more authoritative manner, the former of those languages. Amongst the learned men produced by the city of Balkh may be ranked the following: Jamaab, a Persian philosopher, cōtemporary with the famous Zerdusht, who wrote a treatise in Persic upon the most remarkable conjunctions of the planets, and their most noted effects; which Lali translated into Arabic in Egypt, about the year of our LORD 1280. Ali Ebn Yûnes, a person of uncommon learning and piety, who decided all points of right, and all cases of conscience, for some time, amongst the citizens of Balkh; but desisted from that practice, after he had been reproached by Mohammed, in a dream, for his resolution of a difficulty to his daughter, with which the prophet was by no means pleased; Sheikh Al Imâm Omar Al Bastâmî, a person of profound erudition, who lived at Balkh, and sheikh Al Imâm Afis-addin, the Musti of the same place, who have both been taken notice of by Rashîd-addin Al Wa'wât, as writers in the sixth century of the Hejra, and appertaining to that city; Abu'l Kassim Ahmed Ebn Abd'allah, the author of a book, intitled, Adab Al Jadal, that is to say, the laws or conditions to be observed in a dispute, who had the surname of Al Balkhi, and died in the year of the Hejra 319. The author of a geographical treatise, that bore the title of Takwîm Al Belâd, who is always cited by Ebn Al Wardi, and other oriental geographers, under the name of Al Balkhi. Mohammed Ebn Emir Khoând Shâh, or rather Khawând Shâh, commonly called by the European writers Mirkhond, who composed a great historical work, intitled, Rawdkat Al Safa, was likewise surnamed Al Balkhi by the eastern historians. Mohammed Ebn Okail, a celebrated compiler of history, and another learned man famous for his skill in geography, called Al Balkhi, were both originally of this city. Abu Ma'shar, an astrologer, Abu Khâtem, the translator of the Indian author Shanak upon fishes; Rashîd, a celebrated poet; Anwari, a famous poet and astronomer; besides many other learned men, that we cannot enumerate here, are said to have been natives of Balkh. With regard to the fate this place has at different times met with, our readers will not be displeased to find the following particulars. Balkh, with the whole province of Khorasân, fell under the dominion of Ismael Al Samai, or Ismael Al Sammâni, said by some to be descended from the famous Babram Chubin, the first prince of the Sammânian family, according to Ebn Shobnah, towards the close of the third century of the Moslem æra. In the year of the Hejra, 432, or of CHRIST 1041, Togrol Beg, or Togrol Bek, a Turkish prince of the Seljukian dynasty, conquered the whole province of Khorasân, and possessed himself of the city of Balkh. In the 618th year of the Moslem æra, answering to the year of our LORD 1221, this city was taken by the Tartars, or Moguls, under the command of Jenghîz Khân, who caused all the inhabitants to be conducted without the walls, and massacred without pity. In the 771st year of the Hejra, or of our LORD 1369, Tamerlan besieged Sultan Hosein, the last prince of the family of Jenghîz Khân, in Balkh, and obliged him to surrender the place; which his successors kept in their hands, till they were driven from thence by the Uzbeks, under the command of Shaibek Khân, in the ninth century of the Hejra, and the fifteenth of the Christian æra. It was afterwards redeemed by Shâh Ismael Sif Shâh, but finally wrested out of the hands of the Persians by the Uzbeks, who remained masters of it almost to this day. We are told, that it was lately the subject of almost perpetual wars between the Persians and the Uzbeks, in the same manner as Baghdâd was between the former of these nations and the Turks, and the city of Kandahar between the Shâh of Persia and the Great Mogul. It was not long since the residence of a Khân of the Uzbeks, who posses the southern part of Great Bukhâria. Its district must be allowed to be but small, in respect of the territories of the Khân of Bukhâria; but as this produces very considerable quantities of silk, of which the inhabitants make stuffs, and is extremely fertile and well cultivated, the Khân drew lately a very fair revenue from thence. His subjects were the most civilized of the Mohammedan Tartars of Great Bukhâria, to which the advantageous trade carried on between them, the Persians, and the subjects of the Great Mogul, not a little contributed. The town of Balkh, at present the most considerable of any possessed in those parts by the Mohammedan Tartars, is large, fair, and populous; and its buildings are for the most part of stone or brick. The fortifications consist of bulwarks of earth, fenced without with a strong wall high enough to cover those employed in the defence of those fortifications. As this place is the resort of all the business transacted between the Indies and Great Bukhâria, has a fine river passing from the S. S. E. through its suburbs, which is of vast service to the town, and, in time of peace, all foreign merchants, and other travellers, have free liberty and permission to manage their affairs in it, trade flourishes briskly at Balkh. The aforesaid river falls into the Amû about  $38^{\circ} 30'$  north latitude, upon the confines of Great Bukhâria and Khowarazm. The Khân's palace, or castle, is a large edifice, built after the oriental manner, and consists almost intirely of marble, of which there are very fine quarries in the neighbouring mountains. The jealousy that has long subsisted between the neighbouring powers preserved, till very lately, the Khân of Balkh in a state of independency, and not a little forwarded the extension of the trade carried on by his subjects. But he was at last obliged to submit to the Persian forces, under the command of Riza Kouli Mirza, detached by his father Nadir Shâh against the Uzbeks, in the year of our LORD 1737, and finally to Nadir Shâh himself, in the year 1739, upon his return from his Indian expedition. We shall conclude our account of this city with observing, that the longitude of Balkh has been determined by Ulugh Beigh, or Olugh Bek, to be  $101^{\circ} 00'$ , and its latitude  $36^{\circ} 41'$ ; though according to the more accurate determination of the later astronomers, it stands in longitude  $92^{\circ} 20'$ , and latitude  $37^{\circ} 10'$ .

the coin.

THE anterior part of this dirhêm exhibits the words Be-Balkha thsamânen wathsamâna wameâten; that is, In Balkh, 188, or struck at Balkh in the 188th year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 804. The reverse has preserved the following inscription originally impressed upon it: Mohammedon rasûlo . . . llâbi wamâla namiyyétebi . . . l'Emîro l'Mamûno Abd'allâbi . . . bno Emîri l'Mômenîna âleya waliyy'âmadi l'Moslemîna Yahya; that is, Mohammed is the apostle of God, and the plenitude of all his creatures: The prince Al Mamûn Abd'allah, the son of the prince of the faithful, is the high supporter of the pillars of the Moslems: Yahya, or John. Hence we learn, that dirhêms were coined this year at Balkh, in honour of Al Mamûn, who had been called to the succession after Al Amîn, by one Yahya, who seems to have been at least the governor of that city, if not of the whole province of Khorasân. The title of the plenitude, or nobility, of all creatures, here implies that Mohammed was the most noble and excellent of all created beings; and that this was one of his singular properties, and a prerogative peculiar to him, who was believed by his followers to have created Adam and all other creatures, to have been the first prophet in the order of creation, and the last in the order of mission, to have been the prince and lord of all the sons of Adam, to have had the angels Gabriel, Michael, Izrafil, or Ifrafil, and Azraïl, for his Vizirs, we are informed by some of the most celebrated Moslem authors <sup>m</sup>.

Other dirhêms struck at Baghdâd this
year.

THE same year, that is, the 188th year of the Hejra, some dirhêms were likewise coined at Baghdâd; one of which is said to have been discovered in 1722, on the coast of the Baltick, not far from Dantzick. The following words, at the time of its discovery, were visible upon it: Bêsmi . . . llâbi dhôreba hasa . . . ddirhemo bemedînati . . . Ssalmali, senata thsamânen wathsamâna wameâten; that is, In the name of God, this dirhêm was struck in the city of

- a peace (or Baghdád) in the 188th year, i. e. of the Hejra. The inscription visible on the reverse consists of these words, Muhammedun rasūlo . . llāhī arṣūlabo bel'hóda wadīni . . Plakki leyodh'shérabo āla . . ddīnī kóllebi wālan káreba . . P'músserekāna; that is, Mohammed is the apostle of God, who sent him with direction, or the right way, and the true religion, that he might render this superior to, and more conspicuous than, all other religions, tho' the associaters may abhor it. Of which inscription we have already given a particular account and explication in a preceding part of this work. M. Kehr seems to think, that the Khalif Harún Al Rashíd caused a great number of such silver pieces to be now struck at Baghdád, in order to distribute them amongst his troops, during the expedition he thought fit at this time to undertake against the Greeks. For a farther account of that expedition, we must beg leave
- b to refer our readers to what has been already observed on this head from Al Makín and Abu Jaafar Al Tabari <sup>n</sup>.

- c on the coast of the Baltick in 1722, that the mint set up at Balkh sent out some more of those pieces this year, or at least in the year of the Hejra 187. This coin seems to have been struck in honour either of Al Amín or Al Mamún, one of the Khalif's sons, or rather of the latter of those princes, whose name it exhibits, according to M. Kehr. On the first side are observable these words, Be Balkha, tes'en wathsamánina wameáten, At Balkh, in the year 189; or Be-Balkha, sa'ben wathsamánina wameáten, At Balkh, in the year 187. After the words, Mohammed is the apostle of God, on the reverse, another name of the Moslem prophet, wa'alakeyatoho, and his attendant, occurs; which implies, that he was united with the Deity in such a manner, that the divine and human natures in him were inseparable. The other part of the inscription is the same with that preserved on the reverse of the dirhém
- d coined at Balkh the preceding year; tho' the Cúsic letters, of which those inscriptions are composed, as to their forms, admit of some variation <sup>o</sup>.

- In the 190th year of the Hejra, commencing November 27th, 805, Harún Al Rashíd <sup>The Khalif</sup> marched into the imperial provinces with an army of 135,000 men, besides a great number <sup>undertakes a</sup> of volunteers, and others who were not inrolled amongst his troops. He first laid siege to <sup>expedition</sup> Heraclea, took it, and reduced it to ashes; after which, he made himself master of several <sup>against the</sup> other towns. He is said to have carried with him from Heraclea no less than 16,000 pri- <sup>Greek em-</sup> soners; and, after the conclusion of this expedition, to have made a descent on the island <sup>pior with an</sup> of Cyprus, the people of which country he pillaged and plundered in a dreadful manner. <sup>135,000 men.</sup> This success so intimidated Nicephorus, the Greek emperor, that he immediately sent the
- e tribute due to Harún, and concluded a peace with the Khalif upon the terms he thought fit to prescribe; one of which was, that the city of Heraclea should never be rebuilt. About the same time, or rather whilst Harún was employed in the aforesaid expedition, Rafe' Ebn Al Leith revolted against the Khalif at Samarkand, and assembled a considerable force to support him in his defection; which probably induced the latter to grant the Greek emperor so speedy a peace; tho' that prince's troops were by no means in a condition at this time to make head against him. It seems likely, from one of them found near Dantzick in 1722, with the words tes'ina wameáten, i. e. 190, upon it, that the Khalif caused a large number of *dirhém*s to be now struck, in order to defray the expence of a pilgrimage to Mecca, which he performed the following year. The citizens of Toledo, at this time, rebelled against the
- f western Khalif, Al Hakem, in Spain. But that prince sent his son Abd'alrahmán, then only fourteen years of age, with an army against their city; who, by the assistance of one Ambroz, governor of Saragosa and Huesca, who betrayed them, after they had admitted him into the town, found means to enter the place, without the trouble and fatigue of a siege, put 5000 of them to the sword, after he had decoyed them to an entertainment, and entirely extinguished the rebellion that had begun to shake Al Hakem's throne. We are told by Theophanes, that the greatest part of a body of light-armed troops, sent by the Greek emperor into Syria, to act against the Khalif there, perished, without effecting any thing this campaign <sup>p</sup>.

- THE next year, being the 191st year of the Hejra, the Khalif removed Ali Ebn Isa Ebn <sup>Rafe' Ebn Al</sup> Mákán from the government of Khorasán, probably because he was not sufficiently atten- <sup>Leith makes a</sup>

great progress in the conquest of Khorasân. tive to the motions of Rafe' Ebn Al Leith, and appointed Hazima Ebn Ayan to succeed him in that post. The new lieutenant had no sooner entered upon the government of the province assigned him, than he sent his predecessor, who had exercised unheard of tyranny upon the people of Khorasân, in chains to Harûn Al Rasbîd. The Khalîf also deprived of his office Khasîb, whom he had constituted collector of the revenues of Egypt, the preceding year. It must be here observed, that Theophanes places the last mentioned irruption of the Arabs into the imperial territories in the present year. He informs us, that Harûn advanced to Tyana in Cappadocia at the head of army, raised in Syria, Palestine, and Libya, of 300,000 men, seized upon that city, and erected a mosque there; that he also made himself master of Heraclea, Thebasa, called Safsâf by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, Malacosæa, Sideropolus, and Andrasus, the Androsia of Ptolemy, and detached a body of 60,000 men to ravage all the neighbouring districts. Afterwards he penetrated to Ancyra, took a narrow view of that fortress, and then returned home; having laid waste the circumjacent territory with fire and sword. This rapid progress of the Arabs obliged the emperor Nicephorus to send ambassadors to Harûn to treat of a peace; which was at last granted by the Khalîf, upon condition that he should pay an annual tribute of 30,000 pieces of gold, with his own effigies upon them, and 3000 more with that of his son; as also that the fortresses ruined by the Moslems should be refortified or repaired. But the Arabs were scarce got out of the imperial dominions, when Nicephorus ordered those towns to be rebuilt, and strengthened with new fortifications; of which the Khalîf being apprized, he immediately returned with a powerful army, repossessed himself of Thebasa, made a descent upon the island of Cyprus, being assisted therein by a strong fleet, which forwarded the operations of the land-forces, demolished many churches there, and carried off a vast number of Christians with him into captivity. Such repeated success could not but intimidate Nicephorus, who thereupon was glad to conclude a fresh treaty with the Khalîf, upon the same terms with that he had violated before. Soon after Harûn undertook a pilgrimage to Mecca, with his three sons, and distributed vast sums of money amongst the poor of that city, as well as Medina, before his return to Baghdâd. We must not forget to remark, that the rebel Rafe' Ebn Al Leith made a formidable progress in the conquest of Khorasân the present year<sup>1</sup>.

sends his son
against him.

THE following year, being the 192d of the Hejra, beginning November 6th, 807, Harûn marched against Rafe' Ebn Al Leith, who pretended to dispute the Khalîfat with him. The general rendezvous of his forces was in the plains of Rakka, from whence he advanced at the head of them to Baghdâd. Having supplied the troops with every thing necessary at that place, he continued his march to the frontiers of Jorjân, where he was seized with an illness which grew more violent after he had entered that province. Finding himself therefore not able to pursue his route, he resigned the command of the army to his son Al Mamûn, appointed many experienced officers to serve under him, ordered him to march directly to Merû in quest of the rebels, and retired himself to Tûs in Khorasân, twelve parasangs of Nisabûr, not Tuster in Khûzistân, the antient Susa, as we find falsely asserted by Mr. Kehr. Before the Khalîf assembled his forces at Rakka, he deprived Hasan Ebn Jamîl of the government of Egypt, and sent Mâlec Ebn Dabâm to Mesr to succeed him in that post. We are told by Khondemir, that the Khalîf saw in a dream at Rakka, before he departed from that place, a hand over his head, full of red earth, and at the same time heard the voice of a person pronouncing these words, See the earth in which Harûn is to be interred. Upon which, he demanded where he was to be buried? and was instantly answered by the same voice, At Tûs. This greatly discomposing him, he communicated the dream to his chief physician Gabriel, the son of Bakhtishua, a Christian, who told him, that this ought to give him no manner of concern, as dreams were only phantoms produced by the fumes which the humours of the body sent into the brain; and that the expedition to Khorasân, in order to extinguish the rebellion of Rafe' Ebn Al Leith there, he was upon the point of undertaking, had given place to this imagination. To which the doctor added, that no better remedy could be thought of to dissipate his chagrin, than to pursue some favourite diversion that might draw his attention another way. The Khalîf, therefore by his physician's advice, prepared a magnificent regale for his principal courtiers, which continued several days. After this, he put himself at the head of his troops, and advanced to the confines of Jorjân, where he was attacked by the distemper that proved fatal to him. This increasing, he found himself obliged to leave the army, and retire to Tûs; where the prediction communicated to him in his dream was fulfilled, as will soon more clearly appear. In the month of September this year, according to Theophanes and Cedrenus, the Arabs made a descent upon the island of Rhodes, committed dreadful depredations there, and at last retired into their own dominions with an immense quantity of spoil. About the same

- a time, as may be inferred from the date preserved on one of them found on the coast of the Baltick in 1722, some dirbêms were struck at Mohammedia, a city of Kermân, famous for the great number of learned men it has produced. The words that determine the place where, and the time when, this piece was coined, are, Bel-Mohammediata ethsnatayni wata-s'ina wameâten, i. e. In Mohammedia, or struck at Mohammedia, in the year of the Hejra 192, of CHRIST 807, or rather 808. As Mohammedia was not at a vast distance from Tûs, and our dirbêm exhibits the name Al Amîn, it seems to have been coined in honour of that prince, a little before his father's decease. As Al Amîn was likewise at this time carrying on his military preparations, in order to attack his brother Al Mamûn, then commander in chief of the Khalîf's forces in Khorasân, these pieces might have been struck to enable
- b Al Amîn to undertake the projected expedition, immediately after Al Harûn's death; or they might have been coined by the inhabitants of Mohammedia, not only as an instance of their homage and loyalty to Al Amîn, but likewise with a view of making a considerable present to that prince. At least this is the opinion of M. Kebr. The language spoke at Mohammedia is the Persic; which is not to be wondered at, as this city is almost situated in the very heart of Persia. Other dirbêms were likewise coined this year at Baghdâd, as appears from two of them discovered with the former in 1722. We must not forget to observe, that M. Kebr is inconsistent with himself, when in one place he affirms Tûs to have belonged to Persia, and in another to the province of Khorasân; and that Mohammedia stood in longitude  $90^{\circ} 00'$ , and lat.  $31^{\circ} 45'$ .
- c THE 193d year of the Hejra, beginning October 25th, 808, was famous for the death of the Khalîf Harûn Al Rashîd, who departed this life the third of the latter Jomada at Tûs; being then, according to Eutychius, forty-six, or, if we will believe Abu Jaafar Al Tabari and Abu'l Faraj, forty-seven, or, lastly, as others will have it, forty eight years of age. Upon his arrival at Tûs, to which place the violence of his distemper obliged him to retire, he sent for his physician, Gabriel Ebn Baktishua, and said to him, "Do you remember, Gabriel, my dream at Rakka? We are now arrived at Tûs, the place, according to what was predicted in that dream, of my interment. Send one of my eunuchs to fetch me a handful of the earth in the neighbourhood of the city." Upon which, one of his favourite eunuchs, named Masrûr, was immediately dispatched to bring a little
- d of the soil of the place to the Khalîf; who soon returned, and brought a handful of red earth which he presented to Harûn with his arm half bare. At the sight of which, the Khalîf instantly cried out, "In truth, this is the earth, and this the very arm I saw in my dream." Whereupon his spirits failing him, and his malady increasing, he died three days after this frightful sight, and was buried in the same place, where a stately monument was afterwards erected in honour of the Imâm Ali Ebn Musa Ebu Jaafar, called by the Persians the Imâm Riza, going under the appellation of Mashhad Riza, or the sepulchre of Riza, at this day. Some authors relate, that both these princes were interred at Senabâd, a village about a parasang distant from Tûs; and that Sawri Ebn Al Motez, who presided over the districts of Nisabûr and Tûs in the days of Mahmûd Gazni, adorned the spot
- e where Harûn and Riza lay inhumed with many superb and magnificent buildings. Which place has since been so beautified and enlarged by the later Persian kings, that Tûs, with which this is now immediately connected, was at least very lately esteemed the metropolis of Khorasân. Nor did the territory of Tûs make a mean figure 500 years ago, since we are told by Yûkûl Ebn Abd'allah Al Hamatbi, that it then contained about a thousand villages and towns. It appears from Abu'l Faraj, that Bashîr Ebn Al Leith, Rafe' Ebn Al Leith's brother, was brought to the Khalîf in chains, when that prince was at the point of death; who, at the sight of him, declared, that if he had had only time enough left him to speak two words, he would say, Kill him; and immediately ordered him to be cut to pieces in his presence; which being done, he soon after expired. Harûn sat about three-and-
- f twenty years upon the Moslem throne. As to his person, he was tall, corpulent, and of a fair complexion; he had thick bushy hair, which had begun to grow grey, a handsome face, and a black beard: his head he took care to have shaved as often as he performed the pilgrimage to Mecca. With regard to his disposition, he was a person of such singular humanity, that in this point, he could scarce be paralleled by any of his predecessors, of great liberality, especially to poets, being excessively fond of the Arab poetry, and even capable of writing verses himself, magnanimous and brave, and so devout, that he is said to have gone either eight or nine times on pilgrimage to Mecca, whilst he was Khalîf. He spent a considerable time in prayer every day, except when he was sick, and, during the performance of his devotions,
- g according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari and Abu'l Faraj, made an hundred incurvations. He also distributed every day a thousand dirbems amongst the poor, and carried with him an hundred a learned men to Mecca; and when he did not go thither himself, he took care to furnish three hundred persons with proper accommodations for such a journey. None of the preceding Khalifs had so great a number of counsellors, judges, learned men, and poets, in his palace, as Harûn Al Rashîd. Al Asmaghi relates, that, on a certain day, he found Al Rashîd all in tears, upon discovering a passage in the poetical works of Abu'l Abâbia, that he applied to himself, and seemed to interpret as a prediction of his death. The distemper that attacked him with great fury and violence at Tûs is said to have been the bloody flux, which at last proved fatal to him. The first and last day of his reign was Saturday. His first counsellors were Yabya Ebn Khâled Ebn Barmac, and his two sons Al Fadl and Jaafar; after whose dismissal, he took Al Fadl Ebn Al Rabî. He is said likewise afterwards to have delivered the privy seal to b Ali Ebn Baktar. Ismael Ebn Sabîb also served him in the capacity of prime minister to the day of his death. His judges were Nûb Ebn Daraj and Hafes Ebn Ayât, in the eastern parts of his dominions; and, in the western, Al Hosein Ebn Al Hasan Al A'wfi, and afterwards Awn Ebn Abd'allah Al Masûdi. We are likewise told, that Mohammed Ebn Sama'a, Sherik Ebn Abd'allah, and Ali Ebn Harmala, presided over the courts of judicature during some part of his reign. The captains of his guards were Al Kasem Ebn Najr Ebn Mâlec, Hamzab Ebn Hazem, and Hafed Ebn Omar Ebn Al Shojair; and his chamberlains, Basbar Ebn Maimûn, his servant, Mohammed Ebn Yabya Ebn Khâled Ebn Barmac, and Fadl Ebn Al Rabî. The inscription of his seal was, Greatness, and power of God. From what has been already c observed, it sufficiently appears, that this Khalif was extremely fond of learned men, and cultivated himself at least some of the sciences. He obliged Mâlec, the author of the famous book intitled Mawthâ, to write an explication of that piece; who, when the Khalif would have shut the door of the chamber wherein that explication was made, boldly told him, that knowledge was of no manner of service to the great, except they communicated it to those of a lower degree. But, in order to have an adequate idea of the state of learning in the Moslem empire during this Khalif's reign, and perfectly to understand on what foot he set the sciences, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to the history of Tawadûd Khatûn and Harûn, as well as the works of divers other authors, that he caused to be translated into Arabic; a detail of which may be met with in the Bibliothèque of M. D'Herbelot *.

Harûn finds a ring that he had thrown into the Tigris. It has been observed by some of the oriental historians, that Al Mobdi made his son d Harûn a present of a most beautiful ruby-ring, which he wore himself, as an earnest of the succession, to which he was called after his brother Al Hûdi; and that the last of these princes, immediately after his accession, sent a eunuch to demand it, as of right belonging to him. This unreasonable demand so incensed Harûn, that, in the eunuch's presence, he pulled it off his finger, and threw it into the Tigris, where it remained till Al Hadi's death. But no sooner had he taken possession of the Khalifat, than he commanded some divers to search for it; casting a lead-ring, in order to direct them, from the same part of the bridge where he stood before, when the eunuch demanded Al Mobdi's ring of him, into the river. The divers were so fortunate on this occasion as to find the thing sought for, without any difficulty or toil; which accident was considered as a certain prognostic of a happy and auspicious reign. e One of these authors relates, that the famous Saladin, in the year of the Hejra 560, lost a ruby-ring, of almost inestimable value, which was as luckily found again as this of the Khalif Harûn Al Rashîd †.

The Khalif recovers from an apoplectic fit; IN the 180th year of the Hejra, Al Rashîd being seized with an apoplectic fit, the physicians met at his palace, to consult about the proper means of relieving him; when Gabriel, the son of Bakhtishua, a Christian, and then but a very young man, declared, that, in his opinion, a vein was immediately to be opened. This was opposed by Al Amîn, but agreed to by Al Mamûn, as the only expedient that could be thought of to save his father's life. The Khalif, therefore, was bled without delay, and recovered; after which, Al Mamûn related to him the whole affair, and was ever after his particular favourite. f As for Gabriel, Harûn was so pleased with his conduct on this occasion, that he made him his principal physician, and settled a pension of 100,000 dirhems upon him †.

as does his favourite mistress from another disorder. WHEN Abd'allah Ebn Al Mobdi, the Khalif's brother, was prefect of Egypt, he made a present to Harûn of a most beautiful damsel, of whom that prince was passionately fond. This girl being once extremely ill, and the court physicians not being able to procure her any relief, the Khalif found himself obliged to apply to his brother for a doctor from Egypt. Abd'allah, upon this application, sent him the patriarch of Alexandria, who had great skill in physic, and who soon cured her of her distemper. This so pleased the Khalif, that he

- a ordered all the churches that had been taken away from the Melchites in Egypt to be restored them, and gave the patriarch a large sum of money for the cure he had performed. This patriarch, whose name was Balâtian, or Bulatianus, died in the forty-seventh year of his patriarchate, and was succeeded by one Estât, or Eustatius, at Alexandria, in the sixteenth year of the Khalifat of Al Raschid. Which Eustatius was originally a flax-dresser; but finding a treasure accidentally in the place where he beat his flax, he became a monk in the monastery of Al Kosair, was at last made the head of his convent, and built the church of the Two Apostles, together with a bed-chamber for the bishop. He lived after his advancement to the patriarchate of Alexandria, only four years; and, after his death, one Christopher was elevated to that high dignity; who, having been afflicted with a paralytic disorder, appointed a certain bishop, named Peter, to discharge the duties of his function for him. He continued however, in that sublime post, tho' very infirm, two-and-thirty years. In the eighth year of Al Raschid's reign, Theodoritus was constituted patriarch of Antioch, and presided over the Christians there seventeen years. We are told by Sa'id Ebn Batrik, or Eutychius, that there was so remarkable a solar eclipse, as should seem, at Alexandria, after evening-prayer, in Harûn's reign, that the stars appeared, and the people were struck with terror, inasmuch that they fell down upon their knees, and implored the divine protection. For other particulars relating to the churches of Alexandria and Antioch in the Khalifat of Al Raschid, we must beg leave to refer our readers to the writers mentioned here; as a detail of such ecclesiastical affairs would by no means be compatible with our present design *.

- A CERTAIN writer relates, that Harûn being one day told that there was a fool at Baghdâd, Harûn's son-who pretended to be God, he sent for him, in order to converse with him, and discover whether he was really a fool or an impostor. At his first appearance, the Khalif said to him, a fool at Baghdad. "A man was brought before me some days ago, who made himself a fool, and had a mind to pass for a prophet sent by God. I commanded him immediately to be carried to prison, and from thence brought to his trial; after the conclusion of which being condemned, he had his head struck off." The fool, having heard these words, replied, "You acted on this occasion as became one of my faithful servants; that wretch never received the gift of prophecy from me, nor had he ever any order or mission on my part."
- d The author who has handed down to us this story, adds, that, according to the principles of the Mohammedans, one who is besides himself, and has lost the use of his reason, can say nothing but what is true; since it is God who speaks in him. On the contrary, he who pretends to be a prophet, and to be sent by God, when he really is not so, is an impostor, and can utter nothing but lies. The greatest part of the Moslems believe, that fools are agitated by the spirit of God, and of course reverence them as saints transported by the divine love; and, in conformity to this sentiment, as M. D'Herbelot has rightly observed, it is a saying not uncommon in these western parts of the world, that truth is in the mouth of children and fools *.

- THIS Khalif, being in Egypt, said once to his courtiers, "The king of this country He appoints an formerly boasted himself to be God; I therefore, in abhorrence of such pride, intend Ethiopian to confer the government of it upon one of the meanest of my slaves". In consequence Slave governor of Egypt of which intention, he chose for this effect one Hozaib, an Ethiopian, a person of a most rude and clownish disposition. The king hinted at here is Pharoah, who is represented in the Korân as saying to his people, I am more great and powerful than all your gods: I am your sovereign God and master. The Egyptians having once complained to this Hozaib, after he had been made their governor, that the cotton they had sowed on the banks of the Nile was carried away by an inundation of that river, he asked them by way of consolation, why they had not sown wool there? believing that wool and cotton were produced in the same manner. This answer of the governor has been taken for a piece of wit by M. D'Herbelot; tho' it has been preserved as an instance of his stupidity by Sâdi, an author of good repute amongst the Moslems *.

EBN KASSEM has remarked, that the strong castle of Safsâf in Natolia, called by the Turks at this day Belejek, was taken from the Greeks by the Khalif Harûn Al Raschid, who obliged the emperor Nicephorus to pay him tribute, as we have already observed; but that this was retaken from the Arabs by the Greeks, who kept possession of it till the time of Othmân, the son of Ortogrol, the founder of the Othmân, or Ottoman, empire *. He took Safsâf.

AMONGST the remarkable sayings of this Khalif, the following has been handed down to us by Sâdi, or Saadi, the above-mentioned author. Al Amîn, his son, having one day desired him to punish a man for speaking ill of his mother Zebeida, he consulted his officers His advice, on a particular occasion, to his son.

of justice upon the punishment proper to be inflicted on that offender. After which, he addressed himself to Al Amîn in the following terms: "I would advise you, son, to forgive him, as this will be an action worthy a great and magnanimous prince; but if you cannot absolutely repress your desire of vengeance, nor overcome yourself on so fine an occasion, you may treat his mother in the same manner that he has treated yours<sup>a</sup>."

THE Khalîf being once marching at the head of his troops, a woman came to him to complain that some of his soldiers had pillaged her house. Harûn immediately made answer, "Hast thou not read, woman, in the Korân, that when princes pass with their armies through places, they destroy them." True," replied the woman; "but then it is also said in the same book, that the houses of those princes shall be desolate for the acts of injustice they have committed." This bold repartee, and the good sense of the woman, were so well received by the Khalîf, that he immediately ordered reparation to be made her for the damages she had sustained<sup>b</sup>.

HE took for his instructor in the Mohammedan law the celebrated doctor Asmâi, or Asmaghi, who being willing to examine things to the utmost rigour of the law, would frequently have obliged him to make a false step, if he had not been extremely well upon his guard. On such occasions as these, Harûn used to say to him, "You are more learned than I; but I have more sense and prudence than you." This sage's name at length was Abu Sa'id Abd'almâlec Ebn Koraib Al Asmâi. He was born in the year of the Hejra 122, and died in the 215th, or 216th, year of that æra, when the Khalîf Al Mamûn sat upon the Moslem throne. He excelled in the art of grammar and eloquence, was extremely well versed in the most authentic traditions, and had a perfect knowledge of the Korân. These fine qualities so endeared him to the Khalîf Harûn Al Rashîd, that he did not think it beneath him to take him for his master. But the scholar was resolved to give the first lesson, and that such a one as was worthy his high rank and capacity. He ordered Asmâi never to offer to teach, or instruct, him in public, and not to be too forward, or officious, in giving him his advice in private; to stay till he was asked his opinion, and then to content himself with giving a clear and precise answer to the questions put to him, without any superfluous additions; above all things, to take care not to attempt preoccupying him in favour of any of his notions, or exacting of him too high a regard for his authority; not to dwell too long on the histories and traditions he should relate to him, without his particular permission; to bring him back with softness, and without any hard words, to the paths of justice, if he should ever depart from thence in his decisions; principally to point out to him the things that were most proper for the discourses he was to make in public, in the mosques and other places; and, finally, never to talk to him in obscure and mysterious terms, such as were not easily to be understood. This doctor was something under a middle size, of great vivacity and penetration, and had a mind capable of the vastest undertakings. He was the author of many pieces; the principal of which were Offîl Al Kelam, The foundations of scholastic divinity, and Fahûat-wa-Al-Nadcrat, Rare and curious things. We must not forget to observe, that Isa Ebn Jaafar said the funeral service over the Khalîf Harûn Al Rashîd, at the time of his interment; and that Al Hefan Ebn Al Tahtâh was governor of Egypt, in the room of Mâlec Ebn Dâham, whom he removed a little before his death, when he expired<sup>c</sup>.

S E C T. XXVII.

UPON the arrival of a courier from Tûs with the news of Al Rashîd's death, his son Mohammed Mûsa Al Amîn was proclaimed Khalîf, or emperor of the Moslems, at Baghdâd. This happened about twelve days after his father's decease, though he had been declared Khalîf at Tûs the very morning Al Rashîd died. His mother was Zebeida, the daughter of Jaafar Ebn Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr. He was at Baghdâd when his father expired. Al Mamûn, this prince's brother, had been called to the succession after him, by an express declaration which Harûn, in order to render it the more authentic, had caused to be hung up in the Caaba. He had likewise been indulged by his father with the perpetual government of Khorasân, together with the command of all the troops cantoned in that province. Notwithstanding which, Al Amîn, after his accession, formed a design to exclude him from the Khalîfat, deprived him of the furniture and moveables of the imperial palace in Khorasân, which had been left him by Al Rashîd, and, in open violation of his father's will, and the former declaration of that prince, which had been renewed a little before his death, ordered the forces in Khorasân to march directly to Baghdâd. This not a little incensed Al Mamûn, who thereupon expostulated with Al Fadl Ebn Al Rabî, the general a ral of those forces; but without effect; he punctually obeying the orders he had received from the new Khalif. However, Al Mamûn took care not to be wanting in his fidelity to his brother. He obliged the people of Khorasân to take the oath of allegiance to Al Amîn, and reduced to reason some seditious spirits that had actually excited a considerable body of the inhabitants of his province to a revolt. The new Khalif caused dirhems to be struck immediately after his inauguration, as has been rendered probable by M. Kehr; two of which, with the words thsalathsen wates'ina wameâten, an hundred and ninety-three, upon them, were found near Stegen, on the coast of the Baltick, the 2d of June, 1722<sup>d</sup>.

AL AMIN being extremely addicted to drunkenness and gaming, and thereby become The Khalif incapable of all manner of application to business, chose Al Fadl Ebn Al Rabî for his prime excludes his b Visir, and intirely abandoned to him the government of his dominions. Fadl was a very brother from able minister; though, fearing Al Mamûn's resentment, if ever he should ascend the Moslem the succession.
throne, for the ill offices he had formerly done him, he gave his master very bad advice, and such as in the end proved the total ruin of them both. He told him, that his brother Al Mamûn had gained the affection of the people of Khorasân by the good order and police he had established in his government; that his unwearied application to administer justice to those over whom he presided, had so attracted their esteem, that the forces of the whole province were intirely at his devotion; that his own conduct had by no means been relished by his subjects, whose minds were almost totally alienated from him; and that, therefore, he had only one part to act, which was, to deprive his brother of the right of c succession that had been left him by his father, and transfer it to his son Mûsa, though then but an infant. The Khalif, unhappily for himself, followed the counsel of his prime Visir, ordered Al Mamûn's name to be omitted in the public prayers on Fridays, and in the discourses made afterwards to the people by the Imâm, which the Moslems call Khotbah, and declared Mûsa, though still in his tender years, the presumptive heir to the crown. After which degradation of Al Mamûn, Al Amîn surnamed Mûsa, at that time not above five years old, Al-Nâtik Billah, Al-Nâtik Belhak, or rather Al-Nâtik B'lhak, i. e. one who reasons and discourses in a manner agreeable to God, or according to truth. But several of the Moslems, after Mûsa had been proclaimed his father's immediate successor, by way of ridicule, nicknamed him Natba Billah, that is to say, one who, by the grace of God, begins to speak. The d Khalif also sent for his other brother from Mesopotamia, the government of which province his father Harûn had conferred upon him; and recalled Al Mamûn to court, under the pretext that he wanted his assistance in his councils. This unparalleled treatment so irritated Al Mamûn, that he was resolved to come to an open rupture with his brother, in order, if possible, to frustrate his wicked designs. Instead, therefore, of going to Baghdâd, as Al Amîn had commanded him, he cut off all communication between his province and that capital; pretending, that, as his father Harûn had assigned him the lieutenancy of Khorasân, he was responsible for all the disorders that might happen during his absence there. He also coined money, and would not suffer Al Amîn's name to be impressed upon any of the dirhems or dinars struck in his province. Not content with this, he prevailed upon Rafe' Ebn
e Al Leit Ebn Sayâr, who had been for some time in open rebellion against the Khalif, to join him with a body of troops; whose example was soon after followed by Harthema Ebn Aasan; which put him in possession of all the vast territory of Khorasân. Here he bore an absolute sway, officiated in the mosque as Imâm, and from the pulpit constantly harangued the people. Al Amîn, about this time, removed Al Hasan Ebn Al Tahtâb from the government of Egypt, and appointed Hâtem Ebn Harthema Ebn Aasan to succeed him in that post. He likewise coined a large number of dirhems at Baghdâd; to enable him to carry on the war against his brother Al Mamûn with vigour; one of which, with the words arba'en wates'ina wameâten, an hundred and ninety-four, upon it, was discovered near Stegen, in 1722. Theophanes seems to represent the new Khalif as a very weak prince; and intimates, that a civil f war, between him and Al Mamûn, which occasioned a vast effusion of human blood, and many dreadful devastations, commenced soon after his accession. These were the principal transactions, if not the only events of any éclat, that happened in the Moslem empire, during the year of the Hejra 194<sup>e</sup>.

THE following year, being the 195th of the Hejra, beginning October 4th, 810, the Khalif Al Amîn finding that he had missed his aim, and that his brother Al Mamûn set him at defiance, declared war against him, and sent Ali Ebn Isa to invade Khorasân with an army of 60,000 men. Before his departure, Zebeida, as we are told by Abu'l Faraj, Al Amîn's mother, and mother-in-law to Al Mamûn, intreated that general to consider the latter as her own son, or at least the son of Harûn Al Rashîd; and, if he refused to obey the Khalif's orders, orders, three days after they had been imparted to him, to bring him in silver chains to Baghdád. Authors, however, differ about the number of forces employed by Al Amin in this expedition. Some make them to amount to the number above-mentioned, others reduce them to 40,000, and, lastly, others assert, that Ali Ebn Isa set out from Baghdád with only a body of 10,000 horse <sup>f</sup>.
He declares war against his brother.

overthrown
by those of Al Mamun.

AL MAMUN being informed, that Ali Ebn Isa had begun his march for Khorasán, and even advanced to the frontiers of that province, made the necessary dispositions for giving him a proper reception. He put on foot all the troops he could raise with the utmost expedition, and gave the command of them to Tabar, or Tdaber, Ebn Hosein, afterwards the founder of a considerable dynasty, and one of the greatest generals of the age; who, being a man of undaunted resolution, chose only a body of 4000 men, whom he led against Ali Ebn Isa, then incamped on a spot of ground about ten leagues from the city of Ray. Ali, seeing so small a number of troops, was transported with joy, and promised himself an easy victory over them; not considering that these were all choice men, and the flower of Al Mamun's forces. He, therefore, walked about carelessly in his camp, without any manner of precaution. Which being observed by Dawd, surnamed Siyáh, or, as some of the manuscripts of Abu'l Faraj have it, Sháh, one of Tabar's subalterns, he, with a small party, surprized Ali in his camp, cut off his head, and immediately brought it to Tabar Ebn Hosein; who instantly dispatched a courier with it to Al Mamun, then at Merú, the capital of Khorasán. The courier made such haste, that he arrived at Merú in four days time, tho' that city is near 400 leagues distant from Ray, presented the head to Al Mamun, and brought him the news of a victory obtained by his general over the enemy without striking a stroke; the Khalif's troops betaking themselves to flight, as soon as it was known that Ali had been assassinated in his camp. This is the relation of Al Mamun's first instance of success handed down to us by the Persian historians. But the Arab writers relate this affair in a different manner. Al Mamun, according to them, joined Harthema Ebn Aafan with Tabar in the command of his forces, and ordered them to attack Ali, then posted on an advantageous spot of ground, about five parasangs from Ray. Upon which, those generals, in pursuance of their orders, marched up to Ali Ebn Isa's camp, gave him battle, and intirely defeated him. For some time, Ali's right and left wings behaved well, and forced those of Tabar and Harthema to give way; but Al Mamun's main body having broke that of the Khalif in such a manner, that the troops which composed it could never afterwards rally, and then fallen upon the two wings which had so pushed those of Tabar and Harthema in the beginning of the action, Al Amin's troops could not stand their ground, but were forced to betake themselves to a precipitate flight. And what increased the general confusion, on this melancholy occasion, was the death of Ali Ebn Isa himself, who was killed by an arrow let fly at him by the aforesaid Dawd Siyáh, in the heat of the action; which absolutely obliged victory to declare in favour of Al Mamun's troops. Ali's head was afterwards cut off, and sent as a present to that prince, who amply rewarded Tabar and Harthema for the important services they had done him. If we will believe Abu'l Faraj, Ali thought himself so sure of an easy victory, that he told his men they had nothing farther to do, in order to obtain it (or, as the Arabic text of that author expresses it, to break Tabar to pieces like a tree) than to march over the hill of Hamadán. Hence it appears, that however the preceding accounts may vary in other respects, they seem to agree in this, that the dispersion of the Khalif's forces, as well as the loss of Ali, was in a great measure, if not solely, owing to a want of precaution in that general; who could by no means be induced to think, that the enemy would have the courage to attack him, or even dare to look him in the face. But however this may be, whether Ali was surprized, or overthrown by the bravery and resolution of the enemy, this disaster proved of fatal consequence to Al Amin's affairs <sup>e</sup>.

Al Mamun
assumes the title of Khalif.

AL MAMUN, having received advice of the death of Ali Ebn Isa Ebn Máhan, his brother generals, and the intire defeat of the army under his command, assumed the title of Khalif, ordered Al Amin's name to be omitted at the time of divine service in his turn, and made the necessary preparations for carrying the war into the very heart of the Moslem dominions. For this purpose, he divided his forces into two bodies, and commanded both of them to march into Irák by different routes. One of them obeyed the orders of Tabar, who directed his march towards Abwáz; and the other those of Harthema, who took the road of Holwán; both of them proposing to meet in the neighbourhood of Baghdád, and, after their junction, to form the siege of that city. In the course of their march this year, Al Mamun's troops defeated a body of the Khalif's forces, and reduced the city of Hamadán, together with several other places of strength, without any considerable loss. In the a mean time, Al Amîn removed Hâtem Ebn Harthemâ Ebn Aafan from the government of Egypt, and substituted Hâyar Ebn Al Ahab in his room. According to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, Thaber, with the body of troops under his command, took post in the territory of Hekcân, incamped there, and fortified his camp, to secure it from all insults of the enemy; towards the close of this campaign <sup>h</sup>.

WE must here beg leave to observe, that it seems to appear from a dirbém coined at Some dirbém
Samarkand the preceding year, and found on the coast of the Baltick in 1722, not only that coined at Sa- some of those pieces were then struck in the mint erected there, but likewise that markand.
Al Mamûn assumed the titles of Imâm, protector of the pillars of Islamism, and one by friendship united with Mohammed, at that time. From whence we may infer, that he probably caused b himself to be acknowledged Khalîf in Khorasân at least a year sooner than that event is said to have happened by the Arab historians, if not immediately after his father's decease. This, if admitted, may serve to correct those writers, and perhaps give us to understand, that the Khalîf Al Amîn had some other motives to a war with Al Mamûn besides those they have suggested to us. The words preserved by this dirbém are so remarkable that we must not pass them over in silence here. On one side it exhibits bemedinati Samarkanda senatan arbaa wates'ina wameâtan, i. e. At Samarkand; in the year 194; and on the reverse, Mohammedon rasûlo . . llâhi wama'llîfoko l'Imâmo . . l'Mamûno waliyyo âmadi . .

c whom is united by friendship the Imâm Al Mamûn, the protector of the pillars of Islamism, Abd'allah, the son of the prince of the faithful. This piece seems likewise farther to intimate, that a considerable number of dirbêms were coined by the people of Samarkand, with Al
Mamûn's name upon them, on account of Rafe' Ebn Al Leit Ebn Sayâr's declaration for him, and as an instance of their loyalty to him; if it will not evince that prince's first victory to have been gained in the year of the Hejra 194; though it has been placed by the oriental historians in the following year. In either of which cases it must be owned, that the ancient coins of the Arabs may, on some occasions, illustrate matters of history, as well as those of politer nations. With regard to the word Imâm, it may not be amiss to remind our readers, that it properly denotes the same person as the Latin Antistes, or rather, for the most part, one that presides over ecclesiastical affairs <sup>i</sup>.

d NOTWITHSTANDING the surprizing progress made by Al Mamûn's arms in the year of And at Mo-
the Hejra 195, the province of Kermân, or at least a considerable part of that province, hammedia.
though not so very remote from Khorasân, seems to have persisted in an unshaken fidelity to Al Amîn several months, if not, as is most probable, through the whole course, of that year.
For, some dirbêms were coined then at Mohammedia in Kermân, as we learn from one of them found at Dantzick in 1722; whose anterior face has preserved these words, belmohammediyyata chamsen wates'ina wameâtan, i. e. At Mohammedia, in the year one hundred and ninety-five;
and, on the reverse, we discover the following inscription: Mohammedon rasûlo . . llâhi waalakeyatoho . . l'Khalîfato Mohammedon Emiro . . l'mo'menîna al'abido; Mohammed is the e apostle of God, and the Khalîf Mohammed, prince of the faithful, the devout worshipper and adorer of God, is his attendant. Where, by the Khalîf Mohammed, we are plainly to understand Mohammed Abu Mûsa Al Amîn, the son of Harûn Al Rasbîd, who at that time sat upon the Moslem throne. Hence it appears, that some dirbêms were struck at Mohammedia, in the year of the Hejra 195, probably with a design to enable Al Amîn to pay the troops he had then in those parts on foot; as likewise that the people of this district, at least, were intirely in the interest of that unfortunate and indolent prince, when those pieces were coined.
For a more particular explication of the legend and inscription preserved by the dirbém now in view, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to what has been published on this head by M. Kehr, an author to whom we own ourselves obliged for several hints and observations, that can by no means be judged unworthy a place in the work we are at present f upon <sup>k</sup>.

were advancing to give him battle; but, by the assistance of his emissaries and spies, he found means to sow the seeds of discord and dissension between Abmed Ebn Marîd Al Shai-bânî and Abd'allah Ebn Hamîd Ebn Kabtaba, who commanded them; so that, instead of acting in conjunction against the common enemy, as they ought to have done, they turned their arms against one another. This enabled Thaber to make himself master of Holwân, which he took by capitulation, and then marched directly to Abwâz. Here he attacked a body of the Khalîf's forces; but being weakened by the loss of a detachment he had left in garison at Holwân, under the command of Hartbema Ebn Aasan, who had joined him before his arrival at that place, nothing decisive happened on either side. The indolence and supineness of Al Amîn had hitherto been one of the principal causes of the surprizing progress of Al Mamûn's arms in so short a time, and given such offence to the people of Baghdâd, that they were universally disposed to an insurrection. Of which unaccountable negligence, the following most remarkable instance has been mentioned by some of the eastern writers. When a courier arrived from the army, with the bad news of Ali Ebn Isa Ebn Mâbân's death and defeat, and imparted it to the Khalîf, he found him fishing, and so little concerned at what had happened, that he said to him, Don't disturb my diversion; for Kuthar, my freed-man, has taken two large fishes, and I none at all. Being, therefore, become odious to the citizens of Baghdâd, by such an infamous neglect of public affairs, they unanimously entertained thoughts of withdrawing their allegiance from him. To which they were farther excited by Al Hasan Ebn Ali Ebn Isa Ebn Mâbân, a person of great power and authority in the army, after his arrival from Rakka at Baghdâd. They, therefore, deposed him on the eleventh day of the month of Rajeb, incarcerated him and his mother Zebeida, and took the oath of fidelity to Al Mamûn; though afterwards repenting of what they had done, they drove Hasan out of the city, took Al Amîn out of prison, and placed him again upon the throne. They also, in a little time, seized Hasan, and brought him to the Khalîf, that he might receive the reward of his late treasonable practices and instigations. That prince, however, did not only forgive him, but likewise, after having supplied him with large sums of money, carriages, horses, arms, and all sorts of military stores, sent him to command the troops posted in the neighbourhood of Holwân. But he had no sooner reached the opposite bank of the Tigris, than he took to his heels, in order to make his escape. Of which Al Amîn being apprized, he immediately sent a detachment in pursuit of him; which at last coming up with him, after a brave defence, cut him to pieces, and brought his head to the Khalîf. Two of his servants also that attended him, and in conjunction with him behaved with such unparalleled resolution, that they several times repulsed the above-mentioned detachment, met with the same fate <sup>1</sup>.

Thaber takes In the mean time, Thaber Ebn Hosein made a most rapid progress with the troops under his command. Having advanced to Abwâz, and attacked a body of the Khalîf's forces posted there, as has been already observed, he obliged them to retire; though the action by no means ended in their intire defeat. However, it so intimidated the commandant of Abwâz, that he thought fit to surrender that fortress to him. This opened him a way to Wâset upon the Tigris, and facilitated the conquest of that place. After which, he marched with his army to Al Madâyen, almost within sight of Baghdâd; the inhabitants of which town opened their gates to receive him, upon the first news of his approach. The rapidity of these conquests, and Al Amîn's infamous administration, excited the people of Egypt, Syria, Hejâz, and Yaman, unanimously to declare for Al Mamûn, who was thereupon immediately proclaimed Khalîf in all those provinces. All things thus apparently tending to a revolution, that prince took upon him to constitute several governors of provinces, and in particular appointed Ayâd Ebn Mohammed to preside, in the room of Hâtem Ebn Hartbema Ebn Aasan, whom he deprived of the government of that country, over the people of Egypt. He also made the proper dispositions for improving the vast advantages he had gained, and even for putting an end to the war in which he found himself engaged the following campaign <sup>m</sup>.

Some dirhems To furnish the powers engaged in this war with proper supplies, large quantities both of dirhems and dinârs were probably coined in several of the principal cities of the Moslem empire, the present year. That some dirhems were struck at Ispahân, or Isfabân, the capital of Persia, we learn from one of them found near the coast of the Baltick in 1722. This city, called by the orientals Isfebân, Isfabân, Esfabân, Asfebân, Isbehân, Asbehân, Spabân, Suffibân, and Esbahâna, seems to be the Aspa of Ptolemy, placed in Parthia by that geographer, though he assigns it and the adjacent places a greater latitude than the eastern astronomers and geographers; most of whom place Ispahân in latitude 32° 25', and longitude 86° 40'. This conjecture is not a little countenanced by the affinity of names, as Spahân,

- a Asfehân, Isfabân, Ispabân, &c. must be allowed very deducible from Aspa; tho' Al Bicri seems to derive those names from Ispâb, in the plural Ispabân, which in Arabic denotes militia, troops, &c. because, according to him, the Parthians assembled all their forces, drawn out of Persia, Kermân, and Abwâz, at this place. Some of the oriental writers have ranked Ispabân amongst the cities belonging to the fourth climate; tho', if we will believe Hamdalla, it has a better title given it to the third by its situation. It stands in a very extensive plain, furrounded by mountains, and has eight districts appertaining to it, that contain about 400 towns and villages. The fertility of the soil, the mildness of the seasons, and the fine temperature of the air, all conspire to render Ispabân one of the most charming and delightful cities in the world; for which reason, Ismael Sûfi, the first prince
- b of the last royal family of Persia, that lost all its power and influence in that country by the dethroning of the late Shâh Hosein, when he came to it, gave it the title of Dar Affultana, or the royal seat. Shâh Abbâs also, his great grandson, was so taken with its pleasant situation, that he fixed his residence there. After which, this city was adorned with a superb edifice, called by the Persians Dawlat-khâna, the royal palace, a spacious market-place, a stately mosque, a noble garden divided into four parts, an extensive hippodrome, and a royal park, or place, where wild beasts were kept, consisting of 1000 acres of ground. It soon likewise received such farther accessions of grandeur, as enabled it to lift up its head above all the other cities of Persia. The three principal suburbs annexed to it are, Abbâs-abâd, denominated likewise the mansion of the Taurisians, built by Shâh Abbâs,
- c and belonging to the people of Tauris; Julfa, inhabited by a colony of Armenians, called by some New Julfa, there having been an antient city going under the same name in Armenia, upon the Araxes; and Ghebr-abâd, or, as the Arabs pronounce it, Kebr-abâd, the street of the Magians, occupied intirely by the professors of Magism, or the antient religion of the Persians. The river Zenderoud, having its source on mount Dimarwend, separates the city of Ispabân and Abbâs-abâd from Julfa and Ghebr-abâd; besides which, another river, called Abi Kûren, by means of a passage made for it through mount Dimarwend by Shâh Abbâs, formerly watered part of the neighbouring tract, and united its streams with those of the Zenderoud. Some authors relate, that there are, or formerly were, two other streets, or suburbs, belonging to Ispabân; and that the Persians have a common saying amongst
- d them, importing, that this city is half of the world. The district of Ispabân, which is in Al Jebâl, or the Persian Irâk, is bounded on the east by Kbûzestân, the Susiana of the antients, whose metropolis Tuster, situated in a plain, answers to the Susa of Herodotus, Pliny, and Strabo, and the Shushan of Scripture; and on the south by the town of Semîram, that stands at almost an equal distance from this capital and Shîrâz, the metropolis of Fârs, Fârsistân, or, as the antient Persians pronounced it, Pârs. At first the spot on which Ispabân stands was occupied by four towns, or streets, going under the names of Kirân, Koshec, Jûbâra, and Derdeshta, built by Tabmurath, surnamed the Demoniac, because he was supposed to have vanquished and bound the devil, and Jamshîd. The Persian writers pretend, that Kayko-bâd, the founder of the Kayanian dynasty, was the first king of Persia who fixed his residence here, where he chose his sepulchre; though, according to them, it did not long enjoy the prerogative of capital of that kingdom. Others relate, that the Jews, after their dispersion over Affyria, and some of the neighbouring provinces, being drawn hither by the salubrity of the water, built a small town near another, named Jiey, which was afterwards greatly enlarged, and became a city of very considerable note. Hence it came to pass, that Tâkût styled Ispabân the larger city of the Jews, in order to distinguish it from Jiey, two miles distant from it, that had also received the denomination of the Jewish city, or rather the lesser Jewish city; and hence a probable reason may be assigned why the Persians and Armenians should affirm, that Ispabân had antiently the name of Jûsh. Some authors maintain, that the word Ispabân, or Sipabân, denoted cavalry; and that it was
- f applied as a name to the city so called, because the antient kings of Persia assembled their cavalry, in which the principal strength of their armies consisted, here. The greatest part of the Persian historians attribute the foundation of Ispabân either to Hushenk, or Houshenk, or to Tabmurath, two Persian kings of the dynasty of Pishdâd. It lost its title of capital of Persia by the translation of the royal seat, in the days of the Khosrû's, first to Susa, afterwards to Estakbr, or Istakbra, the antient Persepolis, and lastly to Al Madâyen upon the Tigris. However, in process of time, it recovered this; for Jalâloddîn Mâlec Shâh, one of the Seljukian princes, quitted Khorasân and the Arabian Irâk, where his predecessors had seated themselves, in order to fix his residence in this city. Nevertheless, it was afterwards obliged to leave this honour, upon the decline of the Seljukian dynasty, to Shîrâz, which the Modhafferian, or Mothafferian, Soltâns of Persia had made the capital of their dominions in the days of Tamerlan; tho' after Ismael Sûfi had seated himself upon the Persian throne, it grew more flourishing than ever, and was not only made by his descendants the metropolis of Persia, but likewise one of the most magnificent cities of Asia; especially after Shâh

Abbās I. had joined to it the suburbs, or streets, above-mentioned, and established there a several colonies of Georgians, Ghebrs, and Armenians <sup>a</sup>.

The modern state of Ispahān
before the commencement of the rebellion
in 1721.

WITH regard to the modern state of Ispahān, before the commencement of the dreadful rebellion in the year 1721, since which time the once flourishing kingdom of Persia has been almost one continued scene of blood, ravages, and confusion, in order to give our curious readers a general idea of it, we shall here beg leave to lay down the following particulars. This city was distinguished, no less for the magnificence of its buildings, than for the vast tract it inclosed; the circumference having been ordinarily computed at twenty-four miles, including its gardens and suburbs. It was situated in a plain to the north of the Zenderoud, which separated it from Julfa and Ghebr-abād, as already observed. The source of this river is distant only three days journey: there are various accounts concern- b ing the course of it; but it is agreed to be of very small extent. Abbās the Great caused a chanel to be cut through the mountains, thirty leagues distant; by which means the waters of the river Mahmoud Ker, called by some of the eastern geographers Abi Kūren, as has been above remarked, were conveyed into the Zenderoud; which renders it, according to a very curious modern traveller, as wide and deep, upon the melting of the snows in the spring, as the Seine is in the winter at Paris. This work, which was carried on by some thousands of men, was finished in fourteen years time, at an immense expence. There is a communication between the two banks of the river by different bridges. The largest and finest was that of Julfa: it was 360 geometrical paces in length, and thirteen in breadth; the two extremities of it were flanked by four round towers, with a covered gallery, which c ranged on both sides the length of the bridge; the whole decorated with the richest ornaments of Persian architecture. It was joined by two causeways, made with a gentle descent to a double row of trees, above 3000 paces long. This delightful alley was lined with terrasses and plane trees: it was called Toherbag, or four gardens, and bordered with gardens belonging to the king. The length of it was terminated by a large pavilion towards the town, and on the opposite side by a building, in the royal garden, called Hazar Jerib, or thousand gardens. The town, or suburb, of Julfa on the one side, and that of Abbās-abād on the other, stretched along the Zenderoud. From the bridge of Julfa to the bridge of Abbās-abād was about a mile and a half. The last received its name from the neighbour- d ing suburb, and served as a communication to the western extremity of the town. The bridge of Barbaroui, which was less distant than that of Abbās-abād from the bridge of Julfa, was the third met with descending: like the latter, it was lined with galleries, and not so much inferior to it in architecture as in length. About a mile further, advancing eastward, was the bridge of Shîrâz, or Shirafs, so denominated, because it was the road-way from Ispahān to that city; and near it was the village of Cheerestān. The city of Ispahān, or Isfahān, was then in its highest pitch of splendor, and esteemed the largest, if we except some of the cities of China, and most magnificent in Asia, with 600,000 inhabitants, exclu- sive of those crowds who had fled thither for shelter from different parts of the open coun- try, and were reckoned near 100,000 souls. Julfa was a town situated only a mile and a half south of Ispahān, on the south banks of the river Zenderoud, or fresh river; on the side c of which it extended almost three miles. The Armenians having revolted against the Turks, in the reign of Abbās the Great, and submitted to that prince, he removed part of the inhabitants of Armenia into different provinces of Persia. Those of the antient Julfa, a town on the banks of the Aras, or Araxes, were transported to Ispahān, from whence they afterwards removed, and settled in this place; to which they gave the name of their former residence. The people who had been drawn from Erivan, Shirvan, and the lower Armenia, had settled in the other suburbs of Ispahān; but Abbās, desirous of improving this new colony, obliged them to remove to Julfa, together with some Persees of the neighbourhood of Kermān and Yezd; by which means, four new quarters were formed. Most of the Persees took occasion f to retire from thence; so that of 1500 families, which were at first computed in their quarter, there remained only 300, all composed of artificers and labouring-men. But the Armenians, being an industrious active people, applied themselves to commerce, and, by their care, this colony soon arose to a flourishing condition. They were greatly encouraged by Abbās, and some of his successors, insomuch that Julfa had the appearance of a republic, founded in the midst of a foreign nation. But the Persian court at length, forgetful of its own interests, grew tired of favouring them; and, in Shâh Hosein's reign, their privileges, which had suffered some diminution under his predecessors, fell into contempt. This was the situation of the Armenians at Julfa, whose colony there, by such conduct, was reduced

- a to a pretty low ebb, when the surprising revolution happened in Persia, in the year 1722 ; of which, together with its dreadful consequences, the world has been but too well apprized. However, if we will believe a very celebrated modern author, who was himself upon the spot, the inhabitants of Julfa amounted to 30,000 souls, had thirteen churches, and above an hundred priests, and paid the Persian court 200 tomans yearly for the free exercise of their religion, not many years before that tragical event happened. Abbâs-abâd is situated to the west of the city, and derived its name from Abbâs the Great, its founder, and has always, at least for the most part, been inhabited by Mohammedans. Ghebr-abâd was intirely occupied by the Magians, or Persees, of whose religious tenets we have already given a full and ample account, who are said to have retained the same habit and attire that were used
- b in the days of the antient Persian kings, and to have amounted lately to about 600 families, consisting only of labourers and farmers. Some of the streets were broad, handsome, and of a very considerable length ; such were many of those that composed Abbâs-abâd, some of those that formed the town of Julfa, and a few of those belonging to Ghebr-abâd ; but others of them were narrow, crooked, aloft, and arched, to the great conveniency of those walking in them. Others of them again, though extremely narrow, as well as turning and winding many ways, were of an incredible length, and resembled so many labyrinths. The broad and handsome streets were frequently beautified with trees planted in them, with fountains and canals in the middle of them. At a small distance from the town there were likewise public walks, adorned with rows of plane-trees on each side, ways paved with
- c stone, fountains, and cisterns. There were also above an hundred caravansera's, for the use of merchants and travellers, many of which were built by the king and prime nobility of Persia. The ground was plain and even, except in that part of the city bordering upon the river, which seemed a little lower, and approaching nearer a sort of descent, than the rest. As very little rain fell here, the streets of Ispahân were frequently full of dust ; which circumstance rendered this place disagreeable, during a considerable part of the year. However, in order to remove this inconvenience, or at least to make it more tolerable, the citizens often watered them in the summer-time, and whenever the weather was warmer than usual here. The natives admired a castle in the eastern part of the town, which they took to be impregnable, and called Kalabi-berûk, that is, the citadel of benediction. The public
- d money, and most of the military stores, were said to be kept here ; for which reason it went amongst some by the name of Jébbekhoneh, the armory, or magazine. The building was itself extremely rude, and the penthouses belonging to it resembled a human nose. The baths and caravansera's, or inns, of lesser note in this city were almost innumerable, though there was but one public hospital, which was capable of containing a pretty large number of infirm people. Most of the public buildings were rather neat than magnificent ; though the great Meidan, or market-place, called by the Persians Meidan-besorg, the royal palace, and the alley denominated Tober-bag, adjoining to it, made a very grand appearance. The Meidan-besorg was 660 paces long, and 212 broad ; and was situated in the south-west part of the city. The antient Meidan, or market-place, going under the name of Meidan-koboneh,
- e was 300 paces long, and 100 broad ; and had its situation likewise in the south-western quarter of the town. The former Meidan inclosed the royal mosque, called the mosque of the Imâm Al Mohdi ; the building denominated Kaiserieh, where all sorts of foreign commodities were exposed to sale ; and the mint stiled by the Persians Serraab-khoneh, where the current money of the kingdom was coined. Besides the native Persians, there were, according to Dr. Kæmpfer, who resided some time here, in Ispahân, not many years since, above 10,000 Indians, all supported by trade ; 20,000 Georgians, Circassians, or Cherkassians, and Tartars of Dagestan, or Lesgees ; a considerable number of English, Dutch, and Portuguese, together with a few of the French nation. The Capuchins, Discalceated Carmelites, Jesuits, Dominicans, and Austin Friars, had likewise their convents here ; though they found it impossible to
- f make any converts in this place. The mosques and public colleges amounted to above an hundred, when Dr. Kæmpfer was in this city. It may not be improper to observe, that Ispahân has produced an incredible number of learned men, amongst whom the following seem to merit our principal regard : Abu Ismael Tograi, a celebrated poet, and privy-counsellor to Al Mûlec Mas'ûd Ebn Mohammed Ebn Mûlec Shûb Al Seljûki ; whose fifty-nine verses, ending in L.I. were published by the learned Dr. Pocock, at Oxford, in 1661. Shams-addîn Mahmûd Ebn Abu'l Kâsem Al Asbâri, who wrote a commentary upon the Korân, and annotations upon Al Beidawi's commentary on that book, besides several other treatises of good repute. The first of the pieces here mentioned is said to contain every thing valuable in the Kesbaf of Al Zamakhsbâri. Abu'l Kâsem Ismael Al Esfahâni, who composed a piece, intitled, Targhib wa-Tarhib, i. e. concerning the things that are to be sought after, or avoided. A
- g copy of this is to be seen in the French king's library. Sbarf-addîn Abd'al Mo'men Shakerûn Ebn Hebatallah, who wrote a piece, intitled, Athbâk adksdkscheb, i. e. Golden leaves, containing the lives of some of the most pious Mohammedans. Abu'l Faraj Ali Ebn Hosein Al Esfahâni, who published a treatise upon the morals of travellers, as likewise the life of

Jahedh, of the family of Barmac, and a piece exhibiting the conduct of the most illustrious men of Persia. Abu'l Kâsem Hasan Ebn Mohammed, who penned a book, intitled, Akblâk Ragheb, i. e. The manners and disposition of a curious person. Abu Nâim Ahmed Abd'allah, who wrote a treatise containing his sentiments of the qualities of a sincere friend; wherein he gave a true portrait of many persons who deserved that character. Mohammed Ebn Ibrahim, who wrote upon the forty traditions. Kamal-addin Al Esfabâni, a celebrated poet, who obliged his countrymen with an elogy upon Soltân Jalâl'oddin, and some other works held in good esteem. Mohammed Ebn Ishak Ebn Mandab Al Esfabâni, who composed the history of the city of Ispahân. Omad Al Khattâb Abu Abd'allah Mohammed, who compiled a history to which he prefixed the title of The splendor of Syria. He likewise drew up certain annotations and questions upon the Sonna. Abu Thâber Ahmed Ebn Mohammed Salefi Al Esfabâni, who drew up a piece, intitled, The forty traditions applied to travellers. Abu Zakaria Tabya Ebn Abd'allah Al Esfabâni, sometimes called Ebn Mandab, who wrote the history of Ispahân, and the circumjacent region. Kawâm-addin, Dawd Al Esfabâni, and many other eminent writers, whose names and works we are not permitted so much as to mention by the limits prescribed us here °.

SINCE the fatal period above-mentioned, the suburb of Julfa has been almost totally abandoned by the Armenians, who inhabited it in very considerable numbers before. The government of Ispahân, twenty-four leagues long, and as many broad, comprehending the districts of Techi, Marbin, Kieraridge, Kahab, Baraan, Perbavar, Elkhan, and Roundester, some of which were formerly well peopled, appeared a few years since little better than a desert; most of the inhabitants of that fertile and delightful tract being fled or dispersed. Multitudes of them had taken a precarious refuge in the mountains of Loristân, or Lûristân, a particular territory lying between Ispahân and Tuster; whose lands were left untilld, and their houses mouldered into ruins. In short, all the distresses of an unsuccessful war, or the invasion of a barbarous enemy, could not have plunged the people of Ispahân into greater misery than the victories of their tyrannical king, Nadir Shâh, who seemed more solicitous to humble his own subjects than his enemies. M. Kehr gives us to understand, that the name Ispahân was deduced from the word Sabahan, Sabians, “because,” says he, “many Sabians, Magians, or fire-worshippers, have their habitations in this city.” But nothing certainly can be farther fetched than this; as the Sabians and Magians, whom he here absurdly confounds, are two very different sects; the former paying an adoration either to the stars, or the angels and intelligences which they suppose reside in them, and govern the world under the Supreme Deity; and the latter thinking fire worthy of divine honours. Besides, though the Magians, or Persees, with whom, according to him, Ispahân abounds, might at first have settled here in great numbers; yet this can by no means be allowed to hold true of the Sabians, who were by far more numerous in other parts of the east than in Persia, where Magism principally, if not solely, prevailed. Nor has Ispahân, at least, for several ages, abounded with Magians, or Persees, as this author pretends, in support of his hypothesis; that sect having been, ever since the reign of Abbâs I. confined to the suburb of Ghebr-abâd, as has been already observed. The latitude of Ispahân has been defined by Dr. Kämpfer to be  $32^{\circ} 40'$ ; whereas this city has been placed by Nassir Eddin, or Nassir Khoja Al Tûsi, and Ulugh Beigh, or Olugh Bek, in latitude  $32^{\circ} 25' P$ .

Description of the above-mentioned dirhêm.

THAT a mint was erected here, and consequently that Ispahân was a town of considerable note, in the earlier times of Mohammedism, though it made a much more considerable figure in later ages, the aforesaid dirhêm itself, exclusive of what might be collected on this head from the eastern writers, is a sufficient proof. This dirhêm exhibits the words Benedinati Esfabâna setten wates'ina wameâten, i. e. In the city of Ispahân, 196; and on the reverse, Mohammed is the apostle of God, all direction is from God. The last of which expressions is apparently equivalent to the following assertion, God alone is the true leader and director. As the two Arabic terms in the inscription importing this may either be read Lellabi sarifaton, or Lellabi sarimaton, for saramaton, they may either be rendered All direction is from God, or In God is strength; the last of which versions makes the words perfectly equivalent to the following aphorism of the Mohammedans, Lâ haula wala kuwata élla bellâhi, i. e. There is no strength or fortitude but in God. As neither the name of Al Amîn, nor that of Al Mamûn, occurs in this dirhêm, we cannot certainly say by which of those princes partisans it was coined. However, as Thâber Ebn Hojein reduced Abwâz, as well

- a as Wâset and Al Madâyen upon the Tigris, and obliged the province of Fârs to submit to Al Mamûn in 196, the city of Ispahân must undoubtedly have opened its gates to that prince's troops the same year<sup>a</sup>.

THE next year, being the 197th of the Hejra, Al Mamûn's forces, under the command of Al Mamûn's Thâber Ebn Hosein and Harthema Ebn Aafan, appeared upon the banks of the Tigris, in the <sup>forces from the</sup> neighbourhood of Baghdâd, and formed the siege of that capital. As the Khalîf Al Amîn <sup>siege of Bagh-</sup> dâd, himself was shut up in the place, and it had a numerous garison, the besieged made a vigorous defence, and destroyed the enemy abundance of men. The besiegers, however, played upon the town incessantly with their catapults, and were in their turn not a little annoyed by the garison with the same sort of military machines. The latter likewise made

b continual sallies, and fought like men animated by despair, though they were always at last beaten back into the town with considerable loss. In fine, the siege continued through the whole course of this year; during which, the greatest part of the city called Asker Al Mohdi, or the camp of Al Mohdi, erected on the eastern bank of the Tigris, was either demolished or reduced to ashes by Al Mamûn's troops. The citizens also, as well as the garison, were reduced to the last extremity by the length and violence of the siege. The subjects of Al Hakem seem to have enjoyed this year a profound tranquillity and repose throughout the whole extent of the Moslem dominions in Spain<sup>c</sup>.

IN the beginning of the 198th year of the Hejra, commencing September 1st, 813, the Al Amîn Khalîf Al Amîn, having been deserted by his troops, as well as the principal men of Bagh- <sup>assassinated.</sup> dâd, who had kept a private correspondence with Thâber Ebn Hosein, found himself obliged to retire to the old town on the western bank of the Tigris, called the city of Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr. However, he did not take this step before the citizens of Baghdâd, intimidated by Thâber Ebn Hosein, had formally deposed him, and proclaimed his brother Al Mamûn Khalîf. Thâber, receiving advice of this, caused that town to be immediately invested, planted his catapults against it, and at last starved it to a surrender. Al Amîn, being thus reduced to the necessity of putting himself into the hands of one of Al Mamûn's generals, chose to implore the protection of Harthema Ebn Aafan, whom he judged to be of a more humane disposition than Thâber Ebn Hosein; which having obtained, he embarked in a shallop, or small vessel, upon the Tigris, in order to arrive at that part of the camp

d where Harthema was posted. But Thâber, being informed of his design, which he imagined, if carried into execution, would eclipse the glory he had acquired, laid an ambush for him, which he had not the good fortune to escape. Upon his arrival in the neighbourhood of Harthema's tent, Thâber's soldiers rushed out upon him, sunk his boat, drowned all his attendants, and incarcerated him in Ibrahim Al Talbi's house. Here he was soon after massacred by some of Thâber's servants, who cut off his head, and carried it in triumph to their master; by whose order it was the next day exposed to public view in the streets of Baghdâd. Thâber afterwards sent it to Al Mamûn in Khorasân, together with the ring or seal of the Khalîfat, the scepter, and the imperial robe; at the sight of which, that prince fell down on his knees, returned thanks to the ALMIGHTY for his good success, and made the e courier who brought them a present of a million of dirhems<sup>c</sup>.

SOME of the eastern writers relate, that Al Amîn, a little before his death, imagined him- <sup>Some farther</sup> self in a dream to sit upon a very high thick wall, and saw, as he thought, at the same <sup>particulars re-</sup> time Thâber sapping its foundations. Nor did he appear to desist from that operation, till the wall he undermined was absolutely levelled with the ground. This had such an effect upon Al Amîn, as the Arabs are naturally superstitious, that he resolved never to deliver himself up to the mercy of that general. Other prognostics likewise, according to the oriental historians, preceded this prince's death. Finding a moth in his cloaths the very day he was killed, as soon as he saw it, through an unaccountable impulse, he cried out, God deliver me from every great misfortune that may happen! Ibrahim Ebn Al Mohdi being

f one night along with him, a little before the surrender of old Baghdâd, called the city of Al Mansûr, in the golden palace there, he sent for one of his singing girls, named Da'f, to entertain them with some of her songs. After they had exhilarated themselves with a few glasses of wine, she sung some verses taken out of the works of the celebrated poet Al Nabigha Al Ja'di, that have been preserved by Al Makîn; which he could not forbear considering as presages of his approaching fate, and which obliged him to speak with a sigh the following words: When destiny defeats our projects, we ought to look upon as useless all precautions. The same night, which did not precede this prince's murder above two or three days,

Ibrahim Ebn Al Mohdi and the Khalif heard a voice clearly and distinctly pronouncing these words, from the neighbouring bank of the Tigris, The subject of your consultation is determined; which, being afterwards repeated, threw the latter into such an excess of inquietude and grief, that he immediately fell out of his seat. We are told by Abu'l Faraj, that Al Amin was supplied with the vessel in which he attempted to escape out of Thaber's hands, by Hartbema Ebn Aasan himself, who attended him therein; that Thaber's men, who gave chase to them in little boats, attacked them with stones and naphtha, and at last sent their shallop to the bottom of the river; that Hartbema was with much difficulty saved, being dragged out of the Tigris by the hair of his head; that the Khalif was taken with only an old ragged mantle over his shoulders, his breeches on, and a turban upon his head, at no very great distance from Basra; that he was incarcerated in a house, to which Thaber's soldiers conducted him, till midnight; and that several Persians, sent by Thaber for that purpose, then entering the room wherein he was confined, with drawn scymitars in their hands, immediately dispatched him, and cut off his head, which was soon after carried by a courier to Al Mamun in Khorasan. The aforesaid tragedy was acted either on the twenty-fifth or twenty-sixth day of the month Al Moharram, before Al Amin had completed the thirtieth year of his age, and after he had reigned four years and about seven or eight months. He had a handsome face, little eyes, and thick bushy hair. He was tall, fat, extremely robust, and of a fair complexion. Some of the eastern writers have represented him as vastly liberal, though at the same time as rash, imprudent, cruel, intirely attached to his pleasures, and indolent to the last degree. As a farther instance of his infamous supineness, it may be observed, that he and his freed-man Kutbar were playing at chess, without the least apprehension of any impending danger, when Al Mamun's forces pushed the siege of Baghdad with so much vigour that the city was upon the point of being carried by assault. Soon after his accession, he purchased for large sums of money great numbers of eunuchs, who were brought from all parts of his dominions to Baghdad, constantly attended him day and night, and had, together with his free women, of whom he was likewise extremely fond, the principal share of his favours. Nay, he is said to have divided all his jewels, besides many other things of inestimable value, amongst them. He also commanded the different provinces of the empire to send to his court all such persons as were the most expert at chess, and other games then in vogue amongst the Arabs, allowed them pensions, and spent the most considerable part of his time amongst them. Of the vessels which he constructed on the Tigris, one resembled a lion, another an elephant, another a vultur, another a serpent, and another an horse. He scarce ever associated either with his officers or relations; but gave himself up almost intirely to women (ten of which, that understood music, used frequently to perform on the lute together before him) wine, and diversions of various kinds. His principal counsellors, or Vizirs, were Al Fadl Ebn Al Rabi, Ismael Ebn Sabih, and others; his judges, Ismael Ebn Hamad Ebn Abu Hanifa, Abu'l Bakra Ebn Wahab, and Mohammed Ebn Sama'a; the captain of his guards Ali Ebn Isa Ebn Maban; and his chamberlain Al Abbas Al Fadhl Ebn Al Razi. The inscription of his seal was, Mohammed trusteth in God. In his days, according to Eutychius, the emperor Nicephorus departed this life; and, in the third year of his Khalifat, if we will believe the same author, Thomas, surnamed Tamrik, was advanced to the patriarchate of Jerusalem, in which sublime station he remained about ten years. In fine, as this Khalif, whose body was buried at Baghdad, most shamefully neglected all affairs of government, no very memorable event, or action of éclat, happened, during the whole course of his reign<sup>1</sup>.

S E C T. XXVIII.

He is succeeded by his brother
Al Mamun.

THE same day that Al Amin was assassinated, the people of Baghdad proclaimed his brother Al Mamun the second time Khalif. His mother was Marajel Al Badagheisia. At the time of Al Amin's death, Thaber Ebn Hosein occupied the eastern, and Hartbema Ebn Aasan, the western part of Baghdad. Hamid Abd'al Hamid Al Tusi was posted also with a body of troops at a place about four parasangs from that city. Soon after his accession, the new Khalif removed Thaber Ebn Hosein, whom he appointed to preside over Syria and Mesopotamia, from the government of Irak, and substituted Al Hosein Ebn Sabal in his room. He likewise deprived Ayad Ebn Mohammed of the lieutenancy of Egypt, and sent Al Motaleb Ebn Abd'allah Al Ferai to succeed him in that post; but this governor being soon deposed, Al Abbas Ebn Musa Ebn Isa Al Hashemi was dispatched to Egypt, to take upon himself the direction of affairs there. About the same time, the new Khalif, whose name at length was

- a was Abu'l Abbās Al Mamūn Abu Jaafar Abd'allah Ebn Harūn Al Rashīd constituted Al Fadl Ebn Sabal his Visir; or rather, according to the Persian historians, confirmed him in that exalted charge, to which he had advanced him before his elevation to the Moslem throne. The Khalif also gave Al Fadl the title, or surname, of Dbī'l Riyāsatain, i. e. the person having two principalities, or sublime employments, because he committed to his care the civil and military government of all his dominions <sup>u</sup>.

THE following year, being the 199th of the Hejra, commencing August 21st, 814, the Mohammed new Khalif, who resided still at Merū in Khorasān, was alarmed with the news of commo- Ebn Tabātībā rebels against the Khalif. tions brought him from several parts of the empire; the most dreadful of which was that excited by Mohammed Ebn Ibrahim Ebn Ismael Ebn Ibrahim Ebn Al Hasan Ebn Al Hosein Ebn

- b Ali Ebn Abu Tāleb, commonly called Mohammed Ebn Tabātībā, at Cūfa. The people of that city being incensed at Al Mamūn, for permitting Al Fadl Ebn Sabal, his Visir, to manage all things solely by his own authority, were easily prevailed upon by Mohammed Ebn Tabātībā to espouse the interest of the house of Ali, or, as they termed it, that of the prophet himself. Mohammed, therefore, found it no difficult matter to assemble a considerable body of the malecontents; the command of which he gave to Abu'lsarāyā, an officer who had served under Harthema Ebn Aasan, the preceding year. This officer, not thinking himself rewarded according to his merit, left Harthema in disgust, retired to Cūfa, and took the oath of allegiance to Mohammed Ebn Tabātībā, as the prophet's lawful successor, there. Being now at the head of his new master's forces, he drove Al Hasan Ebn Sabal's deputy c from Cūfa, and in several engagements defeated the troops sent against him by the Khalif's governor of Irāk. This enabled him to advance to Basra, which he possessed himself of without any considerable loss. By these signal advantages, Mohammed Ebn Tabātībā's forces, under the conduct of Abu'lsarāyā, began to grow formidable, and to give no small inquietude to the Khalif; especially since the scene of action, as well as the neighbouring tract now wholly occupied by the rebels, was situated at so small a distance from the city of Baghdād itself <sup>w</sup>.

- It seems to appear from Roderic of Toledo, that the people of Calaborra, the Calaguris of d the antients, rebelled likewise, about this time, against Al Hakem, the western Khalif, in Spain. Upon receiving advice of which revolt, that prince sent Abd'alkarim, one of his generals, with an army to bring them to a sense of their duty. It may also be inferred from Theophanes, that one usurper made himself master of Damascus, with the territory appertaining to it, another ravaged Palestine, a third set up for himself in Egypt, and a fourth in the western part of Africa, the present year. But we shall content ourselves with barely mentioning these rebellions here, as no clear and distinct account of them has been handed down to us by any of the Arab historians <sup>x</sup>.

- THE next year, being the 200th of the Hejra, was remarkable for several material occurrences that happened in it. Hasan Ebn Sabal, the governor of Irāk, having finished his military preparations for reducing the rebels of that province to the obedience of the Khalif, sent Harthema Ebn Aasan with a powerful army against Abu'lsarāyā; who, after the e death of Mohammed Ebn Tabātībā, had caused the authority of Mohammed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Zeid Ebn Ali Ebn Al Hosein Ebn Ali Ebn Abu Tāleb to be recognized by the troops under his command. Abu'lsarāyā, finding himself not able to make head against the Khalif's forces, fled to Cūfa, and even abandoned that city upon their approach. After Harthema Ebn Aasan had possessed himself of the place, and taken the inhabitants under his protection, he sent a detachment in pursuit of Mohammed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Zeid and Abu'lsarāyā, who had made their escape; which soon came up with them, took both of them prisoners, and conducted them, by Harthema's order, to Al Hasan Ebn Sabal, the governor of Irāk. Several of their accomplices likewise, who were taken at the same time, attended them, under the same escorte, to the governor's residence. After they had been brought f before him, and he had had some conversation with them, Al Hasan sent Mohammed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Zeid to Al Mamūn, then at Merū in Khorasān; but ordered one of his executioners to cut off the head of Abu'lsarāyā. Notwithstanding what is insinuated to the contrary by Theophanes, the province of Egypt seems to have enjoyed a profound repose under the administration of Al Motallab Ebn Abd'allah, who succeeded his predecessor Al Abbās Ebn Mūsā Al Hāskemi, and Assari Ebn Al Hakem, both this and the preceding year. After the extinction of the rebellion in Irāk, Harthema Ebn Aasan took a journey to the Khalif's court at Merū; where he accused Al Fadl Ebn Sabal, his Visir, of concealing from him the true state of his affairs, and advised him to reside at Baghdād, that he might be, as it were, in the centre of his empire, and consequently much nearer the greatest part of a his frontiers. On the other hand, Al Fadl, being apprized of this accusation, told the Khalif, that Harthema had excited Abu'lsarâya to the late revolt, and done him many ill offices in other respects. This so exasperated Al Mamûn, that he commanded Harthema to be first severely drubbed, and afterwards thrown into prison; where he was soon put to death by an assassin sent thither by Al Fadl for that purpose. About the same time, Abd'alkarim, after he had besieged Calahorra in Spain, obliged the people of that place to submit to Al Hakem, the western Khalif, and ravaged the territory belonging to them in a dreadful manner, returned to that prince's residence loaded with spoil. The calamities attending the distracted state of the Arabs at this juncture obliged many of the Christians, according to Theophanes, to abandon Palestine and Syria, and to take refuge in the island of Cyprus. b Ibrahim Ebn Mûsa Ebn Jaafar caused himself to be proclaimed Khalif in Yaman, as did Mohammed Ebn Jaafar at Mecca, the present year. But as neither of these usurpers was long supported in his attempt, the commotions in those parts were appeased without any great effusion of Moslem blood <sup>y</sup>.

In the 201st year of the Hejra, beginning July 30th, 816, Al Mamûn called Ali Ebn Mûsa Ebn Jaafar Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ali Ebn Al Hosein Ebn Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, after his death, to the succession, gave him his daughter Omm Habîba in marriage, and ordered him to repair immediately to his court at Merû in Khorasân. He also surnamed him Al Radi min Al Mohammed; alluding thereby to his being one of Ali's descendants, and of the family of Mohammed. He moreover commanded his troops to lay aside their black cloaths, c such as the members of the house of Al Abbâs constantly wore, and to put on others of a green colour, the principal characteristic of the prophet's family, in their room. He likewise wrote to the governors of provinces, to let them know, that he had found none either of the race of Al Abbâs or Ali more pious, excellent, or learned, than Ali Ebn Mûsa; and therefore had nominated that young prince to succeed him in the Khalifat. He sent an express to Al Hasan Ebn Sabal, the governor of Irâk, in particular, with orders to him to repair forthwith to Baghdâd, to oblige the inhabitants of that capital to dress themselves in green, and to exact of them a recognition of Ali Ebn Mûsa's right to the succession. This step, however, greatly alarmed the members of the house of Al Abbâs, who were found the preceding year to amount to above 30,000 souls, and threw the whole city into confu- d sion; many of the Moslems there absolutely refusing to comply with the Khalif's orders. Nay, the principal officers of the families of Al Abbâs and Hâshem assembled on this occasion, resolved formally to depose Al Mamûn, and to proclaim his uncle Ibrahim Ebn Al Mohdi emperor of the faithful in his room. It is intimated by some of the eastern writers, that Al Fadl Ebn Sabal, the first officer of the empire, made profession of the sect of Ali, entertained the highest veneration for the family of that Imâm, and inspired his master with the same sentiments; which produced the aforesaid impolitic conduct. It must here be observed, that the Shiites, or followers of Ali, look upon this Ali Ebn Mûsa as one of the twelve great Imâms, whom they regard as the twelve great pillars of Islamism. However, the measures pursued at this juncture by the Khalif now in view might have proved the e total ruin of his affairs <sup>z</sup>.

Ibrahim Ebn Al Mohdi proclaimed Khalif there.

THE following year, being the 202d of the Hejra, the forces cantoned about Baghdâd, excited to this revolt by the friends of the houses of Al Abbâs and Hâshem, withdrew their allegiance from Al Mamûn, and created his uncle, Ibrahim Ebn Al Mohdi, Khalif. However, the troops commanded by Al Hasan Ebn Sabal, the governor of Irâk, persisted in their fidelity to the former of those princes, and even attacked Ibrahim's forces several times; tho' nothing decisive happened on either side. After his inauguration, Ibrahim made a speech to the people; wherein, like others in the same situation, he promised them all the happiness and advantages that their hearts could desire. Upon which, Cûfa, with its dependencies, submitted to him. Ibrahim's exaltation, and the courage of his faithful f subjects in Irâk, hastened Al Mamûn's journey to Baghdâd. Upon his arrival at Sarkhas, or Sarakhas (which is undoubtedly the true reading in Al Makin) a town of Khorasân, and not at Baghdâd, as is intimated by some of the Persian historians, he gave private orders to an assassin to murder Al Fadl Ebn Sabal, his Visir, who had been the chief cause of all the disturbances in the empire, in a bath; and afterwards put the murderer to death, for the perpetration of a crime which he pretended to abhor. This Al Fadl is said to have been the first Arab who inserted his surname in the letters that he wrote. The people of Corduba in Spain rebelled this year against Al Hakem, the Khalif there; but were reduced to his obe-

a dience by Abd'alkarim, his general, who entered their city by force at the new gate, cut off all the ringleaders, hanged above 300 of the rebels, and suffered some of them to escape. Al Hakem, however, according to his usual clemency, pardoned the wives and children of those who had been concerned in the revolt. This rebellion is attributed by Roderic to the opulence, luxury, and pride, of the Moslems settled in that part of Spain <sup>a</sup>.

THE following year, being the 203d of the Hejra, commencing July 9th, 818, Ali Ebn Músa Al Radi, called by the Persians Riza the Imám, having taken a surfeit, by eating too many grapes, or, as others write, having been poisoned, died at Tús in Khorasán, the last day of the month Safer; and was buried, by Al Mamún's order, near the sepulchre of his father Harún Al Rashíd. This Ali Ebn Músa has been represented by the Arab writers as a most abstemious and religious youth. His death not a little affected the Khalif, who therefore continued the remainder of the year at Tús. In the mean time, great commotions happened at Baghdád. The troops there deposed Ibrahim Ebn Al Mobdi, surnamed by them Al Mobarak; who, in order to escape their fury and violence, was obliged to hide himself about the middle of the month Dhu'lhajja, and to remain concealed till Al Mamún's arrival at Baghdád. That usurper, whom some likewise call Ebn Shaklab, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, sat upon the Moslem throne at Baghdád almost two whole lunar years <sup>b</sup>.

THE next year, being the 204th of the Hejra, beginning June 28th, 819, the Khalif Al Mamún entered Baghdád, at the head of his forces that had attended him from Khorasán, and were all, in compliance with his former order, dressed in green. However, in about a week's time after his arrival at Baghdád, he thought fit to revoke the order he had made three years before, and to command both the people and the army always to appear in black, as heretofore; which produced the desired effect, and intirely conciliated the affections of all his subjects to him. This year was likewise remarkable for the death of the famous Abu Abd'allah Mohammed Ebn Edrís, surnamed Al Sháfí, the author of the third orthodox sect of the Sunnites. He was born either at Gaza or Ascalon in Palestine, in the year of the Hejra 150, the same day, as some will have it, that Abu Hanífa died, and was carried to Mecca at two years of age, and there educated. He died in Egypt, whither he went about five years before. Some authors relate, that he came to Baghdád in 195, and performed the pilgrimage to Mecca, from whence he returned in 198, and afterwards took a journey into Egypt, where he had formerly heard that celebrated doctor and Imám, Málek Ebn Ans. He is held in the highest repute amongst the Sunnites, for his excellency in all points of learning, and was much esteemed by Ebn Hanbal, his cotemporary, who used to say, that he was as the sun to the world, and as health to the body. Ebn Hanbal, however, had so ill an opinion of Al Sháfí at first, that he forbade his scholars to go near him; but some time after, one of them, meeting his master trudging on foot after Al Sháfí, who rode on a mule, asked him how it came about that he forbade them to follow him, and did it himself? To which Ebn Hanbal replied, Hold thy peace; if thou but attend his mule, thou wilt profit thereby. Al Sháfí is said to have been the first who discoursed of jurisprudence, and reduced that science into a method; one wittily saying, that the relators of the traditions of Mohammed were asleep, till Al Sháfí came and waked them. He was a great enemy to the scholastic divines, as has been observed by a good author. Al Ghazáli tells us, that Al Sháfí used to divide the night into three parts, one for study, another for prayer, and the third for sleep. It is also related of him, that he never so much as once swore by God, either to confirm a truth, or to affirm a falsehood; and that being once asked his opinion, he remained silent for some time, and when the reason of his silence was demanded, he answered, I am considering first whether it be better to speak or to hold my tongue. The following saying is recorded of him, viz. Whoever pretends to love the world and its Creator at the same time, is a liar. He also used to say, that for sixteen years together, he never rose from table satisfied, as imagining that a full meal would disqualify him both for study and devotion. We are informed, that when his mother was with child of him, she dreamed that the planet Jupiter fell out of her womb into Egypt, and that a part of it passed from thence into several other regions; from whence the interpreters of dreams, whom she consulted on this occasion, inferred, that she should be brought to bed of a son who should first instruct the Egyptians in all kinds of useful knowledge, and afterwards impart the same instruction to other nations. He wrote a book upon the foundations of Islamism, which comprized all the essentials both of the civil and canon law of the Moslems; as also two others, one of which was intitled Sunan, or Sunnan, and the other Mefnad, upon the same subject. His doctrine was held in such high repute amongst the Sunnites in the time of Saladin, that he founded a college at Cairo, or Al Kabirah, in which no other was permitted to be taught. The magnificent mosque and college erected at Herât in Khorasân by Gaya-tho'ddin, third Soltân of the Gaurian dynasty, was appropriated to the use of the doctors of Al Shâfeî's sect: and the doctors of the city of Farab, or Pariab, in the Transoxana, according to an eastern writer of good note, were all of the same sentiments. There is a history of these doctors, or followers of Al Shâfeî, that bears the title of Thabakat Al Shafeiât, in which they are ranged in different classes. The Shâfeîtes were formerly spread in Mawarâlnahr, and other parts eastward, but are at present almost intirely confined to Arabia. With regard to the Moslem traditions, it is said that Al Shâfeî received them from Mâlec Ebn Ans, and transmitted them to Zohari. For, it is looked upon as a point of no small importance by the Mohammedans to know the canal by which those traditions, that deduced their source from the prophet himself, have been conveyed down to them. We must not forget to inform our readers, that Affari Ebn Al Hakem likewise departed this life in Egypt, over which country he had been sent by Al Mamûn to preside, and was succeeded there by his son Mohammed Abunafr, the present year <sup>c</sup>.

The province of Khorasân is settled upon Thâher Ebn Hosein, and his descendants.

In the 205th year of the Hejra, commencing June 17th, 820, nothing very material happened in the Moslem empire, as far as can be collected from the oriental historians. We are told however, that Al Mamûn, now finding himself in peaceable possession of the Khalîfat, conferred this year upon Thâher, and his descendants, the government of Khorasân with almost an absolute and unlimited power, in order to recompence the signal services done him by that general. Some of the eastern writers also relate, that Al Shâfeî was alive, and continued to propagate his doctrine, as usual, throughout the whole course of the present year <sup>d</sup>.

Al Hakem and Mohammed Abunafr Ebn Affari die.

THE following year, being the 206th of the Hejra, Mohammed Abunafr Ebn Affari, lieutenant of Egypt, died at Meſr, or Al Fostât, and was succeeded by his brother Abd'allah Ebn Affari, whose pretensions to the government were supported by the soldiery. The same year, Al Hakem Ebn Heshâm Ebn Abd'alrahmân, of the house of Ommiyah, king of Spain, or rather the western Khalîf, likewise departed this life at Corduba, or Cordova, in the 27th year of his reign. He left behind him nineteen sons and twenty-one daughters, and was succeeded by his eldest son Abd'alrahmân, then about forty-one years of age. During some of the last years of Al Hakem's reign, the Christians, animated by the dissensions that reigned in the Moslem part of Spain, took Barcelona and other places, and committed dreadful ravages in their dominions. However, an end being put to those dissensions, Al Hakem was making preparations for war, in order to recover the places that had been lost, when he was surprized by death. But an accurate and particular account of the Moslem transactions in Spain, during this period, has not been handed down to us by any of either the eastern or western historians <sup>e</sup>.

As does likewise Thâher Ebn Hosein.

THE next year, being the 207th year of the Mohammedan æra, that renowned general Thâher Ebn Hosein died at Merû in Khorasân, after he had been two years governor of that vast province. He was liberal, prudent, magnanimous, and brave, and had all the great qualities requisite to form a consummate general. He is said, by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, to have given an Arab poet 300,000 dinârs for a few verses he brought him, intended as a panegyric upon some of his heroic actions; and to have told him, that he would have made him still a larger present, had his verses been more numerous. This Thâher Ebn Hosein, according to some of the oriental authors, was the founder of the dynasty of the Thâherians; for a particular account of which, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to the Persian historians. It appears from Cedrenus, that the Moslems of Spain had landed a body of troops in Crete, defeated the imperial forces sent against them, and made themselves masters of at least a considerable part of that island, before the present year <sup>f</sup>.

According to some authors, Al Shâfeî dies in 208.

WE meet with no remarkable events in the year of the Hejra 208, recorded by the eastern historians; unless we will admit, that the famous Abu Abd'allah Mohammed Ebn Edris Ebn Al Abbâs Ebn Othmân Ebn Shâfeî, surnamed Al Shâfeî, who, according to some, was born in Yaman, and of whom we have already given a particular account, died this year, as certain authors pretend <sup>g</sup>.

Abd'allah rebels against

In the year of the Hejra 209, nothing remarkable happened in the eastern territories of the Moslems; at least no material event has been mentioned as happening there at this

- a time by any of the most celebrated Arab historians. However, it appears probable from Abd'alrah-Roderic of Toledo, that Abd'allah, Al Makin's uncle, who had resided many years at Valencia, about this very time rebelled against Abd'alrahmán, that prince's son, who was then settled upon the Moslem throne in Spain. But Abd'alrahmán marched against him, dispersed the troops he had assembled, and forced him to betake himself to a precipitate flight; a few days after which defeat Abd'allah expired. The rebellion being thus extinguished, Abd'alrahmán ordered Abd'allah's wives and children to be brought before him, and very liberally supplied them with every thing they stood in need of. He likewise ordained, that, for the future, children should always inherit their parents estates and effects; and that these should never devolve to brothers and sisters, or other near relations, and much less to persons of another family, when issue was left by the deceased, as had sometimes formerly happened amongst the Moslems in Spain <sup>h</sup>.

THE following year, being the 210th of the Moslem æra, beginning April 24th, 845, Ibrahim Ebn Ibrahim Ebn Al Mohdi was taken in women's cloaths by night, together with two of his wives, in the latter Rabî, after he had lain concealed near seven years. The centry they attempted to pass, who was an Ethiopian, asked them who they were, and what they did there at so unseasonable an hour? The answer returned by Ibrahim Al Mohdi not being satisfactory, the centry carried them all three before the officer that was upon duty; who ordering Ibrahim's face to be uncovered, his beard immediately appeared. This induced the officer to send him under an escorte to the Khalif's palace, where he continued till the next morning under arrest; and being then brought before Al Mamûn, that prince not only pardoned him, but admitted him likewise to his entertainments, and made him a present of ten thousand dinârs. As to the particulars of the conference held between Ibrahim and the Khalif, on this occasion, as they have been related at large by Al Makin, we shall not insert them here, but refer our curious readers to that author himself for their farther satisfaction in this matter. This year Al Mamûn conferred the government of Egypt upon Abd'allah Ebn Thâber Ebn Hosein; who, towards the close of it, set out for that country from Baghdâd, in order to fix his residence there <sup>i</sup>.

THE next year, being the 211th of the Hejra, commencing April 13th, 826, Abd'allah Ebn Thâber Ebn Hosein arrived in Egypt, and, in the month of the former Rabî, entered upon the government there. After the amotion of Abd'allah Ebn Assari, he also appointed Ayâd Ebn Ibrahim his Visir. About this time, Abd'alkarim retook Barcelona from the Christians in Spain, and reduced the other places the Moslems had lost, during the continuance of their late dissensions. The Khalif likewise forbade all his subjects to make honourable mention of Moâwiyah, the first Khalif of the house of Ommîyah, and to prefer him to any of the prophet's companions, the same year <sup>k</sup>.

IN the 212th year of the Hejra, beginning April 2d, 827, Abd'allah Ebn Thâber Ebn Hosein removed Ayâd Ebn Ibrahim from the high office of Visir, and substituted in his room Isa Ebn Yezid. The Khalif likewise, this year, commanded his subjects to admit Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb to have been the most excellent of all men, except Mohammed. This happened in the month of the former Rabî. Nay, it seems probable from Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, that the Khalif Al Mamûn, at this time issued, out a public edict, declaring the Korân to be created, which was confirmed by his successor Al Môtasem and Al Wâthek, who whipt, imprisoned, and put to death, those of the contrary opinion. But, at length, Al Motawakkel, who succeeded Al Wâthek, put an end to these persecutions, by revoking the former edicts, releasing those that were imprisoned on that account, and leaving every man at liberty as to his belief in this point. We must not forget to observe, that the African Moslems made a descent in Sicily about the middle of the month July, the present year <sup>l</sup>.

THE following year, being the 213th of the Mohammedan æra, the Khalif Al Mamûn removed Abd'allah Ebn Thâber from the government of Egypt, and sent his brother Al Môtasem to take upon himself the government of that country, and Syria. He also appointed his son Al Abbâs to preside over Mesopotamia, and some of the neighbouring provinces. He likewise made a present to each of the new governors, as well as to Abd'allah Ebn Thâber, of 500,000 dinârs <sup>m</sup>.

IN the 214th year of the Hejra, nothing very material happened in the eastern provinces of the empire; but the western Moslems in Africa carried on great military preparations, in order to make another descent in Sicily. Nay, according to some authors, about this time, they took and destroyed the city of Selinus, in that island. The western Moslems were now grown in a manner independent on the Khalif. Ibrahim Ebn Aglab, who had been sent a governor into the western parts of Africa, by the Khalif Harûn Al Kashîd, in the year of the Hejra 184, assumed to himself almost an absolute power in that country, and conquered a large extent of territory for himself and his descendants; over which they presided as sovereign princes about 112 years. It appears from Abu'lfeda, that Al Mamûn received Abu Dolaf, one of his brother Al Amîn's friends, into favour, and appointed Abd'allah Ebn Thâber to preside over Khorasân, the present year <sup>a</sup>.

territories of
emperor;

THE next year, being the 215th of the Hejra, Al Mamûn assembled a powerful army, in order to undertake an expedition against the imperial territories. Having finished his military preparations, he set out from Baghdâd, at the head of his numerous forces, on the 27th day of Al Moharram, and made himself master of a fortress called Karra by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari; which he ordered to be dismantled. He also possessed himself of several other places of strength, and then marched to Damascus. Abu Solimân Al Darâni, a person of uncommon sanctity, Makki Ebn Ibrahim Al Balkhi, one of Al Bokhârî's doctors, and Abu Zeid Seid, a famous grammarian and philologer, according to Abu'lfeda, died this year <sup>b</sup>.

THE following year, being the 216th of the Moslem æra, Al Mamûn received advice, that the Greek emperor had put about 1600 of the citizens of Tarjûs and Al Masfihyah in Cilicia, to the sword. To revenge which affront, he took post with a formidable army before a considerable Christian town, which immediately surrendered to him. From thence he detached his brother Al Môtasem with a body of troops, to penetrate farther into the imperial territories; who made himself master of no less than thirty of the enemy's castles. He also sent Iakya Ebn A'lem with another detachment to Tawaba; who carried the place by storm, laid a great part of it in ashes, and then returned to the army, which soon after marched to Damascus. Omm Jaafar Zebeida, Al Amîn's mother, died the present year. In the month of Dhu'l-hajja, the Khalif put himself at the head of the troops to be employed in the Egyptian expedition <sup>c</sup>.

reduces the city
of Taima.

ON Friday the seventh day of the month of Al Moharram, in the year of the Hejra 217, commencing Feb. 7th, 832, Al Mamûn entered Egypt, and soon after attacked the city of Taima, probably the present Tameia, with all his forces. Having obliged it to surrender, he carried away with him all the inhabitants prisoners; and towards the close of the month Safar, departed out of Egypt, taking the route of Damascus, where he arrived in due time, without having sustained any considerable loss. Soon after his arrival here, he received a letter from a member of the house of Ommiyah in Syria, with an account, that Merwân, surnamed Al Himûr, had hid a treasure under some pillars at Hebron: upon which several labourers were sent, by the Khalif's order, to discover them; who, amongst other things, dug up a great number of chests filled with 10,000 waistcoats, the extremities of whose sleeves were greased in a most filthy manner. For, Merwân having been extremely fond of sheeps kidneys, and a most voracious glutton, he used to tear that part out of the carcases of the animal, when roasted whole, with his own hand; by which means he so smeared the extremities of the aforesaid garments sleeves, that he could never afterwards wear it. However, he always deposited it in a chest, with others in the same condition, prepared for that purpose, and put on a clean one in the room of it; at least this was the account of the matter given now to the Khalif Al Mamûn by the celebrated doctor Al Asmai. Which if we admit, we must of course conclude, that M. D'Herbelot, or rather the author he follows, is guilty of a mistake, when he makes this Asmai to have died in the 215th, or 216th, year of the Hejra. The Khalif, if we will believe Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, was so pleased with this piece of intelligence, that he made a present of all those garments to the person he was obliged to for it; who sold them, as curiosities, for a sum amounting to 10,000 dinârs <sup>d</sup>.

Two rebellions
in Egypt.

AL MAMUN undertook the Egyptian expedition, in order to suppress the rebellion of the Al Bimaidæ, or the descendants of FORTY (as the name imports in Coptic) Christians of good note, who made a considerable figure when the Moslems first conquered Egypt. These Al Bimaidæ, who were in all likelihood seated at Taima, refused to pay the tribute usually exacted by the Moslems of those who profess the Christian religion: upon which, Al Mamûn and his brother Al Môtasem marched against them with an army into Egypt, in the year of the Hejra 217, intirely defeated them, put many of them to the sword, dispersed the rest, and carried away their women and children prisoners to Baghdâd. Al Mamûn himself, being highly pleased with the success that attended his army in this expedition, made a triumphant entry into Mejû and Al Fostat on the fourteenth day of the month Safar, and departed out of Egypt <sup>e</sup>.

The Khalîf likewise, during his residence in Egypt, the present year, erected a tower, or castle, on mount Al Mokattam, which he called Kobbat Al Hawa, the tower of desire; and permitted two of the gentlemen of his bed-chamber, who were Christians, to build a church, denominated first from them the church of the two gentlemen of the bed-chamber, and afterwards the church of the Romans, upon a spot of ground at a small distance from it. He also erected a Mikeas, Mikiâs, or measuring pillar, in order to determine the gradual increase of the Nile, at Shûrât, a place belonging to the village of Banbanûdah, in the country of Al Sa'id, Thebais, or the upper Egypt; and repaired another of those pillars at Akbnîm, in the same region, which was gone greatly to decay.
- b Some years before the late rebellion of the Al Bimaida, Al Sari, or Affari, Ebn Al Hakem, and his son Mohammed Ebn Al Sari, or Affari, Ebn Al Hakem, had withdrawn their allegiance from the Khalîf, and usurped the government of Egypt; but all the commotions there were appeased by Abd'allah Ebn Thâber, or Obeid'allah Ebn Thâber, as he is named by Eutychius, sent into Egypt by Al Mamûn for that purpose, who seized upon all the treasures amassed by those usurpers, and ordered them to be conducted to Baghdâd. This Abd'allah likewise obtained permission from the Khalîf to annex the palace of Dâr Al Raml, or Dâr'l Raml, to the great mosque at Mesr. With regard to mount Al Mokattam, we must beg leave to observe, that it consists of a ridge of mountains extending to the eastern part of Al Sa'id, or Thebais; for a farther account of which, as well as mount Al Teilemon, appertaining to the western part of that tract, our curious readers may have recourse to Yâkût Ebn Abd'allah Al Hamathî, Ismael Abu'lfeda, and the rest of the oriental geographers.

- THE same year the Khalîf made another irruption into the imperial territories, invested Lîlîa, and pushed the siege of that fortress with the utmost vigour for an hundred days together; but being obliged to return home, he left Ajîf, or Ojiaîfâ, his general, with the greatest part of the troops employed in this expedition, to continue the siege. That commander was so little upon his guard, that he was surprized by a party of the garison, who sallied out of the town, took him prisoner, and after a detention of eight days sent him back to the Missem camp. In the mean time, Theophilus, the Greek emperor, advanced with a powerful army to force the Arab general to raise the siege; of whose motions the Khalîf being apprized, he hastened with a numerous body of troops to the relief of his forces before Lîlîa. But Theophilus receiving advice, that the whole Arab army, commanded by the Khalîf himself, was marching to attack him, he immediately drew off; not thinking it proper at that time to hazard a battle with so potent an enemy. This so intimidated the besieged, that they opened their gates to Ajîf, without giving him any farther trouble, and were taken under the Khalîf's protection. We must not forget to observe, that the African Moslems landed a body of troops in Sicily the preceding year, and made themselves masters of the city of Messina there. They put Theodotus, the commandant, who probably made a vigorous defence, to the sword; and plundered Lipari, called Lipara by the antients, the chief of the Æolian or Vulcanian islands, on the coast of Sicily, about the same time. These advantages so animated them, that they advanced to Panormus, or Palermo, laid siege to that city, and, without any great difficulty, possessed themselves of it, the present year. It appears from Abu'lfeda, that the Greek emperor made some overtures for an accommodation to the Khalîf, after the reduction of Lîlîa; and that the terms of peace offered at this time by the Christian monarch were rejected by that prince.

- THE object of Al Mamûn's last expedition into Egypt, according to some of the eastern historians, was the reduction of the rebel Aydûs, who had revolted against the Khalîf, and began to grow formidable there; which having effected, he penetrated into the territories of the Greek emperor, advanced to Tarsus in Cilicia, and took fourteen or fifteen towns from the Christians in that tract. Having finished this expedition, he moved at the head of his forces towards Baghdâd; and, in his march, encamped upon the banks of the Badandûn, or rather, as some of the oriental writers will have it, near the source of that river. Here he and his brother Abu Ishaq Al Mutasem one day went into the water; after which, admiring the clearness and freshness of the stream, he could not forbear saying to his courtiers, "Nothing would give a better relish to the water of this river than some of the fresh dates of Azad." Which words were scarce out of his mouth, when it was told him, that some mules were arrived with a considerable quantity of those dates in the camp. This tallying with the Khalîf's present appetite, he ate so immoderately of them, and afterwards drank such vast draughts of the water of the Badandûn, that a violent fever immediately ensued, which put a period to his days on the nineteenth, or, according to Abu'lfeda, the eighteenth, of the month Rajeb, in the year of the Hejra 218. We are told by Abu'l Farj, that, a little before his death, he deprived his brother Al Kasem Al Muktamen of the right to the succession that had been conferred upon him by his father Harun Al Rashid, and declared his other brother Abu Isbak Al Motasem his only lawful heir; tho' this event is said to have happened before Al Mamun's last expedition into Cilicia by other historians. As soon as this affair was settled, he apprized the provinces of it by a letter, signed by himself and his successor Abu Isbak Al Motasem Ebn Harun Al Rashid, which he dispatched to the governors of them at their respective residences with all possible expedition. When he was at the point of death, his physician Ebn Masawaih approached him, and another person, who desired him to make a confession of his faith, or to communicate his religious sentiments to the people about him. But his speech failing him, he could only say, "O thou who never diest, have mercy upon me now dying!" After which, he almost immediately expired, and was carried to Tarsus, where his son Al Abbâs and his brother Al Motasem buried him in the house of Khâkân, one of Harun Al Rashid's favourite eunuchs. Some writers relate, that the astrologers foretold his death should happen at a place called Rakka, or Arrakka; and that as soon as he was informed by the people about him, that the town, or village, upon the Badandûn, where he lay sick, went by that name, he expected there, in conformity to their prediction, to meet with his approaching fate. The same year in which he died, he ordered Ishak Ebn Ibrahim, the governor of Baghdâd, to oblige the judges and masters of traditions to assert the creation of the Korân; and to punish, with the utmost rigour and severity, all who should presume to maintain the contrary opinion. Amongst other delinquents, who incurred the Khalif's displeasure on this occasion, a celebrated Arab historian has mentioned Ahmed Ebn Hanbal, a famous Sonnite doctor, and Mohammed Ebn Nûb, surnamed Al Masrûb, who were loaded with irons, and sent to the Khalif's camp; but Al Mamun was surprised by death, upon the banks of the Badandûn, before his arrival. His successor Al Motasem, however, commanded Ahmed Ebn Hanbal to be whipt in a cruel manner. We must here observe, that the Khalif's son Al Abbâs, by his father's order, repaired the city of Tawaba, a little before the last irruption into Cilicia, and enlarged it with so many additional buildings, that it was a mile square, had three streets and four gates, and was considered afterwards for some time as one of the principal cities in those parts.<sup>c</sup>

 of Kailai, Al

 AL MAMUN was forty-eight, or as others will have it, above forty-nine years of age at the time of his decease. He reigned twenty years, five months, and thirteen days; or above twenty-two years, if we suppose his reign to have commenced at the beginning of the siege of Baghdâd. With regard to his person, he was of a middle stature, of a fair complexion, though tinged with yellow, and had a long beard of a greyish colour. Some, however, have represented him as a person of a comely countenance, with a beard perfectly grey, and of a ruddy or sanguine, or, as others will have it, of a swarthy complexion. As for his disposition, the eastern writers have painted him as endued with all royal virtues; as full of sweetness, liberal, of great clemency, a consummate general, and thoroughly versed in all the arts of government. He is also said to have applied himself particularly to the speculative sciences, and to have made a very considerable progress in them; which induced him, at a vast expence, to encourage learned men to resort from all parts of the world to Baghdâd. He likewise spent immense sums in purchasing curious books, written in Hebrew, Syriac, and Greek, in order to have them translated into Arabic. One of the afore-said authors finishes the portrait of this prince with saying, that he was, without contradiction, the greatest and most renowned prince of the house of Al Abbâs, a race more fruitful in heroes than any that ever swayed the sceptre amongst the Moslems. Through the whole course of his reign he favoured indifferently all learned men of whatsoever religion they were; who, on their part, in return, contributed to the utmost of their power to raise the glory of this monarch to the highest pitch. This they did by the presents which they made him of their works, collected from all the most rare and curious productions of the learned men of the east, whether Indians, Jews, Magians, or oriental Christians of every sect. He seems to have been most famed for his skill in astronomy, and the accurate observations which he made. He used to say, "If men knew what an excess of clemency there was in me, I should be perpetually visited by the most notorious offenders." Abu'lfeda relates, that this Khalif heaped his favours upon the descendants of Ali, and restored to them the territory of Fadak, or Fidak, that formerly belonged to their common mother Fâtema, of which, by the tyranny of his predecessors, they had been so long and so unjustly deprived.<sup>e</sup> a BEFORE we conclude our account of this Khalif, we must beg leave to observe, that the master appointed him by his father Harûn Al Rashîd was the famous Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Hamzah Bahaman Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Firûz, a Persian by nation, but extremely well versed in all kinds of Arab literature. This doctor was a slave of the Asadites, and surnamed Kassâi, or Koffâ, from the decisions he had made against luxury, and in favour of sumptuary laws. He was so excellent a grammarian, that he baffled in a dispute Sibûieh, the Persian, who was before esteemed the best grammarian of his age. The Khalif Hcrûn one day meeting Koffâ, asked him in a very civil manner how he did? To which he answered, with a good deal of wit and elegance, "If I had never received any other fruit from my studies than the favour b "you do me to think of me, that would be sufficient to make me happy." Another day, Koffâ coming to the door of Al Mamûn's apartment, in order to instruct him, as usual, that prince, who was then at table with his friends, sent him a distich upon the leaf of a myrrh-tree, importing, "that there was a time for study, and a time for diversion, and that he c "was then entertaining his friends." Which Koffâ answered by a tetraстich on the back of the same leaf, couched in the following terms: "If you could once perceive the excellency of "knowledge, you would undoubtedly prefer the pleasure arising from thence to that "which you at present taste; and if you knew who was now at your door, you would "immediately get up, come to him, and prostrate yourself on the ground, to thank and

"praise God for the favour he vouchsafes you." The young prince had no sooner read this than he left his companions, and waited upon his master with the utmost deference and respect. This doctor was the author of a book, intitled, Nafâis Alarais wa-Keffas Al Anbia, The history of the patriarchs and prophets from the creation of the world; a translation of which into Persic is to be met with in the French king's library. Koffâ died in Khorasân, or, according to Abulfedâ, at Ray, whither he attended the Khalif Harûn Al Rashîd, in the year of the Hejra 189.

AL MAMUN, notwithstanding his amiable qualities and rare intellectual endowments, had the weakness to fall into the errors of the Môtazalites, and was blamed by the more severe doctors of the law for not being sufficiently orthodox in the religion of the Mohamedans. The same doctors by no means approved of his introduction, or rather improvement, of philosophy and other speculative sciences amongst the Moslems. For, the Arabs had not yet accustomed themselves to read many books besides those relating to their religion. They did not begin even in earnest to cultivate astronomy before the reign of this Khalif, who was himself a great proficient therein *.

AL MAMUN's first prime minister, or Vizir, was Fadl Ebn Sabal, surnamed *Dhi'l Riya-Some farther
satain*, as has been already observed; after whose tragical exit, his brother Hasan Ebn Sa-hal, Omar Ebn Sa'id, Abmed Ebn Abu Khâled, and Abmed Ebn Yusuf, successively filled that sublime and important post. Some, however, maintain, that he was his own prime minister, after Fadl Ebn Sabal's death; which, in our opinion, very well accords with what has been related of this Khalif by the eastern historians. The first captain of his guards was Zohair Ebn Masaiyeb Al Dobbi, who was succeeded by Thâber Ebn Al Hosein, of whose exploits we have already given our readers a full and ample account. Ishak Ebn Ibrahim had also for some time assigned him the command of that corps. His chamberlain, whilst in Khorasân, was Al Hosein Ebn Abu Sa'id, and afterwards Ali Ebn Abu Sâleh, Abd'alhamîd Ebn Shabîb, Mohammed Ebn Sâleh, Ismael Ebn Mohammed Ebn Sâleh, and others who have not been named by the oriental writers. His judges were Mohammed Ebn Omar Al Wafidi, Mohammed Ebn Omar Ebn Abd'alrahmân Al Mahrûmi, Basbar Ebn Al Walid, and Takya Ebn Achem; the last of whom, by some point of ill conduct, incurred the Khalif's displeasure. The first day of Al Mamûn's reign is said to have been Monday, and the last Wednesday. The symbol, or inscription, of his seal was, Ask of God, and he will give you. Some of the Christian writers inform us, that Mark, the Jacobite patriarch, died at Alexandria in the Khalifat of Al Mamûn, and was succeeded in the patriarchal see there by one James, who presided over those of the Jacobite persuasion ten years and eight months. In this patriarch's time, the monasteries, that had been taken from the Christians, were restored, and re-occupied by the monks who had been formerly driven from thence. He was a person of uncommon sanctity, and, if we will believe some of the aforesaid authors, restored to life again the son of one Makâra, a person of great distinction, belonging to Nabrûb; who was so affected with this illustrious miracle, that he distributed the third part of his substance amongst the poor, and built at his own expence a church in Jerusalem solely for the use of the Egyptians resorting to that place. In the Khalif's time, Dionysius, the patriarch of Antioch, took a journey into Egypt, in order to have a conference with Abd'allah, or Obeid'allah, Ebn Thâker Ebn Al Hosein there, and abode for some time in the Jacobite patriarch's house. In Al Mamûn's

Khalifat, a grievous famine likewise raged at Jerusalem, which seems to have been occasioned a by vast swarms of locusts, that devoured all the fruits of the earth, and even every thing green, in the neighbouring tract. The extreme scarcity of provisions, or rather the total want of them, at this juncture, drove almost all the Moslems from the holy city; which gave Thomas, the patriarch an opportunity of repairing the roof of the church of the Resurrection there. For this purpose, he purchased the trunks of fifty tall cedars and firs, which were imported from the island of Cyprus. The expence of this reparation, which was very considerable, was wholly defrayed by one Bocâm, a rich native of Bûtab, or Bûrab, in Egypt. The patriarch made use of forty beams, or rafters, on this occasion; that number having been suggested to him by forty martyrs, who appeared to him in a dream, and seemed to support the roof that was upon the point of falling down. After the return of Abd'allah Ebn Thâber to Jeru- b salem, in his way to Baghdâd, the Christians were accused of having enlarged, and made an addition to, the aforesaid roof; upon which Abd'allah sent for the patriarch, ordered him and many others to prison, and threatened to have them all publicly whipped, if, upon inquiry, he found the Moslems capable of supporting their accusation. However, by the intervention of an antient Mohammedan, on whom he bestowed a sum of a thousand dinârs, and engaged to supply him and his posterity, as long as any of them should remain, with the same monthly allowance of provisions that the priests and deacons themselves were furnished with, out the revenues of the said church, for his assistance in this affair, Thomas pacified Abd'allah Ebn Thâber, escaped the ignominious punishment with which he had been threatened, and obtained the absolute approbation of all the principal Moslems then c residing in Jerusalem of what had been done. After Thomas's death, which happened in the seventh year of the Khalifat of Al Mamûn, one Basilab, who had received his education from his predecessor, succeeded him in the patriarchate of Jerusalem, and continued in that see twenty-five years. One Ayûb, or Job, seems to have been constituted patriarch of Antioch, in the first year of Al Mamûn, according to Eutychius; but this does not tally with what has been observed of Dionysius, the patriarch of this see, as that author makes Ayûb to have presided over the church there no less than thirty-one years. As Al Mamûn was convinced, that the improvement of the mind ought to be the principal object of a wise man's attention, and was much preferable to the pursuit of those pleasures which the vulgar, as well as others placed in more exalted stations, do for the most part take their chief delight, d he did not only treat with the greatest marks of distinction those learned men whom he invited to Baghdâd, but likewise spent as much time in their company as the affairs of state would permit, encouraged his subjects by his example to read the books they both translated and wrote, and even constantly attended their disputations. The principal astronomers that flourished in his days were Habash Al Merwazi, an inhabitant of Baghdâd, who wrote three books of astronomical tables, or calculations, intitled, Al Send Hend, Al Momtaben, and Al Shâb; Ahmed Ebn Kothair Al Fargâni, or, as others call him, Mohammed Ebn Keiter Al Fargâni, known likewise amongst the Europeans by the name of Alfraganus, whose book, intitled, Elements of astronomy, with Golius's version and notes upon it, is held in considerable repute amongst the learned; Abd'allah Ebn Sâhel Ebn Nûbakht, a person e famous for his skill in astronomy, and much esteemed by the Khalîf; Mohammed Ebn Mûsa Al Khowarazmi, whose astronomical tables, intitled, Al Send Hend, were reckoned sufficiently exact; Masballab, the Jew, for his uncommon skill in abstruse literature, looked upon as the phœnix of his age, who flourished in the Khalifat of Al Mansûr, and died after Al Mamûn's accession to the throne; and Yakya Ebn Abu'l Mansûr, of whose skill in astrological matters we have an instance handed down to us by Abû'l Faraj. The most celebrated physicians in Al Mamûn's days, some of whom he employed in translating into Arabic a considerable number of those physical treatises purchased of the subjects of the Greek emperor by the Khalîf, were Yakya Ebn Batrîk, Al Mamûn's freed-man, who had a happy talent at translations, with regard to his hitting upon the true sense and meaning of his f author, though he did not write elegant Arabic, and was better versed in philosophy than physic; Sabel Ebn Sâvûr, surnamed Al Kawfaj, who lived at Abwâz, and consequently wrote in the dialect of Kbûz, or Kbûzeştân; Yakya Ebn Mûsûa, who likewise made a very considerable figure in his profession; Jûrgîs, or George, Ebn Bakhtishua, of whom we have spoken before; Isa Ebn Al Hakem, who also enjoyed a very advantageous character; and Zakaria Al Tîfûri, who practised with good success. Besides these, Al Mamûn had another physician, called Gabriel by one of the Arab writers, who attended him every morning before any of the others, and had for some time assigned him a monthly pension of 1000 dirbêms; but, falling afterwards into disgrace, he was forbidden to appear in the Khalîf's presence, and his pension was reduced to 150 dirbêms. We must here beg leave to remark, g that the Arabs discovered a passion for the study of physic in the earlier times of Islamism; that art being of such vast utility to all ranks and degrees of men, even when they applied themselves almost solely to the study of their own language, and of the Mohammedan civil law,

- a law, founded upon the precepts and determinations of the Korân. For, this was undoubtedly the state of learning amongst the Arabs, whilst the Khalîfs of the house of Ommiyah sat upon the Moslem throne. But, after the elevation of the family of Al Abbâs to the Khalîfat, the cultivation of the sciences began soon to be in vogue. Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr, the second Khalîf of that race, did not only attain to a good degree of knowledge in the Mohammedan civil law, but likewise made some progress in the study of philosophy and astronomy; which arrived at a much higher degree of perfection in the reign of his great grandson Abd'allah Al Mamûn. For, that prince not only hired learned men, whom he had assembled from all parts of his vast dominions for that purpose, to translate the books he had purchased of the Christians at an immense expence, but likewise promoted by all possible motives the study of those branches of literature they were written upon, and even pursued with an almost unparalleled ardour that study himself. But, for a more explicit and particular account of this Khalîf's thirst after knowledge, as well as of his wonderful propension to favour and animate learned men, we must beg leave to refer our curious and intelligent readers to the authors cited here <sup>y</sup>.

S E C T. XXIX.

- c AL MÔTASEM, or Abu Ishak Mohammed Ebn Harûn Al Rashîd, surnamed likewise Bil-lab by some of the oriental historians, was saluted Khalîf the same day his brother Al Mamûn died, that is, the 18th or 19th of the month Rajeb, in the year of the Hejra 218. His mother Mâredah, or Mârudah, was one of the concubines of the Khalîf Harûn Al Rashîd. Some of the Moslem commanders at Tarsus were inclined to favour the interest of Al Abbâs, son to the deceased Khalîf; but that young prince having himself taken the oath of allegiance to Al Môtasem, all the officers of the army, as well as those belonging to the court, soon followed his example. Al Môtasem ascended the throne by virtue of Al Mamûn's express nomination of him to the Khalîfat after his decease, which was made to the prejudice of his own son Al Abbâs, and the exclusion of his other brother Al Mûtamen; though the latter had been called to the succession after him by their father Harûn Al Rashîd. The first thing the new Khalîf did was to issue orders for the demolition of the additional part of Tawâba, that had been built by Al Mamûn's son Al Abbâs in the late reign; which were immediately executed, all the arms and warlike stores to be met with in the town carried from thence, and the inhabitants, who had been transplanted thither from other cities, commanded to return to their former habitations. In the beginning of the month of Ramadân, Al Môtasem arrived at Baghdâd, and soon after was inaugurated there. About the same time, the Khalîf received advice of the great progress made by the rebels in Persia, and Persian Irâk, who were beheaded by one Bâbec, an enemy both to the civil and ecclesiastical constitution of the Moslems. This Bâbec was surnamed Al Horremi, or Al Khorremi, and Khorremdîn, either because he was of a certain district near Ardebîl in Adherbijân, called Khorrem, or because he instituted a merry religion, which is the signification of the word in Persian. He first appeared in the year of the Hejra 201, when he began to take upon him the title of a prophet. We do not find what particular doctrine he taught, when he now made open profession of his impiety; but it is said his system of religion differed from all the others then known in Asia. He gained a great number of devotees in Adherbijân and the Persian Irâk, and grew powerful enough to wage war with the Khalîf Al Mamûn, whose troops he often beat, killing several of his generals, and particularly Ebn Hamid, one of them, with his own hand; by which victories he became so formidable, that Al Môtasem was obliged to employ the whole forces of the empire against him. The general sent to reduce Bâbec was Hâidar Ebn Kaûs, surnamed Affshîn, a Turk by nation, who had been brought a slave to the Khalîf's court, and, having been employed in disciplining the Turkish militia there, had acquired the reputation of a great captain. As the rebels had made themselves masters of Al Jebâl and Hamadân, and were very strong, Affshîn was resolved to bring them to a battle as soon as a proper opportunity offered; which having done, he overthrew them with prodigious slaughter, putting no less than 60,000 of them to the sword, and driving the rest into the imperial territories. He first marched at the head of his army towards the province of Adherbijân, and spent a good deal of time in rebuilding all the castles between the cities of Arzanjân and Ardebîl, that had been demolished by Bâbec's Bābec's troops. This step he judged previously requisite, in order to secure all the passages and defiles, and thereby put a stop to the incursions of the rebels <sup>a</sup>.

rebels against
the Khalif.

THE following year, being the 219th of the Hejra, commencing January 1st, 834, Mohammed Ebn Al Kāsem, one of Ali's descendants, appeared in arms against the Khalif, and seized upon a considerable part of the province of Khorasān. He was, however, at last defeated by the Khalif's forces, taken prisoner, and brought to Al Mótasem at Baghdād. Being sent to prison, he was for some time there confined; but at last, by what means we have not been told, he made his escape, and was never afterwards seen. The same year, Kendi, Al Mótasem's governor of Egypt, died at Mesr, and his son Metasfir, or Modassir Ebn Kendi, was appointed by the Khalif to succeed him. It appears from some of the eastern writers, that Afshin made himself master of Isfahan, or Ispahan, and Hamadan, the two principal cities of Al Jebāl, or the Persian Irāk, and several of Bābec's castles, notwithstanding the great annoyance given him by the rebels, though he could not reduce the whole country to the obedience of the Khalif, the present year <sup>b</sup>.

creation of the Korān.

ABOUT this time, a very severe persecution was carried on by the Khalif against all who denied the creation of the Korān. Abmed Ebn Hanbal, the founder of the fourth sect of the Sunnites, of whom we shall have occasion to speak hereafter, refusing to acknowledge the Korān to be created, was scourged in so cruel a manner that he fainted away, having been almost flayed alive, by order of the Khalif Al Mótasem, and afterwards imprisoned. The same punishment would have been inflicted upon Abu Harūn Ebn Al Badā, had he not escaped it by a notable evasion, which was of signal service to him. He allowed the Korān to have been placed, given, or instituted, by God, and that every such thing was created; though he would not in direct terms admit the conclusion naturally flowing from those premises. In fine, he conceded the Korān to be endued with one of the essential properties of a created being, though he endeavoured to evade standing to the immediate consequence of such a concession <sup>c</sup>.

throw given
shin.

THE next year, being the 220th of the Hejra, Afshin, having fortified the passes in the mountains, and posted proper detachments of troops there to defend them, descended into the plain, and incamped near a village called Arfā, or, as some will have it, Afshāk, where he offered the enemy battle. Bābec, notwithstanding the great losses he had sustained, accepted the challenge; but, after a sharp engagement, was intirely defeated, and constrained to fly with the shattered remains of his troops first to Mogān, and afterwards to Casbabād, the place of his nativity, where he had at that time erected his principal fort. His army must have been extremely numerous before the beginning of the action, if, as we find asserted by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, he lost in it above 100,000 men. Be that as it will, Bābec, finding no other way to escape, was obliged to retire into the Gordyeau mountains, where he fortified several posts; from whence he greatly incommoded the Khalif's forces that pursued him thither, frequently intercepting their provisions, and destroying them abundance of men. In fine, Al Mótasem's general found it impossible to dislodge him from those posts during the course of the present year <sup>d</sup>.

Bābec still supports himself
against Af-
shin.

THE following year, being the 221st of the Moslem æra, Mūsa Ebn Abū'l Abbās Al Sha-bāni was continued by the Khalif in the government of Egypt, to which post he had been advanced by that prince after the death of Modassir Ebn Kendi, the preceding year. Bābec still remained in the Gordyeau mountains, and defended himself against the Khalif's troops. However, Afshin took several of his strong-holds, and forced some of his fortified posts, though he could not bring the war in those parts to a conclusion the present campaign <sup>e</sup>.

Bābec reduced,
and put to death.

IN the 222d year of the Hejra, beginning December 14th, 836, Afshin carried on the war with great vigour against Bābec, and shut up that impostor in Casbabād, Badā, or Al Badb, as it is sometimes called by the Arab historians; which place he straitly besieged. Hither that rebel found himself obliged to retire, after Afshin had reduced all his castles one after another with invincible patience, and forced all his retrenchments in the mountainous tract of the Curds, as his last resource. The fortress of Casbabād, being a place of considerable strength, he defended himself there with great bravery for several months; but at last, finding he should be obliged to surrender the town, he made his escape into a neighbouring wood, from whence he soon after came to Afshin, upon that general's promising to procure for him the Khalif's protection. But Afshin had no sooner got him into his power, than he ordered an executioner, who attended him for that purpose, first to cut off his

- a hands and feet, and afterwards his head. This is the account handed down to us by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari. Other writers, however, relate, that, just before the surrender of Casbabâd to the Khalif's forces, Bâbec found means to escape thence in disguise, after he had with great bravery sustained several assaults, with his son Abd'allah, and his general Moâ-wiyah, into Armenia, where he was betrayed in the following manner. Sabel Ebn Sanbât, an Armenian officer, happening to know him, enticed him, by offers of service and respect, into his power, and treated him as a mighty prince, till, when he sat down to eat, Sabel clapt himself down by him; at which Bâbec being surprized, asked him, how he dared to take that liberty unasked? It is true, great king, replied Sabel, I have committed a fault; for who am I that I should sit at your majesty's table? and immediately sending for a smith, he
- b made use of this bitter sarcasm, Stretch forth your legs, great king, that this man may put fetters on them. After this, Sabel sent him to Affhîn, though he had offered a large sum for his liberty, having first served him in his own kind, by causing his mother, sister, and wife, to be ravished before his face; for so Bâbec used to treat his prisoners. Affhîn, having the arch-rebel in his power, conducted him to Al Môtasem, by whose order he was put to an ignominious death. The Khalif was then at Sar Man Ray, Sarra Manray, or Samarra (for it went by all those names) a city of Irâk, on the eastern bank of the Tigris, a little above half a degree to the west of Baghdâd; where he first ordered Bâbec's hands and feet to be cut off, and then his head, after his belly had been ript open in the presence of a great number of spectators. The body was fixed upon a gibbet, erected for that purpose, in the
- c town, and the head sent into Khorasân. This man had maintained his ground against the power of the Khalifs above twenty years, and had cruelly massacred 250,000 people; it being his custom never to spare man, woman, or child, either of the Mohammedans, or their allies. Amongst the prisoners taken at Casbabâd, there was one Nîd, who had been one of the ten men employed by Bâbec in his executions; and who owned, that, in obedience to his master's commands, he had destroyed above 20,000 Moslems with his own hands. To which he added, that vast numbers had also been executed by his companions; but that of these he could give no precise account. Casbabâd was taken in the month of Ramadân this year; after which, Ajîf Ebn Anbasa reduced the Zatalbdians, who inhabited Al Batayeh, or the fenny tract between Wâset and Basra, to the obedience of the Khalif, and
- d conducted many of them prisoners to Baghdâd. The Khorremites, not Horremites, as they are called by M. D'Herbelot, nor Hazemites, as they are denominated by Dr. Pococke, in his Latin version of Abu'l Faraj, or sectaries of Bâbec, which remained after his death, seem to have been intirely dispersed, there being little or no mention made of them by the oriental historians<sup>e</sup>.

- THE next year, being the 223d of the Hejra, commencing December 3d, 837, the emperor Theophilus invaded the Moslem territories with an army of 100,000 men. He penetrated as far as Zabatra, or Zabtara, took and demolished that city, put all the men therein to the sword, and carried the women and children into captivity. From thence he advanced to Malatia in Cappadocia, seized upon that place, killed great numbers of men he found in
- e it, and took about 1000 of the Moslem women there prisoners. He also made himself master of several other towns, the inhabitants of which he treated with excessive cruelty, putting out the eyes, and cutting off the noses and ears, of the men, and carrying away the women captives, according to some of the Arab historians. The Khalif, receiving advice of these hostilities, and of the barbarous conduct attending them, marched against the Greeks with a more formidable army than any of those with which his predecessors had formerly made war upon that nation. This army he divided into several bodies, which entered the imperial territories by different routs, and reduced several fortresses belonging to the Christians, before any enemy appeared to oppose them. Ancyra, in particular, we are told, he took, and laid in ashes; though Ayûb, the patriarch of Antioch, who attended the
- f Khalif in this expedition, could have prevailed upon him to have saved it, had the inhabitants, as he desired, opened their gates to that prince, when he first presented himself before the town. Some of the Greek writers, on the other hand, pretend, that the Moslems were the aggressors in this war, and made an irruption into the imperial provinces several years before, treating the emperor's subjects with their usual barbarity, without having received either from that prince himself, or any of the people belonging to him, the least provocation. Be that as it will, as Theophilus, in ravaging Syria, had, according to one of them, notwithstanding the earnest intreaties of the Khalif, destroyed Zabatra, or Sozopetra, the place of his nativity; he ordered every one of his soldiers to engrave upon his shield the word Amorium, the birth-place of Theophilus, ranked amongst the cities of Phrygia by
- g Ptolemy and Strabo, which he was resolved, at all events, to destroy. These circumstances, however, have been wholly omitted by the Moslem authors. The Khalif first advanced to Tarsus in Cilicia, and from thence moved into Phrygia; of which the emperor being apprized, he marched at the head of his forces to Dorylaeum, distant about three days journey from Amorium. There, in a council of war, several of his officers advised him to decline an engagement with the Arabs, whose army was far more numerous than that of the Greeks, and to transport the inhabitants of Amorium to some other place. But the emperor, imagining such a proceeding would reflect no small disgrace upon him, resolved to venture all in the defence of his native city; and accordingly sent thither a strong detachment, under the command of Ætius, general of the East, Theodorus Craterus, Theophilus Bubutzicus, and other experienced generals. In the mean time, the Khalif, having made the proper dispositions for investing the city, detached a body of 10,000 Turks, with a strong party of Armenians, to try the strength of the emperor's forces. The two armies faced each other at Dazymenum, and soon came to a general action, wherein the Arabs were at first put to the rout; but the Greeks, in pursuing them, were so galled by the arrows of the Turks, that they not only gave over the pursuit, but betook themselves to a disorderly flight. A body of Persians, however, in the emperor's service, though abandoned by the rest of the army, stood their ground, and surrounding the emperor, who was present in the engagement, made head against the enemy, and at last, by favour of the night, retired in tolerable good order. According to Abu'lfeda, the right wing of the Moslem army was commanded by Afshin Ebn Kaïs, the left by Ashnas, and the main body by the Khalif himself, in this expedition. Al Môtasem, informed of the good success of his troops, marched directly to Amorium, and, being there joined by his victorious forces, laid close siege to the place; which, after a long and obstinate resistance, was betrayed to him by one of the inhabitants, who had abjured the Christian religion. The Khalif, enraged at the great loss he had sustained during the siege, which, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, continued about 55 days, put most of the men to the sword, carried the women and children into captivity, and levelled the city with the ground. Some of the eastern historians relate, that the Greeks lost in the aforesaid action above 30,000 men. The Khalif's forces being distressed for want of water, in their return home, the Christian prisoners rose upon some of them, and murdered them; which so exasperated the Khalif, that he put 6000 of the Greeks, who had been principally concerned in exciting that commotion, to death. Of the inhabitants of Amorium 30,000 were slain, and as many taken prisoners, according to Abu'l Faraj. Al Môtasem having discovered in his march, that some of his officers had engaged themselves to support Al Abbâs Ebn Al Mamûn's pretensions to the Khalifat, he forbade his subjects to supply that prince with liquids of any kind; so that, according to Abu'lfeda, he died of thirst at Manbij, and was buried in that city, the present year. Zabatra, Zabtara, or Sozopetra, whose destruction occasioned the terrible fate of Amorium, stood between Samosata and Malatia, a day or two's journey to the south of the latter, and has been mentioned by Ismael Abu'lfeda, Mohammed Al Firauzabâdi, and other oriental writers. It must here be observed, that, according to the authors followed by M. D'Herbelot, the Khalif did not discover the conspiracy that had been formed against him before his arrival at Sarra Manray, then the seat of the Khalifat, after his return from the Grecian expedition. The conspirators, if we will believe those authors, proposed to assassinate his two best friends, Afshin and Ashhab, and afterwards to elevate his nephew Al Abbâs to the Moslem throne. But their design being detected, they were punished with death; and Al Abbâs himself was shut up in a close place, where he had provisions sent him, but was allowed nothing to drink. In this condition he languished for some time, and at last miserably perished with thirst. Eutychius, however, seems to intimate, that Al Abbâs's death happened whilst the Khalif was on his march from Zabatra, and consequently before he arrived at Sarra Manray <sup>f</sup>.

A rebellion in Tabrestân.

THE following year, being the 224th of the Hejra, Abd'allah Ebn Thâber, the Khalif Al Môtasem's governor of Khorasân, marched against Bârabâ Ebn Kâran, who had set up for himself in Tabrestân, with a powerful army, defeated him in several engagements, and at last took him prisoner. This put an end to the rebellion in those parts, and restored the country, that had been the scene of these commotions, to its former tranquillity. As for Bârabâ Ebn Kâran, Abd'allah sent him to Al Môtasem, who ordered him to be whipt to death; after which, his body was affixed to a gibbet, at a small distance from that erected for Bâbec. About the same time, the Khalif removed Mûsa Ebn Abu'l Abbâs Al Shaibânî from the government of Egypt, and appointed Mâlec Al Hindi to preside over that country in his room. Ibrahim Ebn Al Mohdi died this year, in the month of Ramadân; as did a likewise, in the 68th year of his age, Abu Obeid Al Kafem, who had rendered himself extremely famous by his skill in the Arabic tongue <sup>2</sup>.

In the 225th year of the Hejra, commencing November 12th, 839, Abu Dolaf and Ali Al Mótasem Ebn Mohammed Al Madáyeni, two persons of considerable note, departed this life. It <sup>discovers a</sup> appears from some good authors, that Affbîn, the captain-general of the Khalif's forces, <sup>conspiracy that</sup> endeavoured to excite Máziâr, the governor of Tabrestân, to a defection; of which the <sup>had been form-</sup> Khalif being apprized, as well as of his impiety, he having been actually discovered to be an idolater, and to have a prepuce, he ordered him to be thrown into prison, towards the close of this year <sup>ed against him.</sup> <sup>h</sup>.

b In the year of the Hejra 226, Affbîn captain-general of the Khalif's armies, and his <sup>Affbîn exe-</sup> greatest confident, having been accused of holding a secret intelligence with that prince's <sup>cut for trea-</sup> enemies, was executed for the treasonable practices he had been guilty of. After the execu- <sup>sonable prac-</sup> tion, his body was fixed upon a gibbet, erected near those that exhibited the bodies of <sup>tices.</sup> Bârabâ Ebn Kâran and Bâbec. This was no sooner done, than some of the Khalif's officers searched Affbîn's house, and found in it a great number of idols, which they immediately burned. They likewise reduced to ashes several impious books, discovered there, and written to instruct others in his execrable opinions. This year Al Mótasem took the government of Egypt from Mâlec Al Hindi, and gave it to Asbâs, one of his menial servants. About the same time, Abu'l Hodzail Ebn Al Hodzail Al Bafri, a famous Mótazalite doctor, departed this life, extremely regretted by all his sect <sup>i</sup>.

c THE next year, being the 227th of the Hejra, commencing October 21st, 841, the Kha- Al Mótasem lif Al Mótasem died at Samarra, either in the 48th or 49th year of his age. The distemper <sup>dies.</sup> that carried him off is said to have been a fever; after the first attack of which, he was blooded by his principal physician's order, but without effect. He expired on Thursday, the 18th of the former Rabî, and left eight sons and as many daughters behind him. He reigned eight years, eight months, and eight days. He was also the eighth Khalif of the house of Al Abbâs, was elevated to the Moslem throne in the 218th year of the Hejra, was born in the month of Skaabân, being the eighth month of the year, fought eight battles, possessed 8000 slaves, and had 8,000,000 dinârs, and 80,000 dirhêms, in his treasury at the time of his death. These circumstances induced the Arabs to surname him Al Motbamen, d i. e. the oñonary, or the eighth, according to some of the best oriental writers. As the people of Baghdâd disturbed his repose by their frequent revolts and commotions, he took the resolution to abandon that city, and to build another, in order to fix his residence there. The spot he chose for this purpose was called Katûl, near the city of Sarra Manray, in the Arabian Irâk, and not in Syria, as we find advanced by M. D'Herbelot. Here he erected this new city, which was first called Samarra, and afterwards Sarra Manray. According to Mirkbond, this Khalif had 130,000 pied horses in his stables at Samarra, about whose necks he ordered sacks full of earth to be hung, which they carried to a place in the city he had marked out for that purpose. The earth brought hither in this manner formed a pretty high terras, on which he built a large saloon, from whence he could easily discover every e thing that passed in the city. This terras gave name to the magnificent palace of Samarra, which was ever after called by the Arabs Tel Almekhâli, i. e. the hill of sacks; Almekhâli, in their language, denoting a sort of sacks hung about the horses necks, in which they carry their straw and oats, according to the common usage of the east <sup>k</sup>.

f WITH regard to Al Mótasem's person, he is said to have had a handsome face, red hair, <sup>Description of</sup> a long beard, a broad breast, and to have been of a fair complexion. He was of a middle <sup>his person, and</sup> stature, and so extremely robust, that he once carried a burden of a thousand pounds weight, <sup>character.</sup> if we will believe some of the Arab writers, several paces. As to his disposition, he was brave to a great degree, and punctual in the discharge of religious duties; though he has been represented by some of the oriental historians as intirely attached to the sentiments of the Mótazalites. These heretics maintained, as has been already observed, that the Korân was created, and stuck not to accuse those of infidelity, as assertors of two eternal beings, who held the contrary opinion. However, they were opposed in this notion by the Sonnites, or orthodox Mohammedans, who believed the Korân to be uncreated and eternal, subsisting in the very essence of God; or, as others have expressed it, the word of God, and consequently uncreated, as well as the Divine Being from whom it did originally proceed. This Khalif kept a greater number of forces on foot, particularly horse, than any of his predecessors. He also vastly increased the number of boys at court, for whom he provided a about 50,000 satchels, or little bags, in which they sometimes carried their provisions. The Moslem historians celebrate this Khalif for his greatness of soul, and mention one of his actions that appears in a very singular light. Being once, say they, separated from his companions in the country, he met with an old man standing by his ass, which had fallen down upon the ground, in a very dirty place, with a load of thorns upon his back. This sight so affected the Khalif, that he immediately alighted from his horse, in order to assist the old man, and raise up his beast; which having done, though he spoiled his cloaths by this generous action, he rejoined his retinue, and afterwards made him a present of 4000 dinârs. He was the first of the Khalifs who added the name of God to his own. For, he ordered himself to be surnamed Bi'llah, in God, or by the grace of God; in which he was followed by several of his successors, who to their names added the words Billah, in God, Beemri'llah, by the order of God, Ala'llah, on God, and in God, and Ledin'llah, for the faith of God, or for the worship of God. When the Greeks took and sacked the city of Zabatra, an Arab woman of the house of Al Abbâs is said to have been taken prisoner by a horseman there; and, the very moment she was seized, to have cried out, "Succour me, O Al Môtasem?" Upon which, the horseman said to her, by way of ridicule, "See, here comes Al Môtasem on his pîed horse, to your assistance." This adventure being some time after related to the Khalif, who was then at a great distance from Zabatra, he instantly swore, that he would not think of any other enterprize before he had released this woman. Accordingly he marched at the head of his forces, in the midst of winter, to that city, and attacked the Greeks posted there with such vigour, that he intirely defeated them. This victory opening him a way to the place where the woman, who cried out to him for relief, was detained, he arrived there effectually to her succour, and delivered her out of the hands of her enemies. But, for a more particular and circumstantial account of this affair, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to the eastern historians cited here <sup>1</sup>.

Some further particulars relating to him.

In the fourth year of the Khalifat of Al Môtasem, Sophronius was placed in the patriarchal see of Alexandria, where he continued about thirteen years. He was a person of uncommon prudence and sagacity, and an excellent philosopher. In the seventh year of that prince's reign, one John was also constituted patriarch of Jerusalem; but, being extremely ill used by the Christians there, he soon found himself obliged to retire from that city. Whilst Al Môtasem sat upon the Moslem throne, the king of Ethiopia was likewise engaged in a war with some of the neighbouring powers; during whose absence, the queen thought fit to banish one James, a bishop of that country, and to substitute another bishop in his room. James, immediately after his expulsion, fled into Egypt, and the Ethiopians were visited with a pestilence; which was considered as a punishment inflicted upon them for the violence that had been offered that prelate. The king of Ethiopia, therefore, upon his return from the wars, reproved his wife for what she had done, and recalled the bishop from his exile; which occasioned great rejoicings amongst his subjects. About the same time, the patriarch of Alexandria sent some bishops, whom he had ordained for that purpose, as missionaries, into the western part of Africa, called Pentapolis by the antients, and particularly to the city of Kairwân, the metropolis of that country. Dionysius, the patriarch of Antioch, also died in the Khalifat of Al Môtasem, and was succeeded by one John in that patriarchal see. When Salmarwiyah, one of the most celebrated physicians of the Moslem court, lay upon his death-bed, the Khalif visited him in tears, and asked him who should take care of his health after his decease. Salmarwiyah replied, "That busy-body Yahya Ebn Mâfwiyah; but take none of his compound medicines." Soon after which, Salmarwiyah died; and the Khalif was so affected with the irreparable loss he sustained by that tragical event, that he immediately broke out into the following sorrowful exclamation, "I shall soon follow him; for the preservation of my life and health has been intirely owing to his skill." He likewise abstained from all kinds of food the whole day of Salmarwiyah's decease, ordered a bier to be brought into the palace, and the funeral service to be performed, in his presence, with candles and perfumes, after the Christian manner. And he had great reason to be under the vast concern he expressed on this melancholy occasion. For, Salmarwiyah blooded him twice a year, and, after each venesection, ordered him some cooling physic; by which means, he enjoyed a good state of health as long as that physician lived. Yahya, on the contrary, prescribed him a cathartic before he underwent the aforesaid operation; which, not agreeing with his constitution, gradually altered the habit of his body, and at last terminated in his death, according to Abu'l Faraj. He is said to have survived Salmarwiyah only twenty months by that historian. His first prime minister was Al Fadl Ebn Merwân;

- c AL WATHEK BILLAH was proclaimed Khalîf the same day his father Al Môtasem died, that is, the 18th of the former Rabî, at Sarra Manray, and inaugurated afterwards at Baghdâd. His mother's name was Karâtîs, or Farâtîs, and his own at large Harûn Al Wâthek Billah Abu Jaafar Ebn Al Môtasem Ebn Harûn Al Rashîd. About this time, Theophilus, the Greek emperor, died, and was succeeded by his son Michael; who being then only six years old, his mother Theodora took upon her the administration. Abd'alrahmân still governed the Moslems in Spain, and seems to have gained several advantages over the Christians there. The new Khalîf adhered to the errors of the Môtazalites, as well as his predecessor Al Môtasem; and even, at the instigation of Abmed Ebn Abu Dawd and Mohammed Ebn Hammâd Ebn Abd'almâlec Al Ziyât, carried on a most fierce and violent persecution
- d against the Sunnites, particularly those who denied the creation of the Korân. His mother is said to have been a Greek by nation. In consequence of his attachment to the Môtazalites, he entertained the most favourable sentiments of all the members of the house of Ali. We are told by Abu'lfeda, that Raja Ebn Ayûb, with a body of troops assigned him for that purpose by Al Wâthek, suppressed a rebellion of the Kaisians at Damascus, and beheaded 1500 of the rebels there, this year <sup>n</sup>.

- THE following year, being the 228th of the Hejra, beginning October 10th, 842, Al Wâthek dismissed his judges and secretaries of state, and extorted from them, either for real or pretended crimes, very considerable sums of money. According to Al Noweiri, Al Wâthek undertook this year an expedition against the island of Sicily, and landed a body of troops there. Soon after this descent, he laid siege to Messina, and in a short time made himself master of that city; which conquest, continues this author, was followed by that of the whole island. However, this invasion has been intirely passed over in silence by the Chronicon Siculum, already cited here, which we take to be a piece of exceeding good authority; though it seems to have been mentioned by Abu'l Faraj. Abu'lfeda observes, that Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Aglab was then the Emîr, or governor, of the island, and resided at Palermo. He likewise informs us, that this Aglabite commander reduced many cities there, and carried off from thence a very considerable number of prisoners, together with a large quantity of spoil, in the 228th year of the Hejra. It is probable, therefore, that Al Noweiri, or rather M. D'Herbelot, has mistaken the Khalîf Al Wâthek for the Emîr Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Aglab; especially as we find not the least intimation of Al Wâthek's having undertaken such a Sicilian expedition in the Tarikh of Abu Jaafar Al Tabari. Be that, however, as it will, we may infer from Abu'lfeda, that this Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Aglab first took upon himself the government of Sicily, and assumed the title of Emîr of that island, the present year. It also appears from the Chronicon Siculum, that this prince's new subjects were greatly infested by vast swarms of locusts about the same time <sup>o</sup>.

THE next year, being the 229th of the Moslem æra, Al Wâthek recalled Ali Ebn Yahya from Egypt, and appointed Isa Ebn Mansûr to preside over that country in his room. Khalîf

Ebn Heshâm died this, and Abu Tamim Ebn Aws, a celebrated poet of the tribe of Tay, the preceding year. The Normans sent a fleet, consisting of fifty-four large ships, and as many galleys, with a body of land-forces on board, according to Roderic, at this time, to Lisbon, in order to drive Abd'alrahmân Ebn Al Hakem, the western Khalif, out of Spain<sup>p</sup>.

and are driven from thence by Abd'alrahmân's forces. IN the 230th year of the Hejra, commencing September 18th, 844, Abd'allah Ebn Thâbir Ebn Husein departed this life. He was an excellent officer, a great encourager of learned men, particularly poets, and had been successively governor of Khorasân, Syria, and Egypt. This year the Normans, called Magians by Abu'lfeda, advanced with a formidable fleet, and a powerful body of troops on board, from Lisbon to Seville, and laid siege to that city. From thence they moved to Cadiz, and attempted to make themselves masters of that place. But being repulsed in all their attacks both upon that fortress and Seville, and receiving advice that Abd'alrahmân was marching against them at the head of a numerous army, attended by a strong squadron of ships, they thought fit to retire to Lisbon with uncommon precipitation; and were finally driven from thence by that prince's forces without any considerable loss<sup>q</sup>.

A cartel settled between the Christians and the Moslems. THE following year, being the 231st of the Hejra, beginning September 7th, 845, a cartel for the exchange and redemption of prisoners was settled, according to Abu'l Faraj, between the Moslems and the Christians, upon the banks of the river Al Lames, the Lamus of Ptolemy, about a day's journey from Tarsus in Cilicia. The person sent by Al Wâthek to conduct this affair on the part of the Moslems was one Khâkân, an eunuch, who received orders from his master not to redeem any of the Mohammedan captives, that refused to assert the creation of the Korân, and would not deny all vision of God in paradise by the corporeal eye. The Arab prisoners redeemed on this occasion amounted to 4460 men, besides 800 women and children, and about 100 belonging to the Khalif's allies, who all entered the Moslem camp on the tenth day of the month Al Moharram. Moharek, an Arab musician, Abu Yakûb Yûsef Ebn Yahya Al Bowaitbi, a disciple of the famous Al Shâfe'i, who was incarcerated for denying the creation of the Korân, and Ebn Al Arabi, a celebrated philologer of Cûsa, who left many learned productions behind him, died this year. A body of Al Wâthek's troops, in the winter, made an irruption into the Christian provinces; but were soon obliged to retire by the severity of the season, and the enemy's detachments sent against them. Of the Arabs 200 perished with cold, as many were taken prisoners, and a great number drowned in the Badandûn; so that the Khalif sustained a pretty considerable loss in this unfortunate expedition<sup>r</sup>.

Al Wâthek dies. THE next year, being the 232d of the Hejra, the Moslems defeated a large body of the Sicilian forces near Enna, called at present by the natives Castro Giovanni, and put 9000 of them to the sword. After which, they seized upon that fortress, as well as the adjacent territory dependent upon it. They also fortified the citadels of Modakab, the Motuca, or Motyca, of Ptolemy, and the Modica of the moderns, which they had reduced the preceding year. The Khalif Al Wâthek died on the twenty-third, or the twenty-fourth, day of the month Dhu'lbejja, and his brother Al Motawakkel said the funeral service over him. With regard to the cause of his death, authors are not agreed. We are told by Abu'lfeda and Abu'l Faraj, that, being troubled with the dropsy, he continued for some time in a stove, and found himself thereby greatly relieved; which induced him to stay in it, heated more than usual, the next day longer than before. This, continue the same writers, affected him in such a manner, that he expired upon the spot; though his attendants were not sensible of his death, till they viewed him lifeless in his litter. On the other hand, we are informed by Abu Ja'far Al Tabari, that, being extremely addicted to venery, he ordered his physician to prepare him some provocatives, and those of the most powerful kind. The doctor, unwilling to comply with his commands, represented, that they would prove of fatal consequence to him. However, the Khalif persisting in his resolution, the physician assured him, that if he would take only three drachms of lion's flesh properly prepared in red vinegar, it would produce the desired effect. This provocative, therefore, he made use of in his drink, and it soon put a period to his days. A little before his death, falling prostrate on the ground, he burst out into the following ejaculation, O heavenly king, whose reign is eternal, have mercy upon a poor prince, whose reign is fleeting and transitory! He sat on the Moslem throne five years, nine months, and six days, or, as others will have it, five years, seven months, and thirteen days. Some authors relate, that, whilst the people were assembled after his death to elect his successor Al Motawakkel, a lizard, or rather newt, came out of the garden adjoining to the palace, plucked out his eyes, and greedily devoured

- a them; and that this was not perceived before his body was washed, in order to be interred. With regard to his person, he was of a fair complexion, a middle stature, and had a very broad breast. His beard was also extremely thick and bushy, and he had a white speck in his right eye. As to his disposition, he was a prince of great honour, valiant, an admirer of the Arab poetry, and a munificent rewarder of those who excelled in that branch of literature. In most points of conduct, he imitated his uncle Al Mamûn, particularly in his attachment to the sect of the Motazalites. He confirmed the edict made by Al Mamûn relating to the creation of the Korân, and persecuted with uncommon barbarity all who presumed to maintain the contrary opinion. This greatly alienated his subjects from him; which encouraged Abmed Ebn Nasser Ebn Mâlec, surnamed Al Kborai, one of the most celebrated of those doctors who bore the title of Al Hasedb, that is to say, the preserver of the PROPHEPIC TRADITIONS, entered into a conspiracy against him. This doctor found means to engage many of the principal lords of Baghdâd, and several other doctors, in an attempt to dethrone Al Wâtkek, and to fix himself upon the Moslem throne. But the conspiracy being discovered by the governor of Baghdâd, he seized Abmed in his own house the day before it was to be carried into execution, and sent him in irons to Samarra, or Saria Mamray, then the residence of the Khalîf. Upon his arrival there, he was immediately brought into Al Wâtkek's presence, who, without saying a word of the conspiracy, pressed him to assert the creation of the Korân; which he refusing to do, and absolutely persisting in the common sentiment of the orthodox Moslems, who unanimously admit the eternity of that book, the Khalîf was so enraged, that he instantly drew his scymitar, and cut off the traitor's head with his own hands<sup>s</sup>.

It has been already observed, that Al Wâtkek imitated in all things his uncle Al Mamûn. He was therefore extremely delighted with the study of the sciences, and not a little carested all men of letters. He was also liberal and charitable to a great degree, having taken great care that no poor people should be found in any part of his vast dominions; insomuch that not a single beggar was to be met with, through the whole course of his reign, either at Mecca or Medina. He was particularly fond of astrology, and having in his last illness conferred with some of his wise men, who were the most famed for their skill in that art, upon consulting his horoscope, they assured him, that, from the present moment, his reign should be continued fifty years; though he is said not to have lived above ten days after the prediction. The principal of these astrologers was Al Hasan Ebn Sabel Ebn Nubakht. This occurrence has been mentioned both by the Arab and Persian historians<sup>t</sup>.

AN oriental writer likewise relates, that Abmed Ebn Nazir having been thrown into prison, because he refused to acknowledge the creation of the Korân, and the impossibility of seeing God hereafter in paradise with corporeal eyes, received from the good company he found in the place of his confinement no small degree of consolation. For, Mohammed Ebn Hammâd Ebn Abd'almâlec Al Ziyât, the Khalîf's Visir, who persecuted the Sunnites in a cruel manner, filled all the prisons of Samarra with orthodox Moslems. Amongst these there was one Abmed Ebn Isrâil, a famous astrologer; to whom, as well as to many others of his fellow-prisoners, Abmed Ebn Nazir related, that a phantom had appeared to him in his dream the preceding night, and assured him that Al Wâtkek should die in a month's time. The astrologer then being desired to calculate that prince's nativity, in order to discover what truth there was in this nocturnal prediction, refused to be concerned in so dangerous an affair. However, the last day of the month being come, he said to Abmed Ebn Nazir, "What do you say now of your dream, since the term pointed out by your phantom is almost expired?" To which Abmed replied, Many things may still happen before the conclusion of the approaching night. After which, about the second watch of the same night, a considerable number of people arrived at the prison-door, with advice of the Khalîf's decease<sup>u</sup>.

f OTHER authors inform us, that Al Wâtkek, by eating and drinking to great excess, and that frequently when he had no appetite at all, together with his immoderate use of women, brought himself into a dropsy; of which he was cured by a celebrated physician of Nisabûr, who advised him to live more temperately for the future, as a relapse must prove fatal to him. But notwithstanding this salutary advice, the Khalîf soon began to pursue his former irregular course of life, and was consequently in a short time afflicted with the same distemper, of which, in conformity to the doctor's prediction, he died within the space of a very few months<sup>v</sup>.

Had a very terrible eye.

ONE of the same authors remarks, that the Khalif Al Wâthek had so terrible an eye, that a having a little before his death cast an angry glance of it upon one of his domestics, who had been guilty of some fault, the man was instantly out of countenance, and fell backwards upon another person that stood at a small distance from him. Which very eye, by a most extraordinary accident, was plucked out of the Khalif's head, according to this writer, by an animal resembling a pole-cat, that slipped between his face and a linen cloth which covered it, whilst he lay dead in the palace <sup>x</sup>.

Other particulars relating to him.

SOME of the Arab historians have observed, that Al Wâthek himself was a tolerable good poet, as well as a rewarder of those who excelled in drawing up poetical compositions; that he sung well, and had an excellent voice. He made, in the second year of his reign, one Sergius, who had been a great enemy to those of his own communion, and was for that reason very disagreeable to them, patriarch of Jerusalem, where he resided in that capacity sixteen years. He likewise filled the patriarchal see of Antioch, which became vacant in the sixth year of his Khalifat, with one Nicholas, who presided over the Christians there twenty-three years. We must not forget to remark, that the above-mentioned Al Hasan Ebn Sabel Ebn Nubakht was the greatest astronomer, as well as astrologer, of the age in which he lived, and wrote a treatise upon the Anwâd, or mansions of the moon. With regard to this Khalif's ministers and servants, Mohammed Ebn Hammâd Ebn Abd'almâlec Al Ziyât was his principal counsellor, or Visir; the captain of his guards Ishak Ebn Ibrahim; his chief judge Ahmed Ebn Abu Dawd; and his chamberlains Aylûb, the Turk, his freed-man, Bagâ, the Turk, his menial servant, Wasîf, the Turk, his freed-man, Mohammed Ebn Hammâd Ebn Dankash, Anbâb, his servant, Ahmed Ebn Amer, and Mohammed Ebn Asem Al Jabali. The first day of his reign was Friday, and the last Wednesday. The inscription of his seal was, God is the confidence of Al Wâthek. Some writers make him to have been thirty-two, others thirty-four, and, lastly, others thirty-six, years of age at the time of his decease <sup>y</sup>.

He is succeeded by his brother Al Motawakkel.

AL WATHEK's death was no sooner known than his brother Al Motawakkel Ala'llah was d saluted Khalif by the people of Samarra, and afterwards acknowledged as such by all the provinces of the empire. His mother Shajâ, Al Môtasem's concubine, was of Khowârazmian extraction. Ahmed Ebn Abu Dawd, Al Wâthek's principal judge, Mohammed Ebn Hammâd Ebn Abd'almâlec Al Ziyât, his Visir, and Wasîf, the Turk, together with several other leading men, at first had an intention to proclaim Mohammed, surnamed Al Mohtadi, Al Wâthek's son, Khalif; but Wasîf afterwards objecting to this, on account of his tender years, they dropped their design, and agreed to invest Jaafar Abu'l Fadl Al Motawakkel Ala'llah Ebn Al Môtasem, the late Khalif's brother, then about twenty-six years of age, with the imperial dignity. The new Khalif removed the governor of Egypt from his office, soon after his accession, and conferred upon Anbâb, one of his friends, that lucrative post <sup>z</sup>.

As Al Mohtadi, Al Wâthek's son, was incapable of officiating publicly in the mosque, on account of his tender age, Wasîf, upon mature deliberation, thought he should be guilty of a great sin, if he concurred with the other principal officers of the empire in advancing that young prince to the dignity of Imâm; and therefore determined their choice of a sovereign pontiff, who was to be emperor of the faithful, in favour of Al Motawakkel. This Wasîf commanded the body of Turkish troops, or rather the Turkish irregulars, first set on foot by the Khalif Al Môtasem; which gave great weight to his representations, and enabled him the more easily to carry his point, notwithstanding the vast influence of Mohammed Ebn Hammâd Ebn Abd'almâlec Al Ziyât, the late Khalif's Visir, on this important occasion <sup>a</sup>.

MOHAMMED EBN HAMMAD EBN ABD'ALMALEC AL ZIYAT having treated Al Motawakkel ill, in his brother's life-time, that prince resented the injuries he had then met with, soon after he ascended the Moslem throne. He, therefore, sent him to prison in the year of the Hejra 233, and ordered a person to keep him awake there for several days and nights together. Mohammed being after this suffered to take some repose, slept a whole day and a night; and, after he awoke, was thrown into an iron-furnace, lined with spikes, or large nails, heated red-hot, where he was miserably burnt to death. Some authors, however, relate, that he received fifty stripes upon his belly, and as many upon his back, and soon after expired. This counsellor, or Visir, spoke his mother-tongue fluently and properly, and was extremely well versed in the Arab grammar and poetry. But he was haughty, a foolish, vain-glorious, iniquitous in his conduct, and intirely void of compassion. He was likewise a stranger to modesty, excessively fond of power, and covetous to the last degree. He never did any person a good office, frequently saying that pity was a natural weakness, and liberality folly. It appears from some of the Arab writers, that he composed verses during his confinement, though none of these have been handed down to us. The new Khalif appointed his son Al Montaser to preside over the peninsula of the Arabs; and, about the same time, Abu Zakaria Yahya Ebn Meain Ebn Awn Al Baghdadi, a famous Hafedh and Imam, and a disciple of Al Shafei, departed this life, in the 75th year of his age. The Moslems reduced Leontini, the Lentini of the moderns, called by the Arabs Lertinab, and made a farther progress in the conquest of Sicily, during the course of this

b year<sup>b</sup>.

THE following year, the Aglabite Arabs, settled in Sicily, made themselves masters of the city of Ragusa with very inconsiderable loss. About the same time died Abu Khaitshamah The western Moslems take Ragusa. Zobr, a famous Sunnite doctor, Ali Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Jaaser, a celebrated Hafedh, and Mohammed Ebn Mobasbar, a Motazalite of Baghdad. The Khalif Al Motawakkel, after the death of Mohammed Ebn Hammad Ebn Abd'almalec Al Ziyat, began to think of allaying the heats raised amongst the Moslems by his predecessors Al Motajem and Al Warbek, who persecuted with great cruelty those that refused to embrace the tenets of the Motazalites. A famine this year made terrible havock amongst the Arabs in Sicily<sup>c</sup>.

c IN the year of the Hejra 235, several remarkable occurrences happened amongst the Al Motawakkel eastern Moslems. The Khalif Al Motawakkel settled the succession upon his eldest son Al Montaser, after him upon his second son Al Mo'taz, and, finally, upon his third son Al Mowaiad. Al kel settles the succession upon his sons, and is angry with the Christians. He also gave each of them two banners, or standards, a black one and a white one; the former of which distinguished them as heirs apparent to the crown, and the latter as their father's vicegerents, who had the government of the empire divided amongst them. To Al Montaser the Khalif assigned Africa, from Arisb in Egypt to the most western limits of that vast tract, as likewise the provinces of Kinnisrin, Al Shâm, or Syria, Mesopotamia, Diyâr Becr, Diyar Rabia, Mawfel, or Mosul, Habab, Al Ayât, Al Khâbûr, Karkisia, Tecrit, the region bordering upon the Tigris, Mecca, and Medina, Al Yaman, Hadramaut, Yamama, Babrein, Al Sind, or Sindia, Abwâz, Sarra Manray, Cûfa, Mâseidân, Al Hajrân, Sbaruzûr, Kom, Kâsân, and Al Jebâl, with its dependencies. To Al Mo'taz he assigned Khorasân, Tabrestân, Ray, Persia, Armenia, and Adherbijân. And lastly, on Al Mowaiad he conferred the provinces of Dimishk, or Damascus, Hems, Al Ordan, and Palestine. This division has been celebrated by the Arab poet Ibrahim Ebn Al Abbâs, some of whose verses have been preserved by Abu Jaaser Al Tabari. Al Motawakkel also about this time commanded all the Christians and Jews in his dominions to wear a leathern girdle, called by the Arabs zonar, and a sort of badge on their cloaths, in order to distinguish them from the Moslems. He likewise forbid them to make use of iron stirrups, and enjoined them, according to Eutychius, to paint the figures of devils, or else of hogs and apes, on the doors of their houses; which, as the same writer will have it, was occasioned by the imprudent conduct of Bakhtishua, the Khalif's physician, a Christian, who had incurred his master's displeasure. About this time, one Mahmûd Ebn Faraj, a famous impostor, pretended to be Moses resuscitated, and plaid his part so well that several people believed on him, and attended him when he was brought before the Khalif Al Motawakkel. That prince, having been an ear-witness of his extravagant discourses, condemned him to receive ten buffets from every one of his followers, and then to be drubbed to death; which was accordingly executed; and his disciples were imprisoned till they came to their right minds. Hasen Ebn Sakel, Ishak Ebn Ibrahim Al Sauli, the musician, and Abd'allah Ebn Raghiban, the poet, died the present year<sup>d</sup>.

f THE next year, being the year of the Hejra 236, commencing July 15th, 850, this Khalif The Khalif discour-tenances the posterity of Ali. who had openly declared himself an enemy to the house of Ali, forbid his subjects, under the severest penalties, to go on pilgrimage to the tomb of that Imam. Soon after which, he ordered the sepulchre of Hosein, Ali's son, called in Arabic Mashhad Hosein, in the plains of Kerbela, where that Imam was killed, to be intirely razed; and, in order the more effectually to efface all the traces of it, he was resolved not to content himself with ploughing, or breaking up, the ground on which it stood, but likewise to draw a canal of water over it. However, if we will believe the Shiites, he could not carry his design into execution; the water not approaching the tomb, but keeping its distance out of respect.

Hence that water was denominated Haïr, which signifies astonished and respectful; a name which has since been applied to the sepulchre itself, on account of this miracle. Notwithstanding which, some pretend, that the place of Hosein's interment was always unknown<sup>a</sup>.

This Khalif's death predicted in a dream, according to the Shiites. WE are told by an eastern author, in conformity to the Shiite traditions, that the night after Al Motawakkel had issued this impious order, he saw Ali in a dream, who reproached him with the outrages offered to his family, and gave him seven blows with the famous sword Dbu'l-Fakar, used by the prophet himself in all his engagements, after the battle of Bedr, which he held in his hand. This, according to one of his wise men, well versed in the interpretation of dreams, portended some signal disaster to him, that should happen by way of punishment for the hatred he bore Ali and his descendants. And, in consequence of this prediction, continues the same writer, the Khalif was assassinated two days after by some Turks, at the instigation of his eldest son Al Montaser; who, after the perpetration of this horrid parricide, commanded some of his servants to collect the pieces into which his father's body had been cut. These amounting to seven, that prince from thence inferred, that the murder had been clearly foretold by the preceding dream, which was most evidently verified by that tragical event. But here it may not be improper to observe, that this Shiite fiction must necessarily be exploded by all persons of the least penetration; since Al Motawakkel's edicts, mentioned here, preceded at least eleven years the assassination of that prince<sup>f</sup>.

A rebellion in Armenia. IN the year of the Hejra 237, beginning July 5th, 851, the Khalif sent Yusef Ebn Mohammed to preside over Armenia and Adberbijan; who, upon his arrival at Ekklat, or Akklat, caused Bekrüt Ebn Ashút, an Armenian nobleman, to be secured, and sent in chains to Al Motawakkel. This so incensed the noblesse of Armenia, that, in conjunction with Músa, who had married Bekrüt's daughter, they assembled a body of troops, in order to take vengeance of Yusef Ebn Mohammed for the affront he had offered them. Coming up, therefore, with him at the castle of Músh, they attacked him with such bravery, that, after an obstinate engagement, they intirely defeated him, and put both him and the forces he commanded to the sword. The Khalif no sooner received advice of this unexpected rebellion, than he sent Bogú, the Turk, with an army to suppress it; which he did effectually, and fully revenged Yusef's death, killing above 300,000 of the rebels, and taking a vast number of them prisoners. After this, he advanced to Teflis, a city of Georgia, that had assisted the rebels, laid siege to it, and in a short time reduced it to ashes, together with 50,000 of its inhabitants, who all perished in the flames. Yusef's defeat happened in the middle of the month of Ramadán, and the extinction of the rebellion, as well as the destruction of Teflis, consequential to that event, soon after. About this time, died Hatem Al Asam Al Balkhi, a celebrated Moslem saint. The same year, Al Motowakkel appointed Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Tkáber Ebn Hosein to preside over Al Sarta, the districts of Al Sarwád, and the territory of Baghdád. Either this or the preceding year, Abd'alrahmán paved the streets of Corduba in Spain with stone, and built an aqueduct, with leaden pipes, which copiously supplied that city with water from the neighbouring mountains. The present year also, according to Abu'lfeda, Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Aglab died in Sicily, after he had reigned there about nine years, in the month of Rajeb. He was succeeded by Al Abbás Ebn Al Abbás Ebn Al Fadl Ebn Yakúb Ebn Nazara, who subdued many places in Sicily, and overthrew the Christians near Enna, which, by reason of its surprising strength, they had made the capital of their part of the island, instead of Syracuse. This signal victory, which was gained on Thursday, the fifteenth day of the month of Shawál, the present year, put Al Abbás in possession of Enna, where he erected a mosque for the use of the Moslems that were settled there. This defeat given the Christians, according to Abu'lfeda, in the year of the Hejra 237, seems to be no other than that mentioned by the Cambridge Chronicon, as happening about five years before. But whether the writer of that Chronicon, or Ab'ulfeda, whose authority is undoubtedly of great weight with regard to all the Moslem transactions in the east, is to be followed in the point before us, we leave to the determination of our more learned and intelligent readers<sup>g</sup>.

THE following year, the Greeks fitted out a fleet of 300 ships; an hundred of which, under the command of an admiral, set sail for Dimyút, or Damiata, in Egypt. Here, upon their arrival, they landed a body of troops, seized upon the town, at that time destitute of a garison for its defence, plundered and burnt it, and carried off with them 600 Moslem women into captivity. From Damiata they advanced to Mesr, which they pillaged and

- a laid in ashes, and then retired to their own ports. After which, the Khalif Al Motawakkel ordered Damiata, in order to secure it from all future insults, to be fortified with a strong double wall on the side of the river, and on that of the continent with a triple one; which rendered it one of the most impregnable fortresses in Egypt. This year died at Cordoba Abd'arrahmân Ebn Al Hakem Ebn Hishâm, of the house of Omriyah, after he had reigned thirty-one years and five months in Spain. He left behind him forty-five sons and forty-two daughters, and was succeeded by his son Mohammed Ebn Abd'arrahmân Ebn Al Hakem. About the same time also departed this life Ranimir, the son of Veremund, king of Gallia, whose son Ordonius, according to Roderic of Toledo, succeeded him in his kingdom, frustrated all the attempts of the Arabs upon his dominions, and reigned 35 years. Other authors, however, make Ranimir's death, and his son Ordonius's accession, to have preceded Abd'arrahmân's decease above 20 years <sup>b</sup>.

THE year of the Hejra, 239, commencing June 12th, 853, produced no action of éclat <sup>Nature re-</sup> in the Moslem empire; at least none that has been taken notice of by any historian. Mah-mah-kelle-nag- mûd Ebn Gailan, of Merû in Khorasân, one of Al Bokbâri's doctors, died this year. We <sup>pers in the</sup> are told by an author of good reputation, that Al Motawakkel published an edict forbidding the <sup>year of the</sup> Christians and Jews to ride on horseback in any part of his dominions, and permitting them in their journeys to make use only of asses and mules, the present year. Which law is considered by the Turks as in force at this very day <sup>Hejra 239.</sup> <sup>1</sup>.

- THE next year, according to Abu'lfeza, Abu Othmân Mohammed, the son of the famous Abu <sup>A rebellion in</sup> Al Shafeï, and Ibrahim Ebn Khâled, of the tribe of Calb, a follower of the same celebrated Moslem doctor, departed this life. About the same time, the Khalif appointed his second son Al Mo'taz to superintend all the mints erected in his dominions, and ordered his name to be stamped on all the dirhems coined in the empire. This year likewise, if we will believe Roderic of Toledo, the people of that city rebelled against Mohammed Ebn Abd'arrahmân Ebn Al Hakem, and were supported in their defection by Ordonius, who sent one of his relations with a body of troops to their relief. However, Mohammed advanced with his army into the neighbourhood of Toledo, and found means to decoy the rebels into an ambuscade, that he had posted in a proper place at a small distance from the town. The consequence of which was, that he easily defeated them, put 7000 of the Moslems, and 8000 <sup>d</sup> of the Christians to the sword, and took prisoners a great number of both; many of whose heads he struck off, and sent some of them to the maritime towns, and others to Africa, as evident tokens of the glorious victory he had obtained <sup>2</sup>.

- THE following year, a body of the imperial troops advanced to Aincaria, entered the <sup>The emperor's</sup> place, made the Moslem garison prisoners of war, and carried off all the women and children <sup>forces take</sup> into captivity; after which, several brisk actions happened in those parts between the <sup>Aincaria from</sup> Christians and the Arabs. About the same time, Mohammed Ebn Abd'arrahmân Ebn Al Hakem placed numerous garisons in Curita, Talavera, and Calatrava, and made incursions into some of the neighbouring provinces. This year, the famous Abmed Ebn Hanbal, the founder of the fourth sect of the Sunnites, died at Baghdâd, and was followed to his grave <sup>e</sup> by 800,000 men and 60,000 women. It is related, as something very extraordinary, that on the day of his death, no less than 20,000 Christians, Jews, and Magians, embraced the Mohammedan faith. We must not forget to observe, that the Moslem forces took Bothirab, or Buteria, not far from Leocata, in Sicily, the preceding year <sup>1</sup>.

- IN the year of the Hejra 242, beginning May 10th, 856, the Greeks penetrated to <sup>They are fur-</sup> Sonifât, or Samofata; but were soon obliged by the Moslems to retire from thence to Amîd, <sup>pressed and</sup> or Amida, on the borders of Armenia. After which, they abandoned Assyopotamia, which <sup>visited by</sup> they had entered, and returned into their own dominions; though they carried off with <sup>the Khalif's</sup> them about 10,000 prisoners, and plundered a great number of villages in their retreat. This seems to be the expedition mentioned by some of the Greek writers, when they <sup>f</sup> inform us, that the Moslem garison of Samofata sallied out upon the Christian forces, then before the town, surprized them in their camp, whilst they were at divine service there, and forced them to abandon the siege, the third day after it had commenced. We are told, by some of the Arab authors, that several violent shocks of an earthquake happened this year in Komas, or Komes, a province of Tabrestân, in the month of Shaabân, attended with unusual noises, that demolished many towns and villages there, did incredible damage, and buried 45,096 men in the ruins of the houses that were overturned. The greatest part of these perished at Dâmegân, placed in latitude  $36^{\circ} 20'$ , and longitude  $39^{\circ} 20'$ , by the eastern geographers, the capital of that province. Syria, Perjâ, Kharâsin, and Al Yaman, were all visited with the same calamity, according to these writers; who farther observe, that mount Al Akra', or the bald mountain, in the neighbourhood of Laodicea, or, as 'tis called by the Arabs, Al Ladikia, at the same time fell into the sea; by which surprising accident most of the inhabitants of that city were destroyed. Mohammed Abu'l Abbâs Ebn Ibrahim Ebn Al Aglab, the Khalif of Kairwân, died about this time, and was succeeded by his son, Abu Ibrahim Ahmed Ebn Mohammed; as did likewise Yahya Ebn Aftem, a most celebrated master of jurisprudence, Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmân Ebn Al Hakem sent also an army, under the command of Al Mondar, one of his relations, to lay waste the territory of Toledo, that still refused to submit to him, the present year. The Moslem general executed his orders with excessive rigour and severity, either carrying off or destroying all the corn, fruits, and grapes, of that district. Notwithstanding which, the citizens of Toledo sent some of their forces, after Al Mondar's departure, to possess themselves of Talavera. But the commandant of that fortress having been apprized of their design, met them at the head of his troops, gave them battle, and intirely defeated them; taking many of them prisoners, and killing 700 upon the spot, all whose heads he sent as an agreeable present to his master Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmân Ebn Al Hakem, who then held his residence at Córdoba, the capital of the Moslem dominions in Spain.

resides about two months at Damascus.

THE year of the Hijra 243, commencing April 30th, 857, has not been distinguished by any remarkable event. The Khalif Al Motawakkel, however, set out for Damascus, with an intention to make that city the seat of the Khalifat, the 20th day of the month Dbu'lhajja. He also ordered several buildings to be erected there in the following month Safar, designing to transfer all his treasures from Sarra Manray to that place. Soon after his arrival at Damascus, the Turkish soldiery mutinied for their pay; which having received, they returned to their duty. Notwithstanding this, he conceived an aversion to his new capital, and returned to Sarra Manray, after he had resided at Damascus only two months and a few days. He entered that metropolis on Monday the 22d of the latter Jomâda, to the great joy of all his subjects there. This year died Ibrahim Ebn Al Abbâs, and Al Hâreth Ebn Asad; the latter of whom was expelled Ahmed Ebn Hanbal's school, for being a reasoner, or one principally guided by his own judgment in his decisions. Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmân Ebn Al Hakem also undertook another expedition against the city of Toledo, besieged the place in form, and destroyed the famous bridge over the Tajo there, which threw the citizens into a terrible consternation, the present year.

The Greeks,
according to the Christians, surprize and defeat the
their turn.

THE next year, the Khalif commanded Abu Yusuf Yakûb Ebn Ishak, surnamed Ebn Al Sekkit, a famous philologer, extremely well versed in all kinds of polite literature, to be put to death, for his attachment to the house of Ali. About the same time, that prince deprived Bakhtishua, his physician, of all the riches he had acquired in his service, and banished him into Babrein. The Greek writers relate, that 30,000 Arabs about this time marched into the imperial territories, surprized a body of 45,000 Thracians and Macedonians, headed by the emperor himself, and put them to a shameful flight. The emperor narrowly missed being taken prisoner in the action; having been delivered out of the enemy's hands by Manuel, one of his officers, when he was in the most imminent danger. It seems to appear from the Cambridge Chronicon, that the Sicilian Moslems were worsted in an action by sea the present year.

Terrible
earthquakes
in several parts of the
pire.

THE following year, beginning, amongst the Moslems, April 8th, 859, many cities in the western provinces suffered greatly from earthquakes; by which great numbers of their houses were overturned. Violent shocks were likewise felt at Baghdâd, where the Khalif's palace was in danger of being overthrown, Al Madâyen, Bâlis, Al Rakka, Harrân, Râso'lain, or, Râsa'lain, Hems, Damascus, Al Roba, or Edeffa, Tarsus, Masîsa, Adana, and the maritime parts of Syria. At Antioch, 1500 houses, and above ninety towers belonging to the wall that surrounded the city, are said to have been thrown down; which, together with the frightful and unusual noises heard amongst the ruins, so terrified the inhabitants, that they fled for safety into the neighbouring fields. We are told likewise by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, that mount Al Akra' above-mentioned, notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary by Abu'l Faraj, stood at a small distance from Antioch, and fell into the sea at the same time the earthquake happened there. At Laodicea the shocks were so terrible, that almost all the citizens quitted their houses, expecting them every moment to fall upon

- a their heads. When mount Al Akra' sunk into the sea, a thick black cloud of smoke, that emitted a most noisome smell, issued from the spot on which it had stood. Vast numbers of people were destroyed by these concussions, if we will believe the Moslem writers. The springs at Mecca failed this year to such a degree, that the celebrated well, or fountain, there was almost dried up, and the water sold for 100 dirbêms a bottle. A river also, about a parasang distant from mount Al Akra', disappeared the same year in which that mountain was absorbed, and was never afterwards seen. About the same time, the Khalif being informed, that the Niloscope, or Nilometer, erected on the point of the island of Al Fostat by Solimân Ebn Abd'almâlec Ebn Merwân, was fallen to decay, he sent a geometrician, recommended to him by his astrologer, Mohammed Ebn Mûsa, from Irâk to Egypt, in order
- b to build a new one there. He likewise appointed Yezid Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Bâdân Ebn Farah to assist Mohammed in this work, and ordered the expence of the whole to be defrayed by Solimân Ebn Wâheb; which being done, the machine erected on this occasion was called the new Nilometer, and the other that had fallen to ruin was never afterwards used. The people of Toledo at this time, not being able to make head against Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmân Ebn Al Hakem, thought fit to submit to that prince, and met with a very gracious reception from him. Soon after this, the Normans, with a fleet of 60 ships, ravaged the coast of Spain, laid several places there waste with fire and sword, and carried off with them an immense quantity of spoil. From thence they passed over into Africa, where they committed likewise dreadful depredations; and, returning into the maritime parts
- c of Spain, took up their winter quarters there. But not finding themselves in a condition to settle upon any part of the tract they had taken possession of, they thought fit to return home the following spring. The writer of the Cambridge Chronicle relates, that the Moslems in Sicily repossessed themselves of Enna, that had returned to the Christians, about the time we are now upon. The present year, likewise, died Abu Ali Al Hafeina, a disciple, or follower, of the famous Al Shâfeî. It seems to appear from Eutychius, that Al Motawakkel built a new city and palace, adjoining to Samarra, from him denominated Al Jaafariâ, in which he resided some time, either this or the following year <sup>p</sup>.

- In the 187th year of the Hejra 246, commencing March 28th, 860, Omar Ebn Obeid The Arabs
Al Akta, by the Khalif's order, made an irruption into the imperial territories, and carried gain several d off with him from thence about 70,000 prisoners. Al Fadl Ebn Fiarân, another of the Arab considerable commanders, with a fleet of twenty large ships, insulted the enemy's coasts, and seized upon advantages the citadel of Antioch. Ali Ebn Yakya likewise, in order to make a diversion, penetrated over the into another of the imperial provinces, and took 5000 prisoners, besides 10,000 head of Greeks.
cattle; after which, a cartel was settled between the contending parties, whereby 2367 captives recovered their liberty. From the Greek writers it seems to appear, that the Arabs at this time entered the imperial provinces with an army of 40,000 men, and committed dreadful ravages there. But they were surprized, according to these writers, by Petronas, the emperor's uncle, with the Christian forces, in the district of Lalacæon, not far from Ephesus, who put the Khalif and his whole army to the sword, took his son prisoner, and e returned in triumph to Constantinople. As this relation, however, runs counter to the Moslem history in almost every particular, and as the authors here cited are not greatly to be depended upon in what they have handed down to us concerning the Moslem affairs, our impartial and intelligent readers will undoubtedly refuse their assent, to the short account we have extracted from them of this expedition. For, that Al Motawakkel fell in battle this year, is a notion intirely repugnant to the whole stream of oriental history, which in a point of this nature most certainly merits greater attention than that of the Greeks. About the same time, it rained blood in the tract called Balah, of a very red colour. Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmân marched with an army also now against the people of Navarre, ravaged the country about Pampelona, and made himself master of three fortresses not far from f that place. In one of these he took prisoner a person of distinction, named Fortunius, whom he conducted to Corduba, kept him there twenty years, and at last sent him home loaded with presents worthy of the prince from whom they came. This Fortunius, as our historian informs us, attained to the age of 126 years. About this time, died Dabal Al Khozâi
Ebn Ali, a celebrated poet, of the Shiite persuasion, who was born in the year of the Hejra
148. We are told, that a body of Arabs, named Fendanites, or Effendites, arrived in Sicily the present year <sup>q</sup>.

Al Motawakkel assassinated.

THE next year, the Khalif Al Motawakkel was assassinated in the following manner. Fatab a Ebn Khâkân and Abd'allah Ebn Yakya, finding him indisposed with an asthmatic disorder, endeavoured to dissuade him from officiating in the mosque at Sarra Manray, as he intended, the ensuing Friday; advising him to send his second son Al Mo'taz to perform the public service there in his stead. The Khalif complied so far with their advice as to decline going to the mosque himself, but at the same time appointed his eldest son Al Montaser to officiate for him. This by no means pleasing his two favourites, who were suspicious of Al Montaser's ill designs, they persuaded him to go to the mosque himself, when Friday came, and shew himself to the people, in order to prevent all commotions that might be excited by his illness, which at that time was publickly known. He, therefore, mounted his horse, and went directly to the mosque, where he said the prayers, and preached to the people, as b usual; after which he returned to his palace Jaasarîa, where he then resided. Upon his arrival there, he ordered Al Montaser to appear before him, reproached him and his mother with the dark cabals in which they had been engaged, and threatened to make them both feel the effects of his resentment. Nay, he commanded the judges and counsellors who attended him likewise to reprove them. This so incensed Al Montaser, that he resolved upon his father's destruction, and engaged certain Turks, who were dissatisfied with the Khalif's conduct, and some of his domestics, to assist him in the parricide; for the perpetration of which the following opportunity offered. Al Motawakkel having drank to excess with some of his courtiers, and particularly Fatab Ebn Khâkân, on Wednesday the fourth day of the month Shawâl, Bagâ, Bager, or Bogâ, the younger, his butler, at night entered c the room, and commanded the company to go home; which they all did, except Fatab Ebn Khâkân, and four others, who could not be prevailed upon to retire. In the mean time, Al Montaser came to one of the palace-gates, that had been left open for him, and kept the porter, a Turk, whose name was Razâka, employed, by walking and talking with him, whilst the conspirators destined to assassinate the Khalif made the best of their way to the place where he was, with their scymitars drawn in their hands. As soon as they approached him, one of them, named Taaz, immediately fell upon him, and cut off the hinder part of his shoulders; notwithstanding which, Al Motawakkel attempted to defend himself against the assassin, saying at the same time to him, Be quiet, God cut off thy hand. Which being perceived by the other conspirators, they all rushed in at once upon him. d Fatab Ebn Khâkân observing this, said to them, Wo be to you, this is the emperor of the faithful! To which Bager, or Bogâ, replied, Hold thy peace, thou enemy! Fatab then threw himself upon his master, in order to screen him from the intended violence; but being dragged off by the assassins, he ran about the room like a madman, with his scymitar drawn in his hand, crying out with all his might, Death! Death! This so enraged them, that they instantly dispatched him, and then massacred Al Motawakkel without the least resistance; after which, they waited upon Al Montaser, and saluted him Khalif. Several reasons have been assigned for this unnatural parricide by the Moslem writers; some of which our readers will not be displeased to find inserted here. One of those writers pretends, that Al Montaser alledged, as a reason to excuse the perpetration of so horrid a fact, the hatred his e father bore Ali and all his descendants. He also, says the same author, at last was afraid of his own life. For, Al Motawakkel once holding between his hands a scymitar that cost him 10,000 dinârs, said to Fatab Ebn Khâkân, I should be glad to find a valiant man amongst my Turkish slaves, into whose hands I may put this scymitar, for the defence and preservation of my person. Fatab immediately answered him, Here is Bager, the bravest of your Turks, who is worthy of receiving so valuable a present from your own hands. This Bager came by accident into the Khalif's apartment the moment the conference between him and Fatab began, when he received this sword, together with very large appointments, from Al Motawakkel. We are told, however, that he never drew it before the time he entered his master's chamber, and slew him with it. Other authors relate, that the Khalif frequently entertained f himself with some mischievous kinds of diversions, that were extremely disagreeable to the people about him; and that this in all probability hastened his death. Sometimes he would order a lion to be let loose in the middle of the room where he was regaling his friends, which never failed of throwing them into a terrible consternation. At other times he would command his servants to put serpents privately under the table, and break pots full of scorpions in the middle of the hall where he had prepared a banquet for his favourites, without suffering any of them to rise from the table, or change his place; and when any of his friends were bit on such occasions by those venomous animals, he immediately expelled the poison by a theriacal medicine that he had prepared for that purpose. Whilst he was in the midst of one of these debauches, the Turkish slaves that had conspired against g him entered the hall of the festin with their scymitars drawn in their hands, and Bager at the head of them, according to some of the Persian historians; upon which, one of those at table, who first perceived them, but did not suspect any wicked design, said, in a facetious manner,

- a manner, This is neither the day of lions, nor of serpents, nor of scorpions, but that of scymitars, or swords. Al Motawakkel no sooner heard him talk of scymitars, or swords, than he said, What's that you would say? Which words were scarce out of his mouth, when the conspirators fell upon him, and cut him to pieces. Fatab, continue those authors, endeavouring to defend him, and crying out with all his might, O Al Motawakkel, I will not survive you! was likewise killed with the Khalif. That prince's buffoon, who had hid himself at the sight of the scymitars, hearing Fatab's last words, and observing what happened to him thereupon, said with a loud voice, O Al Motawakkel, I should be very glad to live after you! which he thought might induce them to let him make his escape. One writer of good repute informs us, that Al Montaser was persuaded by the wise men
- b about him to commit the parricide above-mentioned, because his father had been guilty of some enormities that merited such an end. Another assures us, that his cruelty to those persons of distinction, who were so unhappy as to incur his displeasure, greatly contributed thereto. These he inclosed in an iron stove, lined with pointed nails, which he caused to be heated more or less in proportion to the heinousness of the crime he intended to punish; and when any of them, upon finding himself in exquisite torture, said to him, Have pity upon me, he replied, Pity is nothing but a meanness of soul. 'Tis affirmed by some authors, that Mohammed Ebn Abd'almâlec Al Ziyât, his Visir, remained in such torture forty days before he expired. Another will have it, that Al Montaser's principal motive to desire his father's death, and to engage the Turks to dispatch him, was the opprobrious treatment he
- c met with from him. For the Khalif called his eldest son, by way of mockery and reproach, Montazber, or Montadber, instead of Montaser; by which nickname the former would intimate, that the latter lived in continual hopes of his death. Sometimes likewise Al Motawakkel would force the young prince to drink to excess, than which nothing could make him more unpopular or disagreeable to the Moslems, and then beat him without the least discretion. Nay, for what had scarce the appearance of a crime, he would make him undergo the most rigorous punishment. Lastly, we are given to understand by some of the oriental historians, that Al Motawakkel's assassination was owing to the resentment of Wasif the Turk, whom he had appointed captain of his guards, and consequently made him master of his person, and yet was so imprudent as to give him just cause of offence.
- d For he deprived him of some domains that he possessed in the Persian Irák, in order to bestow them upon Fatab Ebn Khâkân, his favourite and Visir. But whatever was the true cause of this prince's violent death, it has been observed by the Moslem writers, not only that the conspiracy formed against him was discovered a little before Al Montaser caused it to be carried into execution, by one of his trusty slaves, but likewise that his tragical exit was clearly predicted to him about the same time by a most strange and wonderful dream<sup>r</sup>.

It has been remarked upon the subject of the sword, or scymitar, given by Al Motawakkel to Bager, by Al Bakhteri, that this Khalif having heard much of the excellency of a sword in the city of Basra, writ to his governor there to purchase it for him, cost what it would.

- e But the governor, upon inquiry, finding it had been sold, and sent into the province of Babrein, informed the Khalif that it was not in his power to procure it for him. Al Motawakkel, therefore, dispatched a courier thither to buy it at any price that should be demanded for it. His order was executed, and, as soon as the sword came into his hands, he gave it to Bager, with the following compliment, Take this sword; I set no greater value upon it than I do upon you<sup>s</sup>.

- f ANOTHER oriental author has observed, that this Khalif was slain by his son Al Montaser's order, upon the very spot where Khosrû Parvîz, king of Persia, of the Sassanian race, had been massacred by the command of his son Shirûyeh. His principal physician, Bakhtishua, having amassed vast treasures, and Al Motawakkel being informed of this, the Khalif once invited himself to an entertainment at his house; where being regaled with the utmost magnificence, he conceived an aversion to him, especially as the immense wealth he had acquired by his master's favour and munificence, had rendered him insolent and haughty. This induced that prince to send Al Hosein Ebn Al Mokballed to seal up the rooms where his treasures and effects were deposited, and soon after to deprive him of them. Bakhtishua's disgrace happened in the year of the Hegira 244, and his death in the year 256. Besides Bakhtishua, another physician of considerable note, named Abu Zeid Abd'alrahmân Honain Ebn Ishak Al Ebadi, a Christian likewise, flourished in the Khalifat of Al Motawakkel. This physician was an Ebadian, that is, one of those Christian Arabs known by the title of servants of God, (for that the words Al Ebadi, or Al Ebadi, import) who were collected from different tribes, and settled in the Arabian, Babylonian, or Chaldean Irák, not far from the cities of Hira and Cúfa. Honain, whose father Isbak was an apothecary in the city of Hira, having in his youth an uncommon thirst after knowledge, went to the school of Tabya Ebn Máfwiya, a celebrated physician of Baghdád, for instruction; where he continued for some time. But meeting with contemptuous treatment from Tabya, on a certain occasion, he retired into the territories of the Greek emperor; where he remained two years, and, during that term, not only learned the Greek language, but likewise made a fine collection of books, in order to forward his philosophical studies. After the expiration of that term, he took a journey into Persia, from whence he went to Basra, a city of the Persian Irák, where he attained to great skill in Arabic, under the direction of Al Khalil Ebn Ahmed, and then returned to Baghdád. Here he soon grew so famous, that Gabriel Ebn Bakhtishua, universally esteemed for his knowledge, declared to Yusef, another physician, that he would excel in every branch of learning Sergius of Rasoulain, or Rásalain, the prodigy of the age, who translated many of the Greek authors into Syriac. His fame soon reaching the ears of Al Motawakkel, that prince sent for him, and was so pleased with his conversation, that he determined to settle a pension upon him. However, as he had resided two years in the Greek emperor's dominions, suspecting that he might be carrying on some sinister designs for that monarch, he was afraid at first to trust him; and therefore, in order to try him, after he had ordered him to be clothed in a sumptuous robe, and assigned him an yearly appointment of 50,000 dinârs, he commanded him to prepare him a subtle poison, with which he might destroy one of his enemies in so private a manner that no one could suspect him to be the author of his death. This Honain refused to do; telling the Khalif, that he could only prepare medicines which would be beneficial to mankind; however, he assured that prince, in order to gain time, that he would study the nature of poisons, if he could once understand that such a study would prove agreeable to him. The Khalif not being able, either by promises or menaces to prevail upon him to do what he desired, sent him immediately to prison, where he kept him confined a whole year; after the end of which, he ordered him to be brought before him, and threatened him with immediate death, if he persisted in his refusal to obey his commands. But he still remained inflexible; which so pleased Al Motawakkel, that he bad him be of good courage, and told him that he should now repose the greatest confidence in him. Afterwards demanding of him what could inspire him with such an amazing resolution, when death did as it were stare him in the face? "Two things," replied Honain, "my religion and my profession. The former commands me to do good to my enemies, and much more not to hurt my friends. The latter was instituted solely for the benefit and advantage of mankind; and, at my entrance upon it, I took a solemn oath never to be concerned in any mischievous or lethiferous preparations." This answer charmed the Khalif, who made him a present of a rich vest, together with a very considerable sum of money; so that he seemed to be, for some time, one of the happiest of mortals, as he enjoyed so large a share of Al Motawakkel's favour. However, one Al Tifiri, a Christian, envying his happiness, found means to accuse him of profaneness and infidelity to the Khalif, and to excite the superior clergy to prosecute him for the same; which terminated in an excommunication. This so affected Honain, that he died suddenly the following night; having, as was generally believed, put a period to his days by poison. He left behind him two sons, Dawd and Isbak; the latter of which applied himself to the study of philosophy, and translated some of the best Greek writers, and the former practised physic, after his father's death, amongst the lower sort of people. He had likewise a nephew, named Hobaisb Ebn Al Asam, who had an excellent talent at translations; inasmuch that his Arabic version of several Greek and Syriac authors has been justly admired by many learned men of the east, and by some of them even ascribed to Honain himself. This celebrated physician, according to Ebn Shobnah, translated into Arabic Euclid, and Ptolemy's Almagest, which were afterwards revised and corrected by Thâbet Ebn Korra the Subian. His scholars are also said to have translated into the same language the greatest part of the works of Galen and Hippocrates, and to have published this version under their master's name. Some writers likewise attribute to him and his son the Arabic translation of Aristotle's Analytics, and his treatise of Interpretation, intitled by the Arabs Anothica and Bari Arminias; which words are manifest corruptions of the Greek. In the French king's library, N° 866, several of Honain's pieces, namely, the Kesaiat Al Naik, the Hawasbi Messail Al Hakim Honain, &c. are still preserved. It appears from Ebn Shobnah, that Honain's excommunication by the patriarch for his irreverence to certain sacred pictures, or images, and consequently his death, which immediately followed that tragical event, happened in the Khalifat of Al Mo'tamed, and the year of the Hejra 260, or 261.

- a THE reign of this Khalif is called by the oriental historians the reign of prodigies. The Many prodigies in this prince's reign. earthquakes in various parts of the world during that period, and the strange effects produced by some of the dreadful concussions attending them, already taken notice of, have been considered by those writers as part of them. Besides which, many others, and particularly one in the country of Kairwân, the Cyrenaica of the antients, wherein the earth opened and swallowed up a vast number of people, as also another in Yaman, during which a large ploughed field was carried from the top of a hill to a place at a considerable distance from it, without losing an inch of ground, have been mentioned by Ebn Jûzi. We are likewise informed by Ebn Abu'l Weza, that a strange bird, bigger than a raven, perched upon a tree in the same country, and, in the hearing of many people, distinctly pronounced the following words, Serve and fear God, God, God, which it repeated forty times, and then flew away; but soon after returned and pronounced the same words forty times more. The truth and reality of which facts were attested by 500 persons who heard them, and were brought before Al Motawakkel for that purpose. Ebn Al Jala also writes, that in Khûzestân, a bird placed itself upon the bier of a man, whom some of his neighbours were carrying to his grave, and cried out in the language of that province, ALMIGHTY God have mercy upon this dead person, and all that assist in his interment. The water of the Tigris likewise at Baghdâd, once in this prince's reign, continued for three days together as yellow as melted gold, and then assumed the colour of blood, which remained a much longer time. At Sowida, a small town, in Egypt, it hailed stones of a monstrous size, every one of which weighed ten Arab pounds. Nor was the nature of these stones less wonderful than their size. For, an Arab having taken one of them, in order to make a fire with it in his tent, so violent a flame immediately issued out of it, that the whole tent, and every thing combustible in it, were consumed in an instant. Some of these stones are said to have been preserved at Kairo, or Al Kabirah, and Betlis in Georgia, a long time after. A Persian author relates, that two men in Egypt having been struck down to the ground by lightening, about the same time, they both continued black from head to foot all the remaining part of their lives, without having received any other damage therefrom<sup>u</sup>.

- d THIS Khalif issued at least two edicts against the Christians settled in the Moslem empire, He issued two edicts against the Christians. as has been already observed; one of which has been considered as the effect of his resentment against Bakhtishua, his physician, who professed the Christian religion, by some of the eastern writers; though he seems to have persecuted the followers and descendants of Ali with a much greater degree of violence. In his reign, Theophilus, the Greek emperor, ordered all the images of saints in the churches to be destroyed; which induced Sophronius, the patriarch of Alexandria, and one Abu Korra, an Arab, to write in defence of image-worship; though others, with an invincible strength of reasoning, maintained the contrary opinion. The former of these learned men sent a letter to the emperor, containing the reasons that obliged him to disapprove of his conduct in the aforesaid particular; which, according to some, had such an effect upon that prince, that he immediately revoked his former edict. Sophronius died of a dropsy, in the 233d year of the Hejra, and was succeeded by one Michael, a native of Alexandria, who sat in the patriarchal see there, according to Eutychius, about twenty-four years. The same author relates, that the emperor had a distaste given him to images by the pious fraud of a priest, who, by means of a leaden tube made the people believe, that the breasts of an image of the virgin Mary dropped milk; which pretended miracle procured from the populace an uncommon degree of reverence for that image, and no small accession of wealth to the priest himself; but the imposture being detected, the emperor was so incensed, that he commanded him to be beheaded, and forbade his subjects to worship either the images or pictures of saints; which, for some time, he considered as downright idolatry. To which we may add, that this event seems to have preceded a few years the Khalif's first edict against the Christians; and that not long after the emperor had abolished the worship of images, he relapsed into that species of idolatry. This, therefore, being so extremely repugnant to the turn and genius of the Mohammedans, probably excited the Khalif to discover an ill disposition to the Christians in the year of the Hejra 235. For, the disgrace of Bakhtishua happened, if we will believe Abu'l Faraj, in the year of the Hejra 244; and therefore could not occasion the publication of the aforesaid edict, notwithstanding what may seem to be insinuated to the contrary by Eutychius, who, perhaps, industriously concealed the true cause of that affair<sup>w</sup>.

Description of
kel's person
and character.

WITH regard to Al Motawakkel's person, he was tall, of a thin habit of body, and had a swarthy complexion. He had, however, a handsome face, in which a reddish and yellowish hue appeared, a middling beard, and eyes of a larger size. As to his disposition, he was, if we may believe Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, extremely affable, munificent, and of great condescension. He was also a vast encourager of learned men, insomuch that prodigious numbers of them resorted to his court. In this, he followed the example of his great predecessor Al Mamûn, of whose uncommon passion for the sciences, particularly geometry and astronomy, the following remarkable instance has been handed down to us by Cedrenus. A young Greek having been taken prisoner by the Arabs, and brought by the officer whose slave he was into the Khalif's presence, that prince's geometricians, who likewise then appeared, immediately entered into a conference with him; but the youth proving in knowledge infinitely superior to them, they asked him whether there were any more geometricians at Bizantium as good as himself? To which he answered, that there were many there who vastly excelled him, and particularly his master Leo, then in poor circumstances, who applied himself solely to the study of the sciences. The Khalif, extremely desirous of having so celebrated a mathematician at his court, gave the Greek his liberty, and sent him with a letter to Leo, then at Constantinople, or Bizantium, to invite him into his dominions; offering at the same time to load him with presents, and settle what pension he pleased upon him, if he would undertake to instruct his subjects in those sciences, in which he so eminently excelled. This letter Leo shewed to Theodistus; and he immediately communicated the contents of it to Theophilus, who then sat upon the imperial throne. The emperor, being by this means made acquainted with Leo's uncommon merit, constituted him professor of those branches of literature he was master of, and converted the church of the forty martyrs into a school, or gymnasium, where he exercised the great talents he was master of for the public good. After this, Al Mamûn sent a considerable number of geometrical and astronomical problems, besides several relative to other sciences, of all which he soon received from him a most accurate and satisfactory solution. This so raised the advantageous idea the Khalif had already formed to himself of Leo's transcendent merit, that he sent an ambassador to the imperial court, to desire the emperor to permit that learned man to reside a short time with him. For which favour the ambassador offered Theophilus, in his master's name, a large sum of money, and to enter into a lasting treaty of peace and alliance with him. But the emperor, being unwilling that the Arabs should make a figure in the learned world, refused to comply with Al Mamûn's request, and created Leo bishop of Thessalonica. However, this sufficiently demonstrates that Khalif's thirst after knowledge, and confirms the character given of this prince, at least in the particular here insisted upon, by the oriental historians *.

lating to him.

THE Khalif Al Motawakkel reigned fourteen years and seven months, according to Abu'l Faraj, or fourteen years, nine months, and nine days, if we will believe Eutychius, or, lastly, fourteen years, ten months, and three days, if we chuse to admit what has been advanced by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari. According to the first and last of these authors, he was forty years of age at the time of his death; but Eutychius makes him to have been forty-four years old when that tragical event happened. In the tenth year of his Khalifat, he made Salmûn Ebn Zarkûn patriarch of Jerusalem, who sat in that see about five years. The first of his Visirs was Mohammed Ebn Abd'almâlec Al Ziyât; after whose death, Mohammed Ebn Al Fadl Al Forjâni was called to that high post. And, lastly, Al Forjâni was succeeded by Abd'allah Ebn Yahya Ebn Kbâkân, who, as some writers will have it, was the Khalif's principal secretary of state. The first employed by this prince in the capacity of judge was Yahya Ebn Asem, whom he turned out of his office, and deprived him of all the money he had therein acquired, which amounted to the sum of 100,000 dinârs. After Yahya's disgrace, he advanced to that honourable employment Jaafar Ebn Mohammed Al Barbarmi, and then Jaafar Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Jaafar Al Hasbemi. He removed from the exalted post that had been conferred upon him Ahmed Ebn Dawd, who had been so instrumental in his elevation to the Khalifat. The first captain of his guards was Ishak Ebn Ibrahim, and the second Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Thâber, who was sent for out of Khorasân. His first chamberlain was Wasîf, the Turk, his second Sa'id Ebn Sâleh, and his third Bagâ, or Bogâ, the Turk. The first day of his reign was Thursday, and the last Wednesday. The inscription of the seal was, In God is my trust. It has been already observed, that Fatah Ebn Kbâkân, his principal favourite, was assassinated with him †.

S E C T. XXXII.

- <sup>a</sup> IT appears from what has been related above, that the night Al Motawakkel was massacred <sup>Al Montaser</sup> the assassins saluted his son Mohammed Abu Jaafar Al Montaser, or, as he is commonly <sup>saluted</sup> called, Al Montaser Bi'llah, Khalif. The next morning the new emperor of the faithful assembled all the great officers of the court, and the principal inhabitants of the city of Al Jaafariya, built by the late Khalif, who had been murdered there, and ordered Abmed Ebn Al Khasib to read to them a declaration he had caused to be drawn up, importing that he had no hand in his father's death, but that this ought to be imputed to his favourite Fatab Ebn Khakan, whom he had ordered to be cut to pieces for being guilty of so black a crime. After which, he was inaugurated, and all the persons of distinction present took the oath of allegiance to him. His mother Habasha, one of Al Motawakkel's concubines, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, was of Greek extraction. <sup>b</sup> Soon after his inauguration, he demolished the palace Al Jaafariya, erected by his father, and retired into Samarra, or Sarra Manray, where he resided during the remainder of his short reign. Some of the Moslem writers pretend, that Al Montaser, not long after his accession, looking upon a piece of tapestry curiously wrought, discovered thereon a person on horseback with a diadem about his head, and round it a Persic inscription, which he commanded a Persian then belonging to his court to explain. The Persian, continue these authors, would willingly have evaded obeying the Khalif's command; but finding this impracticable, he told Al Montaser, that the horseman he saw was Shiruyeh, the son of Khosru Parviz, who slew his father; and that the inscription was to the following effect: I am Shiruyeh, the son of Khosru Parviz, who slew my father, and reigned only six months. <sup>c</sup> Al Montaser no sooner heard these words than he changed countenance; considering the whole affair as ominous, and amounting to a prediction that his reign should not exceed that term. Which prediction, if we will believe the Arab historians, met with a full and absolute completion. Abu Othman Becr Ebn Mohammed Al Mazeni, a celebrated grammarian famed for his skill in the Arabic tongue, died the present year. We must not forget to remark, that Al Mondar, the son of Mohammed, Khalif of Spain, invaded the province of Alava, where he overthrew the Christian forces, and brought a great number of heads with him to Corduba; and that Al Abbâs, the second Aglabite Emir of Sicily, who was succeeded by his son Abd'allah Ebn Al Abbâs, elected by the people Emir, till the Khalif of Kairwan's pleasure was known, died in the year of the Hejra 247<sup>2</sup>.
- <sup>d</sup> THE next year, being the 248th of the Moslem æra, beginning March 7th, 862, Bogâ Al Kabir, Boga Al Saghir, Bagher, or Bager, Wasif, and the other officers of the Turkish guards, <sup>He excludes his brothers from the succession.</sup> concerned in the assassination of Al Motawakkel, held a council amongst themselves, and, in order to avoid being brought to condign punishment for the perpetration of so horrid a crime, resolved to oblige the new Khalif to exclude his brothers Al Mo'taz, or rather Al Mo'tazz, and Al Mowaiad from the succession; being convinced that either of those princes would take vengeance of them for his father's death, if ever he should ascend the Moslem throne. But the Khalif's brothers, having been apprized of the violence with which they were threatened, went of their own accord to Al Montaser, and resigned with a good grace their right to the crown after his decease. This is the account of the affair, at present in view, handed down to us by <sup>e</sup> some of the Persian historians: tho' the Arab writers represent this resignation, or abdication, as the effect of compulsion. Be that as it will, the Khalif immediately notified this event to Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Thâker Ebn Hosein, the commandant of Baghdâd; intimating at the same time, that the two princes themselves desired to be permitted always to live a private life, as their abilities were by no means equal to the government of so large and extensive an empire. Notwithstanding which, he considered the Turkish officers, who had imbrued their hands in his father's blood, according to some of the Arab writers, as the principal authors of this measure; and even told his brothers themselves, in the very presence of those officers, that they had impelled him to it. After which, he dispatched couriers with advice of what had happened to all the governors of the provinces in the empire. Some historians report, that the rich tapestry above-mentioned, which threw Al Montaser into such a consternation, was found in his father's wardrobe, and had formerly belonged to the ancient kings of Persia<sup>2</sup>.

not long enjoy the fruits of his wickedness, in the following terms: “Mohammed, thou hast “ killed me, thou hast oppressed me, thou hast deprived me of the Khalifat, which thou “ shalt in a short time leave, and then enter into eternal fire.” This dream so frightened the Khalif, that he immediately awaked in the utmost terror, burst out into tears, and made the palace ring with his lamentations. This soon brought to him Abd’allah Ebn Amru, to whom he related his frightful dream; who told him, that these nocturnal horrors were only the effects of his waking thoughts, and bad him slight them as much as possible. In order to which, he farther advised him to take a chearful glass, and to drive away all pensive thoughts by a round of his favourite diversions; which he accordingly for some time attempted to do.
 But notwithstanding this, he gradually fell into a deep melancholy, which at last put a period to his days; tho’ he died of a squinancy on Sunday the fifth of the later Rabi, according to Abu’l Faraj, after he had been ill only three days. Some authors pretend, that he was carried off by poison; and others, by an ulcer in his head, caused by dropping some oil into one of his ears. He expired on the 25th day of the former Rabi, if we will believe Abu Jaafar Al Tabari. Another writer assures us, that he died of a fever; of which when his physician said he could easily cure him, he replied, I greatly fear this will be the last sickness I shall ever have, as I saw a person in a dream last night, who declared to me that I should die in the twenty-fifth year of my age. This person, as he found afterwards, was his father, whose nocturnal apparition to him in a dream has been already taken notice of. The death of this Khalif happened at Sarramawraia, where, from the sixth day of his short reign, he chose to reside <sup>b</sup>.

A remarkable story of him. MIRKHOND writes, that this Khalif was extremely liberal to his friends; of which he gives us the following singular instance. One of his officers being returned from Egypt, where he had acquitted himself perfectly well in an office he was intrusted with, and entertaining his master with an account of the various adventures he had met with in that country, amongst other things told him, that he had brought with him from thence a wounded heart, because he could not purchase, for want of money, a female slave of exquisite beauty and a most charming voice. The Khalif heard him without making any reply; but being determined to gratify him, he gave orders privately to the governor of Egypt to buy that slave, and send her to Samarra as soon as possible. Upon her arrival there, she was immediately conducted to the palace; whither the Khalif invited the officer a few days after, in order to rally him upon his amours. He no sooner appeared in his master’s presence, than he heard the voice of his beloved slave in the next room; which put him instantly out of countenance. The Khalif asked him the reason of his confusion, and whether he knew the voice he heard? Upon which, he frankly owned, that he took it to be the voice of the beautiful slave he had formerly mentioned to him. Al Montaser then demanded of him, whether he still preserved his affection for her? To which he answered, that “as he could not enter“ tain the least hopes of ever possessing her, he ought to lay aside his passion for her, “ especially as she was become his master’s property.” The Khalif very generously said to him, “I can assure you with an oath, that I have purchased this beautiful slave in Egypt “ for no other person than yourself, and that I have only cast one glance at her since her “ arrival at the palace.” Which words were no sooner out of his mouth, than he commanded her to be put into the officer’s hands, adorned with all those jewels he had given her, in order to make her a more valuable present to him <sup>c</sup>.

A pleasant occurrence in his reign. IT was in this Khalif’s reign, that an Arab, seated on a little hill in the neighbourhood of Mecca, held unlawful assemblies at his house, in order to debauch the youth of both sexes, whom he suffered to mix together promiscuously there, in direct opposition to the Moham- medan laws. This man was brought before the judge of Mecca, who, after he had reproached him with his unparalleled impudence in daring to be guilty of such lewdness so near the holy place, began immediately to draw up his process; not doubting in the least of the truth of a fact which was become so notorious to all the people of the territory of Mecca.
 But as none of his accomplices would appear against him, the judge found himself greatly embarrassed for want of evidence. However, he at last hit upon an expedient, which he thought would infallibly convict him; and that was to try whether any of those public beasts made use of by the people who set out every day from one particular place to that part of the mountain where this Arab lived, would of themselves find the way to his house.
 The experiment was made on some asses, the beasts principally used in this country, that went directly of their own accord to the spot inhabited by the Arab, tho’ this was of itself extremely difficult to be discovered. The judge having now, as he imagined, full proof of his guilt, sent for the executioner to chastise him, who immediately appeared with the whips or scourges in his hand. The Arab, who did not want wit, at the sight of him, bea thought himself of a pleasant sort of finesse, in order to avoid the chastisement with which he was threatened. Turning himself then to the judge, he said, When you have slay'd me alive with your whips, you will have punished only one guilty person; but, by such an action, you will reflect an eternal ignominy upon the whole Arab nation. For it will be ever said of them hereafter, that, when the evidence of men could not be produced, they admitted that of asses. The company were so pleased with the humour of the man, that it was the opinion of every one present that he ought to be pardoned; so that he was instantly dismissed, without having any punishment at all inflicted upon him <sup>d</sup>.

WITH regard to his person, Al Montaser was of a middle stature, and had very large black eyes. He had also an aquiline nose, a majestic mein, a large beard, was extremely fat, and of a fair complexion. As to his disposition, he is reported to have been naturally brave, prudent, and just, but too great a lover of money. Some of the Arab writers observe, that he had a taste for poetry, and made tolerable good verses, a specimen of which has been preserved by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari. He reigned only six months, and had scarce completed the 25th year of his age, tho' Eutychius supposes him to have been three years older, at the time of his death. Not only the lower sort of people, but even the grandees themselves, gave out publicly, from his first advancement to the Moslem throne, that he would not reign longer than six months, the time that Sairūch, the son of Khosrū Parvīz, survived his father; which renders it probable that he was poisoned, as we find asserted by some of the Arab historians. He favoured the house of Ali, and permitted the Shiites to visit Al Hosein's tomb. His Vizir was Abmed Ebn Al Khasib, the captain of his guards Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Thāber, his judge Jaafar Al Abbāsi, and his first chamberlain Abu Nāser, the Turk. The first day of his reign was either Wednesday or Thursday, and the last Saturday. The inscription of his seal was, The person who endeavours to avoid fear necessarily takes it to him. He died, and was interred, at Sarra Manray, and had a more beautiful sepulchre, erected for him by his mother, than even the most famed and eminent of his predecessors <sup>e</sup>.

d THE day after Al Montaser's death, the two Bogā's, father and son, Atāmesh, and the other principal Turkish officers, who had been concerned in the murder of Al Motawakkel, assembled in that part of the metropolis denominated Al Harūniā, and, after coming to a resolution never to vest with the imperial dignity any of that prince's sons, lest they should be called to an account for their former villainy, unanimously elevated to the Khalifat Abmed Abu'l Abbās Ebn Mohammed Ebn Al Mo'tasem, who was surnamed Al Mosta'in, or Al Mosta'in Bīllah. This step was taken apparently to the prejudice of Al Mo'tazz, second son to the Khalif Al Motawakkel, to whom the right of succession most evidently appertained. But the Turkish faction having acquired a great degree of power, by the credit which Boga Al Kabir, Boga Al Saghir, Wasif, Bagher, or Bager, and their other chiefs, had obtained in all the provinces, they carried all before them; insomuch that Al Mo'tazz's party was intirely borne down, and Al Mosta'in whose mother Mahārif, or, as others call her, Makhārek, had served his father in the capacity of concubine, soon found himself in peaceful possession of the empire, and was universally acknowledged the sole, true, and lawful Khalif <sup>f</sup>.

e THE election of the new Khalif happened on Monday the 6th day of the latter Rabī, in the year of the Hejra 248; he being then, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, about 28 years of age, and receiving at the same time from the electors the surname of Al Mosta'in Bīllah. As soon as the election was over, he appointed Atāmesh his Vizir, or Wazir, and Abmed Ebn Al Khasib his secretary of state. The day following he, shewed himself to the people, in his imperial robes, who were ranged in two lines to receive him. But the Khalif no sooner appeared, than there suddenly started up a body of 50 horse, and 1000 foot, with their scymitars drawn in their hands, crying out with all their might, Long live Al Mo'tazz! upon which a very smart conflict ensued. But Al Mo'tazz's friends being at last defeated, and for the most part cut to pieces, Al Mosta'in was fixed upon the Moslem throne. That prince no sooner found himself without a competitor, than he sent to prison Al Mo'tazz and Al Mowaiad, the Khalif Al Motawakkel's sons. About this time, Yakūb Ebn Al Leit, or Al Lit, moved out of Sejestān towards Herāt, with a considerable body of troops; and the people of Hems drove the Khalif's governor out of the town. The present year likewise, according to Abu'lfeda, Bogá Al Kabír, and Mohammed Ebn Al Ola Al Hamadani, departed this life. We must not forget to observe, that the citizens of Merida, the antient Emerita, rebelled also this year against Mohammed, the Khalif of Spain; who marched against them with a powerful army, obliged them to surrender at discretion, destroyed their bridge, dismantled their city, forced them to send a number of hostages to Gorduba, and, in order the more effectually to keep them in their duty, left amongst them a detachment of his troops<sup>e</sup>.

The Turkish troops in the Khalif's service mutiny.

THE following year, being the 249th of the Hejra, commencing February 24th, 863, the Greeks overthrew the Arabs at Marj Al Askaf, and put Omer Ebn Abd'allah Al Aktab, their general, together with a great number of his men, to the sword; which enabled them to make incursions into the Moslem territories, as far as the borders of Mesopotamia. The Turkish troops also in the Khalif's service mutinied, and cut to pieces Atâmesb, Al Mosta'in's Visir, and Seja' Ebn Al Hâtem, another person of distinction belonging to the court. They also plundered Atâmesb's house, and carried off with them from thence an immense treasure. To these outrages they were excited by Wasîf and Bogâ, their leaders, who were dissatisfied with Atâmesb's conduct; he having, at least as they pretended, set the Khalif against them, and excluded them from a share in the administration. These enormities occasioned a commotion at Baghdâd, where the populace assembled in great numbers, burnt one of the bridges over the Tigris, and demolished the other, opened all the prisons in that city, pillaged the houses of the wealthiest inhabitants, and distributed the money that fell into their hands on this occasion amongst the forces posted, for the defence of the frontiers, at a considerable distance from the town. The troops likewise in garison at Baghdâd, enraged at the Turkish insolence, about the same time committed great disorders<sup>b</sup>.

IN the 250th year of the Hejra, beginning February 13th, 864, Yahya Ebn Omar Ebn Yahya, of the house of Ali, assembled a body of troops at Cûfa, and declared his intention to dethrone Al Mosta'in. Upon advice of this revolt, the Khalif sent Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Thâber Ebn Al Hosein with an army against Yahya; who coming up with him not far from Cûfa, attacked him with such bravery, that he put his forces to flight. Yahya himself was killed in the action, and his head sent by Mohammed to Al Mosta'in, who caused it to be exposed to the view of the people in one of the most publick places of Sarra Manray. This defeat, and the death of Yahya, extinguished the rebellion that had broke out in Arabian Irâk. The troubles, however, continued at Baghdâd<sup>c</sup>.

Another rebellion in Tabrestân.

SOME of the authors followed by M. D'Herbelot relate, that one Hasan Ebn Yezid, another chief of the house of Ali, rebelled against the Khalif, and seized upon the province of Tabrestân, the same year. This usurper, according to those writers, remained master of that province nineteen whole years, and left it to his brother Mohammed Kasem, or Kassem, who succeeded him, and kept possession of it eighteen years, without any molestation from the Khalifs. This usurper is called Al Hasan Ebn Zeid Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ismael, by Abu'lfeda and Abu Jaafar Al Tabari; the former of which writers placed his defection in the 250th, and the latter in the 251st, year of the Moslem æra. About this time, the people of Hems cut Al Fadl Ebn Karân, the Khalif's governor of that city, to pieces; but they were defeated by Mûsa Ebn Boga Al Kabír, his successor, who put a vast number of them to the sword, and laid their city in ashes. The preceding year, died Ali Ebn Al Jabm, a poet of considerable note; as did also about this time, Al Kbâli, another of equal merit. The Moslems reduced the city of Neetum, the Noto of the moderns, called by the Arabs Natis, in Sicily the present year<sup>d</sup>.

Al Mosta'in flies to Baghdâd.

IN the year of the Hejra 251, the first day of which was coincident with February 2d, 865, the Turks, who had made themselves masters of all the forces of the empire, and by that means intirely influenced the Khalif's councils, were divided into two powerful factions. Bagher, or Bager, one of their leaders, having had some dispute with Wasîf, another of them, applied to the Khalif for justice; who was so far from complying with his request, that he openly favoured his antagonist. This so exasperated Bagher, that he assembled his friends, with a resolution to assassinate Wasîf, and depose Al Mosta'in, in order to elevate in his place another Khalif, that should be more favourable to him. But this conspiracy being discovered, the Khalif caused Bagher to be arrested in the imperial palace; of which the Turks being apprized, they immediately took up arms, under the pretext of delivering their general out of his enemies hands. This obliged Al Mosta'in to hold an extraordinary council, at which assisted Wasîf and Bogâ, two of the other Turkish commanders; who, being interested in Bagher's destruction, advised the Khalif to put him to death. This advice was readily listened to, Al Mosta'in thinking by that execution to appease the seditious spirit of

- a the Turkish soldiery. But it produced a quite contrary effect. For the Turks, being rendered more furious by the death of their chief, pillaged the city of Sarra Manray, and threatened to set fire to the palace, if Wasîf and Bogâ, who had been the author of that general's death, were not immediately delivered into their hands. Those officers seeing themselves reduced to such an extremity, could find no other expedient at that critical juncture, to avoid the fury of their own troops, than to carry off their master with them to Baghdâd; which they accordingly did. The mutineers being informed of what had happened, repented of the violence they had committed, and sent deputies after Al Mosta'in to intreat him to return to his capital. But Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Thâber, the commandant of Baghdâd, being extremely pleased that he had got the Khalîf in his hands, and hating the Turks, as did also
- b both the garison and people of Baghdâd, received them very ill, and obliged them to return to Sarra Manray without having seen the Khalîf. This so irritated the Turks, that they had again recourse to arms, by their own proper authority deposed Al Mosta'in, and placed Al Mo'tazz, Al Montaser's brother, whom they took out of prison for that purpose, upon the Moslem throne. Some of the Arab authors call Bagher Taaz, and inform us, that he was massacred by Wasîf, Bogâ, and other persons of distinction, because he had possessed himself of the imperial palace with a design to assassinate both them and Al Mosta'in. This year the Christians worsted the Moslems in an action by sea, off Syracuse, and took four of their ships. It was with great difficulty that the Khalîf Al Mosta'in made his escape in a small vessel from Sarra Manray, seated on the eastern bank of the Tigris, to Baghdâd <sup>1</sup>.
- c THE Khalîf Al Mo'tazz, after he had settled himself upon the Moslem throne, sent his brother Abmed Ebn Motawakkel with an army to lay siege to Baghdâd. Abmed began his march from Samarra, or Sarra Manray, on the 23d of the month Al Moharram, and, upon his arrival at Baghdâd, besieged the place in form. His army, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, was not extremely numerous, the principal part of it consisting of no more than 5000 Turkish and Faraonian, or Egyptian horse, and 2000 Magrebians, or western Arabs; though, if we will believe Abu'l feda, it amounted to 50,000 men. Al Mosta'in for some time defended himself with great bravery, made several successful sallies on the besiegers, and destroyed a considerable number of their men. Nay, he would, in all probability, have forced Abmed to abandon the siege, had he not been betrayed by those in whom he was obliged
- d the most to confide. For, Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Thâber, the commandant of Baghdâd, in order to provide for his own security, thought fit to propose an accommodation to Abmed; which was at last concluded upon the following terms, viz. that Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Thâber should remain in peaceable possession of his government; and that Al Mosta'in, on condition his life was granted him, should abdicate the Khalîfat. Some of the Arab historians relate, that Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Thâber being apprized, that Al Mosta'in had engaged Bogâ and Wasîf to assassinate him, came to an immediate resolution to desert the party of that prince. Be that, however, as it will, as soon as Al Mo'tazz had signed and ratified the aforesaid treaty, Al Mosta'in formally renounced all pretensions to the Khalîfat, and contented himself with a living private life in the magnificent palace of Hasan Ebn Sohal at Baghdâd, which was assigned him for his residence. This happened in the year of the Hejra 252. He was afterwards removed to Al Hasan Ebn Wabeh's palace at Basra, and there straitly confined. From thence he was sent to Wâset, and committed to the custody of Abmed Ebn Tolûn; who, as some will have it, murdered him by the Khalîf's command, in the month of Shawâl, the same year. Others affirm, that Sa'id, Al Mo'tazz's principal chamberlain, dispatched him at Kâdesia; cut off his head, and immediately sent it as an agreeable present to his master. And, lastly, others believe that he was cut off by Sa'id, Al Mo'tazz's Vizir, soon after his abdication, in the imperial city of Sarra Manray. Those who make Abmed Ebn Tolûn his executioner relate, that his head was transmitted to the Khalîf at Sarra Manray; and that when the messenger appeared with
- f it in that prince's presence, he was playing at chess, and would not vouchsafe to look at it till he had finished his game; after which, he for some time beheld it with great pleasure, and then ordered it to be buried. Al Mosta'in reigned three years, nine months, and a few days, if we will believe the Arab historians; tho' his reign has likewise been extended by Khondemir to the length of almost four complete years. With regard to his person, Al Mosta'in was fat, of a comely aspect, and had a black beard. As to his disposition, he was mild, indolent, extremely fearful, and intirely governed by the people about him. His first Vizir was Atâmesh, and his secretary of state Abmed Ebn Al Khasîb. His favourites Wasîf and Bogâ, who at last deserted him, had an uncommon ascendant over him. His general Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Thâber abandoned his interests in the manner already related. His judges Abmed Ebn Abu'l Shawârib Al Amawî and Mohammed Ebn Wazîr Al Wâsetî made no very considerable figure. In the last year of his reign, one Sanitius is said to have been advanced to the patriarchate of Alexandria, and to have presided over the church there eleven years. In the first year of his Khalifat, Theodorus, called by the Al Moklâti, was also constituted patriarch of Jerusalem, and sat in that see nineteen years. We must not forget to observe, that Al Mosta'in's abdication was attested by his own judges, and all the principal citizens of Baghdâd <sup>m</sup>.

Rebellion in Tabrestân.

THE same year, that is, the 252d of the Hejra, Al Hasan Ebn Zeid Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ismael, of the posterity of Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, rebelled against the Khalîf in Tabrestân, and made himself master of that province. Several smart actions happened between him and Solimân Ebn Abd'allah, Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah, Thâber's lieutenant there. But at last Solimân intirely defeated him, put a vast number of his followers to the sword, and obliged him to fly with great precipitation into Deylam <sup>n</sup>.

Another in Deylam and Arabia.

Not long after, another pretender, an Arab of Al Thalabiya, named Al Hasan Ebn Ahmed Ebn Ismael Ebn Ibrahim, one of Ali's descendants, set up for himself in Deylam, routed the forces sent against him, and possessed himself of their camp. Not content with this, he penetrated to Medina, drove the governor out of the town, and obliged the inhabitants to open their gates to him. From Medina he marched at the head of his troops to Mecca, and besieged that city two months; but finding himself not able to carry the place, he retired to Jodda, cut off all communication between the Meccans and that port, and so infested the roads that it was not safe to perform the pilgrimage to Mecca. However, he soon returned thither, massacred great numbers of the citizens who were assembled on mount Arafat, on the ninth of Dbu'lhajja, in order to perform their devotions there, and forced many others, after he had plundered them, to abandon the place before they had gone through the prescribed ceremonies. But death soon put an end to all his towering projects, and dispersed his numerous followers in such a manner, that not the faintest traces of this rebellion ever afterwards appeared <sup>o</sup>.

S E C T. XXXIV.

Al Mo'tazz
elected Khalîf.

UPON the abdication of Al Mosta'in, Mohammed Abu Abd'allah Al Mo'tazz Ebn Al Motawakkel was unanimously acknowledged emperor of the Moslems, on the fourth of Al Moharram, in the year of the Hejra 252; both the Turks and the Arabs, without the least scruple, recognizing his authority. His mother's name was Fatîba. When he was fixed upon the throne, without any danger of a competitor, he called his brother Al Mowaiad again to the succession, though he soon after, upon a bare suspicion only, deprived him of his right, and sent him to prison. It is true, Al Mowaiad had a strong party in the empire, that would undoubtedly have declared for him, had he intended to undertake any thing against the Khalîf. But as to the rest, he was guilty of no crime; which was the case of Al Mowaffek, another of his brothers, who soon after fell under the same disgrace <sup>p</sup>.

He orders his brother to be privately murdered in prison.

THE news of Al Mowaiad's confinement no sooner transpired, than the whole body of the Turkish troops began to be in motion, and gave out publicly that they would release him. This so excited Al Mo'tazz's jealousy, that he ordered him to be privately murdered in prison; which was done in such a manner, that no marks of violence could be discovered upon him. So that when the body was exposed to the view of the judges, doctors of the law, noblesse, and Turkish officers, they readily agreed that this prince died a natural death <sup>q</sup>.

The new Kha-
lîf carries the Turks out of fear.

THE Khalîf, upon his accession, confirmed Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Thâber in the possession of the territories assigned him, and the government of Baghdâd, in conformity to the promise he had made him before his elevation to the Khalîfat. He likewise came to a resolution to cut off the chiefs of the Turkish soldiery, whose exorbitant power had proved so fatal to his three immediate predecessors. But he was dissuaded from carrying that design into execution by Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Thâber, who represented to him the dangerous consequences of it in so strong a light, that, instead of punishing Wasîf, Bagher, and the other Turkish commanders, as he had intended, he heaped new favours upon them, and gave them several additional employments, that greatly augmented the power they had already acquired. He likewise deprived Yezid Ebn Abd'allah of the government of Egypt, a which post he had enjoyed about eleven years, and sent Mazâhem Ebn Khâkân to preside over that country in his room. About this time, according to Abu'lfeda, died Mohammed Ebn Basbar, and Mohammed Ebn Al Motshan, of Basra, two of Al Bokhârî's doctors, and Al Mista'in was whipt to death by Sa'id Ebn Sabel. We must not forget to remark, that the Moslems retook Neetum, or Noto, in Sicily, after it had fallen again to the Christians, the present year<sup>1</sup>.

THE following year, being the 253d of the Hejra, the Turkish troops in Sarra Manray mutinied for their pay; upon which, Wasîf, their general, in order to appease the sedition, expostulated with them about their breach of duty in very sharp terms. But this was so far from producing the desired effect, that it proved fatal to him. Those insolent troops first gave him ill language, for his laudable attempt to bring them back to a sense of their duty by words only; and then some of the most guilty of them, rushing upon him all at once, cut him instantly to pieces<sup>2</sup>.

THE same year, the Khalîf Al Mo'tazz banished his brother Ahmed Ebn Al Motawakkel, called by some writers Al Mowaffek, and by others Abu Ahmed, to Wâset, or, according to Entychius, to Basra, because he seemed to take to heart his brother Al Mowaiad's death. He afterwards, however, permitted him to reside in the eastern part of the territory of Baghdâd. The famous general Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Thâber departed this life at Baghdâd, the 14th of Dhu'lkaada; and the following night, according to Abu Jaasar Al Tabari, there happened a remarkable lunar eclipse. The Moslems of Sicily, if we will believe the Cambridge Chronicle, reduced a second time the city of Ragusa, the present year<sup>3</sup>.

THE 254th year of the Hejra, beginning January 1st, 868, had like to have proved fatal to the Khalîf Al Mo'tazz. Bogâ, the Turk, surnamed the Elder, in order to distinguish him from a younger officer of the same name, observing an alteration in the Khalîf's conduct towards him, according to the writers followed by M. D'Herbelot, left the court abruptly, and retired to Mawfel. But he was no sooner gone, than a party of the Khalîf's guards pillaged his house. Upon receiving advice of this, Bogâ marched at the head of a body of troops he had raised towards Sarra Manray, under the pretext of chastising the seditious soldiers in that capital, but in reality with a resolution to be revenged on the Khalîf. That prince, who was not ignorant of the Turk's ill designs, commanded Al Walid, the Magrebian, or western Arab (so the African Moslems were called) to meet him with a powerful army, and give him battle wherever he should find him. The Magrebian executed his master's orders with such bravery, that, after a sharp engagement, he defeated the rebels, and took Bogâ himself prisoner. The news of this signal victory no sooner reached Al Mo'tazz, than he dispatched an express with orders to Al Walid to cut off his prisoner's head<sup>4</sup>.

THE same year, according to Abu Jaasar Al Tabari and Abu'lfeda, Al Mo'tazz put Bogâ the younger also to death at Sarra Manray; which excited great murmurings amongst the Turkish troops, and paved the way to the deposition of that prince. About this time died Abu'l Hasan Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ali Ebn Al Hosein, one of Ali's descendants, the ninth Shiite Imâm, and Mazâhem Ebn Khâkân, after he had been two years governor of Egypt. The latter of these was succeeded in his post by his son Ahmed, or Mohammed, as he was by Arjûz Ebn Olugh Ebn Tarkan, the Turk, and Arjûz by Ahmed Ebn Tolûn, an officer of Turkish extraction, then about thirty-four years of age, in the month of Ramadân. This Ahmed was born at Baghdâd, and, by the influence of the Turks at the Moslem court, had the government of Egypt conferred upon him; though his father Tolûn had been only one of the Khalîf Al Mamûn's Turkish slaves. He was a fast friend to the Turks on all emergent occasions, considering them as his friends and countrymen; though he is said to have despised the barbarous customs and genius of that nation. He has been represented as a person of uncommon greatness of soul, and of a very amiable character, by Abu'l Faraj<sup>5</sup>.

f THE next year, being the 255th of the Hejra, the Turks perceiving every day that the Khalîf was resolved to get rid of them as soon as possible, they were determined to be before-hand with him. For this purpose, they elected Saleb, the son of Wasîf, whom they had formerly assassinated, their general. After this election, they marched in a body to the house of Ahmed Ebn Isrâîl, who was then Al Mo'tazz's Visir, and pillaged it. Not content with this, they went afterwards, with their new general, and Mohammed Ebn Bogâ, whose father had been beheaded by the Khalîf's order, at their head, directly to the imperial palace; which they immediately invested, and in an insolent manner demanded their a pay. The Khalif, at that time not being in a condition either to satisfy their demands, or to resist their violence, was dragged out of his palace, and at last constrained to abdicate the Khalifat, in the presence of Ebn Abu'l Shawârib, and other proper witnesses, either on the 2d, the 28th, or the last, day of Rajeb, in favour of Mohammed Abu Abd'allah Ebn Al Wâthek, who afterwards assumed the name of Al Mohtadi. After this unexpected revolution, Al Mo'tazz was sent under an escorte to Baghdâd, where he died of thirst, according to Khondemir, or rather was starved to death with hunger, if we will believe the Arab historians. He reigned about four years and seven months, if we compute from his public inauguration at Sarra Manray; but a year less, if we make his Khalifat to commence immediately after the abdication of Al Mosta'in. His funeral service was performed by his suc- b cessor Al Mohtadi. His prime ministers, or Vizirs, were Mohammed Ebn Jaasar, Isa Ebn Farbanah, Abmed Ebn Isrâil, or, as he is called by Abu Jaasar Al Tabari, Abu Mohammed Jaasar Ebn Isrâil Al Anbâri; his generals, Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Thâber, Solimân Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Thâber, and finally Obeid'allah Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Thâber; his chief judge Abmed Ebn Al Hasan Ebn Abu'l Shawârib; and his chamberlains Wasîf, Bogâ, Bâcbâc, or Bâkbâk, and Saleh Ebn Wasîf, all Turks; the last of which had the principal hand in his deposition, as well as his death, that soon after followed. As to his person, Al Mo'tazz had an elegant head of hair, and so handsome a face, being of a fair complexion, that he has been represented as the most beautiful person in his dominions. Nor was he at the time of his death, if we will believe Eutychius, above twenty-two years of age. With regard c to his disposition, he was so attached to pleasures of various kinds, that he intirely neglected the government of his vast empire, and frequently acted beneath the dignity of his sublime station. The patriarch Sanitius, converted several unbelievers, who denied the reality of our Saviour's passion, in this prince's reign; which gave no small pleasure to the pious patriarch of Antioch, according to some of the Christian writers. The same Sanitius likewise, in the lieutenancy of Abmed Ebn Tolûn, was at the expence of making several subterraneous aqueducts, by means of which the city of Alexandria was plentifully supplied with excellent water. If any credit may be given to Eutychius, the Khalif Al Mo'tazz appointed Bâkbâk, the Turk, to preside over Egypt; who bestowed his daughter in marriage upon Abmed Ebn Tolûn, and constituted him his deputy in that country. And, in the d month of Ramadân, according to the same writer, in the year of the Hejra 254, Abmed entered Egypt as Bâkbâk's deputy only; which runs counter to what has been related by Abu'l Faraj and Abu Jaasar Al Tabari. Abu'lfeda relates, that when the Turkish militia found Al Mo'tazz not able to produce the money demanded of him, they offered to accept of only 50,000 dinârs; but that the Khalif having applied to his mother Kabihah, who was immensely rich, in vain for that small sum, they came to a resolution, in conjunction with the Faraônians, or Egyptians, and the Magrebiens, or western Arabs, to depose him. After which, continues this author, they dragged him to his chamber-door, beat him, exposed him without the palace to the burning rays of the sun, where for some time he remained in exquisite torture, buffeted him in a barbarous manner, and finally obliged him to abdi- e cate the Khalifat, in the presence of proper witnesses, and particularly of Ebn Abu'l Shawârib, the Kadi of Baghdâd. Not content with this cruel treatment, they permitted none of his subjects to bring him any nourishment for three days together, hurried him into a subterraneous vault, out of which issued a noxious and pestilential vapour, that put a period to his days, and deposited his remains in a tomb, near those of Al Montaser, at Sarra Manray. We must not forget to remark, that Abd'allah Ebn Abd'alrahmân Al Darâni, the author of the Mojassseman, or Corporeal, traditions, Abu Omrân Amru Ebn Bahr Al Jabeth, who left many learned works behind him, and Mohammed Ebn Kerâm Al Sejestâni, whose followers not only admitted a resemblance between God and created beings, but declared God to be corporeal, and from thence received the denomination of *Mojassseman*s, or Corporealists, died f the present year *.

Some farther particulars relating to this Khalif, and his mother Fatihah, or Kabihah.

EBN SHOHNAH writes, that the Atrâk, or Turks, the Faraônab, Faraônians, or Egyptians, and the Magâreba, Magrebiens, or western Arabs, as the African Moslems were called, assembled in a body before the imperial palace, entered it by force, and dragged Al Mo'tazz by his feet from the throne. After which, they beat him with clubs, and exposed his body stretched out at length to the solar rays, then extremely hot, in order to force him by such barbarous indignities to sign the resignation they had caused to be drawn up for that purpose. The same author relates, that this Khalif's mother's name was Kabihah, and not Fatiba, Fatihah, or Fatihat, as Erpenius reads it in the text of Al Mâkin; which imports homely, or ugly, and was given her by her husband Al Motawakkel, by way of joke, she g

- a having been one of the most beautiful women of the age. This lady amassed vast treasures during her husband's reign, and buried them in the earth after that prince's death. But the Khalif Al Mohtadi, after his accession, obliged her to put them into his hands. This writer farther relates, that those treasures consisted of 1,000,000 dinars, a makûk, or bushel, of emeralds, and another of pearls, together with a kilajah of rubies of the colour of fire. Every kilajah contained three Arabic pounds and three quarters, and every makûk three kilajah's; so that the latter amounted to eleven pounds and a quarter Arabic weight. Whenever Saleh Ebn Wasîf mentioned this princess, he said Kabbah ALLAH Kabibat, i. e. GOD makes ugly, i. e. curses, this woman, who bears the name of ugly, notwithstanding she is extremely beautiful. For, though she was mistress of such immense treasures, she suffered her son
- b Al Mo'tazz to be deposed and murdered, rather than part with only 50,000 dinars, which small sum would have satisfied the Turkish soldiery that mutinied for their pay. After Al Mohtadi ascended the Moslem throne, Kabibah quitted Sarra Manray, and retired to Mecca, where she cursed Saleh Ebn Wasîf in her turn; and vented her complaints against him in the following terms: Hatak setri, that is, He has torn my veil; which in modest language imports, He has enjoyed me, he has killed my son, he has driven me from my native country, and has at last left me, in order to follow a common prostitute †.

- WE are told by some of the Arab writers, that the Greek emperor Michael was assassinated in the Khalifat of Al Mo'tazz, by his general Basilus, in an island of the Propontis, whilst he was performing his devotions; and that, after this prince's death, the assassin
- c mounted the imperial throne. The principal reason assign by those writers for execrable action is, that Basilus was forced by the emperor to marry a beautiful woman, in order to cover an intrigue that prince was carrying on with her, and keep it from the empress's ears; so that not being permitted to cohabit with her, he was resolved to dispatch the person who had made so egregious a dupe of him. The Arabs settled in Crete, of whom we have already given some account, seem to have made a descent about this time upon Thrace, penetrating far into the country, and committing every-where dreadful ravages. In the 255th year of the Hejra, Ebn Sofiân, the Moslem Emîr in Sicily, was murdered by an Arab soldier, who afterwards made his escape to the Christians; after which, his son Mohammed Ebn Kbafajah was elected Emîr by the Sicilian Moslems in his room. This election was confirmed
- d by Mohammed Ebn Ahmed Al Aglabi, the Khalif of Kairwân, and the Emîr so confirmed enjoyed the government of the Moslem conquests in Sicily two whole years. The Rossi, a barbarous Scythian nation, seated in a tract to the north of mount Taurus, and the ancestors of the Russians, after having reduced the city of Constantinople to great straits, returned home, and were converted to the Christian faith, not far from the beginning of Al Mo'tazz's reign <sup>z</sup>.

S E C T. XXXV.

- e UPON the deposition of Al Mo'tazz, who was obliged by the Turkish troops to declare Al Mohtâdi himself unequal to the government of the Moslem empire, Mohammed Abu Abd'allah succeeds him. Al Mohtadi Ebn Al Wâthek was saluted Khalif at Sarra Manray, and all the people of that metropolis took the oath of allegiance to him. His mother Korb, or Karb, one of Al Wâthek's concubines, is supposed, or rather affirmed, to have been a Christian by some of the Arab historians. Al Mo'tazz himself was first, though this ought to be considered as the effect of compulsion, who acknowledged him Khalif, and gave him the surname of Al Mohtadi Bill'ah. This prince has been represented by the Moslem writers as a great lover of justice, which he distributed daily in person to all his subjects. He prohibited the use of wine, as well as gaming of all kinds, so expressly forbidden by the Korân, and banished
- f from the court all singers, soothsayers, jesters, and buffoons. He also sent away the lions and hounds that had been kept by his predecessors in the imperial palace. In order to ingratiate himself with the people, he suppressed part of the tribute that lay so heavy upon them; inspected the conduct of the judges, as well as the public accounts; and set apart two days every week, viz. Monday and Thursday, for the hearing and redressing the grievances of that part of his subjects which then appeared before him <sup>a</sup>.

AFTER Al Mo'tazz's violent death, his mother Kabibah had her life given her, though on condition that she discovered her immense treasures, and even deposited them in the hands of the new Khalif Al Mohtadi. The money found therein is said by Abu'l Faraj to have amounted to 1,300,000 dinârs. Her son Al Mo'tazz, in his great distress, applied to her for only the sum of 50,000 dinârs, in order to appease the turbulent minds of the Turkish militia; which she refused him, telling him at the same time, that she was in possession of no money at all. This afterwards drew upon her a great number of curses and execrations, one of which has already been taken notice of. This year, Yakûb Ebn Al Leit, the Saffarian, made himself master of the provinces of Kermân and Fârs, and seized upon the city of Shîrâz. We must not forget to observe, that Sâbûr Ebu Sabel, the principal physician of the hospital at Jondîsâbûr, a man of vast erudition, who had distinguished himself by his learned writings, and particularly by a book treating of all the compound medicines used in hospitals, and prepared by the apothecaries, departed this life, in the month of Dbu'lhajja, the present year <sup>b</sup>.

The Zenjians
make an irruption into the Moslem empire.

IN the beginning of Al Mohtadi's reign, towards the end of the 255th year of the Hejra, the Zenjians, or Zinjians, a people of Nubia, of Ethiopia, and of the country of the Cafres, called at this day by the moderns Zanguebar, according to M. D'Herbelot, having penetrated into Arabia, advanced from thence into the neighbourhood of Basra and Cûfa. Abu'l Fedâ, however, seems to intimate, that these Zenjians were originally seated in the district called Al Sabak, or the sandy tract in the neighbourhood of Basra; though, it must be owned, Abu Jaafar Al Tabari's description of them not a little countenances what has been advanced by M. D'Herbelot, in relation to the parental country of these barbarians. The chief of this gang of robbers, who, according to some of the Arab historians, were little better than wild beasts, Ali Ebn Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmân, one of the descendants of Abd'alkais, gave out falsely, that he was of the family of Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb. This made such an impression upon the Shiites in those parts, that they flocked to him in vast numbers; which enabled him to seize upon the cities of Ramla and Basra, and even to pass the Tigris, at the head of a powerful army, which spread terror where-ever it moved. This Ali, who was an astrologer and a Shiite, as well as an impostor, began first to be taken notice of in the year of the Hejra 249, and at last became so formidable, that the Khalif's forces could not make head against him. He, therefore, reduced most of the fortresses of Irâk, and a considerable part of Arabia; in the possession of which conquests he maintained himself fourteen years, notwithstanding all the efforts of Al Mohtadi and his successors to dislodge him from thence. After he had dismembered the Khalifat in this manner, he assumed the title of Sahab Al Zenj, the prince of the Zenjians, in order to ingratiate himself with those barbarians, of which the greatest part of his army was composed. We must beg leave to remark here, that Erpenius calls this people Ribi, or Ribans, in his Latin version of Al Makin; and that this mistake arose from a wrong reading of the punctuation of the Arabic letters, as the forms of the characters of the word Rib, without the diacritical points of the first and last of them, are the same with those of the letters constituting the word Zenj <sup>c</sup>.

murdered.

THE following year, being the 256th of the Hejra, commencing December 9th, 869, and not the preceding year, as we find intimated by M. D'Herbelot, who, in this point perhaps has followed the Persian historians, Mûsa Ebn Bogâ, general of the forces of the Khalifat, who had been employed in the expedition undertaken against Al Hasan Ebn Yezid, having been apprized of the death of the Khalif Al Mo'tazz, who had been cut off soon after his abdication, returned from Tabrestân and Ray with his army into Irâk. Soon after his arrival there, being informed that Saleh Ebn Wasîf was the new Khalif's Visir, he quitted the camp he had formed in the neighbourhood of Baghdâd, and marched directly to Sarra Manray; declaring publickly his intention to take vengeance of those who had been concerned in the late revolt. This declaration was chiefly levelled at Saleh Ebn Wasîf, who had been principally instrumental in the death, as well as the deposition, of Al Mo'tazz. Saleh, conscious of his guilt, and not having a sufficient number of troops to oppose Mûsa, hid himself at his approach. But being soon discovered, he was brought before the general, who commanded his head immediately to be struck off; and, the day following, it was carried, by Mûsa's order, through the streets of Sarra Manray; the person carrying it at the same time crying out with a loud voice, This is the head of a traitor, who has imbrued his hands in the blood of his sovereign <sup>d</sup>.

The Khalif
is deposed and slain.

THE murder of Saleh greatly incensed the Khalif, who thereupon came to a resolution to repress the insolence of the Turkish troops; which so excited their hatred, that Bânkiâl and Mûsa Ebn Bogâ, their chiefs, conspired his destruction. This conspiracy, however, was not kept so secret, but that some news of it transpired; upon which the Khalif ordered Bânkiâl, who was to have acted the principal part in it, to be put under arrest. This so

- a exasperated the Turks, that they assembled in a tumultuous manner about the imperial palace, and demanded the releasement of their chief. The Khalif, far from being intimidated by their riotous behaviour, instead of complying with their demand, ordered Bânkiâl's head to be instantly cut off, and thrown amongst them out of the palace. But this instance of severity was so far from appeasing the sedition, that it rendered the Turks more furious and intractable; insomuch that a fierce conflict ensued between them and the Magrebians, who defended the Khalif, before the palace, in which about 4000 on both sides were slain. The Turks, however, returning to the charge with a body of 10,000 men, under the conduct of Tagarbâ, Bânkiâl's brother, put the Magrebians, who had been reinforced by a body of Faraonian troops, to flight, and pursued Al Mohtadi himself into the house of
- b Mohammed Ebn Mardâd. Being taken from thence, he was conducted to that of Abmed Ebn Khâkân; where some of the mutineers began to spit in his face, and to beat him, in order to force him to abdicate the Khalifat. But he refusing to do this, they barbarously trampled upon his privities till he expired; which happened on the 16th of the month Rajeb, before he had quite completed the first year of his reign. Some authors relate, that Al Mohtadi received two wounds in the last action between the Turkish Magrebian and Faraonian troops; and that he was finally dispatched by one of Bânkiâl's relations, who, after his death, drank a draught of his blood. He was buried at Sarra Manray, and Jaasar Ebn Abd'allah Al Hâshemi, his judge, said the funeral service at his interment. He was about thirty-eight, or thirty-nine, years of age at the time of his death. With regard to his person, Al Mok-
- c tadi was of a middle stature, somewhat bald, and of a swarthy complexion. He had, however, a handsome face, a portly gait, and a long black beard. As to his disposition, he was abstemious, devout, a lover of justice, of a sweet temper, and exemplary life, and in his manners greatly resembled the Khalif Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz. His Visirs were Saleh Ebn Wasîf and Abu Ayûb Ebn Abmed; his judges Al Hasan Ebn Abû'l Shawârib and Jaasar Ebn Abd'allah Al Hâshemi; the captain of his guards Obeid'allah Ebn Abd'allah; and his chamberlains Bânkiâl and Mûsa Ebn Bogâ. The first and last days of his reign were Tuesday, and the inscription of his seal, He who transgresses the rules of justice, or exceeds what is right, goes astray *.

- d AFTER the barbarous murder of Al Mohtadi, the assassins created Abmed Abû'l Abbâs Al Mo'tamed Al Mo'tamed Ala'llah Ebn Al Motawakkel Khalif. His mother's name, according to some writers, was Fynân, or, as other affirm, Kynân. He took for his principal counsellor, or Visir, Abd'allah Ebn Yabya Ebn Khâkân, who, if we will believe Eutychius, had served his father Al Motawakkel in the same capacity; tho' his brother Al Mowaffek had so great an ascendant over him, and used the authority he gave him in so absolute a manner, that he seemed to be master of the Khalifat. Nay, he had so much influence over his brother's counsels, that he excluded Al Mo'tamed's son from the succession, and caused his own to be elevated to the Moslem throne in his room, as will be seen in the sequel of his history <sup>created Kha-</sup> <sup>lif.</sup>
- e THE same year, that is, the 256th of the Hejra, Ali, or Al Habîb, as he is called by Abu <sup>The progress</sup> Jaasar Al Tabari, prince of the Zenjians, who was now become extremely formidable, made <sup>of the rebel</sup> <sup>Al Habîb.</sup> incursions almost to the very gates of Baghdâd, doing irreparable damage where-ever he moved. The Khalif, therefore sent Jalân, one of his generals, with a considerable army against him. But the Zenjian overthrew him with very great slaughter, made himself master of twenty-four of the Khalif's largest ships in the bay of Basra, put a vast number of the inhabitants of Obolla to the sword, and seized upon the town. Not content with this, he set fire to it, and soon reduced it to ashes; the houses consisting for the most part of the wood of a certain plane-tree denominated by the Arabs Saj. From thence he marched to Abûdân, which likewise surrendered to him. Here he found an immense treasure in money, which enabled him to possess himself of the whole province of Abwâz. In fine, his army
- f being now increased to 80,000 strong, the greatest part of the citizens of Basra abandoned the place; which struck with terror all the inhabitants of the adjacent territories, and even the court of the Khalif itself <sup>5</sup>.

Al Habîb continues victorious in the year 257;

THE next year, being the 257th of the Hejra, beginning November 29th, 870, Al Habîb attacked Sa'id Ebn Jaafar Ebn Dînân, at the head of the Khalîf's forces, and intirely defeated him; killing many of his men upon the spot, and more in the pursuit. He also routed several other armies sent against him by the Khalîf, reduced Basra, and put 20.000 of the citizens to the sword, before the conclusion of the campaign. The people of Toluso rebelled about this time against Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmân, the Khalîf of Spain, and chose one Mohammed Ebn Lâib for their general; but, upon the approach of the Khalîf with a powerful army, they thought fit to submit to him, and sent hostages for their future good behaviour to Corduba. We must not forget to remark, that Amajûr drove Ija Ebn Sheikh out of Syria, where he had set up for himself against the Khalîf, the preceding year; and that, about the same time, the famous Imâm Abu Abd'aliab Mohammed Ebn Ijmael, surnamed Al Jofi, as deducing his origin from the tribe of Jofab in Taman, though generally called Al Bokbâri, died at Khashak, or Khartank, a small town about two parasangs from Samar-kand. In the 257th year of the Hejra, Al Hasan Ebn Zeid, one of Ali's descendants, who had possessed himself of Tabrestân, seized likewise upon Forjân; and Yakûb Ebn Al Leit, the Saffarian, made himself master of Balkh and Câbûl. Before the close of the same year, died Abu'l Abbâs, a famous grammarian, known by the name of Al Rayash. Mohammed Ebn Khafajah, the Emîr of Sicily, according to Abu'lfeda, was murdered by some of his eunuchs, who were afterwards taken and put to death, and succeeded by Ahmed Ebn Yakûb, sent over by Mohammed Ebn Ashmed Al Aglabi, the Khalîf of Kairwân, for that purpose, and Malta was conquered by the Sicilian Moslems, the present year <sup>a</sup>.

DURING the course of the following year, Al Habîb, the Zenjian prince, still remained victorious over the Khalîf's troops. Al Mo'tamed, supported by his brother Al Mowaffek, had formed a design to confine within narrower bounds, at least, if not directly to annihilate, the power of the Turkish soldiery, which had proved so fatal to several of his predecessors; they having, for a considerable time, given law to the Khalîfs, and elevated or deposed them as they pleased. But the Zenjians made so rapid a progress this year in Persia, Arabia, and Irâk, that he was obliged to suspend the execution of that design, and even to send the Turkish troops to join those commanded by his brother Al Mowaffek, in order to oppose them. The first of the Khalîf's generals overthrown by Al Habîb was one Mohammed, whose army was worsted in several engagements, and at last intirely cut to pieces by the rebels. This year, Al Mo'tamed called his brother Abu Ahmed Ebn Al Motawakkel to the succession, gave him the surname of Al Mowaffek, together with a most sumptuous vest, and appointed him to preside over Diyâr Rabîa, Mawfel, Al Awwâsem, and Egypt. He also caused his own son Jaafar, whom he surnamed Al Mofawed, to be publicly declared the heir apparent to the crown, and assigned him the prefecture of the west. After this, he sent Al Mowaffek and Mofleh, with a numerous army, to reduce the rebel Al Habîb; who, in pursuance of their orders, came up with him, and attacked him with very great bravery. But Mofleh being killed with an arrow, Al Mo'tamed's troops were at last obliged to leave the field of battle to the Zenjians, and retire, after having sustained a very considerable loss. However, Al Mowaffek soon rallied his forces, that were put into disorder by the death of Mofleh, and drew them up in such order, that the enemy durst not renew the attack. Some time after, there happened a very sharp action between the Khalîf's forces and the rebels, commanded by Yakya Ebn Mohammed Al Azrâk, who was dangerously wounded and taken prisoner. Several other battles were fought between the contending parties before the conclusion of the campaign, from whence no great advantages accrued to either side. But at last some contagious distempers carrying off considerable numbers of Al Mowaffek's men, he found himself obliged to agree to a sort of truce, or cessation of arms, with the enemy, and to retire to Wâset, in order to refresh and repose his troops. As for Yakya Ebn Mohammed, who had fallen into his hands before, he had sent him under an escorte to Sarra Man-ray; where, soon after his arrival, he received two hundred stripes, had his hands and feet chopt off, and was cut to pieces by a detachment of the Khalîf's guards. The body was afterwards reduced to ashes, and thrown into the Tigris, in the presence of an infinite number of spectators, of all ranks and degrees, who attended the execution <sup>b</sup>.

The war continues between the Khalîf and Al Habîb.

IN the year of the Hejra 259, commencing November 7th, 872, the war still continued between the Khalîf and Al Habîb. Al Mowaffek, upon his arrival at Baghdâd, sent Mohammed, surnamed Al Mowalled, with a powerful army to act against the Zenjians; but he could not hinder them from ravaging the province of Abwaz, cutting off there about 50.000 of the Khalîf's subjects, and dismantling the city of the same name. However, Al Mo'tamed commanded Abd'alrahmân Ebn Mofleh to march with a body of troops to Abwâz, Ishak Ebn

a Daraj with another to Basra, and Ibrahim Ebn Simâ with a third to Dawrad. But, notwithstanding all the Khalîf's efforts, or rather those of his generals, his forces could gain no considerable advantage over Al Habîb, though several battles were fought. About this time, Yakûb Ebn Al Leit made himself master of Nisabûr, and threw Mohammed, the Thâberian, who had before enjoyed the sovereignty of the province of Khorasân under this Khalîf, with all his family and domestics, into prison. About the same time, died Mohammed Ebn Mûsa Ebn Shaker, one of the mathematicians employed by the Khalîf Al Mamûn to discover the true ambit, or circumference, of the earth. This year, a body of the Sicilian Moslems seized upon the city of Salerno, but were soon after all cut to pieces there<sup>k</sup>.

b THE following year, being the 260th of the Hejra, the Arabs cut to pieces Manjûr, the governor of Hems, and substituted Beṣṭimûr in his room. About the same time, Al Hasan Al Asfari, the eleventh Shiite Imâm, Al Hasan Ebn Sabab Al Zafarâni, one of Al Shâfi'i's followers, and Honain Ebn Ishak Al Ebadi, a famous physician, who translated the Elements of Euclid, Ptolemy's Almagest, and several other pieces, out of Greek into Arabic, departed this life. This year the Khalîf's generals likewise made several attempts to drive the Zenjians out of the Moslem territories; but without effect. For, Al Habîb maintained himself in his conquests, notwithstanding there happened several vigorous actions between his troops and the Khalîf's forces, in which many brave men fell on both sides<sup>l</sup>.

c In the 261st year of the Hejra, beginning October 16th, 874, Mohammed Ebn Wâsel, who had killed the Khalîf's governor of Fârs, and afterwards made himself master of that province, engaged several times the Zenjian forces commanded by Al Habîb, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari; but with what success, we have not been told by that author. The Khalîf, having been apprized of the state of affairs on that side, annexed the government of Fârs, Abwâz, Basra, and Babrein, to the prefecture he had assigned Mûsa Ebn Bogâ, whom he looked upon as one of the best generals he had. Mûsa, soon after his nomination to that sublime post, dispatched Abd'alrahmân Ebn Mosleh as his deputy to Abwâz, and joined to him, as his colleague and assistant, Tîsam the Turk. But Mohammed Ebn Wâsel, then at the head of his troops in Abwâz, refusing to obey the orders of Abd'alrahmân Ebn Mosleh and Tîsam, a fierce conflict ensued; in which the latter were overthrown with very great slaughter, and Abd'alrahmân Ebn Mosleh taken prisoner. After the end of the action, Mohammed Ebn Wâsel advanced to Eṣṭakbr, in order to attack Mûsa Ebn Bogâ's forces; incamped at a small distance from that place. But Mûsa, having received intelligence of his design, retired at his approach; and, finding that he could not take possession of his new government, nor fix his deputies in the provinces assigned them, without a vast effusion of Moslem blood, he recalled them from thence, and made the best of his way to Sarra Manray. After which, Yakûb Ebn Al Leit, who had before dispossessed of the province of Khorasân the family of Thâber, that had for a considerable time enjoyed the sovereignty of it, made an irruption into Abwâz, defeated Mohammed Ebn Wâsel, and seized upon his palace, in which he found a sum of money amounting to 40,000,000 dirhems. Some authors write, that Al Mo'tamed declared Jaafar, his son, the heir apparent to the crown, and called Al Mowaffek, his brother, to the succession after him, the present year. But in this point we chuse to follow Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, who is of a contrary opinion. The dynasty of the Sammanians, in Khorasân, according to Ebn Shobnah and Abulfeda, commenced the present year. It appears from Abulfeda, that Mohammed Ebn Ahmed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ibrahim Ebn Al Aglab, the Khalîf of Kairwân, died in the former Jomâda, after he had reigned twenty years, five months, and fifteen days. He was succeeded by his brother Ibrahim Ebn Ahmed Ebn Mohammed, who extended the Moslem conquests in Sicily, and gained several signal victories there<sup>m</sup>.

f THE next year, being the 262d of the Hejra, commencing October 5th, 875, the rebel Yakûb Ebn Al Leit, called Yakûb Ebn Leith by the Persian historians, being grown formidable by the acquisition of Abwâz, and a considerable part of Fârs, at least of Al Jebûl, or the Persian Irâk, without having openly declared against the Khalîf, pulled off the mask, and advanced at the head of a powerful army into the neighbourhood of Baghdâd. In order, therefore, to put a stop to the progress of so dangerous an enemy, who had already made himself master of Wâset, Al Mo'tamed sent Al Mowaffek with the forces of the empire against him. That general, in pursuance of his orders, advanced first to Baghdâd, whither he was attended by the Khalîf, and at last came up with Ebn Al Leit at a village named Katûl. Here, after a bloody engagement, he overthrew him with incredible slaughter, plundered his camp, and pursued him into Khorasân; where, meeting with no opposition, he entered Nisabûr, and released Mohammed the Thâberian, who had been detained in prison by Yakûb<sup>n</sup>.

Ebn Al Leit three whole years. As for Ebn Al Leit himself, who was the first prince, or Soltân, of the race or dynasty of the Saffarians, he made his escape with great difficulty after the late defeat; though he and his family maintained themselves several years in the possession of many of the conquests he had made. The war waged by the Khalîf against Ebn Al Leit proved a seasonable diversion in favour of Al Habib, who routed all the troops sent by Al Mo'tamed to reduce him to his obedience, and ravaged the district of Wâset, the present year <sup>a</sup>.

but are over-<sup>1</sup> thrown by Al Habib. THE following year, being the 263d of the Hejra, beginning September 24th, 876, the Khalîf's forces, under the command of Abmed Ebn Lebûna, gained two considerable advantages over Al Habib's troops; but being at last drawn into an ambuscade, they were almost intirely destroyed. Abmed, their general, himself, with great difficulty, made his escape <sup>b</sup>.

The Arabs make an incursion into the imperial territories. In the 264th year of the Hejra, commencing September 13th 877, the Arabs made an incursion into the imperial territories, under the conduct of Abd'allab Ebn Rashîd Ebn Kâwâs, with a body of 4000 horse, put a considerable number of the emperor's subjects to the sword, and committed dreadful ravages in the provinces through which they moved. But the Greeks came up with them at a small distance from the Badandûn, cut the greatest part of them in pieces, and took Abd'allab Ebn Rashîd himself prisoner. After which, they sent him under an escorte to Constantinople. About the same time, Amajûr the Khalîf's governor of Damascus, Kabibab, the Khalîf Mo'tazz's mother, Abu Ibrahim Al Mazâni, and Tundâs, Ebn Abd'alala, two scholars of the famous Al Shâfi'i, departed this life. This year, a detachment of Al Habib's troops advanced to Wâset, drove the inhabitants out of the town, and then laid it in ashes; carrying off with them from thence an immense quantity of spoil. One of the Arab writers mentions several smart engagements between the Zenjians and the Khalîf's forces after that tragical event; but does not inform us that any thing decisive happened on either side. Mûsa Ebn Bogâ, the best of the Turkish officers in Al Mo'tamed's service, dying about this time, the influence his nation had at the Moslem court was intirely lost; insomuch that the Turkish troops now intirely obeyed the Khalîf's orders independently on their chiefs <sup>c</sup>.

Ahmed Ebn Tolûn rebels against the Khalîf. THE next year, being the 265th of the Hejra, beginning September 3d, 878, Abmed Ebn Tolûn rebelled against the Khalîf, and set up for himself in Egypt. Having assembled a considerable force, he marched to Antioch, and besieged Simâ, the Khalîf's governor of Haleb, or Aleppo, and all the provinces known amongst the Arabs by the name of Al Awâsem, in that city. As the besieged found that he was resolved to carry the place by assault, they thought fit, after a short defence, to surrender to him, and to put Simâ into his hands. Abmed no sooner found himself in possession of that officer, than he struck off his head, and advanced to Aleppo, which opened its gates at his approach. Soon after, he reduced Dimishk, or Damascus, Hems, Hamath, Kinnisrîn, and Al Rakka, situated upon the eastern bank of the Euphrates. This rebellion so exasperated Al Mo'tamed, that he commanded Abmed to be publicly cursed in all the mosques of Baghdâd and Irâk; and Abmed, on his part, ordered the same solemn malediction to be thundered out in all the mosques within his jurisdiction against the Khalîf. The same year, Yakûb Ebn Al Leit, having set on foot a powerful army, moved a second time towards Baghdâd; but was seized with a violent choleric on his march, of which he died, after eleven years reign, if we will suppose it to have commenced when he first entered Persia in a hostile manner, and was succeeded by his brother Amru Ebn Al Leit. A detachment of Al Habib's troops penetrated into Irâk, and made themselves masters of four of the Khalîf's ships, laden with corn, the present campaign. They also advanced to Al Nomânia, laid the greatest part of it in ashes, and carried off with them several of the inhabitants prisoners. They likewise possessed themselves of Jarjarâyâ, where they found many prisoners more, and destroyed all the adjacent territory with fire and sword. About the same time, died Ibrahim Ebn Hani Al Nisabûri, a celebrated Mohammedan saint. The Moslems of Sicily fixed themselves this year in Syracuse, and seized upon all the dependencies of that place. It is worthy observation, that there were three powers at this time in the Moslem empire independent on the Khalîf, besides the house of Aglab in Africa, and that of Ommiyah in Spain; namely, one in Syria and Egypt, another in Khora-sân, and another in Arabia and Irâk <sup>d</sup>.

The most memorable events that happened IN the 266th year of the Hejra, beginning August 23d, 879, Al Habib reduced Râmhor-moz, burnt the stately mosque there to the ground, put a vast number of the inhabitants to the sword, carried many of them away with him prisoners, and acquired an immense quan-<sup>e</sup>

a tity of spoil. In Sicily, Krîsf was killed this year. Al Hasan Ebn Al Abbâs was also sent from Kairwân to that island in quality of Emîr; who, soon after his arrival, ravaged the Christian territories in a dreadful manner. Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmân ordered a good number of ships to be constructed at Corduba, or Cordova, Seville, and other maritime towns, where materials for shipping were to be found. But these being afterwards almost intirely destroyed by tempests and storms, the sailors on board them for the most part drowned, and Abd'alamîd, his admiral himself, narrowly escaping with his life, that prince laid aside his design of making a figure by sea<sup>r</sup>. in the year of the Hejra 266.

THE 267th year of the Hejra, commencing August 12th, 880, produced several actions of éclat between the Zenjians and the Khalîf's troops. Al Mowaffek, attended by his son Abu'l Abbâs Al Mo'tadbed Bîlla, took the field with an army consisting of some infantry and a body of ten thousand horse. On the other side, Al Habîb appeared at the head of an army, to oppose him, amounting to an hundred thousand men. But, notwithstanding the inequality of numbers, the Arabs overthrew the Zenjians in several pitched battles, recovered most of the towns they had taken, together with an immense quantity of spoil, and released 5000 Moslem women that had been detained in prison by those barbarians. After these victories, Al Mowaffek took post before the city of Al Mabiya, that had been built by Al Habîb, and was the place of his residence, burnt all the ships in the harbour, thoroughly pillaged the town, and then intirely dismantled it. Here he likewise found treasures of exceeding great value. After the reduction of Al Mabiya, he pursued the flying enemy, defeated several bodies of the Zenjan troops, put to the sword Ebn Al Sa'râb, Ebn Jâm, and others of their chiefs, and advanced to Al Moktara, a city that had been strongly fortified by Al Habîb. As the Zenjan had collected all his forces into a body, and was posted at no great distance from the town, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, with an army of 300,000 men, and the place was almost impregnable, Al Mowaffek plainly perceived, that it would sustain a very long siege. He therefore built a fortress opposite to it, in which he erected a mosque, and coined both dirhems and dinârs. The new city, from its founder, was called by the Arabs Al Mowaffekia, and soon rendered considerable by the settlement of several wealthy merchants in it. By this means, Al Mowaffek thought to starve Al Mokhtara to a surrender, and actually reduced it to very great straits; which occasioned an incredible desertion amongst Al Habîb's troops. However, Al Mowaffek having, with his battering engines, made a practicable breach in the walls, took the place by storm, after a great resistance on the part of the besieged, in the latter Jomâda, and gave it up to his soldiers to be plundered till the month of Shaabân. After which, he put to flight Al Habîb's numerous forces, and dispersed them in such a manner, that the Zenjan found it impossible to rally them during the remainder of the campaign. Two persons were struck dead by lightning by Mohammed Ebn Abd'rahmân's side in a mosque at Corduba, and a general earthquake happened in Spain, whose dreadful concussions were felt in every part of that country, the present year<sup>r</sup>. The military operations of the year 267.

THE following year, being the 268th of the Hejra, Al Mowaffek penetrated a second time to Al Mabiya, demolished again the fortifications of that place, which he carried by assault, though Al Habîb and his troops that defended the town disputed every inch of ground. This year, one Lûlû began to rebel against his master Abmed Ebn Tolûn in Egypt. Al Mowaffek gains other advantages over Al Habîb;

IN the 269th year of the Hejra, commencing July 21st, 882, Al Mowaffek attacked Al Habîb with unparalleled bravery, and had intirely defeated him, had he not been wounded in the breast by an arrow, which obliged him to retire out of the heat of the action, and to sound a retreat. However, as soon as he was cured of his wound, he advanced a third time to Al Mabiya, made himself master of that metropolis, threw down the walls that had been raised again by the Zenjan prince, put many of the inhabitants to the sword, and carried a vast number of them away with him into captivity. The same year, Lûlû went over to Al Mowaffek, and engaged upon certain conditions to act against his former master Abmed Ebn Tolûn. Soon after which, Al Mowaffek caused Abmed to be publickly cursed in all the mosques of Baghdâd and Irâk. and takes his capital a third time.

THE next year, being the 270th of the Hejra, beginning July 11th, 883, Al Mowaffek penetrated again to Al Mabiya, possessed himself of that city, demolished Al Habîb's palace there, seized upon his family, and sent them to Sarra Manray; though that rebel and usurper, who had made such havock in the Moslem empire, himself found means to escape. Al Mowaffek gives Al Habîb a total overthrow, takes him pri-

However, Al Mowaffek pursued him into the province of Abwáz, and intirely defeated the shattered forces that he had rallied there. As for Al Habíb himself, he now fell into the hands of the victor, who ordered his head to be cut off, and carried upon the point of a lance through a great part of the region whose repose he had so long disturbed. After which, he sent it by his son Al Mo'tadbed Billa to Baghdád, where it was exposed to public view, and then fixed upon one of the gates of the city. As Al Habíb first appeared in arms against the Khalíf the 26th of Ramadán, in the year of the Hejra 265, and was put to death the second of Safar 270, he reigned over the Zenjians, that had rendered themselves so formidable to two Khalífs, about fourteen years and four months. By the last victory, which was complete, Al Mowaffek acquired the glorious title of Al Na'ir Lidni'llah, or Al Nasser Ledinillah, that is, the protector of Islám, or Mohammedism; which was given him by the Khalíf Al Mo'tamed, his brother; and he continued to govern the Khalifat under that title to the time of his death *.

Ahmed Ebn Tolún dies.

THE same year died Ahmed Ebn Tolún, on the 18th of Dhu'l-bajja, or, as some will have it, the 18th of Dhu'l-kaada, in Egypt. It has been observed by Al Makín, that, when he was at the point of death, he lifted up his hands to heaven, and said, "O LORD! forgive thy servant, whose load of guilt is too great for him to comprehend, and shew thyself merciful to him at the time of his death." He left behind him thirty-three sons, one of which, named Khamarawiyah, succeeded him in the dynasty he had founded. He is said to have been a strict observer of justice, and of so charitable a disposition, that he gave away every month in alms 300,000 dinárs. He distributed likewise every month amongst the ecclesiastics of the best repute 1000 dinárs, and spent the same sum in his kitchen every day. Some authors write, that, during the time he presided over Egypt, he sent to Baghdád, to be distributed amongst men of learning and probity, as likewise the poor and the sick, no less than 2,200,000 dinárs. He left in the treasury at his death 10,000,000 dinárs; which, considering the money he spent and gave away in his life-time, was a prodigious sum. His servants and slaves amounted to 7000, his horses to the same number, his mules and camels to 8000, and his war-horses to 300. All this was his own peculiar property, and bore no relation to the public. The revenue of Egypt in his time, if we will believe Jaafar Al Tabari, did not fall short of 300,000,000 dinárs. Notwithstanding his good qualities, he is reported to have been extremely cruel, and guilty of a vast effusion of human blood; having either put to death, or starved in prison, at least 18,000 persons. Seventeen sons, and as many daughters, not thirty-three sons, as some writers affirm, survived him, according to Abu'l Faraj. Al Hasan Ebn Zeid, one of Ali's descendants, who had reigned near twenty years in Tabrestán, and was succeeded by his brother Mohammed Ebn Zeid, Mohammed Ebn Ishak Ebn Jaafar Al Sagáni, and Dawd Ebn Ali Al Esfaháni, a celebrated Imám, who denied any assimilation of God to created beings, died likewise this year *.

The Khalif's forces defeated by those of Khamarawiyah.

IN the 271st of the Hejra, commencing June 29th, 884, a sharp and bloody engagement happened between the Khalíf's forces, commanded by Al Mowaffek's son, and those of Khamarawiyah, who had made an irruption into Syria. This battle was fought between Ramla and Dimishk, or Damascus. Khamarawiyah was charged so hotly in the beginning of the action, that his men began to give way; upon which he fled with great precipitation even to the borders of Egypt, taking for granted that every thing was lost. But his troops, not having been apprized of their general's flight, afterwards rallied, and gained a complete victory. This year, died Túrân Bint Al Hasan Ebn Sabel, the wife of the Khalíf Al Mamún, as we learn from Abu Jaafar Al Tabari †.

Nothing remarkable happened the following year.

THE following year, being the 272d of the Hejra, produced no memorable event in the Moslem empire. Khamarawiyah having won the hearts of his subjects by his mild and gentle administration, though he was now but twenty-two years of age, and kept on foot a large body of troops that he could intirely depend upon, Al Mowaffek found it impossible to make any impression upon Egypt the present year. Before the conclusion of it, a person of distinction was sent from the imperial court, to ransom the Syracusans that had been taken prisoners by the African Moslems about six or seven years before ‡.

Mohammed Ebn Abd'al-rahmán dies in Spain.

DURING the whole course of the 273d year of the Hejra, the Khalíf Al Mo'tamed gave himself up intirely to indolence and pleasure; so that Al Mowaffek alone held the reins of the Moslem empire. However, he could neither regain Khorasan, nor Egypt. Abu Dawd

- <sup>a</sup> Solimán Al Sejestáni and Mohammed Ebn Yezid Ebn Majab Al Kazwini, two famous Sunnite authors, as also Kháled Ebn Ahmed, who had been governor of Kherasán, departed this life, the present year. About the same time, died Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmán, the Khalif of Spain, at Corduba, in the 60th, or according to Abu'lfeda, who styles him the Emír of Andalusia, in the 65th, year of his age, and the 35th of his reign. Being walking in his royal gardens, a little before his death, one of the soldiers of his guards said to him, "What fine gardens are these that we walk in, how beautiful is the present day, and what a delightful age would this be, were it possible to avoid being arrested by death!" To which the Khalif replied, "Thou art mistaken in thy last remark; since, had it not been for death, I should never have swayed the Moslem sceptre of Spain." He left thirty-three sons behind him. Al Mondar, his successor, one of them, was at the baths of Almeria when the Khalif expired; but, upon receiving advice of his father's decease, he posted away with all possible celerity to Corduba, and ascended the throne there in the 43d year of his age<sup>a</sup>.

THE next year, being the 274th of the Hejra, the Khalif Al Mo'tamed pursued the same course of life, he left the government of the Khalifat intirely to his brother Al Mowaffek. This year, there was an action in Sicily between the Christians and the African Moslems, as we learn from the Cambridge Chronicon; but whether or no any advantage accrued from thence to either of the contending parties, we are not certainly informed<sup>b</sup>.

- IN the 275th year of the Hejra, Khamarawiyah received advice, that one Mohammed Ebn Diwadád, called by some authors Abu'l Sáj, had taken post at Damascus with a powerful army; upon which, he assembled all his forces, and made the proper dispositions for a march, in order to attack him. This year, Al Mowaffek sent his son to prison, and confined him there, till he was seized by that sickness which put a period to his days. About the same time Abu Sa'id al Hosein Ebn Al Hasan Ebn Abd'allah, a famous grammarian and philologer, departed this life. The machine of government at Sarra Manrey was moved in the same manner this year as the preceeding. Al Mondar behaved with great liberality and munificence to his subjects in Spain, and even remitted the taxes, or tenths, paid by the people of Corduba; notwithstanding which, they rebelled against him. This so exasperated him, that he resolved to take vengeance of them for their ingratitude, as well as their disobedience. But he died on his march to their city, before he could carry his design into execution. He reigned only two years, and left six sons and seven daughters behind him. However, the army elected Abd'allah, his brother, in prejudice to his eldest son, to succeed him. As soon as the people of Corduba were apprized of this, they opened their gates to the new Khalif, and met with a favourable reception from him. After which, he buried his brother, the deceased Khalif, in a manner suitable to his high rank, and presided above twenty-five years over the Moslems in Spain<sup>c</sup>.

- THE following year, being the 276th of the Hejra, Khamarawiyah Ebn Ahmed Ebn Tolán led his army against Mohammed Ebn Diwadád, or Abu'l Sáj, and overthrew him in a great battle at Al Bathnáa, not far from the city of Damascus; after which, he advanced to Al Rakka upon the Euphrates, and made himself master of that place. Having annexed several large provinces to his former dominions, and left some of his friends that he could confide in to preside over them, he returned into Egypt, the principal part of his empire, which now extended from the Euphrates to the borders of Nubia and Ethiopia. The cities of Lisbon, Seville, &c. in Spain, rebelled this year against Abd'allah Ebn Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmán, of the house of Ommiyah; there, at the instigation of Omar Ebn Al Hasan, who headed the troops of those rebellious cities. But Abd'allah having assembled a numerous army, in order to reduce them to his obedience, they thought fit to lay down their arms; upon which, Abd'allah received them into favour, and pardoned Omar Ebn Al Hasan, who had first excited them to a revolt. The civil dissensions and intestine broils that reigned in Seville, which had occasioned no small effusion of blood, greatly facilitated the submission and reduction of that place. About this time, died Abd'almálec Ebn Mohammed Al Rakasbi, and Abd'allah Ebn Moslem, a celebrated Mohammedan author. The African Moslems made themselves masters of an imperial fleet, and put 5000 imperialists to the sword, at Melazzo in Sicily; after which, the inhabitants of that town fled to Reggio in Calabria, the present year<sup>d</sup>.

THE next year, being the 277th of the Hejra, Al Mowaffek presided over the Khalifat in the same manner as he had done the preceding years; Al Mo'tamed not concerning himself at all in the affairs of government. Omar Ebn Al Hasan rebelled again in Spain; cutting off the heads of several commandants of towns, and committing other outrages in various parts. However, he was at last driven by Abd'allah out of the Moslem territories, and obliged to fly to the Christians for refuge; when, in order to ingratiate himself the more with them, he is said by Roderic to have been baptized, and made profession of the Christian faith. We are told by the Cambridge Chronicle, that the Sicilian Moslems fell upon the Africans, and cut to pieces Al Tâwali, one of their chief commanders, in March, this year <sup>a</sup>.

THE following year, being the 278th of the Hejra, beginning April 15th, 891, Al Mowaffek Bi'llab departed this life at Sarra Manray, on Wednesday, the 21st of the month Safar, and was succeeded by his son Abul Abbâs Ebn Al Mowaffek, surnamed Al Mo'taded Bi'llab, in his post of prime minister, or Visir. With regard to his character, Al Mowaffek has been greatly celebrated by the Arab historians, who represent him as a person of superior magnanimity, naturally brave, liberal, and thoroughly versed in the art of government. He used to say, "I always behold my friends in the same light as my brothers, and would, if it could be done with sufficient propriety, confer upon them the same appellation." Al Mo'taded Bi'llab had as great an ascendant over the Khalif as his father; so that it is no wonder he should be able so easily to exclude Al Ja'far, Al Mo'tamed's son, from the succession, and, after his nominal master's death, to fix himself upon the Moslem throne <sup>b</sup>.

THE Karmatians, a sect which bore an inveterate malice against the Mohammedans, began first to raise disturbances in the empire this year. Their origin is not so well known; but the common tradition is, that a poor fellow, whom some call Karmata, came from Khûzestân to the villages near Cûfa, and there feigned great sanctity and strictness of life, and that God had enjoined him to pray fifty times a day; pretending also to invite people to the obedience of a certain Imâm of the family of Mohammed: and this way of life he continued till he had made a very great party, out of whom he chose twelve, as his apostles, to govern the rest, and to propagate his doctrines. He also assumed the title of prince, and obliged every one of his earlier followers to pay him a dinâr. But Al Haidam, the governor of the province, finding men neglected their work, and their husbandry in particular, to say those fifty prayers a day, seized the fellow, and, having put him in prison, swore that he should die; which being overheard by a girl belonging to the governor, she, pitying the man, at night took the key of the dungeon from under her master's head as he slept, and, having let the prisoner out, returned the key to the place whence she had it. The next morning the governor found the bird flown; and the accident being publickly known raised great admiration, his adherents giving it out that God had taken him into heaven. Afterwards he appeared in another province, and declared to a great number of people he had got about him, that it was not in the power of any to do him hurt; notwithstanding which, his courage failing him, he retired into Syria, and was not heard of any more. During his abode in that country, he is said to have been entertained by a man called Karmatiab, from whom his name Karmata was derived. Others, however, relate, that the Karmatians wrote very close and in exceeding small characters, contrary to the manner of the Arab Moslems, amongst whom the Cûfic character prevailed, who used large letters, and left a considerable space between their lines; and that from this custom they derived the name of Karmatians; Karmath, or Karmat, amongst the Arabs, denoting that manner of writing. Be that, however, as it will, this sect continued and increased, after the founder of it disappeared; pretending that their master had manifested himself to be a true prophet, and had left them a new law, wherein he had changed the ceremonies and form of prayer used by the Moslems, and introduced a new kind of fast; and that he had also allowed them to drink wine, and dispensed with several things commanded by the Korân. They likewise turned the precepts of that book into allegory; teaching that prayer was the symbol of obedience to their Imâm, and fasting that of silence, or concealing their dogms from strangers. They also believed fornication to be the sin of infidelity; and the guilt thereof to be incurred by those who revealed the mysteries of their religion, or paid not a blind obedience to their chief. They are said to have produced a book, wherein was written, amongst other things, In the name of the most merciful God. Al Faraj Ebn Othmân of the town of Nafrâna saith, that CHRIST appeared to him in a human form, and said, "Thou art the invitation: thou art the demonstration: thou art the camel: thou art the beast: thou art John the son of Zacharias: thou art the HOLY GHOST." The sect of the Karmatians, according to some writers, first began to appear in the Khalifat of Harûn Al Rashîd, or, as others will have it, in that of Al Mamûn; but their leader having then soon disappeared, they kept themselves concealed; neither acknowledging any particular Imâm, nor any other chief. Ebn Shobnah relates, that they first excited some commotions in the villages and towns near Cûfa, in the 275th year of the Hejra; and that they were headed by a man named Kersa, who often changed his situation and place of abode, and was so effectually concealed by his followers, that he could never be discovered by any of the Khalif's officers who were sent in quest of him. Khondemir writes, <sup>c</sup>

a that, in many particulars, this sect agreed with that of Ismael Ebn Jaafar Al Saâk, the sixth Imâm; that they did not scruple eating many things forbidden by the Mohammedan law; and that they believed angels to be the friends, directors, and guardians of mankind, and evil demons their most inveterate enemies, that were continually meditating their destruction. The Karmatians pretend, that CHRIST revealed to the above-mentioned Al Faraj Ebn Othmân, that the prayer before sun-rise ought to be performed with two ingenuculations, and that before sun-set with two more; and that they ought to fast twice a year, viz. on the days Mihjân, or Mihrijân, and Al Nirûz, that is, the 16th day of the Persian month Mibr, and the first day of the year. From the year of the Hejra 278, the Karmatians, under several leaders, gave almost continual disturbance to the Khalifs; and their b Mohammedan subjects, for several years; committing great disorders and outrages in Chaldea, Arabia, Syria, and Mesopotamia, and at length establishing a considerable principality, the power whereof was in its meridian in the reign of Abu Dhâber, famous for his taking of Mecca, and the indignities by him offered to the temple there, but which declined soon after his time, and came to nothing. Mowaffek died of the leprosy, or elephantiasis, according to Abu'lfeda and Abu'l Faraj, a little before the Karmatians began to disturb the repose of the Moslem empire. He could not forbear saying, in his last illness, that of 100,000 men, whom he commanded, not one was as miserable as himself. After that c general's decease, his son Abu'l Abbâs Al Mo'tamed succeeded him, with the unanimous approbation of all the officers of the army, who likewise acknowledged his right to the crown after Al Mo'tamed, by the express command of the Khalif. We must not forget to observe, that Ahmed Ebn Mohammed Al Tâbi, prince or chief of the Karmatians; obliged every one of his subjects, or followers, to pay him yearly, by way of tribute, a dinâr <sup>2</sup>.

THE next year, being the 279th of the Hejra, commencing April 3d, 892; the Khalif <sup>The Khalif Al Mo'tamed dies.</sup> Al Mo'tamed died at Baghdâd, the 19th of Rajeb, being then about fifty years of age. The day before, he had drank to great excess, and at night eaten a much larger supper than usual; which proved fatal to him, as before morning he expired. Some of the authors, however, followed by M. D'Herbelot, relate, that he died of a squinancy, and that he was, at the time of his decease, fifty years and six months old. This Khalif was extremely attached to his pleasures; so that he left the management of his affairs intirely
d to others. He was passionately fond of music, and not unacquainted with letters. He quitted the city of Sarra Manray, and fixed his residence for some time at Baghdâd; tho' he was buried, according to the best of the Arab writers, at the former of those places. During the course of twenty-three years reign, Al Mowaffek and his son Al Mo'tamed deprived him absolutely of his authority, leaving him only the bare name of Khalif; inasmuch that when he once asked of his brother 300 dinârs, that small sum was refused him. However, the Moslems in general were very well pleased with Al Mowaffek's administration. Al Mo'tamed was a little swarthy, of a good stature, had a comely face, a large head, a long beard, and a forehead a little pitted with the small pox. Both his hair and his beard were greyer than usual in one of his age. He loved gaming and chearful conversation, e as well as eating and drinking, to a great degree; whence 'tis no wonder he should have been too indolent to apply himself to the affairs of government. In this Khalif's reign flourished Jaafar Ebn Mohammed Abu Maashar Al Balkbi, commonly known by the name of Albumasar, Al Mowaffek's astrologer, who attended him when he besieged a body of the Zenjian troops in Basra. This Abu Maashar, when he lived at Baghdâd, was an enemy to Abu Yusef Yakûb Ebn Ishak Al Kendi, and endeavoured to prejudice the people of that city against him, because he applied himself to the study of philosophy. But Al Kendi having found a person who prevailed upon him to learn arithmetic and geometry, which he left for the sake of astrology, before he had made a very considerable progress in them, he ceased to persecute, or give any farther molestation to, that celebrated scholar.
f Abu Maashar, a man of fine parts, and an excellent disposition, arrived at great skill in astrology, tho' a stranger even to the rudiments of that art when he was forty-seven years of age, and wrote several treatises upon it, held in vast repute amongst the Arabs. The Khalif Al Most'ian ordered him to be severely whipt, because an event that he had foretold actually came to pass; which not a little chagrined him. He lived to be above 100 years of age, and died at Wâsjèt. He was accused of drunkenness, and generally troubled with an epileptic disorder at the full moon. With regard to Al Kendi, he was of noble extraction, and born at Basra. His father Ishak had been governor of Cîsa in the Khalifats of Al Mukdi and Harûn Al Rashid. This Yakûb Al Kendi was so singularly well versed in physic, natural philosophy, arithmetic, dialectics or logic, music, geometry, and astronomy, and wrote so many famous books in most of these sciences, that he infinitely excelled all the Moslems of his age in the knowledge of those branches of literature, and was the only one of them that merited the honourable title of philosopher. Kostâ Ebn Lûkâ Al Baalbeki, a Christian philosopher, and his cotemporary, rendered himself exceeding famous by travelling over a considerable part of the imperial territories, and purchasing of the Greeks a multitude of books, which he brought with him first into Syria, and afterwards into Irâk, where he was employed in translating some of the most useful of them out of Greek into Arabic. Several pieces written in a compendious, though most excellent, method by this learned author, were extant in the days of Abu'l Faraj. We are also told that Senbârîb invited him into Armenia, where he kept him till his death, and afterwards erected over him a mausoleum, or stately monument, in order to demonstrate to future ages the high regard he had for him. In fine, he was looked upon as the greatest scholar of the age, and famous for expressing his vast flow of sentiments in a concise and engaging manner <sup>b</sup>.

An inscription in unknown characters
discovered.

It appears from an oriental historian, that, in the reign of this Khalif, and the year of the Hejra 276, there were found in a place of Syria called Tel Shâif, that is to say, the lover's bill, as also Tel Alfekkab, the hill of contracts, seven tombs, every one of which contained a body extremely well preserved, whose shroud seemed quite new, and emitted a very grateful odour. Amongst these seven bodies there was one that had belonged to a young man, whose visage, and particularly the lips, appeared as fresh as those of a living person who had just drunk a draught of water. Near these tombs a stone was discovered that greatly resembled one of those which are used to sharpen or whet any iron instrument upon. This stone exhibited an inscription drawn up in characters that nobody could decypher; tho' the Khalif ordered a large number of men of all nations, sects, and religions, that lived within the limits of the Moslem empire, to be assembled for that purpose <sup>i</sup>.

Several remarkable events, not hitherto mentioned, in this Khalif's reign.

In the first year of the Khalifat of Al Mo'tamed, Stephen was constituted patriarch of Antioch, and died on the very day of his consecration. He was succeeded by Tadîs, who sat in that see twenty years. In the tenth year of his reign, Eylia Ebn Mansûr was advanced to the patriarchate of Jerusalem, and presided over the church there twenty-nine years. Mikbâtyel Ebn Bacâm, the patriarch of Alexandria, died in the 256th year of the Hejra, was buried in the city of Bûrah, and succeeded by another Michael, of Greek extraction, who continued patriarch of Alexandria thirty-four years. Basilus, the Greek emperor, likewise died in this prince's reign; which made way for his son Leo to the imperial throne, who has been dignified by Eutychius with the honourable title of a wise man and a philosopher. In the 8th year of Al Mo'tamed, or the 263d of the Hejra, Sa'id Ebn Batrîk, who had completed the 60th year of his age when he was promoted to the patriarchal see of Alexandria, and, after that event, assumed the name of Anbâ Eutychius, or Eftysbûs, was born. Basilus departed this life in the 259th year of the Hejra, according to some authors cited by Al Makin, and his son Leo ascended the imperial throne the same year. Al Mo'tamed's principal counsellors were successively Abd'allah Ebn Khâkân, Solimân Ebn Wahab, Al Hasan Ebn Mokballed, three times, Sa'id Ebn Mokballed, and Abulsakar Ebn Ismael Ebn Mâlec; his judges Al Hasan Ebn Sabal Ebn Abu'l Shawârîb and Abmed Ebn Ali; and his chamberlains Mûsa Ebn Boga, and his brother Jaafar. The inscription of his seal was, Happy is he who receives instruction from another man's example <sup>k</sup>.

Al Mo'taded
proclaimed
Khalif.

THE same day that Al Mo'tamed died, Abu'l Abbâs Abmed Al Mo'taded Bi'llah Ebn Al Mowaffek, in consequence of his having been called to the succession after that prince, was saluted Khalif. His mother's name was Darâr, or Derûr. She had been one of his father Al Mowaffek's concubines; but to what country she originally belonged, we have not been told. A profound tranquillity took place throughout the empire, immediately after his accession; so that there was a vast plenty of provisions and necessaries of all kinds in every province. Some writers pretend, that Al Mo'taded, before his elevation to the Khalifat, saw a person in a dream plunge his hand into the Tigris, and instantly pull it out again; upon which, that river was immediately dried up, as tho' he held all the water of it in his hand; which when he opened, it returned to its former course. This person then asked him whether he knew him? and, upon his answering him in the negative, discovered himself to be Ali, desiring him at the same time to be kind to his family, after he had ascended the Moslem throne. Al Mo'taded, continue these authors, promised him a him he would, and was afterwards as good as his word. For, the descendants of that celebrated Imâm enjoyed a large share of this prince's favours, during the whole course of his reign <sup>1</sup>.

b Ebn Mohammed Ebn Isa Ebn Sawda, a celebrated Imâm, and the author of the great collection of traditions. Abd'allah Ebn Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmân governed his subjects with great lenity and justice this year, and the remaining part of his reign, in Spain <sup>m</sup>.

IN the 281st year of the Hejra, beginning March 13th, 894, the Khalif came to an<sup>and gets him</sup> open rupture with Hamdân. Being informed of his hostile intentions, and of the junction<sup>into his hands.</sup>
c of his forces with a body of Curds, he advanced to Mawfel at the head of his troops, and, in his march, defeated a large body of the enemy, killed a great number of them upon the spot, and drove most of the rest into the Zâb, a river that, at a small distance from Mawfel and Hadîza, unites its stream with that of the Tigris; who, not being able to reach the opposite bank, were all drowned. From Mawfel he marched to Mâredîn, or Mîradîn, a place of some strength belonging to Hamdân, in which he had posted his son with a garison to defend it; who surrendered to the Khalif at discretion, the day after he presented himself before it. Al Mo'taded, having possessed himself of this fortress, ordered every thing valuable in it to be carried out, levelled it with the ground, and then returned with his army to Baghdâd. In the mean time, Hamdân thought fit to retire to Hoseinîa, d a large city extremely well fortified, and defended by a garison of ten thousand men, commanded by Shadâd, one of his friends. However, the Khalif found means to make himself master of that fortress also, and to get Hamdân into his hands. Some authors write, that Hamdân had three sons, Al Hosein, Abd'allah, and Dawd; and that the Khalif gave Al Hosein the command of a body of his troops. Be that, however, as it will, Abd'allah Abu'l Hija, Hamdân's second son, was one of the Khalif Al Mo'etâf's generals. Some writers make Saifo'ddawla the son of this Abd'allah, and others of Hamdân himself. He was born, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, the preceding year <sup>o</sup>.

THE next year, being the 282d of the Hejra, commencing March 2d, 895, Khamara-<sup>The Khalif</sup>wiyah's daughter Ketralhada, attended by a splendid equipage, was sent by her father to<sup>marries Ke-</sup>
e Baghdâd, in the month of Al Moharram, and received by the Khalif himself, her future<sup>trahada Kha-</sup> spouse, at the gates of that city; from whence he conducted her to the imperial palace<sup>marawiyah's</sup> there, with great pomp and magnificence, the 25th of the latter Rabî. About this time, died Abu Hanîfa Ahmed Ebn Dawd Al Dainawari, the author of a natural history of plants, Al Hâreth Ebn Abi Osâma, the author of the Masnad, or body of traditions, and Abu'l Aina Mohammed Ebn Al Kasem, a disciple of the famous Al Asmai. The same year, Khamarawiyah was assassinated by one of his domestics in bed, the 3d of D'bulhajja, at Damascus; after which, the army substituted his son Faish or Feish, in his room. As soon as this prince had mounted the throne of Syria and Egypt, the troops demanded his uncle's head; which he thereupon ordered to be cut off, and thrown to them, without f delay. In a short time after his accession, he quitted the city of Damascus, where his father had fixed his residence, left a governor there, and returned with all possible expedition into Egypt <sup>p</sup>.

THE 283d year of the Hejra proved fatal to Faish, or Feish; who, together with his<sup>The transac-</sup> mother, was massacred by the soldiery, after he had presided about eight months over<sup>tions of the</sup> Syria and Egypt. After his death, the mutineers demolished his palace in Mesr, and placed<sup>year 283.</sup> his brother Harûn Ebn Khamarawiyah, a child of ten years old, upon the throne. This happened in the month of Rajeb. The Khalif Al Mo'taded, having received advice of a Harun's accession, wrote him a letter, wherein he acquainted him, that he had conferred the prefecture of Egypt upon him, and imposed on him an annual tribute of 1,500,000 dinars; which Harun promised to pay him out of the public revenues of Egypt. The Slavi, or Slavonians, according to Abu'l Faraj, either this or the following year, made an irruption into Thrace, put a vast number of people to the sword, besieged Constantinople itself, and ravaged all the country about that capital. The Greek emperor not being able to make head against the barbarians with his own troops, continues this author, armed the Moslem slaves, or prisoners, on this occasion, in order to make a vigorous sally upon the besiegers, and drive them from before the town. Which having done, principally by the bravery of those slaves, he again disarmed them, and dispersed them over the provinces of the empire; fearing lest, if they remained in a body with their arms, after they had so distinguished themselves, they might meditate some enterprize against him. Soon after this, a cartel was settled between the Christians and the Moslems, who were continually making incursions into each other's territories, for an exchange of prisoners: by which means, 2504 Moslems, men, women, and children, recovered their liberty. The same year, that is, the 283d of the Hejra, a phantom, or apparition, frequently, for a considerable time, presented itself before the Khalif, notwithstanding all the doors of his palace and his apartments were shut, in different manners, postures, and shapes. Sometimes it would appear to him in the habit of a merchant, at others in that of a soldier, and at others in that of a dervise. Its visage also changed its colour often; for sometimes it was white, and incircled with rays of light, at others brown, and at others pale and wan. The same of this apparition was soon spread over the city of Baghdad, and people reasoned differently upon it. Some took it to be the devil, whom the Divine Justice sent to this prince to torment him. Others believed it to be one of those wanton spirits called by the Arabs Fin, or Genii, which participate both of the nature of spirits and that of men. Others imagined, that it was an angel sent by God to reform this prince, and dispose him to forsake the vicious habits he had contracted. But the most sensible part of his subjects apprehended, that these pranks were plaid by some of his domestics, assisted herein by a person well versed in the occult sciences, in order to carry some design he had formed into execution. Nevertheless, the truth of the fact could never be discovered; which excited the Khalif to use several of his domestics, whom he suspected of having a hand in this affair, ill on that account. About this time, died at Manbij, or Aleppo, Al Walid Ebn Obeidah, and Ali Ebn Al Abbās, two celebrated Arab poets. This year, a truce, or cessation of arms, in Sicily was agreed upon the Christians and the Moslems <sup>a</sup>.

Several wonderful phænomena in Egypt. In the year of the Hejra, 284, beginning February 8th, 897, a wonderful phænomenon, or rather several such phænomena, were seen in Egypt. On Holy Thursday, or Ascension-day, which this year fell on the 28th of the former Rabi, a high wind arose towards the evening, which blew till midnight; when on a sudden it became so dark, the night having been pretty light before, that not the faintest traces of any visible object could be discerned. This thick darkness was succeeded by a storm, or tempest, much more violent than the former wind, which threw down a vast number of houses, and did incredible damage. During this storm, a large quantity of a sort of red sand fell upon people's heads in their houses, to their great terror and astonishment, and the whole hemisphere seemed to be covered with pillars of fire. This continued till towards the approach of the morning, when the tempest somewhat abated, and the heavens appeared of an exceeding red colour, which they communicated to the earth, mountains, trees, men, and every other object of sight, for the space of two hours; the wind blowing all the time extremely fresh. Then this surprizing redness turned into a yellowish colour, which continued till noon, and was succeeded by a thick black cloud, that remained till the middle of the next day; so that, for a day and a half, the face of the heavens was totally obscured, this cloud, and the aforesaid phænomena, all that time absolutely intercepted the solar rays. After the dissipation of the thick black cloud, the boisterous weather above-mentioned immediately ceased. As the red meteor, or vapour, here mentioned, not a little resembles that seen by the writer of this history at Oxford, December 5th, 1737, which the famous Dr. Halley told him he never saw any celestial appearance like, through the whole course of his observations, nor ever met with an account of any similar to it in history; we thought our curious readers would not be displeased to find the preceding article, extracted from Eutychius, inserted in this place <sup>f</sup>.

- <sup>a</sup> THE same year, some of the Arab astrologers predicted a general inundation, which should be occasioned by a long course of continual rains, and by which Mesopotamia and all the neighbouring countries, except the territory of Baghdâd, should be laid under water. But the reverse of this happened. For, by reason of a long uninterrupted drought, the waters of the Tigris, and other rivers, were lower than ever had been known in the memory of man; insomuch that they frequently offered up prayers to heaven for rain, in the public mosques, at Baghdâd. About this time, the Khalîf, excited thereto by his affection for Ali and his descendants, would have issued an order to curse publicly the name of Mod-wiyah I. of the house of Ommiyah, in all the mosques of the empire, for the solemn malediction that prince caused to be published against Ali and his family. But Obeid'allah Ebn Solimân, his Vîzir, dissuaded him from this, by representing to him, that it would make him incur the hatred of a very considerable part of his subjects; and, by raising the credit of the race of Ali, then dispersed all over the empire, would make them lift up their heads, and perhaps enable them to embarrass his affairs. Before the conclusion of this year, the Karmatians, a sect of which we have already given our readers some account, began to be in motion <sup>Other occurrences this year.</sup>.
- <sup>b</sup> THE following year, being the 285th of the Hejra, commencing January 28, 898, one Abu Sa'id appeared for the first time at the head of a body of Karmatian and Arab troops in Bakrein. Having taken several towns in that province, he advanced to Al Katîf, and even threatened to pay the Moslems a visit at Basra. This induced the Khalîf to surround that city with a wall, which cost him 14,000 dinârs. About the same time, died Ibrahim Ebn Ishak, a famous traditionist of Baghdâd. An action happened this year in Sicily, the consequences of which are not known <sup>The Karmatians commit hostilities in Bahrein.</sup>.

- <sup>c</sup> THE 286th year of the Hejra, beginning January 17th, 899, produced several military operations. The Khalîf Al Mo'taded laid siege to Amed, or Amida, a city of Mesopotamia, seated upon the Tigris, with a powerful army. For some time, Abmed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Shaikh, who commanded in the town, defended it with great bravery. But Al Mo'taded having, by the application of his catapults thereto, made a practicable breach in the walls, and being upon the point of carrying the place by storm, the commandant found himself obliged to surrender, on condition his life should be granted him. Kinnisrîn also and Al Awâsem submitted to the Khalîf. After which, he took Ebn Shaikh into favour, gave him a sumptuous vest, and carried him with him to Baghdâd <sup>The Khalîf reduces Amida.</sup>.
- <sup>d</sup> THE same year, Abu Sa'id Al Hamâni, with a body of the Karmatian forces, penetrated into Yamâma, and laid siege to Hajr, the capital of the district of the same name. But as the place was strongly fortified, and rendered almost impregnable by its situation, he found himself obliged to draw off, and abandon the siege. However, after this repulse, he sat down before Al Absâ, a town about two miles north-west of Hajr, and ravaged all the adjacent territory; which enabled him to form again the siege of Hajr, and carry it on with more vigour than before. But, notwithstanding all his efforts, he could not make himself master of that fortress this campaign <sup>The Karmatians penetrate into Yamâma.</sup>.

- <sup>e</sup> THE Khalîf, receiving advice that the Karmatians had over-ran a considerable part of Arabia and Irâk, pillaging all the country through which they moved, and putting all the Moslems they could meet with to the sword, assembled a considerable army, to stop their farther progress; which he ordered to advance towards the frontiers of those provinces, though none of the troops of which it was composed could enter upon action this campaign. About this time, Al Mo'tadel granted Harûn Ebn Khamarawiyah Ebn Ahmed Ebn Tolûn, at his request, the perpetual prefecture of Awâsem, and Kinnisrîn, which he annexed to that of Egypt and Syria, on condition that he paid him an annual tribute of 45,000 dinârs. About the same time, died Abu'l Abbâs Mohammed Abd'allah Ebn Zeid, a celebrated grammarian and philologist, who wrote a great number of excellent books. Another battle was fought this year in Sicily, the particulars of which have not been handed down to us by any historian <sup>The Khalîf prepares to march against them.</sup>.
- <sup>f</sup> THE next year, being the 287th of the Hejra, Al Abbâs Ebn Omar, the Khalîf's general, took the field with a powerful army against the Karmatians, who continued still to make terrible havoc in Arabia and Irâk. That general soon brought Abu Sa'id Al Hamâni, who commanded them, to a general action; wherein the Khalîf's troops were overthrown with great slaughter <sup>His forces are overthrown with very great slaughter.</sup>.

great slaughter, and 700 of them, amongst whom was Al Abbâs Ebn Omar himself, taken prisoners. The Karmatian general, however, dismissed Al Abbâs Ebn Omar, on condition that he should represent to the Khalîf the fatal consequences of continuing the war against the Karmatians, who were inured to all kinds of hardships and fatigues, and would therefore always prove superior to the forces of that prince, to whom they were resolved never to give quarter; as likewise to endeavour to prevail upon him, by all proper motives that he could think of, to desist from that war. This he accordingly did, and which had such an effect upon the Khalîf, that he sent no forces against them the following year. We must not forget to observe, that Abu'l Abbâs landed a considerable body of Moslem troops from Africa at Mazara, or Mazaria, in Sicily, the 24th of July, the present year <sup>1</sup>.

illustrations of
of the year

THE following year, being the 288th of the Hejra, commencing December 26th, 900, the plague made such dreadful havock in Alberbijdân, that the living were not sufficient to bury the dead; inasmuch that they were obliged to leave them exposed on the highways in great numbers. About the same time, the Greeks made an irruption into Kajâm, ravaged it, and carried off about 15000 Moslems prisoners. The whole hemisphere was filled with those meteors called falling-stars, the ninth of Dhu'llajja, from midnight till morning, to the vast surprize of the beholders, in Egypt. Abu Sa'id Al Hamâni, the Karmatian general, took Hajr in Yamâma, having starved the garison to a surrender, and forced them to feed upon dogs and other unclean animals, either the beginning of this, or towards the conclusion of the preceding year. After he had put all the inhabitants to the sword, and distributed every thing valuable belonging to them amongst his troops, he abandoned the town. Abu'l Abbâs, with the African troops, took Palermo September 8th, 901, and massacred a great number of the citizens at the reduction of that place <sup>2</sup>.

The insolence of a Karmat-
ian officer.

THE next year, being the 289th of the Hejra, beginning December 16th, 901, Al Mo'taded, receiving advice that a body of the Karmatian troops had taken post in the neighbourhood of Cûfa, sent a detachment of his forces to reconnoitre them. The officer, who commanded the detachment, was so lucky as to surprize one of their parties, and to carry off one of their principal chiefs, whom he immediately conducted to the imperial palace at Baghdâd. As soon as the Karmatian was brought before the Khalîf, that prince asked him whether they believed that the spirit of God resided in their bodies, or not? To which he made answer, Suppose the spirit of God should reside in us, what hurt does this to you? or if the spirit of the devil should have taken up his residence in us, of what advantage is this to you? Mind your own business, and concern yourself not with other men's affairs. "What then," said the Khalîf, "do you think of me and my dignity in particular?" The Karmatian boldly replied, Your ancestor Al Abbâs was alive at the time of the prophet's death, and yet did he either aspire to the Khalîfat, or had he it offered him by any of the COMPANIONS? Was not Abu Becr unanimously elected his successor? After that prince's decease, Omar was called to the succession, not the least mention having been made in his predecessor's will of Al Abbâs. Omar nominated six persons, a little before he expired, to elect a new Khalîf, without permitting Al Abbâs to be one of their number. What title, therefore, can you have to the Khalîfat, when your great ancestor Al Abbâs himself was excluded from that high dignity by the COMPANIONS? Al Mo'taded was so incensed at this insolent discourse, that he instantly ordered the executioner, then present, to disjoint all his bones, to cut off his hands and his feet, and finally to strike off his head <sup>3</sup>.

The Khalîf
dies.

THE same year, the Khalîf Al Mo'taded died at Baghdâd, the 22d of the latter Rabî, after he had obliged his subjects to take an oath in favour of his son Al Mo'edess, whom he had declared his successor. Some authors relate, that his death was occasioned by immoderate coition, and others that he was poisoned by Ismael Ebn Mûlec. He reigned about nine years and nine months, and died either in the 47th, 48th, or the 50th, year of his age. His judge Abu Omar said the prayer usual on such occasions, when he was interred. As to his person, he was lean, swarthy, of a proper stature, just beginning to grow grey, had a handsome face, together with a long beard died black, and was of a strong robust constitution. With regard to his disposition, he is said to have been a person of great sagacity and penetration, to have been thoroughly versed in the art of government, happy and expeditious in hitting upon expedients, at all critical conjunctures, and of great justice and moderation. On some occasions, however, he was rigorous and severe in his punishments, which made him feared by his domestics, though on others his lenity was unparalleled. He was also naturally brave, an encourager of learned men, and sometimes extremely liberal, though he has been represented by Eutychius and Abu'l Faraj as a lover of money. His experience and excellent genius for government rendered him every way qualified for the sublime

a post he so worthily filled. In fine, if we will believe some of the eastern writers, he excelled all his predecessors of the house of Al Abbâs, except the Khalîf Al Manjûr, in the happiness of his administration. But the true disposition of this prince will more clearly appear from the following instances of his affection for the descendants of Ali, as well as of his justice, severity, and moderation, which have been recorded by the oriental historians <sup>b</sup>.

THE provost of Baghdâd having one day stopped in the hands of a merchant the sum of 30,000 dinârs, sent by Mohammed Ebn Zeid, prince of Mazanderân, or Tabrستان, of the race of Ali, to the chiefs of the descendants of that Imâm, according to annual custom, residing there; they immediately carried their complaint to the Khalîf. That prince very generously gave them the money that had been seized, and, in order to justify this action, which appeared strange to the Sunnites, or orthodox Moslems, who considered the followers of Ali as heretics, he related them the following dream <sup>c</sup>.

“ I thought,” said he, “ that I formerly saw in a dream a man standing at the end of a bridge that I was to pass, who seemed at first to have an intention to oppose my passage; but afterwards, all of a sudden, he approached me, and presented to me a spade that he held in his hand; commanding me at the same time to break with it the ground on which we stood. I obeyed his order, and after I had given some strokes with the spade, he told me he was Ali, and that as many of my sons should enjoy the Khalîfat as I had given strokes upon the ground with the spade. Then he enjoined me to be kind to his family, and particularly those members of it that lived under my government. In consequence, therefore, of the promise I made him, as well as in point of justice, I ought to restore the 30,000 dinârs to the descendants of that Imâm, to whom they properly belonged “

THE severity of this Khalîf on some occasions was exceeding great, as will appear from the two following examples. A soldier having once by force picked some bunches of grapes of a certain Moslem's vine, the man immediately carried his complaint to the Khalîf; who commanded both the soldier and his captain to appear before him, in order to receive the punishment he should think fit to inflict upon them. Some of the people about him demanding what crime the captain had committed; he answered, “ I saw him kill a man unjustly in my uncle's reign, and then made a vow to punish him for so enormous a crime, if ever the Khalîfat should fall into my hands, and he should be found guilty of any other fault “.

AN eastern writer relates, that a merchant having lent one of the principal lords of the Khalîf's court a large sum of money, after he had applied for the payment of it several times in vain, and given it up for lost, resolved to trouble himself no farther about it, but to quit the court in order to go a voyage. This design he communicated to a friend, who advised him by all means to have recourse to Sheikh Khaïath, for the recovery of his money. The Sheikh, upon the application of these two gentlemen to him, for his assistance in this affair, went directly to the lord, and no sooner represented to him, with a tone of authority, as he very well knew how to do, the iniquity of his conduct, than he paid the merchant the sum he was indebted to him. The great reputation, or rather authority, of this Sheikh Khaïath was acquired by a very singular action, an account of which has been preserved by one of the oriental historians. A Turk attempting to ravish by force a girl in the city of Baghdâd, she found herself obliged to call in all her neighbours to her help. At the cries of this girl, Sheikh Khaïath ran to her relief, and begged the Turk in the most pressing terms not to offer her any violence. But the brute was so far from paying any regard to his intreaties, that he insulted him and treated him in a very injurious manner. The Sheikh, not being able to think of any other expedient, to prevent him from accomplishing his wicked design, mounted the minâret, or steeple, of the great mosque, and from thence called the people together to prayer, though it was out of the stated times of prayer, in order to excite the Moslems so assembled to succour the poor girl, and deliver her effectually out of the hands of the insolent Turk. The Khalîf, having been apprized of the action, but being ignorant of the motive to it, commanded the Sheikh to be brought before him, and severely reprimanded him for convening the people to prayer at an unlawful hour. But being afterwards informed of the whole affair, he ordered the Turk to be punished according to his demerit, and at the same time commanded the Sheikh, as often as he should see any violence or injustice committed, to publish it in the same manner, that by this means the author of it might meet with the treatment he deserved. 'Twas this action that gave so great a degree of credit to the Sheikh Khaïath, that there was no person in Baghdâd, neither great nor small, who did not pay the highest regard to his admonitions, for fear he should assemble the people as before, make public the crimes he was willing to expose, and bring the authors to condign punishment for them <sup>d</sup>.

particulars
relating to
him.

ANOTHER author relates a fact of this Khalif, that our curious readers will not be disappointed to find inserted here. Being desirous of borrowing a considerable sum of money of one of his subjects, who had been represented as in very affluent circumstances to him; the man said, as soon as he was brought into his presence, Take as much of my money as you please. “But,” replied the Khalif, “what security do you require for it?” God, returned the man, has trusted you with the government of his lands and his servants, of which you have shewn yourself worthy by your excellent administration; and shall I be afraid to trust you with my money? These words so affected the Khalif, that he is said to have shed tears, and to have told the man that he would not finger a dirhém of his money, but that if hereafter he should become indigent, all the public revenues of the empire should be at his service. This was the more remarkable at that time, as he was in great want of money to pay the forces; which in another reign might have produced very dismal effects. He also eased the people of the burthen of some of their taxes, and remitted the tribute paid by the inhabitants of Mecca and Medina. Besides which, other instances of his preferring the welfare of his subjects to pecuniary considerations, even when he stood in need of money, and his finances were at a pretty low ebb, have been handed down to us by some of the best oriental writers <sup>a</sup>.

WITH regard to this Khalif's lenity and mildness to his servants, on some occasions, a very remarkable story of him has been preserved by Abu'l Faraj. Abd'allah Ebn Solimân Ebn Wakeb, his Visir, being one day with him, a servant, whilst he endeavoured to drive away the flies with a fly-flap in his hand, struck off the Khalif's cap; which greatly confounded the Visir. But the Khalif, unmoved with the accident, only said, This boy is exceeding careless. This so astonished the Visir, that he could not forbear falling prostrate on the ground, and saying, O emperor of the faithful! is it possible there should be so much lenity in so great a prince? The Khalif replied, “What other notice ought to be taken of such an accident as this? I knew that if the poor boy had done this designedly, he must have been out of his senses; and certainly where no ill is intended, no action ought to be imputed to any one as a crime <sup>b</sup>.”

Other authors represent him
as cruel on some occasions.

OTHER authors, however, relate, that, at certain intervals, he was cruel, and took great delight in spilling human blood; inasmuch that he punished with death the most trifling faults. The same writers also affirm, that whenever any of his domesticks incurred his displeasure, he ordered him to be buried alive; which made them all to stand in the greatest awe of him. In fine, from what has been observed of this Khalif it clearly appears, that different authors have represented him in different lights, at least as inconsistent with himself, and acting differently at different times; so that we must consider him on certain occasions as adorned with some of those virtues, the exercise of which appears most amiable in a very great prince, and on others as deformed by their opposite vices <sup>c</sup>.

His favourites
and Visirs.

HIS principal counsellors, or Visirs, were Abu'l Sakar Ebn Ismael Ebn Mâlec, Abd'allah Ebn Solimân Ebn Wakeb, Abimed Ebn Abu'l Abbâs Ebn Mohammed, Abu Hârim Abd'alhamîd Ebn Abd'alaziz Al Selwi, and Yusef Ebn Yakûb, who successively governed the Muslem empire under the Khalif. His chamberlain Sâleh, and his freed-man Eadar, enjoyed likewise a considerable share of his favour. The inscription of his seal was, Necessity takes away all choice and free will. The first day of his reign was Tuesday, and the last Monday; tho', with regard to the precise duration of it, authors are not perfectly agreed <sup>d</sup>.

Some occurrences in the Greek empire,
during his reign.

IN the first year of the Khalifat of Al Mo'taded, Simeon, or Sim'ân, Ebn Zarnâk was constituted patriarch of Antioch, and presided over the church there twelve years. In the year of the Hejra 281, or of CHRIST 894, according to the Christian writers followed by Al Makin, the emperor Leo married his fourth wife Zoe, who brought him a son, called Constantine. This marriage being the fourth, which was then held unlawful, gave rise to great disturbances and divisions in the church of Constantinople. For, Nicolaus Mysticus, at that time patriarch, not only declared against the marriage, but excommunicated the emperor; who thereupon, after having earnestly begged, but in vain, to be restored to the communion of the church, confined the patriarch in a monastery, and placed one Euthymius Syncellus in his room. Some of the clergy adhered to Nicolaus, and others to Euthymius; which occasioned a schism in the church. However, the pope, or bishop of Rome, Michael, or Mikhâïyel, patriarch of Alexandria, Elias, or Eylâ, Ebn Mansûr, patriarch of Jerusalem, and Simeon, or Sim'an, Ebn Zarnâk, patriarch of Antioch, by their legates, or nuncio's, whom they sent to Constantinople for that purpose, if we will believe Euty chius, declared for the legality of that marriage, and were joined herein by a considerable number of the Greek bishops. But, for a farther account of this affair, we must beg leave a to refer our curious readers to the Roman, or Constantinopolitan, history, to which it more properly belongs <sup>1</sup>.

DURING the Khalifat of Al Mo'taded, several learned men were not only countenanced, but <sup>Several learned men encouraged in Al Mo'taded's reign.</sup> cared for, at the Moslem court. Amongst these may be ranked the three sons of Mûsa Ebn Shâker, Mohammed, Abmed, and Al Hasan, who excelled in various branches of literature. As for Mûsa Ebn Shâker himself, he followed the occupation of a robber, or highway-man, in his earlier years; but he afterwards became reformed, and was one of the greatest favourites of the Khalif Al Mamûn. After his death, that prince committed his three sons, then very young, to the care of Ishak Ebn Ibrahim Al Mosa'bi, who placed them under Tabya Ebn Abi Mansûr, in the university of Baghdâd. However, their circumstances then were b narrow enough, as the pensions settled by Al Mamûn upon his favourites were but small. Abu Ja'far Mohammed, the eldest of them, made a very considerable progress in geometry and astronomy; though afterwards applying himself to military affairs, he had a command given him in the army, which he kept till the Turks becoming masters of every thing, filled it with officers of their own nation. Abmed, the second of Mûsa's sons, was inferior, in point of learning, to his brother Mohammed; but he had the best mechanical head of any man of the age. Al Hasan, the youngest son, was extremely fond of geometry, and of such prodigious parts as could be equalled by none of those of his contemporaries. For, whatever knowledge he had came to him by dint of genius, and as it were by inspiration, not having been acquired by labour and study. When he had read only the six first books of the c Elements of Euclid, with the assistance of those, purely by force of genius, he could demonstrate any proposition contained in the books of that celebrated author he had not touched upon; as he scrupled not to tell Al Merûzi, when he reproached him with not having gone farther in Euclid, before the Khalif Al Mamûn. However, that prince, though giving credit to what he advanced in this particular, seems to have blamed him for his want of application. Mohammed Ebn Mûsa instructed in his house, or school, at Baghdâd, the famous Thâbet Ebn Korra, the Sabian, who was born at Harân, or Harrân, in Mesopotamia; and introduced him to the Khalif Al Mo'taded, who consulted him as his astrologer, honoured him with a greater degree of familiarity than even his Visir himself, and took an inconceivable liking to him. This Thâbet Ebn Korra Ebn Merwân composed several excellent treatises upon mathematical, physical, and logical subjects. He likewise wrote some books in Syriac upon the d Sabian religion, containing an account of the Sabians method of wrapping up and burying their dead, of their cleanness and uncleanness, of the animals they look upon as proper or improper for sacrifices, of their stated times of public worship, and, in fine, of all their rites, precepts, and institutions. But, as we have already obliged our readers with a full and ample account of all those particulars in another place, we shall not expatiate any farther upon them here. Abmed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Merwân Ebn Al Tiyeb Al Sarkhasi likewise flourished in this reign. He was also an eminent Moslem philosopher, and penned several excellent pieces, full of various kinds of erudition, that prevailed both amongst the Arabs and the e antients. His knowledge was very extensive, his parts admirable, his language copious and elegant, and his style extremely neat. He had first been preceptor to the Khalif Al Mo'taded, and afterwards his most intimate companion and friend; insomuch that he communicated all his secrets to him, not excepting even those of state, and consulted him upon the most important points. He is called by some writers Abd'allah Abmed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Merwân Al Sarakfi, having been born at Sarkhas, or Sarakhs, a city of the province of Khorasân, which also gave birth to several other learned men, and is said by them to have dedicated one of his moral treatises, intitled, Adab Al Nefes, to the Khalif Al Mo'taded, his pupil, who was a great encourager of learned men. Another of his compositions, being a comment upon the Isagoge of Porphyry, has been mentioned by those authors, as having the title of Isagogi prefixed to it. This piece of Porphyry has likewise been commented upon, f and translated into Arabic, by Atkiro'ddîn Al Baberi; a fine copy of which performance is preserved in the French king's library, N<sup>o</sup> 908. We have also an Arabic version of the Isagoge of Porphyry, in verse, written by Ibrahim Al Mostabasheri, which bears the title of Taiyab, because the last consonant of every rhyme is the letter T. This poem is likewise intitled Mawzen Al Mizân, that is, The weight of the balance. The word Mizân, which in its proper signification denotes a balance, in a figurative one is taken for logic. The Arabs generally divide their systems of logic into ten chapters, one of which comprehends the Isagoge of Porphyry. The philosopher Abmed Ebn Mohammed, named sometimes Abu'l Abbâs Al Sarakfi Al Thabib, of whom we have been speaking, greatly excelled in this art. But this Abmed's learning was greater than his prudence. For, he once revealed a secret the Khalif had entrusted him with; which so provoked that prince, that he immediately ordered him to be put to death, in the year of the Hejra 286<sup>m</sup>.

Al Mo'tafi
succeeds Al Mo'taded in
the Khalifat.

AL MO'TADED was no sooner dead, than Kasem Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Soliman Ebn Wakeb, his Visir, who succeeded Yusef Ebn Yakub, caused Abu Mohammed Al Mo'tafi Billah, his son, to be proclaimed Khalif at Baghdad. He also wrote to the new Khalif, who was then at Al Rakka, upon the Euphrates, desiring him to return as soon as possible to his capital, in order to take the government of the empire upon him. As soon as Al Mo'tafi received advice of his father's death, he obliged all the forces he commanded at Al Rakka to take the oath of allegiance to him, and posted away with the utmost celerity to Baghdad, where he arrived the 8th of the former Jomada, the present year. Upon his arrival, he was inaugurated with the usual formalities, and acknowledged emperor of the faithful by all his subjects there. His mother Bakhtajakne, called by some writers Khade, and by others Hibac, or Hibaca, was the daughter of Al Kasem Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Soliman Ebn Wakeb, the prime minister or Visir. This we find asserted by Eutyckius, though the contrary seems to be intimated by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari; who relates, that this Al Kasem, in Al Mo'taded's life-time, formed a design to exclude Al Mo'tafi from the succession, to which was privy only Badar, or Badir, who had a vast ascendant over that Khalif. Al Kasem, therefore, continues the same author, being afraid that Badar would discover the whole affair to Al Mo'tafi, inspired the Khalif with sentiments by no means favourable to him. As Badar then resided in Al Jebel, or the Persian Irak, at some distance from Baghdad, and consequently was incapable of obviating the ill impressions made on the Khalif's mind by his enemy's insinuations, Al Kasem easily prevailed upon Al Mo'tafi to send an army against him. But before this measure was actually pursued, the Khalif found means to bribe the greatest part of Badar's troops to desert him, by privately distributing very considerable sums of money amongst them; which obliged that commander himself to retire to Waset. Al Mo'tafi, having been informed of what had happened, moved at the head of his forces to attack him. But, before hostilities commenced, Al Kasem sent Al Haram, the principal judge, to Badar, to offer him a pardon, provided he would submit to the Khalif, and lay down his arms. This being accepted by Badar, upon the terms prescribed, he immediately disbanded his troops, and set out with Al Haram for Baghdad. Of which Al Kasem having been apprized, he sent a person to take off his head upon the road; which being done, and the head brought to Baghdad, Al Mo'tafi returned to his capital in peace. This article renders it improbable, if we admit it to be true, that the new Khalif's mother was Al Kasem's daughter; as it cannot well be supposed that the Visir would have entered into any scheme that had the least tendency to forward the exclusion of his grandson Al Mo'tafi from the Moslem throne<sup>a</sup>.

The Karmatians make an irruption into Syria.

THE same year the Karmatians, under the command of Yahya Ebn Zakrîna, advanced to Rusafa, and overthrew Shakr, the Deylamite, who was sent against them by the Khalif, in the neighbourhood of that city. Shakr himself was killed in the action, and his forces utterly dispersed; after which the rebels burnt the great mosque at Rusafa, and ravaged all the adjacent territory. From thence they marched into Syria, routed Harun Ebn Kbamarawiyah Ebn Ahmed Ebn Tolun's forces, under the conduct of Taj Ebn Hanaf, or Tagaj Ebn Jof Al Fargani, as he is called by Eutyckius, and at last laid siege to Damascus. But Harun, having sent Bedr Al Yamami with a reinforcement into Syria, after the junction of those troops with the army commanded by Taj, his forces attacked Yahya with such bravery, that they intirely defeated him, killed him upon the spot, with a vast number of his men, and forced his camp. This blow, however, did not dishearten the Karmatians; who thereupon elected his brother Al Hosein, then not above twenty-two years of age, their general, in his room. Al Hosein, having been joined by a body of auxiliary troops, penetrated to Hems, and made himself master of that city. From thence he moved towards Damascus, in order to form a second time the siege of that place; but the inhabitants, by paying him a large sum of money, prevailed upon him to lay aside that design. He, therefore, returned to Hems; from whence he advanced to Hamab and Maara, or Maarra, near two days journey from Kinnisrin, seized upon both those cities, and put the greatest part of their inhabitants to the sword. Those of Baalbec he served in the same manner. But Salamiyah, a town in the district of Hems, or as others will have it, in that of Hamab, being a place of considerable strength, he was obliged to promise the people of it their lives, and the secure possession of all their effects, before he could persuade them to surrender it to him. Notwithstanding which, he had no sooner entered the town, than he ordered them all, without a distinction of sex and age, together with their cattle and domestic animals, in open defiance of the capitulation, to be put to the sword °.

It must be here observed, that this Al Hosein, now at the head of the Karmatians, pretended to be Ahmed, the son of Mohammed, the son of Ismael, the son of Jaafar, surnamed Al Sadik, or the just, the sixth Imâm; and, in order to render this the more credible, he shewed a mole, or wart, on his face, which, as he affirmed, resembled that of his father Mohammed in the same place. Hence he had given him, by way of derision or ridicule, the surname of Sabeb Al Samab; and the general that commanded under him that of Sabeb Al Khal; the words Samab and Khal in Arabic denoting the same thing. About two years before this irruption of the Karmatians into Syria, Ali Ebn Abd'alaziz Al Bagawi died at Mecca. After the surrender of Salamiyah, Al Hosein destroyed a great number of towns and villages in Syria, killed many of the Khalif's subjects there, carried others of them into captivity, and, in fine, laid the most considerable part of that fine country waste with fire and sword °.

And commit dreadful devastations there.

A LITTLE before this time, the African Moslems, having equipped a mighty fleet, reduced the island of Lemnos, and ravaging without controul the coasts of Asia, threw the imperial city itself into a great consternation. The Arab fleet in this expedition was commanded by Leo Tripolites, a renegado, who made himself master of Thessalonica, cutting to pieces the greatest part of the garison, and taking Chatzilacius, the imperial governor, prisoner. However, the place was afterwards redeemed with a large sum by Simcan, one of the emperor's secretaries, who was on that account raised to the rank of patrician. Leo then sailed to Crete, and distributed part of the plunder he had met with at Lemnos, which he abandoned soon after it fell into his hands, Thessalonica, and on the coast of Asia, amongst the Moslems there. After which, he returned home, without having sustained any considerable loss. The emperor, not being able to make head against the Moslems by sea, sent Andronicus Ducas, and Eustathius Agyrus, into the East, in order to attack them by land; which they did with great success, having gained several victories over them. This we learn from the Greek writers only, not the least mention being made of such an eastern expedition by any of the Arab historians.

The military operations between the Moslems and Greeks.

THE following year, being the 290th of the Hejra, commencing December 5th, 902, the Khalif Al Motasif sent Al A'z, one of his commanders, with a body of 10,000 men, to attack the Karmatians. As soon as that general came up with the rebels, his men immediately threw off their cloaths, and charged them with great fury. But the Karmatians, animated by Al Motawek, who commanded them, routed the Khalif's forces, and cut the most considerable part of them in pieces; Al A'z himself, attended by the shattered remains of his army, with great difficulty, making his escape to Aleppo, whither he was closely pursued by Al Motawek, who laid siege to the town. But the inhabitants, supported by Al A'z's troops, repulsed him in all his attacks, and at last forced him to abandon the siege.

The Khalif's forces not able to reduce the Karmatians.

The Khalif, receiving advice of what had happened, retired to Al Rakka, and sent several other bodies of troops afterwards against the Karmatians, but without effect. This enabled Al Hosein to ravage the provinces through which he moved without controul. It seems to appear from some of the Greek writers, that, a little before this time, the Moslems invaded the imperial territories with a very numerous and formidable army; which obliged the emperor to dispatch Himerius and Andronicus Ducas against them. They were both generals of great courage, experience, and conduct, continue these authors; but a fatal misunderstanding between them, which was owing to the malicious intrigues of one Samonas, put a stop to the progress of their arms. But the particulars of this expedition, as well as those of the former, have been passed over in silence by both the Persian and Arab historians °.

The Khalif's troops overthrow the Moslem territories.

THE next year, being the 291st of the Hejra, beginning November 24th, 903, the Khalif, having been informed that Al Hosein had pillaged several parts of Syria, and put the rest under contribution, took the field with an army of 100,000 men, in order to reduce him. He advanced first to Al Rakka, upon the Euphrates, and from thence detached Mohammed Ebn Soliman, with a large body of troops, to go in quest of the rebels, who retired at his approach; but at last he came up with them, and attacked them with such bravery, that he intirely defeated them, without having sustained any considerable loss. A great number of the rebels perished in the action, and Hosein himself, together with the general who acted under him, and 360 of his men, fell into the hands of one of the Khalif's officers, who conducted them under an escort, as prisoners, to Bagh-

dâd. It appears from Abulfeda, who in this particular has followed Sharîf Al Abed, an author a that lived before him, that the battle was fought at a place called Tamna. After this victory, which was complete, and gained in the 291st year of the Hejra, if we will believe Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, and not in the 290th, as is suggested by M. D'Herbelot, the Khalîf entered triumphantly his capital, and ordered the hands and feet of all the Karmatian prisoners, not excepting those of Al Hosein himself, to be first cut off, and afterwards their heads. Our readers will not be surprized, that we should prefer the authority of Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, styled by Mr. Ockley the Livy of the Arabians, in the point before us, to that of any other writer followed by M. D'Herbelot, after we have informed them, that the French author himself asserts, in the most positive and express terms, that the Tarîkh of Abu Jaafar Al Tabari is allowed by the Mohammedans themselves to be the very basis and foundation b of the Moslem history.

The Turks
make an irruption into Mawarâ'nahr.

THE same year, according to Abu'l Faraj, the Turks made an irruption into Marwarâ'nahr with a prodigious army; no less than 700 officers of superior rank having, amongst the rest, pitched their tents in that province. However, the Khalîf's forces fell upon this vast multitude early in the morning, put them to flight, and made a terrible slaughter of them. Soon after which, the Greeks, according to this author, entered the Moslem territories with an army of 100,000 men, divided into ten bodies, which burnt several towns and villages, carried off a pretty large number of prisoners, and then retired of their own accord, without having done any thing very considerable. This may possibly be the expedition mentioned in the preceding page; but that it really is so, we must not presume to c assert. Be that, however, as it will, as it has been but just taken notice of by Abu'l Faraj, who has scarce touched upon any particulars relating to it, we can say nothing farther of it here. Abu'l Abbâs Ahmed Ebn Yakya Ebn Zeid, a famous grammarian and philologer of the university of Cûfa, departed this life the present year, at Baghdâd. It appears from Abu'l-feda, that Ibrahim Ebn Ahmed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ibrahim Ebn Al Aglab, Khalîf of Kairwân, died in the month of Dhu'lkaada, in Sicily, the present year. The body was carried out of that island to Africa, and interred at Kairwân. This Ibrahim was a person of great penetration, famous for his wonderful memory, extremely devout, charitable to the poor, and, in fine, one of the best and most excellent princes of the family of Al Aglab.

The Moslems
take Seleucia.

IF we will believe Eutychius, the Moslems took Seleucia from the Romans, in the month of d the latter Rabî, either this or the preceding year, and sent a vast number of the enemy, whom they had made prisoners on this occasion, in the month of Rajeb, into Egypt. The same author writes, that, in the second year of the Khalîfat of Al Mo'elâfi, the Nile did not rise above thirteen cubits, notwithstanding the prayers of the Christians, Jews, and Mohammedans, to implore from heaven a farther increase of the waters of that river. About this time, one Eylia, or Elias, was constituted patriarch of Antioch, and remained in that see twenty-eight years. Besides which, nothing material, as far as can be collected from the Arab writers, happened in the Moslem empire, the present year.

The Khalîf's
forces conquer
Syria and Egypt.

THE 292d year of the Hejra, in a great measure coincident with the 905th of the Chris- e tian æra, proved fatal to the house of Tolûn in Syria and Egypt. The Khalîf Al Mo'elâfi, flushed with the good success that had attended his arms the preceding campaign, resolved to attempt the intire reduction of those provinces. To this he was farther excited by the great loss sustained by Harûn Ebn Khamarawiyah Ebn Ahmed Ebn Tolûn in the Karmatian war, two or three years before, wherein all his best commanders were cut off, and the flower of his forces perished. He, therefore, sent Mohammed Ebn Solimân with a powerful army to make himself master both of Syria and Egypt; who first attacked and defeated a large body of the Karmatian troops near Hems, and took 700 of them prisoners. Soon after which, one of his parties came up with Al Nâjem, the general that commanded them, who had made his escape out of the battle, at a village called Al Dâlia, seized him, and brought him to Mohammed Ebn Solimân, who sent him, together with the 700 prisoners, under a strong escorte, to the Khalîf, then at Al Rakka. Upon their arrival, that prince ordered them all to be conducted to Baghdâd; where Al Nâjem was first tortured, and afterwards beheaded, and the others put to death, without mercy. The bodies of Al Nâjem, and the f other principal Karmatian captives were, after these executions, hung upon gibbets erected for that purpose without the gates of the city. From Hems, which after this victory immediately surrendered to him, Mohammed Ebn Solimân marched to Damascus; the gates of which city Badr Al Jamâni, Harûn's commandant there, opened to him at his approach. After the surrender of Damascus, Mohammed led his army through Palestine, in order to reach with all possible expedition the borders of Egypt. Harûn, receiving advice of Mohammed's march,

- a advanced with his forces to the frontiers, to dispute the passage into his kingdom with him. By the advice of his generals, he took post in a place called Al Abbâsia, in that part of Egypt known by the name of Al Hûf, where he waited for Mohammed Ebn Solimân. In the mean time, Damianus, or Damîân, a Greek, the Khalîf's admiral, appeared with that prince's fleet off the coasts of Egypt, and landed a body of troops, that routed a large detachment of Harûn Ebn Khamarawiyah's forces at Tanûbah. Shaibân Ebn Akmed Ebn Tolûn, imagining that a favourable opportunity now offered of setting up for himself, assassinated his nephew Harûn Ebn Khamarawiyah, on Sunday the 18th of the month Safar, and for some days was considered as the sovereign of Egypt. But the officers of the army having an utter aversion to the assassin, wrote a letter to Mohammed Ebn Solimân, pressing him to hasten his march, and assuring him that they were ready to submit to the Khalîf, provided that prince would take them under his protection. Mohammed, having granted their request, and sent them such an answer as satisfied them in every particular, entered Egypt the 28th of Safar, without opposition. After which, he advanced with his army drawn up in order of battle to Al Riyah, at a small distance from Mesr, where he was met by Shaibân himself, and several of his brothers, who submitted to the Khalîf; upon which, an unlimited pardon and amnesty were granted them by Mohammed, in his master's name, both for their lives and effects. However, that general ordered all the officers and secretaries that had been in the service of the family of Tolûn to leave Egypt, and retire with their effects, the possession of which was secured to them, to Baghdâd. As for Mohammed himself, he exacted of those to whom he had granted the Khalîf's protection, and others, the sum of 1,000,000 dinârs, remained six months at the head of the administration in Egypt, and then, after he had substituted in his room Isa Al Nûsheri, to govern the province, went to Irâk. Here he also collected another sum, drawn out of various provinces, amounting to 1,000,000 dinârs, for the use of the Khalîf. But that prince having been informed, that Mohammed had imbezzled a considerable part of the public revenues of Egypt, and amassed to himself vast sums of money there, put him under arrest, and even loaded him with irons, in order to oblige him to refund what he had purloined in that opulent country. After Mohammed's arrival in Irâk, Mohammed Ebn Ali Al Khalîj, one of Harûn's commanders in Syria, who had remained for some time with Mohammed Ebn Solimân there, revolted against the Khalîf, and posted himself with a body of troops he had assembled at Al Ramla, threatening to make an irruption into Egypt. The news of Al Khalîj's design reaching the ears of Isa Al Nûsheri, he and Al Hosein Ebn Ahmed Al Mâderâni put themselves at the head of the forces in Egypt, and advanced towards the frontiers, in order to meet him, and give him battle; but receiving advice of his approach, and being informed that his army was much more numerous than had before been given out, they retired with great precipitation to Al Fostât. Not thinking themselves safe there, they fled, after a short stay, to Al Jîza; burning two bridges in their flight, to prevent Al Khalîj from coming up with them. In fine, they were struck with such terror, that they never continued long in one place, but moved about the country as if they had been pursued by an enemy of superior strength. This threw the inhabitants of Al Fostât, now intirely abandoned, and left without a governor, as well as those of the adjacent district, into such a consternation, that Al Khalîj seized upon Mesr, which he entered on Thursday the 16th of Dhu'lkaada, the present year, without opposition, and resided there eight months. After the expiration of that short term, he was driven out of Egypt by the Khalîf's troops, as will more clearly appear from our enumeration of the principal transactions of the following year *.

- The next year, being the 293d of the Hejra, commencing November 2d, 905, Al Mo'etafi sent an army into Egypt, under the command of Fâtec, his freed-man, and Badr Al Fadl Jamâni, to reduce the rebel Mohammed Ebn Ali Al Khalîj. The Khalîf's forces found him posted near Al Fostât, and, after a sharp engagement, intirely defeated him. Al Khalîj himself, however, found means to make his escape, though he was soon after taken out of the lurking-place where he had lain concealed, and brought to Isa Al Nûsheri; who sent him, with a great number of rebel officers, in the month of Rajeb, to the Khalîf at Baghdâd. Upon their arrival there, Al Mo'etafi ordered them to be loaded with irons, and thrown into prison. He also recalled Fâtec, after he had made a triumphant entry into Al Fostât, and appointed Isa Ebn Mohammed Al Nûsheri to preside over the province of Egypt <sup>r</sup>.

The same year, the Karmatians, under the command of Zakrûna Ebn Mabrûna, seized upon Adbraât and Basra, pillaged those two cities, and put all the inhabitants to the sword. After which, they advanced to Damascus, slew Salch Ebn Fadl, the governor's deputy there, <sup>The Karmatians and the Greeks invaded the Moslem empire.</sup> and plundered the adjacent district. But they were repulsed, in a rally, by the garison, a who drove them from the place, after they had destroyed abundance of their men. Notwithstanding which, Zakrûna marched to Tiberias, called by the Arabs Tabariyah, where he was met by Yusef Ebn Ibrahim, with a body of the Khalif's forces, who gave him battle, intirely defeated him, and pursued him into the desert as far as Al Sawân. Here, however, Zakrûna waited for Yusef, overthrew him in his turn, with very great slaughter, and made himself master of his camp. The place where this battle was fought is called by some authors Sabian, and said to be in the neighbourhood of Kadesia, a city of the Babylonian Irâk, about fifteen parasangs off Cûfa. Be that as it will, so unexpected a blow as this could not but greatly embarrass the Khalif's affairs. About this time, died Abmed Ebn Yabya Ebn Ishak, the Rawandian, who wrote a great number of impious books according b to Shababo'ddin, at Rahabab. We must not forget to observe, that the Greeks invaded the Moslem territories, took the city of Cyrrhus, or Kîrûs, burnt the great mosque there, massacred most of the inhabitants, and carried off the rest with them prisoners, the present year <sup>2</sup>.

The Karmatians plunder a caravan going to Mecca, and are routed by the Khalif's troops.

THE following year, being the 294th of the Hejra, the Karmatians, who still remained in the desert, fell upon a caravan going to Mecca, plundered it, and put about 20,000 pilgrims to the sword. This so enraged the Khalif, that he immediately sent Wasîf, one of his generals, with a considerable body of his troops, to take vengeance of them for so daring an affront. Wasîf, in pursuance of his orders, soon came up with them, and attacked c them, loaded and incommoded with the spoils they had taken, so opportunely, that, after an obstinate resistance, he put them to the rout. Zakrûna, their chief, was taken prisoner in the action, and died of a contusion he had received, that hurt his brain, five days after; notwithstanding which, Wasîf sent his body, attended by his wife, domestics, and a great number of Karmatian prisoners, to Baghdâd. Upon their arrival there, the body, preceded by Zakrûna's wife, was carried in triumph through the principal streets of the city, and all the prisoners put to a cruel death. This year, Ismael Ebn Ahmed Al Samâni, the Khalif of the Transoxana and Khorasân, died at Samarkand. The last defeat so humbled the Karmatians, that they did not attempt to disturb the repose of the empire for several years <sup>2</sup>.

The Khalif Al Moctafi dies at Baghdâd.

IN the 295th year of the Hejra, beginning October 12th, 907, the Khalif Al Moctafi departed this life at Baghdâd. Some authors relate, that he died the 13th of Dhu'lkaada, d and others the 13th of Dhu'lhajja, after he had reigned either six years, six months, and twenty days, or six years, nine months, and two days. With regard to his age, the Arab writers likewise differ; some of them making him a little above thirty-one, and other thirty-three, years old at the time of his death. He was short of stature, had a handsome face, large eyes, and a long beard. He was likewise religious, munificent, and had a natural aversion to the effusion of human blood; though he found it absolutely necessary, on some occasions, to punish rebellion and other capital crimes in a proper manner. He left behind him immense riches, and a numerous army; though he could not re-annex to the empire all the provinces that had been lost by some of his predecessors. He bore an uncommon affection for the family of Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, as his father had done before him. His principal favourites were Al Abbâs Ebn Al Hosein and Fâtec, his freed-man; his Vizirs Al Kasem Ebn Abd'allab Ebn Solimân Ebn Wakeb and the above-mentioned Al Abbâs Ebn Al Hosein Ebn Ayûb; his judges Yusef Abu Harem Ebn Yakûb, Abu Omar, and Ali Ebn Abu'l Sharwâreb, and his chamberlain Hafif Al Samarkandi. The inscription of his seal was ALI the son of AHMED puts his trust in GOD. The famous physician Yusef, surnamed Al Sâker, that is, the watchful, or the vigilant, and Al Kas, that is, the elder, or the antient, flourished in this Khalif's reign. Some authors relate, that he seldom slept above four hours, and spent all the rest of the night in study; from whence he received the appellation of Al Sâker. Others say, that he was deprived of his natural rest by a cancer, and derived from thence the first of his surnames; and, in confirmation of this sentiment, it clearly appears from some of his f works, that he was troubled with such a disorder. About nine months before Al Moctafi's death, Ismael Ebn Ahmed Al Sammâni, the sovereign of Mawarâ'lnahr and Khorasân, departed this life; as did Mohammed Ebn Nafr Al Merûzi, a celebrated author, the preceding year, at Samarkand. We must not forget to observe, that, according to the eastern historians, Al Mondar Ebn Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmân, of the house of Ommiyah, notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary by Roderic of Toledo, died, the 16th of the month Safar this year, in Spain <sup>b</sup>.

S E C T. XL.

- <sup>a</sup> UPON the death of Al Mo'tafi, Jaafar Abu'l Fadl Al Moktader, surnamed Bi'llah, in And is succeed- common with his two immediate predecessors, ascended the Moslem throne. He was ed by Al Mok- inaugurated at Baghdâd the very day on which his brother Al Mo'tafi died; being then, if tader Bi'llah.
we will believe Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, not quite fourteen years of age. His mother's name was either Sa'f, or Sba'b, and his own at large Jaafar Abu'l Fadhl Al Moktader Bi'llah Ebn
Al Mo'taded. This year, Abu Nasr Ahmed Al Sammâni succeeded his father Ismael Ebn Ahmed
Al Sammâni in the sovereignty of Khorasân and Mawarâ'lnahr; as did Abd'allah his brother
Al Mondar in that of Andalusia, or Spain. About a month before the last event happened, died Abu Jaafar Mohammed Ebn Ahmed Ebn Nasr Al Termedi, a famous Sonnite theologer of the sect of Al Shâfe'i. An Emîr arrived in Sicily, from Africa, with some Moslem troops, in <sup>b</sup> the month of May; and, being reinforced by a body of the Sicilian forces, made himself master of Taormina, the Tauromenium of the antients, called by the Arabs Tabermîn, the first of August, which happened to be one Sunday, the present year <sup>c</sup>.
- THE next year, being the 296th of the Hejra, commencing September 30, 908, Al Abbâs Al Mortadi
Ebn Al Hosein, Al Moktader's Visir, and Fâtec, were cut to pieces by the soldiery, com- Ebn Al Mo'- manded by Al Hosein Ebn Hamdân, who assembled in a tumultuous manner, the twentieth tazz is placcd of the former Rabî, and, not content with that outrage, afterwards deposed the Khalîf upon the Mos- himself, whom they despised on account of his tender age. The Moslem throne being by lem throne, this means become vacant, they placed thereon Abd'allah Ebn Al Motazz, surnamed by and, after 24 them Al Mortadi Bi'llah, who appointed Mohammed Ebn Dawd his Visir. But Al Mortadi hours reign, <sup>c</sup> being immediately deserted by many of those who assisted him in his elevation to the Khalî-
fat, Al Moktader's forces proved superior to those of the new Khalîf, and intirely dispersed them. However, Al Mortadi made his escape into the desert, after he had reigned about twenty-four hours, where he lay a short time concealed. But being soon taken, he was instantly brought to Al Moktader; who ordered him to be strangled, together with Mohammed Ebn Dawd Ebn Al Harâb, his Visir, and Sawdar Ebn Al Hafâs, who had concealed him. After these executions, Al Mortadi's body was carried out of the imperial palace, and interred in a spot of ground opposite to his own house, the 2d of the latter Rabî; Al Moktader's adherents giving out every-where, that he died a natural death.
Al Mortadi, at the time of his tragical exit, is said to have been about 49 or 50 years of
the ringleaders were soon after seized, and brought to condign punishment, and all commotions appeased, both there and in every other part of the empire. As for Al Hosein Ebn Hamdân, though he had been the chief author of the late revolt, and the principal fomenter of all the disturbances consequent thereupon, the Khalîf, at his brother Ibrahim's intercession, did not only pardon him, but likewise made him a present of a sumptuous vest, and conferred upon him likewise the government of Komm and Kâshân. This year, there fell such an immense quantity of snow, in one day, at Baghdâd, that it was four feet deep in every part of the district of that metropolis; which before had never been known in the memory of man. This was followed by a most severe frost; during which the cold was <sup>e</sup> so intense, that it destroyed most of the palm-trees and vegetables in the territory of Bagh- dâd. Nay, not only water, vinegar, and all other liquors, but likewise eggs of every kind, were frozen up by it, and rendered unfit for use. It appears from Eutyckius, that Abu Abd'allah Al Moktaseb Bi'llah defeated the Khalîf of Kairwân's forces, and drove the family of Al Aglab from thence, the present year; upon which, Abu Nasr, or Nasser, Ziyâdat'allah Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Ibrahim Ebn Ahmed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ibrahim Ebn Al Aglab, the head of that family, fled into Egypt, where he arrived in the month of Ramadân, and from thence retired to Al Ramla, in which city he spent the remainder of his days. Abu Abd'allah Al
Moktaseb, having thus, by the expulsion of the Aglabites, made himself master of Kairwân, placed Abu Mohammed Obeid'allah, one of Ali's descendants, upon the throne there; and <sup>f</sup> obliged all the subjects of that Khalîfat to take an oath of fidelity to him. This revolution in Africa occasioned an insurrection of the Sicilian Moslems, under the conduct of Abu'l Fawâres, against Ebn Ziyâj, whom they forced to abandon Sicily, the first of April, 909, and to make the best of his way to Africa. It must be remembered here, that the unfortunate prince Al Mortadi Ebn Al Mo'tazz was esteemed by his contemporaries for his wise sayings, his even temper and tranquillity of mind, his love of divine knowledge, and his fine poetical compositions; and that some of his verses have been preserved Abu Jaafar
Al Tabari <sup>d</sup>.

Al Mohdi,
the Khalif of Kairwân, extends his conquests.

THE following year, being the 297th of the Hejra, Isa Ebn Mohammed Al Nîsberi, Al a Moktader's governor of Egypt, died the 10th of Sbaabân, at Al Fostât; and, as soon as the news of his death arrived at court, the Khalif sent Yakîn Al Harari to preside over that province in his stead. Abu'l Kasem Jonaid Ebn Mohammed Al Sûfi, the famous Imâm of the Sûfi's, died the present year. About this time, Leo was constituted patriarch of Jerusalem, and sat seventeen years in that see. This year, Abu Mohammed Obeid'allah, the founder of the dynasty of the Fâtemites, assumed the surname of Al Mohdi, and greatly extended his conquests in Africa. Nay, he visited the Aglabite territories in Sicily, and exacted an oath of allegiance of the Moslems settled there. He also put himself at the head of the grandees, whom he convoked soon after his arrival in the island, and assisted at their deliberations.
Whilst he resided in Sicily, Al Isa, the prince, or regulus of Sejelmessa, who had refused to b recognize his authority, was brought before him, and put to death by his order. After he had spent forty days in this part of his dominions, he returned to Africa. He likewise caused an exact account to be taken of all his subjects properties and effects, during his residence at Rakada, or Rakkada, the seat of the later princes of the house of Al Aglab, and sent officers to collect the tribute demanded of them. At the same time, he dispatched governors into all the western provinces constituting the Khalifat of Kairwân; and in particular Al Hasan Ebn Ahmed into Sicily. Though Abu Mohammed Obeid'allah assumed the surname of Mohdi, or director of the faithful, yet the Moslems believe, that this title is properly applicable to none but the twelfth Imâm, who is to make his appearance at the end of the world <sup>c</sup>.

Authors not agreed about the origin of
Al Mohdi.

IN the 298th year of the Hejra, Al Mohdi took upon himself the title, or appellation, of emperor of the faithful, and gave out that he was descended, in a right line, from Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb and Fâtema, the daughter of Mohammed. For which reason, the Arab writers call him and his descendants Fâtemites; though some of them have handed down to us a far different account of this usurper's origin, as will hereafter be more particularly observed. He was born, as some will have it, at Salamiyah, or, as others with more probability believe, in Irâk, about the 269th year of the Hejra; and built a city, from him denominated Al Mohdia, wherein he afterwards fixed his residence, the present year. Before the conclusion of it, according to Eutychius, he likewise put to death Abu Abd'allah Al Moh- taseb, his general; but for what crime this punishment was inflicted on him, we have not d been by that annalist informed <sup>f</sup>.

He continues victorious over the house of
Al Aglab.

THE next year, being the 299th of the Hejra, the Khalif Al Moktader having been offended by Ali Ebn Mohammed Al Farât, removed him from the post of Visir. This happened in the month of Dhu'lhajja; soon after which, the Khalif threw him into prison, and appointed Ali Ebn Mohammed (or rather Abu Ali Mohammed) Ebn Obeid'allah Ebn Yahya Ebn Khâkân to succeed him. This Visir was surnamed Dakka Sedrabo, that is, the person beating his breast, because he always appeared in that attitude whenever any petition was put up to him. Al
Moktader was now wholly governed by his women and eunuchs. Abu'l Hasan Mohammed
Ebn Ahmed, commonly called Ebn Kisan, who was extremely well versed both in the grammar taught at Cûfa, and in that which prevailed at Basra, and Ishak Ebn Honain, a cele- e brated physician, died the present year. About this time, the Moslems, under the command of Dâmîân, the Emîr of Tyre, and Leo of Tripoli, with a fleet of 300 ships, committed dreadful ravages on the coasts, and in the islands, of the Ægean sea, and utterly defeated the Greek navy in a sea-fight near the island of Samos; Himerius himself, the Greek admiral, having with much difficulty escaped to Mitylene. The famous Lacapenus was at that time governor of Samos; but he could afford Himerius no considerable assistance in this naval engagement. Al Mohdi continued victorious over the partizans of the house of Al Aglab, throughout the whole course of the present year <sup>g</sup>.

His forces un-

mand of Hab-

Egypt.

THE following year, being the 300th of the Hejra, Habbasab, one of Al Mohdi's generals, overthrew the Khalif's forces in the neighbourhood of Barka, and made himself f master of that city. After the reduction of Barka, then extremely populous, situated between Tripoli and Egypt, Habbasab marched directly to Alexandria, defeated another of the Khalif's armies, drawn up in order of battle to cover the place, and then entered the town without opposition. One of his detachments likewise reduced Al Fayûm, taken particular notice of by Abu'l feda, and Al Bahasa. Al Mohdi, receiving advice of the great

- a success that had attended his arms, sent a strong reinforcement, commanded by his son Abu'l Kâsem, to the victorious troops that had in a manner conquered Egypt. Al Moktader also, being informed of what had happened, dispatched Al Kâsem Ebn Samâ, with a body of auxiliary troops, to reinforce his army in Egypt, and to drive the rebels out of the western provinces; who, upon his arrival at Al Fizab, or Al Fiza, was joined by great numbers of the Khalîf's subjects, that flocked to him from all parts. Al Moktader's army, therefore, in Egypt, after the junction of the forces commanded by Takîn (or, according to Eutychius, Takîn) Al Harari, the governor of that province, and Al Kâsem Ebn Samâ, consisted of an hundred thousand effective men. Habbasab, having been acquainted that the Khalîf's troops were in motion, advanced at the head of his army to give them battle, and
- b at last came up with them in the island denominated by the Arabs Ard Al Khamsîn. Here he attacked them with unparalleled bravery, notwithstanding their force was much superior to his; but the approach of the night obliged the generals on both sides to sound a retreat. The action, therefore, was by no means decisive, though extremely bloody. Takîn and Al Kâsem having lost in it 20,000 men, and Habbasab 10,000. The latter, however, durst not renew the fight the next morning, but stole off in the night, and found himself obliged to return home; so that the Khalîf's troops remained masters of the field of battle, and, in effect, gained a victory, as they forced the enemy to abandon Egypt. The great church
- c at Alexandria, called by the Arabs Al Kaisâria, or Cæsarea, that had formerly been a pagan temple, erected in honour of Saturn by the famous Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, was set on fire the third of Shawâl; though it does not appear from Eutychius, who mentions this accident, that it was then intirely consumed. The same year, died Abd'allah Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Thâber and Abd'allah Ebn Al Mondar Ebn Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmân, of the house of Ommiyah, who swayed the Moslem sceptre in Spain. The former of these was a brave experienced general, of consummate skill in the art of war, who had distinguished himself in many actions of éclat; and the latter was succeeded by his brother Abd'alrahmân Ebn Al Mondar Ebn Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmân, who, according to Abu Jaasar Al Tabari, first assumed the title of emperor of the faithful in Spain. Abu'lfeda styles this prince the lord, or
- d Emîr, of Andalusia, and calls him Abd'allah Ebn Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmân Ebn Heshâm. He also relates, that this Abd'alrahmân was forty-two years of age at the time of his death; that he was grey-eyed, of a middle stature, with a reddish beard, which he dyed black, and of a fair complexion; that he reigned almost six years, and had eleven sons, one of whom, named Mohammed Al Ma'sûl, he caused to be put to death, for some crime he had been guilty of; and that he was succeeded by Abd'alrahmân, this prince's son. We are assured also by Roderic of Toledo, that this Abd'alrahmân was the son of Mohammed, Abd'allah Ebn Al Mondar's son, and consequently his predecessor's grandson; that he was twenty-three years of age when his grandfather died; and that he governed the Moslems in Spain about fifty years<sup>b</sup>.
- e THE next year, being the 301st of the Hejra, Abu Sa'id Al Hamâni, the Karmatian general, who made an irruption into Yamâma, and took Hajr and Al Absâ, in the reign of the Khalîf Al Mo'taded, was assassinated by one of his domestics in a bath, and succeeded in the command of the Karmatian forces by his son Sa'id. The new general, immediately after his election to that high post, ordered the flesh of the assassin, who murdered his father, to be torn off with pincers, till he expired. The Khalîf Al Moktader, being offended at the conduct of Abu Ali Mohammed Ebn Obeid'allah Ebn Yahya Ebn Khâkan, his Vîsir, deprived him of his office, and advanced to the sublime post of prime minister Ali Ebn Al Jarâb in his room. Abmed Ebn Ismael Al Sammâni was killed by his guards, the 22d of the latter Jomâda, and buried in the city of Bokhâra. This year, being the seventh of Al Moktader's reign, Abuna Gabriel was constituted patriarch of Alexandria, according to some Christian writers followed by Al Makîn, and sat in that see eleven years. These authors likewise relate, that Kosmâ, or Cosmas, was made patriarch of the Jacobites there about the same time, and presided over those of that communion twelve years. About this time, died Al Kâdi Abu Abd'allah Mohammed Ebn Abmed Al Mocri Al Thakîfi, and Mohammed Ebn Yahya Ebn Nabada, the author of the Chronicon of Esfahân. Amrân, the Moslem prince of Al Khams, was murdered at Palermo, January 27th, and Korhab appointed Emîr, May 18th, the present year<sup>i</sup>.
- f THE following year, being the 302d of the Hejra, Habbasab, or Habasab, returned with a numerous army of *Magrebian*s, or western Arabs, into Egypt, and possessed himself of

He also defeated a body of the Khalif's forces, commanded by Munes, or a Munas, and killed 7000 of them upon the spot; though the remainder found means to throw themselves into the city of Alexandria, that had been abandoned by the Magrebian troops. Soon after, Munes deprived Takîn of the government of Egypt; and Dacâ Al A'war was sent from Baghdâd to succeed him. Korhab, or as he is sometimes called Ebn Korhab, fitted out a fleet that destroyed a squadron of ships sent by Al Mohdi to the coast of Sicily, under the conduct of Abu Khazîr, his admiral, who was killed in the action, according to the Cambridge Chronicon, this year <sup>k</sup>.

A rebellion ex- IN the 303d year of the Hejra, beginning July 17th, 915, Hosein Ebn Hamdân rebelled tinguished in against the Khalif in Mesopotamia, defeated an army sent against him, under the command Mesopotamia. of Al Ratek the Visir, took all their baggage, and even threatened the imperial city of Baghdâd itself. But he was at last overthrown by Munas, or Munes, the eunuch, the best general Al Moktader had; who took him and his son Abd'akwabâb prisoners, and conducted them under an escorte, upon a camel, with oblong caps, or turbants, upon their heads, and vests of red hair-cloth on their bodies, through Al Marâsel, to Baghdâd; where, immediately after their arrival, they were thrown into prison. This year, as it should seem, the Moslems made an irruption into the imperial territories, under the conduct of Damiân, Emîr of Tyre, and attacked a fortress called Strobelon; which they would undoubtedly have taken, had not Damiân been surprized by death whilst he was carrying on the siege. According to Abu'lfeda, the Greeks likewise penetrated almost as far as the borders of Mesopotamia, and afterwards retired into their own dominions, with many prisoners, and a vast quantity <sup>c</sup> of spoil, the present year. Soon after which, Abu Ali Mohammed Ebn Abd'akwabâb, the Motazalite, and Abu Abd'alrahmân Ahmed Ebn Ali Shoaib Al Naisawi, one of the authors of the book of traditions, departed this life; and the latter of them, who died at Mecca, was buried between the mounts Al Safa and Al Merwâ. However, the empress Zoe, who had taken upon her the administration, in order to employ the whole strength of the empire against the Bulgarians, sent Joannes Rademus and Michael Toxaras, as her ambassadors, to the Khalif's court, to conclude a peace with that prince. These probably were the embassadors said by some of the Arab historians to have arrived from Constantinople at Baghdâd, in the 304th, and by others in the 305th, year of the Hejra, and to have been received by the Khalif Al Moktader with the utmost magnificence. The terms of the pacification being <sup>d</sup> settled, and the treaty signed, the imperial ministers, who had been treated with uncommon marks of distinction at the Moslem court, returned home. About the same time Melîb, the Armenian, invaded the Moslem territories, advanced as far as Mara'sh, plundered all the neighbouring district, and carried off with him a vast number of prisoners. Ebn Korhab, the Emîr of the Moslem conquests in Sicily, lost a considerable fleet, that he had fitted out against the Christians, this year <sup>e</sup>.

THE next year, being the 304th of the Hejra, the Khalif removed Ali Ebn Mohammed Ebn Al Hosein Ebn Al Farât from the office of Visir, sent him a second time to prison, after he had filled the post of prime minister about a year, and appointed Hamed Ebn Al Abbâs to succeed him. It must be remembered here, that Ali had been dismissed from the afore- <sup>e</sup> said employment in the 299th year of the Hejra, and succeeded by Abu Ali Mohammed Ebn Obeid'allah Ebn Yahya Ebn Khâkân, who incurred Al Moktader's displeasure in 301. Upon which, Ali Ebn Al Jarâb was advanced to the dignity of Visir, and deprived of his sublime office by the Khalif in 303. After which, Ali Ebn Mohammed Ebn Al Hosein Ebn Al Farât held a second time the reins of the empire about a year. The Sicilian Moslems deposed Ebn Korhab in the month of July, and sent him back to Africa, where he and his son afterwards died. Abu Sa'id Al Daif arrived likewise in Sicily, with a large body of troops from Africa, in order to bring the Sicilians back to a sense of their duty, the 15th of August, the present year. About the same time, died Yusef Ebn Al Hosein Ebn Al Râzi, and Al Hosein, one of Ali's descendants, who had expelled the Sammâniâns out of Tabrestân, in the year of the <sup>f</sup> Hejra 301<sup>m</sup>.

THE following year, being the 305th of the Hejra, commencing June 24th, 917, the Greek emperor sent an embassy to the Moslem court, in order to settle with the Khalif's ministers a truce, or cessation of arms, and a ransom of prisoners. The two ambassadors had first an audience of the Visir, and afterwards of the Khalif. The first of these treated them with great marks of distinction, being most richly dressed; and the latter received them sitting on his throne, and surrounded by his guards, with the utmost pomp and magnificence. He also agreed to the emperor's demands, and sent Munes, one of his most expe-

- a rience generals, to conduct the cartel for the redemption of prisoners on the part of the Moslems, and gave him 120,000 dinârs to redeem the Khalîf's subjects that had been carried into captivity by the Greeks. Ebn Shobnah writes, that the imperial embassadors arrived at Baghdâd the preceding year; that the Khalîf's palace was adorned on this occasion with the most valuable furniture belonging to it, and all sorts of arms disposed in a proper manner; that his guards were ranged in order of battle, to the number of 160,000 men, and received their pay out of a golden purse; that 40,000 white eunuchs and 30,000 black ones, together with 700 ushers, or door-keepers, appeared upon the avenues and at the gates of the palace; that an infinite number of vessels upon the Tigris presented themselves to their view, and made a most brilliant appearance; that the palace was hung within and without with
- b 12,000 pieces of silk, 500 brocados, and 12,500 pieces of rich tapestry of admirable workmanship, and almost inestimable value; that, in the middle of the great saloon, there was exhibited a tree of massive gold, which had eighteen principal branches, on which there fluttered a great number of little birds, made likewise of gold and silver, that warbled their notes with most delightful harmony; and that the Greek embassadors beheld these scenes of grandeur with prodigious admiration. About the same time, Abu'l Hîjâ, with his brethren and domestics, was delivered out of prison, where, by Al Moktader's order, he had been confined. The Sicilian Moslems discovering no inclination to submit to Abu Sa'id Al Daif, he entered the port of Palermo with his fleet, landed a body of troops there, and laid siege to the town. The Sicilians, however, having made an alliance with Ebn Ali Wârâ Al Saari,
- c and been reinforced by him, defended the city with great bravery till the 12th of March, tho' they laboured under such a scarcity of provisions, that an ounce of salt was sold for two taries, or tarens. But, notwithstanding this vigorous resistance, the troops in garison found themselves obliged to capitulate then, and to open their gates to the victors, after they had granted them their lives, and the secure possession of all their properties and effects <sup>a</sup>.

NOTHING material happened in the Arab empire during the course of the 306th year of the Hejra; at least nothing material has been mentioned as then happening there, by the best Moslem historians. This year, died the celebrated Imâm, Abu'l Abbâs Ahmed Ebn Soraib, a follower of Al Shâfe'i, and Al Kâdi Mohammed Ebn Hayyan Al Dhobbi, commonly called Al Waki, a famous Moslem historian. The Khalîf of Kairwân's forces, and his fleet, returned home, in the month of September, after they had made one Sâlem Emîr, or viceroy of the d Moslem conquests in Sicily. Some of that Khalîf's ships of war, with a body of land-forces on board, also surprized the city of Reggio in Calabria, towards the conclusion of the present year <sup>o</sup>.

- In the 307th year of the Hejra, Abu'l Kâsem, son of the first Fâtemite Khalîf of Kairwân, or, as he is called by the Cambridge Chronicon, the Soltân of Africa, invaded Egypt with an army of 100,000 men. The Magrebian forces at first met with extraordinary success, and over-ran a very considerable part of that fine country. They made themselves masters of Alexandria, Al Fayûm, Al Baknasa, and the isle of Al Ashmaryîn, and even penetrated into Al Fîzah, where the Khalîf's army, under the command of Munes, had posted itself, in order to oppose them. In the mean time, Al Moktader, having received advice, that the
- e enemy had a strong squadron on the coast of Egypt, off Rasbîd, or Rosetta, consisting of 100 ships, sent a powerful fleet, under the conduct of Thamâl, his admiral, to attack them. Thamâl, in pursuance of his orders, at last came up with the enemy, and fell upon them with such fury, that he either took, sunk, or burnt, almost the whole Magrebian fleet; though his naval force did not consist of above 50 ships. The Sicilian and African prisoners taken by Thamâl in this action were spared; but the others, amounting to about 500 men, were all put to the sword. After the destruction of this fleet, Abu'l Kâsem retired from Alexandria to Al Fayûn, and left in the former of those places only a garison of 300 men; of which Thamâl having been apprized, he in a few days appeared with his fleet before the town, and carried off the remainder of the citizens to an island in the Nile, called the island
- f of Abukair. This he did, in order to prevent Abu'l Kâsem from meeting with any entertainment at Alexandria, in case he should think fit to return thither from Al Fayûm. It appears from Eutychius, that above 200,000 of the miserable inhabitants of that city had perished since the beginning of the campaign. About this time, a period was put to the power of the Edrisites, in the western part of Africa. A truce, or cessation of arms, was concluded between Salem, the Emîr of Sicily, and the people of Taormina, the Tauromenium of the antients, called by the Arabs Tabermîn, a little before the end of this year <sup>p</sup>.

THE 308th year of the Hejra was rendered famous by the intire defeat of the Magrebian army in Egypt. Munes, Al Moktader's general, having come to a resolution to give the enemy battle, quitted his fortified camp in Al Fizab, advanced into the neighbourhood of Al Fayûm, and attacked Abu'l Kâsem's forces with such bravery, that he overthrew them with very great slaughter. He also made himself master of all their baggage, as well as of all the plunder they had acquired. This blow intirely ruined Abu'l Kâsem's affairs in Egypt, and obliged him to fly, with the shattered remains of his army, to Kairwân, in the month of Dhu'lhajja, the present year. As for Munes, he remained about two months in the neighbourhood of Al Fayûm, after the signal victory he had obtained, and then returned to Baghdâd. But, before his departure, he appointed Helâl Ebn Badar to preside over the province of Egypt, that he had wrested out of the enemy's hands <sup>a</sup>.

Al Hallâj executed at Bagh-dâd.

THE next year, being the 309th of the Hejra, beginning May 12th, 921, Abu Mogbitb Al Hosein Ebn Mansûr Al Hallâj was put to death at Baghdâd. This extraordinary person has <sup>b</sup> been considered in different lights by the Moslems; some of them having looked upon him as a sort of divinity, and others as a juggler and impostor. We are told, that, in summer, he could make winter-fruits appear before any number of spectators, and summer-fruits in winter; that, by stretching out his hands in the air, he could make dirhêms fall upon the ground, with this inscription upon them, ALLAH abed, There is but one God; which he called the dirhêms of omnipotence; that he knew every particular transaction in private families; and that he could even penetrate into the most secret recesses of mens minds. A persuasion of such surprising abilities as these could not but gain him a vast number of disciples and followers amongst the vulgar; nor could even several doctors of the law themselves for some time tell what to make of him. Some writers inform us, that he frequently <sup>c</sup> fasted for several days together; and that, when he broke his fast, he only took three mouthfuls of bread, and a little water. With regard to the place of Al Hallâj's nativity, authors are not perfectly agreed; some asserting that he was born at Nisâbûr, others at Merû, others at Al Tâlakân, and others at Al Ray. He came from Khorasân into Irâk, and went from thence to Mecca, where he lived a year in a cave, or, as some will have it, in a place called Al Hejra, which was always open at top. He was seen upon mount Abu Kobais standing with his bare feet on a stone, and his head uncovered, being at the same time in a violent sweat. After his return to Baghdâd, he was much talked of there; many pretending, that the Deity resided in him, nay, that he was God himself. The Visir Hamed <sup>d</sup> having been told, that he had raised several people from the dead, sent for him, in order to interrogate him about his pretensions. Upon his appearance before the Visir, he disclaimed the gift of prophecy, the power of working miracles, and the residence of the Divinity in him; saying, that he had nothing extraordinary in him, and that he worshipped God like other men. Hamed, therefore, must have immediately dismissed him, had not one of his books been produced, wherein he maintained, that “if a Moslem could not go in pilgrimage to Mecca, he ought to perform all the prescribed ceremonies in some convenient room at home, fitted up and set apart for that purpose, on the 9th and 10th of Dhu'lhajja, feed and cloath thirty orphans, and afterwards give each of them seven dirbêms; and that if he did this, he would from thence reap all the benefits and advantages accruing to all Moslems from a performance of the aforesaid pilgrimage.” This position <sup>e</sup> being manifestly repugnant to what has been advanced in the Korân, the doctors of the law unanimously judged Al Hallâj worthy of death; which decision being confirmed by the Khalîf, he was executed in the following manner. First, he received 1000 stripes, without uttering so much as a groan; then one of his hands was cut off, then one of his feet, afterwards the other foot, then the other hand, and, lastly, the fatal stroke was given him, which put an end to his pain. After his execution, his body was burnt, the ashes of it thrown into the Tigris, and his head exposed to public view in the market-place of Baghdâd. The Kâdi who condemned Al Hallâj was Abu Omar, who passed sentence upon him, not only because he endeavoured to propagate a tenet subversive of the Mohammedan faith, but likewise because he fathered so pernicious a notion upon the irreproachable doctor Al Hasan Bakhteri, in none of whose works it was to be found. It appears from some good authors, though he denied this to the Visir, that he was thoroughly infected with the blasphemous opinions of the Sûfis, and even scrupled not to assert, that God had taken up his habitation in him. Abu'l Hosein Ali Ebn Isa, a famous and learned doctor, who disputed with him, found him perfectly illiterate, according to Abu'l Faraj, and reproved him for his great vanity and impiety. Abu'l Hasan Ebn Al Jondi, if we will believe the same historian, saw several of his juggling tricks, and particularly the appearance of a beautiful garden exhibited by him. Some Arabic verses attributed to him, that have been preserved by Al Makîn, seem to point at the union of the divine and human natures in CHRIST; which may have induced some of the Moslems, as we find hinted by Khondemir, to have taken him for a <sup>f</sup> Christian; though, after all, as has been observed by M. D'Herbelot, these verses might only <sup>g</sup>

- a contain certain expressions of the Mohammedan mystical theology, by which the Moslems enthusiasts understood the intimate union of the divinity with the heart of a man detached from the love of worldly things, and transported beyond itself. It may also be farther remarked, that the Shiites have entertained the most extravagant fancies of their Imáms, and applied particularly to Al several things which are said in Scripture of CHRIST; and that most of the other Mohammedan sects are tainted with the same madness; there being found many amongst them, and, amongst the Súfis especially, who pretend to be nearly related to heaven, and boast of strange revelations before the credulous people. “Matters are come to that pass,” says Al Ghazáli, “that some boast of an union with God; and of discoursing familiarly with him, without the interposition of a veil, saying, It hath been thus said to us, and we have thus spoken; affecting to imitate Al Hoséin Al Halláj, who was put to death for some words of this kind uttered by him; he having said, as was proved by credible witnesses, I am the truth; or, Abu Yazíd Al Bastámi, of whom it is related, that he often used the expression, Subháni, i. e. Praise be unto me! But this way of talking is the cause of great mischief amongst the common people; insomuch that husbandmen, neglecting the tillage of their land, have pretended to the like privileges; nature being tickled with discourses of this kind, which furnish men with an excuse for leaving their occupations, under pretence of purifying their souls, and attaining I know not what degrees and conditions. Nor is there any thing to hinder the most stupid fellows from forming the like pretensions, and catching at such expressions: for whenever what they say is denied to be true, they fail not to reply, that our unbelief proceeds from learning and logic; affirming learning to be a veil, and logic the work of the mind: whereas what they tell us appears only within, being discovered by the light of truth. But this is that truth, the sparks whereof have flown into several countries, and occasioned great mischiefs; so that it is more for the advantage of God’s true religion to put to death one of those who utter such things, than to bestow life on ten others.”
- Tajo’ddín Ali Ebn Ahmed Al Baghdádi*, who died in the 674th year of the Hejra, has written the life of Abu Moghib Al Hoséin Ebn Mansúr Al Halláj, of whom we have here been speaking, under the title of Akbbár Al Halláj. Al Ghazáli likewise and Ebn Khalecán have been very prolix on the actions and behaviour of this extraordinary person. M. D’Herbelot, in the account he has given of Al Halláj, truly calls Gayyath Addín Ebn Hamam Addín, surnamed Khondemír, the abbreviator of Mohammed Ebn Emír Khowand Sháb, commonly going under the name of Mirkhond; though, in another place, he wrongly intimates, that Khondemír and Khowand Sháb were the very same person: which falls very little short of a clear and express contradiction<sup>r</sup>.

THE same year in which Al Halláj was executed at Baghdád, that is, the 309th of the Hejra, Yakín Al Harari was deprived of the government of Egypt, and Abu Fánus appointed to succeed him in that post. The new governor did not remain five days in his office, having been deposed within that term, in order to make way for his predecessor Yakín, or Takín. The Khalíf, however, soon removed Yakín, and substituted in his room Helál Ebn Yezíd<sup>s</sup>.

- THE following year, being the 310th of the Hejra, Abu Jaafar Mohammed Ebn Jorair Ebn Morwayad Al Tabari, the author of the history we have for the most part followed here, departed this life at Baghdád. He was an Imám of great piety, as well as of most extensive reading and erudition. The Moslems call his valuable work Al Táríkh Al Tabari, and have it in such high esteem, that they look upon it as the basis and foundation of all their other histories. Ebn Al Jūzi writes, that his history at first consisted of a great number of volumes, and that the copies we now have of it are only an abridgment of a larger work. Ebn Al Sobki relates, that Abu Jaafar Al Tabari having asked his friends whether they could take any pleasure in reading a history of every thing that had happened in the world to the age in which they lived, they made answer, that they should very willingly read such a history, if it could any-where be found: upon which, this author having told them, that he had actually compiled 30,000 leaves upon that subject, they immediately replied, that their whole life-time would not be sufficient to read over so voluminous a work in. Whereupon, Al Tabari assured them, that he would abridge it as much as he could for their use; and this, says Ebn Al Sobki, is the abridgment that still remains in our hands. Ebn Shohnah writes, that this history began with the creation of the world; that Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, who was born in the year of the Hejra 224, was a strenuous defender of the Korán; and that, notwithstanding this, he was looked upon as an heretic, or shite, at Baghdād. The last of which articles is confirmed by Abu'lfeda; who says, he was considered as heterodox by the populace of Baghdād, because he made not the least mention of the famous Abū Ebn Hanbal, in the treatise he wrote upon the controversies of the Fakhs, learned interpreters of the law, or masters of jurisprudence. The Tārīkh of Al Tabari has been translated into Persic by Abu Ali Mohammed Al Yāli, who served some of the Sammāni princes in the capacity of Visir, in the time of Mansūr Ebn Nūb, and the 352d year of the Hijra, according to M. D'Herbelot. The same history has also been translated into Turkish by an uncertain author, and many copies of this version are to be met with amongst the Turks. Abu Mohammed Abd'allah Ebn Mehammed Al Fargāni obliged the world with a continuation of the Tārīkh of Al Tabari, and published it under the title of Selat. Abu'l Hasan Mehammed Ebn Abd'almālec Al Hamadāni, who died in the year of the Hijra 521, has written another supplement, wherein he has brought the history of which we are speaking down to his own times. Abu Jaasar is said by Abu'lfeda to have been born at Amū, or Amel, the capital of Tabarestān, and from thence to have derived the surname of Al Tabari. M. D'Herbelot is inconsistent with himself, when, in one passage of his book, he asserts, that Al Tabari concluded his history with the 300th year of the Hijra, and, in another, that he has preserved the Arabic verses spoken by Al Hallāj at the place of execution, in the year of the Hijra 309. Abu'lfeda relates, that the Tārīkh of Al Tabari concludes with the year of the Hijra 302. However, we are inclined to believe, that our author continued his work, which he began at the creation of the world, to the day of Al Hallāj's execution, if not in a manner to the very time of his own death. Abu'l Abbās Ahmed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Sabl, a doctor of great repute amongst the Sūfis, and Ibrahim Ebn Harūn Al Harrāni, a celebrated physician, died the preceding year. We must beg leave to observe, that an imperfect MS. copy of the Tārīkh of Abu Jaasar Al Tabari, in (A) Arabic, according to Mr. Ockley, has a place assigned it in the Boaleian library at Oxford.

The Karmatians take Basra.

In the 311th year of the Hijra, the Khalif removed Hchil Ebn Tēzid from the government of Egypt, and appointed Ahmed Ebn Keigalag to preside over that province; but he soon made way for Takīn Al Harari, who was again put at the head of the administration there, and continued to govern the Egyptians till the death of Al Moktader. The same year, Abu Thāher Solimān Ebn Abu Sa'id Al Jannābi, who succeeded his brother Sa'id in the command of the Karmatian forces, and pretended to great skill in the occult sciences, penetrated to Basra with an army of 107,000 men, made himself master of that city, put all the inhabitants that fell into his hands to the sword, burnt the great mosque there, and thoroughly plundered every part of the town. However, being apprehensive of a visit from the Khalif's troops, after he had possessed himself of it seventeen days, he thought fit to abandon the place. The Khalif constituted Ali Ebn Ahmed (or Mohammed) Ebn Al Farāt, whom he delivered out of prison for that purpose, in the latter Rabī, the third time, his Vijir. Abu Mohammed Ahmed Ebn Al Jorairi, a doctor held in much esteem amongst the Sūfis, and Ibrahim Ebn Al Sarī Al Zajjāj, a famous grammarian, departed this life the present year. It appears from Eutychius, that the Moslems demolished the Melchite churches of St. Cosmas and St. Cyriacus in Al Ramla, two others in Askalen, Askelon, or Askalūn, and Cæsarea, and another in Tamīs, or Tinnīs, a very antient city of the lower Egypt, which were all afterwards rebuilt by Al Moktader's order, in the latter Jomāda and Rajeb, the present year.

THE next year, being the 312th of the Hijra, Abu Thāher fell in with a caravan of pilgrims, on their return from Mecca to Baghdād, in a place called Al Naker, or Al Nahr, attacked their escorte, commanded by Abu'l Hijl Abd'allah Ebn Hamdān Abu Saifo'ddawla,

As the diacritical points are preserved in this beautiful manuscript, any person tolerably well versed in the Arabic language may, by its assistance, not only oblige the learned world with a much more correct and accurate Latin version of part of Al Makin's abridgment than that of Erpenius, which is a very indifferent one, but likewise with a continuation of that version. For, that part of

Al Makin's history, translated into Latin by Erpenius, and published after his death by Gilius, ends with the life of Al Mostadher (2) the twenty-eighth Khalif of the house of Al Abbās, who died in the year of the Hijra 512; whereas the Oxford MS. goes on to his son and successor Al Mostafsed, and the rest of the Khalifs of that line, and ends with Rucno'ddin, or Rucno'ddin, the fourth of the Babrite, or Turkish (3), Mamluks, who died in the year of the Hijra 676, twenty years after the Tartars had made themselves masters of Baghdād.

- a the governor of Al Mawfel, Diār Rabia, Dinawār, a city about forty parasangs off Cufa, and at the same distance from Marāga in Adherbijān, and Al Jebel in the Persian frith. intirely defeated it, and cut to pieces the greatest part of the Khalif's troops of which it was composed. As for Abu'l Hijā himself, he was taken prisoner in the action, which was extremely sharp, together with a very considerable number of his soldiers and officers, who all fell into the enemies hands. After which, the rebels plundered the caravan, and carried off most of the women and children belonging to it into captivity. The success Abu Thāber had met with on this occasion excited him to advance to Ilejr, where he took post, without any obstruction from the Khalif's forces, which were too weak to oppose him. Most of the people that he permitted to make their escape died of thirst, and the fatigue they were
- b obliged to sustain, in the desert. The Karmatian general, who was at this time not above nineteen years of age, is said by the authors followed by Al Makin to have made 2220 men and fifty women prisoners, and to have acquired a booty of 1,000,000 dinārs in money, together with all the rich effects and provisions of the caravan, worth at least as much more, in this successful expedition <sup>w</sup>.

THE same year, Abu Thāber released Abu'l Hijā, and many of the other prisoners, and Abu Thāber sent an ambassador to Baghdād. The purport of this minister's commission was to desire Al <sup>finds an em- b. ssador to</sup> Moktader to grant his master the sovereignty, or at least to make him perpetual governor, of Basra and Abwāz; but this the Khalif peremptorily refused. However, as he was not able to reduce the rebels, he treated the ambassador with marks of distinction, and made

c him a present of a sumptuous vest. About this time, an insurrection happened at Damascus, wherein the Moslems demolished the large and beautiful church of St. Mary there, on which there had been laid out 200,000 dinārs, and carried off all the sacred vessels, and other ornaments belonging to it, of almost inestimable value. They also plundered several monasteries and nunneries in that district, and particularly a nunnery near St. Mary's church. They likewise pulled down the church of the Nestorians, and many of those belonging to the Melchites, in the month of Rajeb. The Khalif put Ali Ebn Mohammed Ebn Al Farāt, his Visir, and his son Al Mobfen, to death, in the former Rabī, this year <sup>x</sup>.

- THE following year, being the 313th of the Hejra, Abu Thāber advanced to Cufa, pillaged <sup>He takes and</sup> the town, put many of the inhabitants to the sword, and carried most of the rest into cap- <sup>pillages Cufa.</sup> tivity. He likewise took away with him from thence 4000 pieces of rich coloured stuff, or silk, and 3000 camels, besides several other effects that he found in the place, of very considerable value. About the same time, Abd'allah Ebn Mohammed Ebn Khākān, Al Moktader's Visir, wrote to Ali Ebn Isa at Mecca, ordering him to repair immediately to Egypt, and inquire into the state of affairs there. Ali, therefore, in pursuance of the order he had received, entered Egypt in the beginning of Rajeb, and exacted tribute of all the religious settled in the lower part of that tract going under the name of Al Sa'id, particularly of the bishops and monks in the monastery of Mīnā. Many of these religious, thus harrassed, retired to Irāk, and carried their complaints to the Khalif; who thereupon commanded the tribute that had been imposed upon them to be remitted, removed the Visir from his office,
- e and appointed Abu'l Abbās Ahmed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Ahmed Al Khasīb to succeed him. About this time, Nicolas, patriarch of Constantinople, died, when he had occupied that see thirty-three years; after whom came one Stephen, an eunuch, who presided over the church there three years. A surprising meteor, resembling an exceeding large and bright star, or comet, of a very red colour, moving with great velocity from north to east, followed by a terrible flame, and attended with an infinite number of sparks issuing from it, about thirty lances long, and two broad, appeared in Egypt, on the fifth of the latter Rabī, at sun-set. This meteor exhibited the appearance of a fiery serpent, and continued about three hours; after which, not the faintest traces of it were to be seen. About this time died Ali Ebn Mohammed Ebn Basfar Al Zahed, and Abd'allah Ebn Mohammed Ebn Abd'alaziz Al Bagawi,
- f in the 102d year of his age. We must not forget to observe, that a general, called Mas'ūd, came from Africa, and took the castle, or citadel, of St. Agatha, in the kingdom of Naples, either this or the preceding year <sup>y</sup>.

IN the 314th year of the Hejra, the Greeks penetrated to Malatīa, the Melitene of the <sup>The Greeks</sup> antients, situated on the borders of Armenia and Cappadocia, took it, slew part of the inha- <sup>take Malatīa.</sup> bitants, and made slaves of the rest. However, after they had remained there a few days, they found themselves obliged to abandon the town. The Khalif Al Moktader commanded Tufes Ebn Abu'l Sāj, the governor of Adherbijān, to advance to Wāset against the Karmatians, the present year. About the same time, Nasir, or Nasr Ebn Ahmed Al Sammāni possessed himself of the city of Ray; but soon after, being seized with a violent illness, he found himself obliged to relinquish that place. The Cambridge Chronicle seems to intimate, that the chamberlain (B) of the Khalif of Kairwân came over this year from Africa, and reduced the fortress of Barisâna; but the particulars of this action are not known <sup>a</sup>.

The Christians gain several advantages over the Moslems according to the Greek writers.

SOME of the Greek authors relate, that the Moslems invaded the Christian territories several years before the aforesaid irruption of the Greeks into Cappadocia; and that Jokannes Caranus, the imperial general in those parts, not only drove them back with great loss, but, having besieged and taken the city of Melitene, reduced the adjoining country to the form of a province. This, however, was perhaps the expedition placed in the 314th year of the Hijra by Al Makin. It seems to appear likewise from Zonaras, that, about this time, Leo of Thessali, the Moslem admiral, was defeated by the Christian fleet near the island of Lemnos, and had almost all his seamen cut to pieces, and his ships sunk. But we find not the least mention of these transactions in any of the Arab historians <sup>b</sup>.

The Karmatians make a farther progress in Irâk.

THE next year, being the 315th year of the Hijra, commencing March 8th, 927, Abu Thâker Ebn Abu Sa'id, the Karmatian general, overthrew the Khalif's forces with very great slaughter, and took Iusef Ebn Abu'l Nabij, who commanded them, prisoner. He also possessed himself of the city of Cûsa, and even threatened to penetrate to Baghdâd; which struck the inhabitants of that capital with the utmost terror and consternation. However, Al Mektader, taking 300,000 dinârs out of the treasury, and being supplied by his mother with 500,000 more, raised a body of 10,000 horse, which he sent to act against the Karmatians. But the general who commanded them, not having been able to bring the enemy to a battle, returned, after the conclusion of the campaign, to Baghdâd, without having effected any thing considerable. This so animated Abu Thâker, that he advanced at the head of his forces to Anbâr; though he soon thought fit to retire, without having attempted any thing against that place. As Anbâr was not above ten parasangs off Baghdâd, the Khalif considered the Karmatian's retreat from thence, in the present situation of affairs, as equivalent to a victory; and therefore, with his mother and Visir, returned God thanks, in the most solemn manner, for it; and even, by way of farther acknowledgement to the great arbiter of events, distributed amongst the poor of Baghdâd no less than fifty thousand dinârs. After which, Abu Thâker appeared with his army before Hit, or Hait, a strong castle on the northern bank of the Euphrates, about twenty-one parasangs above Anbâr, bordering on the deserts of Al Jazira; but, upon taking a view of it, he retired with precipitation to Hajr. This so raised the drooping spirits of the Khalif, that he ordered a second thanksgiving for so auspicious an event, and a farther distribution of 100,000 dirhems amongst the poor. Abu'lfeda relates, that Abu Thâker, with a small body of troops, consisting of only 800 foot and 700 horse, overthrew Iusef Ebn Abu'l Sâj, probably the Iusef Ebn Abu'l Nabâj of Al Makin, at the head of 40,000 men, when he thought himself so sure of conquering, that he had ordered his secretary to write a letter to the Khalif, notifying the victory his troops had gained over the rebels, before the beginning of the action. In this battle, Iusef Ebn Abu'l Sâj himself was taken prisoner, and afterwards put to the sword, by the Karmatian general; who found an immense quantity of wealth at Cûsa, defeated another of the Khalif's armies commanded by Mûnes, ravaged all that part of Irâk bordering upon the Euphrates, and, after having thrown the citizens of Baghdâd into an inexpressible panic, returned laden with spoil to Hajr. Abd'ahrahmân Al Nasr Ebn Mohammed, of the house of Ommiyah, the Emîr, or lord, of Andalusia, or rather the Khalif of Spain, according to the same author, reduced also the city of Tolêdo, and destroyed a considerable part of it, after it had rebelled against him, and sustained a very long siege, the present year. Mûnes, one of Al Mektader's best officers, having entertained a suspicion of that prince's sinister intentions towards him, refused for some time to go to the imperial palace, at the Khalif's invitation; but at last he was prevailed upon to repair thither, and kiss his hand, by the troops that promised to support him. About this time, according to the Cambridge Chronicle, the Hâjeb, or chamberlain, of the Khalif of Kairwân agreed upon a sort of truce, or cessation <sup>c</sup> <sup>d</sup> <sup>e</sup> <sup>f</sup>

(B) In the Latin version of the Cambridge Chronicle, the Arabic word Hajr is taken for the proper name of the Khalif of Kairwân, who at that time was Abu Mohammed Obeid'allah, surnamed Al Mubdi, the founder of the dynasty of the Fâtimites; whereas that word generally denotes the chamberlain, or some such officer, of the Khalifs, in the Arab historians. That it is not a proper name in the passage here referred to, appears from hence, that neither the Khalif of Kairwân reigning at this time, nor any of either his predecessors or successors, ever went by such a name. 'Tis surprising that the very learned Sig. Giuseppe Simoni Assimani, a Maronite, and professor of Arabic in the college at Rome (1), who revised and corrected this Latin version, should have suffered such a mistake to escape him.

a of arms, with the Calabrians, after he had taken from them Aura, or Ura, the Uria of the antients, denominated by the moderns Oria; upon which, they left in his hands as hostages, says the writer of that Chronicon, Leo, bishop of Sicily, and the prefect, or governor, of Calabria. This affair being terminated, the Khalif of Kairwân dispatched Al Bolzami and Al Kolshâni, two grandees of his court, called by that writer Sbeikhs, with Ebn Sâlem into Sicily, to mulct the inhabitants of that island for some disturbances that had happened. We must not forget to observe, that the Deylamites, the first of whose princes was Wasbûdân Ebn Al Marzabân, who fixed his residence at Shabrestân, began to make a figure, according to Al Makîn, in the year we are now upon <sup>b</sup>.

b THE following year, being the 316th of the Hejra, Abu Thâber seized upon the town of Rahaba, and put a vast number of the inhabitants to the sword. He also made himself master of Karkîsia, or Karkîsyâ, in Mesopotamia, and afterwards retired to Hajr, in Yamâma, where he chose for the most part to reside. Here he built a palace, to which he gave the name of Hajra. The Khalif dismissed first from his employment Abu'l Abbâs Ebn Al Khasîb, his Visir, and afterwards Ali Ebn Isa Ebn Al Jarâb, his successor; substituting in the room of the latter Abu Ali Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ali, commonly called Ebn Meklâb, about the middle of the latter Rabî. After the reduction of Rahaba, Abu Thâber, according to Abu'lfeda, made himself master of Al Rakka upon the Euphrates, and treated the inhabitants of that place in a cruel manner. He likewise penetrated to Sinjâr, the Singara of Ptolemy, a considerable city of Mesopotamia, in the province of Diyâr Rabîa, which immediately submitted to him. About the same time, if we will believe this author, Mardawîj Ebn Zayyâr, or, as he is called by Al Makîn, Mardawîj Ebn Ramâz, the Deylamite, having cut off Asfâr Ebn Shîrîyeh, his master, who had seized upon Jorjân the preceding year, subdued Kazwîn, Ray, Hamadân, Dînowar, or Al Deinawar, Kenkewar, Yazdejerd, Komm, Kâshân, Esfahân, Jarbâlkân, and the whole mountainous region of Tabrestân. The dynasty, therefore, of the Deylamites, according to Abu'lfeda, commenced the present year. The same historian farther relates, that Johannes Curcuas, who presided over all the imperial territories extending from the Hellespont to the frontiers of the Moslem empire, obliged the citizens of Akhlat and Bedlis in Armenia, at this time, to erect crosses upon the spots, in their respective principal mosques, on which the Christian pulpits had formerly stood; and that the Hâfedh Abu Awanah Takûb Ebn Ishak Ebn Ibrahim Al Esfarayni, author of a Masnad, or body of traditions, drawn up after the manner, and upon the principles, of the Sabîh of Moslem Ebn Al Hejâj, died in the year of the Hejra 316. A body of the Khalif of Kairwân's forces, under the conduct of an African general, named Sâin, took the fortrefs of Zarnîna, or rather Zarnîwa, in the month of Sbaabân, according to the Cambridge Chronicon, this year <sup>c</sup>.

IN the 317th year of the Hejra, beginning February 14th; 929, Al Moktader was constrained to abdicate the Khalifat. Mûnes, his general, who was greatly esteemed by the soldiery, having conceived an invincible aversion to him, entered the imperial palace, with a party of twelve horse, the 14th of Al Moharram, plundered it, and carried Al Moktader, together with his mother, aunt, children, wives, and concubines, prisoners to his own house. The next day, the soldiers saluted Mohammed Ebn Al Mota'ded, surnamed Al Kâber, Khalif. Upon his elevation to the Moslem throne, the new Khalif made Ebn Ali Ebn Moklâb his Visir, and Bârûk, or, as others will have it, Abd'allah Abu'l Hija Ebn Hamdân Abu Saifo'ddawla, his chamberlain. When the imperial palace was pillaged, Al Moktader's mother lost six hundred thousand dinârs. After the late Khalif's abdication, letters were sent into all the provinces, notifying Al Kâber's accession; and people entertained hopes, that the tranquillity of the empire would be settled upon a lasting foundation. But, the third day of the new Khalif's reign, the troops assembled in a tumultuous manner, with great insolence demanded their pay, cut in pieces Bârûk the captain of the guards, drove Ebn Moklâb the Visir out of the palace, and placed Al Moktader again upon the throne. That prince no sooner found himself repossessed of the Khalifat, than he sent for his brother Al Kâler, forgave him what was past, expressed an inviolable attachment to his interests, recalled Ebn Moklâb, and ordered him to communicate to the provinces the news of this last revolution. According to Eutychius, not only Mûnes, but likewise Abu'l Hija, Nâzûk, and other principal commanders, contributed to the abdication of Al Moktader, and assisted at the inauguration of Al Kâber. However, continues the same author, the body of infantry, called Al Mosâfia, two days after that event happened, slew Nâzûk and Abu'l Hija, and brought about the restoration of Al Moktader, without any considerable effusion of human blood. Abu'lfeda relates, that Al Moktader had rendered himself extremely disagreeable to the army, by permitting his women and eunuchs to govern with an absolute sway, and to fleece his subjects in a most arbitrary and oppressive manner. He also seems to intimate, that Munes, contrary to his own inclination, was forced by the soldiery to concur with them in the violent measures which were at this time pursued; but that afterwards this general not a little contributed to Al Moktader's re-establishment upon the Moslem throne. About this time, Egypt was infested with such swarms of locusts, that they darkened the air, intercepted the solar rays, and devoured every thing green in all those parts of that fruitful country which they so traversed. The same year, Abu Thâber, the Karmatian general, and prince of Hajr, entered Mecca with his troops, killed a great number of the pilgrims, on the 8th of Dhu'lhajja, in the temple there, demolished the small building and cupola that covered the well Zemzem, and plundered the Caaba. Nay, we are told by Abu'lfeda, that they filled this well with the carcases of those going in procession round the Caaba, whom they had massacred, amongst which was that of Ebn Al Mokalleb, the prince of Mecca, himself. Among other profanations by them offered to that celebrated place of the Moslem worship, they took away the famous black stone, of which we have formerly given our readers a full and ample description, and could not be prevailed upon for love or money to restore it, though one Tabcam, in the name of the people of Mecca, offered no less than 5000 dinârs for it. However, after they had kept it above twenty-two years, seeing they could not thereby draw the pilgrims from Mecca, they sent it back from Hajr of their own accord; at the same time bantering its devotees, by telling them it was not the true stone: but, as it is said, it was proved to be no counterfeit, by its peculiar quality of swimming on water. The Karmatian, however, who was sent to take away the golden spout, or pipe, that carried the rain-water from the top of the Caaba, broke his neck in the attempt. We must beg leave to remark here, that Euty chius calls Abu Thâber Abu Sa'id Al Jannâbi; though he has been more properly named Solimân Ebn Abu Sa'id Al Jannâbi by Abu'lfeda. The first of those authors also informs us, that, before he advanced to Mecca, he incamped in a place going under the name of Tel Arkûf, at a small distance from Baghdâd, and had several engagements with the Khalif's forces; after which, he stopped up all the wells between that capital and Mecca, not permitting the caravans of pilgrims to pass to the latter of those cities, either from Mesopotamia or Khorasân. The same writer also relates, that this Al Jannâbi butchered an infinite number of people both within and without the Caaba, as also in the streets of Mecca; insomuch that the well Zemzem was filled with dead bodies, as well as most of the houses of the town, and the ways, valleys, desert places, &c. in the neighbourhood of it. And, to crown all these misfortunes, if any person escaped out of the city with his effects, he was cut to pieces and plundered by the Arabs themselves, who were assembled in considerable numbers not far from the gates for that purpose. Some, however, fled to Jodda, and made their escape by sea. As the Karmatian general carried off all the rich furniture and utensils, both of gold and silver, belonging to the temple of Mecca, held in so high a veneration amongst the Mohammedans, except the spout, or pipe, above-mentioned, the spoil he acquired on this occasion was of immense value; besides which, he met with a considerable booty in the town; as he gave the place up to his troops to be plundered for seven days together. After he had committed these depredations, he abandoned Mecca, and ordered the pillage that had fallen into his hands to be conducted to Hajr. It has been already observed, that Abu Thâber, to whom Euty chius gives also the name of Solimân Ebn Al Hasan, attacked the city of Basra with his forces in the year of the Hejra 311, carried it by assault, put a great number of the inhabitants to the sword, and then of his own accord retired. All which events the last-mentioned author seems to place either in the 312th or 313th year of the Hejra; tho' it must be owned, that he so huddles things together there, that we cannot safely depend upon him in this particular. This year a very sharp debate was carried on at Baghdâd between Abu Becr Al Merûzi, or Al Marwazi, the principal of those who were followers of the famous Abmed Ebn Hanbal, with his adherents, and the members of another sect in that metropolis, concerning the true import and meaning of the controverted passage in the Korân. The former inferred from it, that God would hereafter place Mohammed upon the throne of his glory near himself; and the latter only, that God would accept of the prophet's intercession for all true Moslems, at the day of judgment. The minds of the disputants on both sides were so agitated and inflamed on this occasion, that many murders were committed; insomuch that the city of Baghdâd, for some months, became a scene of blood and confusion. About the same time, Nasr Ebn Abmed Ebn Nasr Al Basri, a famous poet, surnamed Al Khabazarzi, departed this life. It ought to be here remarked, that Eyliâ, or Elias, the patriarch of Antioch, died on Saturday, the 13th of the latter Jomâda, after he had sat in the patriarchal see there twenty-eight years. It appears from the Cambridge Chronicle, that Sâin, one of the Khalif of Kair-wân's generals, made an incursion into Italy, and penetrated as far as the

- a the borders of the Lower Lombardy, that is, Campania, the dutchy of Benevento, and the neighbouring tract, with a body of the Magrebian troops, took many prisoners, and agreed upon another cessation of arms with the Calabrians, the present year <sup>a</sup>.

THE next year, being the 318th of the Hejra, Solimân Ebn Al Hasan Ebn Mokballed was appointed by the Khalif his Visir. That prince likewise, about the same time, conferred upon Nasero'adawla Ebn Abu'l Hijâ Ebn Hâmdân the government of Amed, Diyâr Becr, and Mayâ-farkîn, or Mayyâfârakîn; ordering him to pay annually a certain sum of money into the exchequer at Baghdâd. About the same time, the body of infantry, termed by the Arabs Al Mesûfia, being grown extremely insolent since the restoration of the Khalif Al Moktader, were first expelled the city of Baghdâd, then that of Wâset, and at last totally dispersed.

- b This year, Sûn made an incursion into Calabria, took a fortress in that province, named Termûlab, and carried with him into the Moslem territories 12,000 prisoners, without having sustained any considerable loss <sup>c</sup>.

THE following year, being the 319th of the Hejra, Obeid'allah Ebn Mohammed was nominated by the Khalif to act in the capacity of Visir. He did not, however, continue long in that sublime post to which he had been advanced; Al Hasan Ebn Al Kasem Ebn Obeid'allah Ebn Solimân Ebn Wakeb being appointed to succeed him, before the end of the month Shawâl. About the same time, died Abu Becr Al Nakrawânî, a noted poet, who wrote some celebrated elegiacal verses upon a cat; being, at the time of his death, about an hundred years old. This year, Mardawij Ebn Ramâz, or Mardawij Ebn Zayyâr, the king, or prince, of Delam, made himself master of Hamadân, violated the women there, and put 30,000 of the inhabitants to sword. The Khalif, receiving advice of the havoc he had made, sent an army, under the command of Harûn Ebn Arab, to reduce him; of which the Deylamite being informed, he advanced at the head of his troops to attack the Khalif's forces, engaged them between Hamadân and Kazwîn, and overthrew them with incredible slaughter; after which, he ravaged the country as far as Hokwân, and the frontiers of Irâk, and at last carried the city of Esfabân by assault. But of the great exploits of Mardawij Ebn Ramâz, as well as those of the other Deylamite princes, our readers may expect a particular and circumstantial account in another part of this work, to which it will more properly belong <sup>f</sup>.

- c In the 320th year of the Hejra, commencing Jan. 13th, 932, the Khalif Al Moktader was killed at Baghdâd; of which tragical event some of the oriental historians have handed down to us the following particulars. Mûnes, the Khalif's general, having entertained a suspicion that his master intended to throw him into prison, left the court in disgust, and retired to Al Mawfel. Soon after his arrival there, he assembled a body of troops, with which he marched directly to Baghdâd. Al Moktader, having received advice of his approach, led his forces out of the city, in order to give him battle. A fierce conflict ensued between the contending parties, in which the Khalif was killed, stript, and had his head cut off by one of the barbarians in Munes's army, who immediately brought it to his general. The body of that prince was buried by a Curd, who passed by it soon after the end of the action, and saw it lie naked, and exposed to public view, on the field of battle. In this manner fell Al Moktader, on Wednesday the 28th of Shawâl, soon after he had completed the 38th year of his age, and had sat upon the Moslem throne about twenty-five years. He conferred upon Abu Fadl Ebn Jaasar Ebn Al Farât the office of Visir, towards the close of the latter Rabî. After his death, his head was carried on a lance, in the midst of a vast crowd of people, through the principal streets of Baghdâd <sup>g</sup>.

- d This affair, however, has been more particularly related by Abu'lfeda and Abu'l Faraj. Those authors write, that Mûnes, being greatly displeased with the Khalif's conduct, retired towards Al Mawfel; of which that prince being apprized, he wrote to the head of the family of Hamdân, who then governed the people there, and commanded him to oppose the rebel with all his forces. The prince, or Emir, of Al Mawfel, continue they, having received the Khalif's letter, immediately drew together an army of 30,000 men, with which he advanced towards Mûnes, then attended by only a body of 800 horse, in order to attack him. That general, however, having probably been reinforced by some fresh troops, waited for him upon a spot of ground at a small distance from Al Mawfel, engaged him with great bravery, and at last put him to flight; after which, he made himself master of all the towns and villages, as well as all the riches, belonging to the descendants of Hamdân. This victory had such an effect upon the minds of the soldiery, that a very considerable a part of the Khalif's forces cantoned in Syria and Egypt, and even at Baghdád itself, deserted him, and joined Munes; which enabled that rebel, after nine months preparations at Al Mawfel, to march through Tecrit, at the head of a numerous army to Baghdád. Upon his arrival there, he pitched his tents before the gate Al Sammasia, and immediately invested the town. Al Moktader's friends, finding their master and themselves upon the point of being closely besieged, persuaded the Khalif to go out of the city in Mohammed's cloke, preceded by the doctors of the law, and other persons of note, with copies of the Koran open in their hands, in order to shew himself to the rebels; imagining that they would be touched with reverence of his person at so august a sight, and be thereby the more readily induced to return to a sense of their duty. At first he stood upon an eminence, with his attendants, and seemed unwilling to fight; but the signal at last, by his order, being given, a general action immediately ensued. The flower of his troops having already deserted him, Al Moktader's men were soon put to flight, and he himself, with several of the run-aways, endeavouring to return into the town, surrounded by a party of the Magrebian soldiers; one of whom, after a profusion of the most opprobrious language, ran him through with his sword, and the others instantly dispatched him. After which, they cut off his head, and carried it upon a pole to the rebel general, then at Al Rasbidia, who had not been present in the action. The *Magrebian*s likewise intirely stripped him, not leaving him so much as his breeches on to cover those parts which nature commands us to conceal, and buried him in the place where he fell. When Al Moktader's head was brought to Munes, at the sight of it, he is said to have wept, and to have discovered signs of the most unfeigned grief. He also posted a guard upon the imperial palace, in order to prevent its being plundered, and commanded his men not to offer the least violence to any of the late Khalif's family or domestics there <sup>b</sup>.

The circumstance attending Al Moktader's death, according to Mirkhond.

MIRKHOND, the Persian historian, has given us a long detail of the circumstances attending this prince's death, most of which have been omitted by the Arab writers. Al Moktader, according to this author, having caused his brother Al Káber to be imprisoned, for the part he had acted in the late revolt, which terminated in the elevation of that prince to the Moslem throne, though he sat not above two days thereon, resolved at last to put him to death. Al Káber, having been informed of his brother's design, engaged a Barbarian, or Magrebian, officer, who was an excellent horseman, and entirely at his devotion, to assassinate him. In order to effect this with the greater facility, he procured the assistance of Munes, the eunuch, who was not a little disaffected to the Khalif, and who consequently came into Al Káber's measures with uncommon alacrity. The Magrebian charged with his commission, sought all opportunities of killing the Khalif; and one day observing him seated in the place called Shammasia, to see some feats at arms and horse-races there, he presented himself before him, in order to be permitted to partake of those diversions; when he performed his part with so much dexterity and address, that the Khalif made him repeat it several times, and commanded his guards to retire, that he might have a more free and extensive view in the place. The Magrebian thinking that a proper opportunity of carrying his design into execution now offered itself, immediately turned his horse towards the Khalif, rushed upon him in an instant, and thrust his lance into his breast with such force, that he fell from his seat, and soon after died of the wound he then received. As soon as the officer had given the blow, he rode directly to the prison where Al Káber was confined, in order to deliver him from thence, and put him in possession of the Khalifat. But passing through the market-place, he met an ass loaded with thorns, which the people of that country make use of to heat their ovens. At this the Magrebian's horse took fright, and ran with his master against a butcher's stall with such violence, that a hook belonging thereto stuck fast in his chin; the horse being by this means deprived of his rider, and leaving him hanging thereon. Soon after this accident, a party of the Khalif's guards, who observed what had been done, and closely pursued the assassin, came up with him, made a fire of the thorns on the ass's back, and burnt him therein. This is the account of Al Moktader's death preserved by Mirkhond, an author of good repute; though, for several reasons, we prefer, as more consonant to truth, the relation of that tragical event handed down to us by the Arab historians cited here <sup>c</sup>.

His person, character, and the great officers of his court.

WITH regard to his person, Al Moktader had a round handsome face, and the hair of his head, as well as his beard, was exceeding gray; though he had but just completed the 38th year of his age at the time of his death. He had likewise very good eyes, was of a middle stature, and a fair complexion. As to his disposition, he was religious, delighted in giving of alms, and fasted often. He had many secretaries, governors of provinces and cities, and counsellors, or Vizirs. Some of the women and girls belonging to the court had

- a a great hand in the administration, particularly a girl named Yamek, who was so thoroughly versed in all the weightier points of the Mohammedan law, that both the judges in the determination of criminal causes, and the doctors of the law, in the most important decisions, found themselves obliged to have recourse to her for her assistance. Al Moktader reigned twenty-five years, and created twelve principal counsellors, or Vizirs; which cannot, with truth, be said of any of his predecessors. From the time that the Karmatians took Mecca, and carried from thence the celebrated black stone, to the day of this prince's death, not a single Moslem performed the pilgrimage thither; which never happened in the reign of any of the preceding Khalifs. Al Moktader is said to have given away to the poor, and appropriated to charitable uses, above seventy millions of dinârs. He also distributed a vast number of
- b jewels, a considerable quantity of the most precious unguents, and above sixty-three grains of civet, amongst the girls that he kept for his own use, and some other favourites that had an uncommon ascendant over him. His Vizirs, or Wazîrs, some of whom had different names, or surnames, assigned them by authors, were Abu'l Abbâs Ebn Al Hasan, Ali Ebn Ahmed (or Mohammed) sometimes called Abu'l Hasan Ebn Al Farât, Abu'l Kasem Al Khâkânî, Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Khâkân, Ali Ebn Isa Ebn Al Jarâh, Abu Ali Ebn Mohammed, generally known by the name of Ebn Moklab, Ahmed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Ahmed Al Khasib, Solimân Ebn Al Hasan Ebn Al Mokballed, Obeid'allah Ebn Mokammed Al Kadâni, Al Hasan Ebn Al Kasem Ebn Obeid'allah Ebn Solimân Ebn Wakeb, Abu'l Fadl Ebn Jaasar Ebn Al Farât, who received from his mother the denomination of Ebn Kaizarâna,
- c and Al Fadl Ebn Jaasar Ebn Al Karân. The most famous of his judges were Tusef Ebn Yakûb, his son Mohammed, Abd'allah Ebn Abu'l Shawârib, Mohammed Ebn Ahmed Ebn Ishak Al Bahlûl, Omar Ebn Mohammed Ebn Tusef, Al Hasan Ebn Ali, and Omar Ebn Al Hasan Ebn Abu'l Shawârib. His chamberlains were Saws, Al Mo'tâsi's servant, Nasr Al Kasîri, Yakûb Al Mo'tadedi, and Ibrahim Ebn Mohammed Ebn Rayek. The inscription of his seal was, Praise be to God, to whom no other being is similar, and who is the creator of all things. That this Khalif, in whose reign the two Greek emperors Leo and Alexander died, was a prince of great justice and moderation, appears from his remission of the tribute imposed upon the Christian bishops and religious in Egypt by Ali Ebn Isa, his governor of that country, as well as from several other things we have related of him here; and
- d particularly for the order he issued to obliged his Moslem subjects to rebuild several churches in Egypt that his officers had demolished there. We are told by Al Makin, that a Greek pinnacle, sent by the emperor for intelligence, and to discover a proper place for landing a body of troops in, was taken by some of the Moslem guard-ships stationed in the mouths of the Nile, in the 314th year of the Hejra; and that a man, who by his dress seemed to be a person of distinction, was found therein, who confessed that he was a spy, and declared that the Christians would soon appear on the coast with a fleet of 1000 sail, and a numerous body of land-forces on board, in order to make a descent. This news not a little alarmed the governor of Egypt, who there upon sent for a reinforcement from Syria, and took all other necessary precautions to render abortive the enemy's designs. But the Christian fleet
- e being soon after shattered by a storm, in which were lost above 300 ships, and all the soldiers and sailors therein drowned; the Greeks found themselves obliged to make the best of their way to their own ports, and thereby delivered the Egyptians, whom they had struck with such terror, from all apprehensions of the invasion with which they had been threatened<sup>k</sup>.

- BEFORE we conclude what we have to say of the Khalif Al Moktader, it may not be im-<sup>Several</sup>proper to touch upon the characters of two of the most learned men that flourished in his<sup>learned men</sup> reign. The famous Mohammed Ebn Jâber Ebn Senân Abu Abd'allah Al Harrânî, a native<sup>flourished in</sup> of Batân, or Battân, one of the dependencies of Harrân, and thence commonly called<sup>Al Mokta-</sup> Al Battânî, or Albatânî, so justly celebrated for the accurate astronomical observations he made at Araçta, or Aracca, that is, the city of Al Rakka upon the Euphrates, departed this
- f life in the 317th year of the Hejra. This great mathematician and philosopher professed the Sabian religion, chiefly prevailed at the time of his birth in the city of Harrân, and all the adjacent tract belonging to it. And for this reason it is, that his tables are called the Sabian Tables. He began his observations in the year of the Hejra 264, and concluded them in 306; though the fixed stars are placed therein, according to their situation, in the year 299. In the 320th year of the Hejra, according to Abu'l Faraj, died Abu Becr Mohammed Ebn Zacaria, Zechariah, or Zacarias Al Râzi, a person extremely well versed in all kinds of ancient learning, though he excelled most in physic, and is stiled the phoenix of his age by that writer. However, Osaiba, the author of The Lives of the Physicians, quotes two writers; one of whom places the death of Al Râzi either about the year of the Hejra 290,
- g or a little after 300, and the other in the year 310, or 320. Abu'l feda relates, that he died in the 311th, and Ebn Shohnab fixes his decease in the 310th, year of the Moslem æra. In a his younger years, he gave himself up intirely to music; but afterwards applied himself to the study of philosophy, with so much success, that he made a wonderful progress in every branch of it, and composed a great number of books both upon physical and philosophical subjects. He first presided over the hospital either at Ray or Jondisâbâr, and afterwards for a time over that at Baghdâd. He got webs, or pearls, in his eyes, by immoderate eating of beans; and, towards the close of his life, lost both of them by cataracts. He would not permit an oculist, who came to couch his eyes, to touch them with his instrument, because he could not tell of how many tunics, or little coats, the eye did consist; saying at the same time, that he was not so desirous of recovering his sight, as he had already seen enough of the world to make him nauseate and abhor it. We are told, that b he spent almost all his time in writing, either adversaria or fair copies of books. He is said to have penned twelve pieces in alchymy, wherein he asserted the possibility of a transmutation of metals, and to have understood astrology, or the art of predicting future events, from the aspects and configurations of the celestial bodies. He was liberal, munificent and courteous to all men; as likewise extremely charitable to the poor, when they were sick, not only giving them his advice as a physician, but supplying all their wants in the most ample manner. Some authors relate, that he was one of the principal physicians of the Khalif Al Moktader, and at the top of his profession when he was not above forty years of age. This is the doctor who, in the schools of physic, is commonly called Rhazes, or Rhazis, a corruption of Râzi; which surname he derived from the city of Ray, where he was born. c He has by some been accused of Pyrrhonism, or Scepticism, because he did not sufficiently understand Aristotle in many particulars. M. D'Herbelot thinks, that he was the author of the piece, intituled, Ekbtiarat Al Najûmiab, which has been abridged in Persic under the title of Hakkam Alâlamîab, in the French king's library, N° 890, and not Fakbro'ddîn Ebn Omar, as some suppose. Al Râzi also wrote a comment upon Aristotle's treatise περί ερμηνείας, De Interpretatione, called by the Arabs Bari Arminias, that is, the book of interpretation, according to some of the eastern writers. Al Ca'bi is reported to have told Al Râzi, that he demonstrated himself to be ignorant of physic, but his not being able to cure his own eyes; to be a stranger to astrology, by not foreseeing the misfortunes that came upon him; and to be unacquainted with alchymy, by his poverty. But all the facts here mentioned are looked d upon as envious falsehoods by Abu'l Faraj. Bakhtîshûa Ebn Yahya and Senân Ebn Thâbet Ebn Korra, the Sabian, and father of Thâbet Ebn Senân, the historian, were likewise two of the Khalif Al Moktader's principal physicians, and in great favour with that prince. But of the latter of these we shall give a more particular account, at the conclusion of our history of the following reign <sup>1</sup>.

succeeds his brother Al Moktader in
the Khalifat.

AFTER the death of Al Moktader, Mînes proposed that prince's son Abu'l Abbâs, who e had been his pupil, to the grandees of the court for Khalif. But, in opposition to this motion, Ishak Al Nûbakhti thought fit to observe, that the late Khalif Al Moktader had been intirely under the management and direction of his mother, his aunt, and his servants; that they should be again in the same situation, if a minor ascended the throne; and that therefore, as they now wanted a prince who could govern both himself and his subjects, they ought to cast their eyes upon Abu Mansûr Mohammed Ebn Al Mo'taded, surnamed Al Kâher Bi'llab, as the most proper person of the house of Al Abbâs to be advanced to the Khalifat. Mînes, for some time, shewed himself extremely averse to the elevation of Al Kâher, as being perfectly well acquainted with the cruel and avaritious disposition of that prince. However, he suffered himself at last to be persuaded by Al Nûbakhti to concur with the other great officers in f the election of the new Khalif, assisted at his inauguration, and took the oath of allegiance to him. Al Kâher, upon his accession, conferred the office of Hâjeb, that is, chamberlain, or master of his chamber, upon Balik, ordered all Al Moktader's children and domestics to be brought before him, and caused them to be tortured, to force them to confess what sums of money his predecessor had distributed amongst them. He also put his mother-in-law Sha'b, or Sa'f, to the rack, to oblige her to produce the remainder of her money and her jewels, after she had deposited in his hands all her rich cloaths, her most valuable furniture, and other effects, and 100,000 dinârs. However, she persisted in the declaration she had made upon oath, that she had nothing remaining in her possession of any real value; though

two

- a two persons asserting the contrary appeared as evidences against her. This so enraged the Khalif, that he commanded her, though then very infirm, and even sick of the dropsy, to be stript naked, and hung up by the heels, with her head downwards, in such a posture that her urine ran all over her body. Nay, he is said not only to have exposed to public view, but even to have kicked or beaten, those parts that modesty enjoins her sex to conceal. In the midst of her tortures, however, she had courage enough to tell him that she was his mother, and to reproach him with ingratitude; she having once diverted the Khalif Al Moktader, her son, from his resolution, when he had determined to put him to death. This monster's own mother, according to some of the eastern writers, was named Fenân. He is said to have made Mohammed Ebn Al Kasem his Visir, soon after he took the government upon him; though several authors make Ebn Moklah his first Visir. Two persons of distinction, called Ebn Salma and Ebn Aldâya, were sent by the Khalif of Kairwân this year to Sicily, to mulct the Moslems, probably for the depredations they committed in the Christian territories, there. About the same time, died Abu Amru Mohammed Ebn Yusef, the learned Kâdi of Baghdâd, Abu'l Hasan Ebn Saleh, one of the followers of the famous Al Shâfeî, and Abu Noaim Abd'almâlec, a learned and religious Moslem of the same sect. Al Kâber Bi'llah was created Khalif at Baghdâd, the 28th of Shawâl, the present year <sup>m</sup>.

- THE following year, being the 321st of the Hejra, beginning Jan. 1st, 933, and not the 322d of that æra, as we find advanced by M. D'Herbelot, Al Kâber gave the charge of Visir <sup>He cuts off several of his great men.</sup> to the famous Ebn Moklah (if he had not that honourable post conferred upon him the preceding year); who, according to an eastern writer of good repute, first formed the beautiful character now used by the Arabs from the Cûfic. About this time, the Khalif commanded Abmed Ebn Al Mo'tasî to be confined in a house by himself, where he soon pined away with grief. Sba'b, or Sa'f, Al Moktader's mother, died this year, after Al Kâber had thoroughly pillaged her, stript her of all her possessions, and treated her in a most barbarous manner. This and other instances of his avarice and cruelty so alienated the affections of Balik, Ali his son, Ebn Moklah, Abmed Ebn Zairac, and Mûnes, who was at first inclined to favour Abmed Abu'l Abbâs Ebn Al Moktader's pretensions to the Khalifat, from Al Kâber, that they conspired against him, and came to a resolution to depose him. But Tdharîf, or Tbarîf, Al Saccari having found means to convey himself into the palace in women's cloaths, notwithstanding the conspirators had possessed themselves of all the avenues to it, and discovered the whole affair to the Khalif; that prince, thus opportunely informed of the design, by the assistance of the dependents of Yusef Ebn Abu'l Sâj, got Balik, his son Ali, Mûnes, and Abmed Ebn Zairac, into his hands, and ordered all their heads to be cut off. As for Ebn Moklah, he made his escape to Wâset, where he kept himself concealed, till, by the assistance of Simâ, the chief of the Turkish militia, or rather the leader of the partisans of Yusef Ebn Abu'l Sâj, he brought about a new revolution at the Moslem court. He was succeeded by Abu Jaasar Mohammed Ebn Al Kasem in the sublime post of Visir, or Wazir. The same year, Yakîn Al Harari the governor of Egypt, whom we have already so often mentioned, died at Mesr, or Al Fostât, and was succeeded by Abu Becr Mohammed Ebn Ta'j, or Tagaj, surnamed Al Akhsîd, as he was soon after by Abmed Ebn Keigalag. Ebn Salma and Ebn Aldâya returned this year to Africa, but met with a very indifferent reception from the Khalif of Kairwân; that prince being highly displeased with their conduct. About this time, according to <sup>c</sup> Abu'lfeda, commenced the dynasty of the Bûiyans, which was founded by one Bûiya, a Deylamite, of royal extraction, surnamed Abu Shajâ'. Abu Becr Mohammed Ebn Al Hosein, commonly known by the name or surname of Ebn Doreidi, a celebrated poet and philologer, who wrote a great number of learned books, but was too much given to wine and music, died in the month of Sbaabân, being at the time of his death about ninety-eight years of age; as did likewise, on the same day, Abu Hassem Ebn Ali, a Môtazalite sophist, or metaphysician, born in the year of the Hejra 247. Both of these learned men were interred in the common burying-place at Baghdâd. Mohammed Ebn Yusef Al Farbâri, so denominated from Farbâr, a town in the territory of Bokbâra, placed by some of the eastern writers at a small distance from the Oxus, where he was born in the year of the Hejra 231, (who <sup>f</sup> had been acquainted with the famous Al Bokbâri) and Abu Jaasar Abmed Ebn Mohammed Al Azdi, the principal of the sect of Abu Hanîfa in Egypt, two men of great piety and erudition, also departed this life, the present year. We must not forget to observe, that the Khalif Al Kâber commanded the heads of the conspirators to be exposed to public view in all the principal streets of Baghdâd <sup>n</sup>.

deposed.

THE next year, being the 322d of the Hejra, commencing December 22d, 953, Ebn a Mohlab excited the Sâjians and Hajarians to a revolt against Al Kâher, by insinuating to their leaders, that he had broken his word with regard to Balik, his son Ali, Abmed Ebn Zairac, and Mûnes, whom he had put to death, after he had promised them their lives, and taken them under his protection; that he had served many other persons of transcendent merit in the same manner; and that, in short, they themselves had great reason to be afraid of his perfidious conduct. Secret conferences were likewise held between him and Simâ, general of the Sâjians and Hajarians, who had all the Turkish militia at his devotion; whom he sometimes visited in women's cloaths, sometimes in the habit of a common beggar, and at others in that of a blind mendicant; wherein the plan of operations relative to the deposition of the Khalîf was gradually settled and adjusted. Not content with this, he also b made a present to Simâ's astrologer of 200 dinârs, and another to his interpreter of dreams, engaging them thereby to assist him in the execution of this plan, and by their predictions and interpretations to inspire the general himself with such sentiments as might impel him to act with vigour in the affair. The former of these, therefore, assured Simâ, that his horoscope indicated a violent death to him on the part of the Khalîf; and the latter, that his dreams pointed out to him the same thing. This so alarmed and terrified Simâ, that, in his defence, he resolved to drive Al Kâher from the throne as soon as possible; of which the Vîfir being informed, he sent Salâm, or Salâma, the Khalîf's chamberlain, and Ijâ, his physician, to apprize him of the danger he was in. But Al Kâher having spent the greatest part of the night in carousing, and being then asleep, upon their arrival at the palace, they c were not permitted to see him. Soon after this, the Sâjians and Hajarians forced their way into the palace, possessed themselves of every apartment there, and by the noise they made on this occasion awaked him; when, being struck with terror, he hid himself under the roof, or covering, of a bagnio, where he for a short time lay concealed. But the rebels soon discovered him, took him from thence, deprived him of the use of his eyes with a red-hot iron, threw him into prison, and plundered the city of Baghdâd. A little before his deposition, he put to death Ishak Al Nûbakhti, who had been so instrumental in his elevation to the Khalîfat. Al Kâher was deposed on Wednesday, the sixth of the former Jomâda, after he had reigned about one year and seven months, and was succeeded by Abmed Abu'l Abbâs Ebn Al Mektader, surnamed Al Râdi, or Al Râdi Bi'llah; he himself, d according to Al Makîn, having been the first who saluted him Khalîf. However, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, he could not be prevailed upon, by any means whatsoever, to abdicate, before proper witnesses, the Khalîfat. Al Kâher remained in a state of confinement till the latter Rabî, in the year of the Hejra 333, when the Khalîf Al Motaki released him, and sent him home. After he had recovered his liberty, he was reduced to such extreme poverty, that he found himself obliged to beg on Fridays at the door of the great mosque in Baghdâd. The son of Abu Mûsa Al Hâshemi once gave him a thousand dirbêms there.
Another person, according to Al Makîn, at a certain time saw him in rags addressing himself to the people, that resorted to the mosque of Al Mansûr, in the following terms: "Remember him who was formerly your Khalîf, and is now reduced to the necessity of asking e
"you for alms." He died either in the 338th, or the 339th, year of the Hejra; being then, according to some, fifty-two, or, as others will have it, fifty-five years of age; and was buried in the house of Ebn Thâber. He was rash, cruel, avaritious, and a person of a very iniquitous conduct. His Wazîrs, or Vîfirs, were Ebn Mektab, Mohammed Ebn Al Kasem Ebn Abd'allah, Abmed Ebn Abd'allah Al Hafani, and Isa; and his chamberlains Ba'ik, Ali Ebn Balik, and Salâmi Al Tolûni. The first day of his reign was Thursday, and the last Wednesday; but the inscription of his seal has not been handed down to us. We must beg leave to remark here, that Sa'id Ebn Batrîk, a native of Al Fostât, was constituted patriarch of Alexandria, and received the name of Anba Eutychius, the 8th of Safar, the preceding year, being the 321st of the Hejra, and the first of Al Kâher's reign. He was at first a f physician, of the Melchite persuasion, and, at the time of his promotion, about sixty years of age °.

Some farther
particulars
relating to
Al Kâher.

MIRKHOND writes, that the Khalîf Al Kâher owed his advancement to Mûnes, the eunuch, who had been his master and governor; but that he soon forgot his obligations to that general, and ordered him, together with many other servants of the Khalîf Al Mektader, to be put to death. The same author likewise observes, that Mûnes was a person of an extraordinary size; and that his head was so large, that his brains, being taken out of it, after it had been cut off, weighed six pounds of Baghdâd; upon which, a Persian poet thought fit to remark, that the larger any head was, the greater number of infirmities it was subject to.
After this execution, continues that historian, the dependents and domestics of Yusef Ebn Abu'l g

- a Sāj, excited a tumult in Baghdād, during which, they talked of placing Abu Ahmed Ebn Al Moṭaṣṭ upon the Moslem throne. Al Kāber, having been apprized of this, commanded Abu Ahmed to be brought before him; and, after having sent him into the Harem, the most retired part of the palace where the women lived, ordered him to be nailed with four nails to the wall of one of the chambers there; tho', according to some of the Arab writers; this poor prince was only immured in that place, where he soon after ended his days. Whilst Abu Ahmed was in this wretched situation, Al Kāber sent for one Abu Yahya, a man of the gown, who was very rich, and told him he wanted 200,000 dinārs. Abu Yahya declared to the Khalīf, that he was not able to supply him with so large a sum. Upon which, that prince said to him, " Abu Ahmed, who is within here, assured me that you
- b " could, and he would advise you to do it." Abu Yahya then stepped into the room where Abu Ahmed was confined, and, to his infinite surprize, saw him there nailed to the wall. This sight struck him with such terror, that he immediately furnished Al Kāber with the money demanded of him, and by that means maintained himself in the possession of all his dignities and employments <sup>p</sup>.

- AMONGST the learned men that flourished in Al Kāber's reign, we may rank Isa, already Isa Ebn Yusef mentioned here, and Senān Ebn Thābet Ebn Korrah, likewise taken notice of above, both Ebn Al Attār of them physicians to that prince. Isa was the son of one Yusef, who went under the and Senān Ebn name of Ebn Al Attār, and was a great favourite of the Khalīf he had the honour to serve. Thābet Ebn Such confidence did Al Kāber repose in Isa, that he frequently sent by him his commands Korra were to the Viṣīr, and imparted many secrets to him. As for Senān Ebn Thābet, he likewise had Al Kāber's good interest with his master; but was not so much esteemed by him as was Isa Ebn Yusef principal phy- sicians.
- c Ebn Al Attār. However, the Khalīf, being now and then not a little pleased with his conversation, pressed him to embrace Mohammedism; which, for some time, he stily refused, but, as he was extremely afraid of Al Kāber's ferocity, he at last agreed to do it, and accordingly professed himself a Moslem. After which, he continued, during a certain term, in the Khalīf's service; but being often terrified by Al Kāber's commands, he found himself obliged to fly into Khorasān, from whence he afterwards returned to Baghdād, where he died in the 331st year of the Hejra. The following merry story has been told of this Senān by Abu'l Faraj. The Khalīf once commanded him to examine the physicians of
- d Baghdād, in order to discover their abilities, and see whether or no they imposed upon his subjects. Soon after he had received this order, a person of gravity and a very good aspect, exceedingly well dressed, came to him to be examined; upon which Senān, having first paid his respects to him in a proper manner, desired him to give a specimen of his skill in physic, and to name the doctor who had instructed him in that art. Upon this, the other took a paper out of his sleeve, that contained in it a certain number of ḍinārs, laid it down before Senān, and frankly told him that he knew nothing at all of the matter; that he could neither write nor read; but that, as he supported himself and his family by his practice, he begged he would not ruin him, by telling the truth to the Khalīf. To this
- e Senān, who could not forbear laughing at what he heard, replied, that he would not expose him, provided he would promise never to attend a patient whose distemper he did not understand, and that he would neither prescribe phlebotomy nor cathartics in any cases but such as were perfectly well known to him. This the doctor readily agreed to, saying at the same time, that he never ventured beyond oxymel and a julep, when he prescribed to his patients; and immediately left him. The next day, a young physician of an agreeable mien, in a neat and decent dress, waited upon Senān, who asked him to whom he was obliged for his knowledge in the art he professed. The other answered, " To my father." " Who is your
- f " father?" said Senān. " The doctor," replied the young man, " who was with you yesterday." " A noble doctor, truly!" replied Senān. " Do you," continued he, " prescribe " in the same manner? " Always," returned the young physician. " Take care then," said Senān, " that you go on as you have done, improve in your profession as your father " does, that he may have a son as like him" (rather than go in peace, as Dr. Pococke has translated the original Arabic here) " as possible." All Senān's works are held in great esteem. He was an excellent astronomer, and one who had rendered himself famous throughout the east. Nor is this to be wondered at, since the Sabians, whose religion both he and his ancestors professed, cultivated the study of astronomy above any other sect or nation, during the period we are now upon. As the Khalīf Al Kāber obliged Senān to embrace Mohammedism, he has been surnamed Al Kāberi, or the Kāberian, by some of the oriental writers <sup>q</sup>.

S E C T. XLII.

Al Râdi is proclaimed
Khalif.

AFTER the deposition of Al Kâber, his nephew Abu'l Abbas Ahmed Ebn Al Moklab,<sup>a</sup> surnamed Al Râdi, or Al Râdi Billah, was taken out of the prison where he had been confined by that prince, and placed upon the Moslem throne. This happened on the sixth of the former Jomâda, the very day his uncle was deposed. The new Khalif's mother was denominated Takim, according to Al Makin. Upon his accession, Ali Ebn Isa petitioned for the post of Visir; but the new Khalif told him, that Ebn Moklab was better qualified to take upon himself the government of the empire, in the present critical situation of affairs; and therefore he conferred upon him that arduous charge. About this time, Mardawij Ebn Ramâz, the king, or prince, of Deylam, overthrew, in several engagements, Mu'bin Ebn Mâli, took Amid, or Amed, in Mesopotamia, and possessed himself of the province of Tabrestân; Motabar Atâ'a, the Khalif's lieutenant of Khorasân, not being able to make head<sup>b</sup> against him there. It appears from some of the eastern writers, that Al Kâber, a little before he was deposed, granted to Mardawij Ebn Ramâz the inv. s. ture or Ray, Markab, Zanzân, and Abbar, upon condition that he restored the city of Esfahân, from whence his brother Wasmakîn had driven the famous Ali Abu'l Hasan Amado'ddawla Ebn Bâha a little before. With this proposal Mardawij immediately closed, and recalled his brother from Esfahân; but soon after receiving advice, that Al Kâber was deposed, and his nephew Al Râdi advanced to the Khalifat, he sent Wasmakîn with all possible expedition to seize again upon that city, and to secure to himself, without delay, the possession of Ray, Abwâz, and Fârs. He also concluded a treaty of peace with Amado'ddawla Ebn Bâha; the principal article of which was, that each party should keep possession of what he had made himself master of. It<sup>c</sup> appears from Abu'lfeda, that Joannes Curcuas, the imperial general, invaded the Moslem territories, and took the city of Malatia, after a long and obstinate siege, the first day of the latter Jomâda, the present year. After the surrender of the place, he sent a detachment of his troops to conduct the Moslem garison, that had made a brave defence, to one of the Khalif's fortresses, and reduced a large extent of territory to the obedience of the emperor. Abu Mohammed Obeid'allah Al Mobdi, the first of the Fâtemite Khalifs of Kairwân, died the 14th of the former Rabî, after he had reigned twenty-four years, three months, and six days, the present year; being at the time of his death (C) about fifty-three, or, according to Abu'lfeda, sixty-three, years of age. He was succeeded by his son Abu'l Kasem Mohammed, surnamed Al Kayem, who was created Khalif at Al Mobdia, the day his father expired; tho'<sup>d</sup> the Moslems of Sicily, for near six months, heard nothing of this remarkable event. Nay, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, the new Khalif, for reasons of state, concealed his father's death a whole year. About the same time, Abu Ali Mohammed Al Rudbâri and Al Hosein Ebn Abd'allah Al Nassaj (or the weaver), two of the principal Sâfis, as well as Abu Neaim Al Forjâni Al Astarabâdi and Mohammed Ebn Ali Ebn Jaafar Al Kattâni, a celebrated scholar of Al Jonaid, two very learned men, departed this life. We are told by Abu'lfeda and the Cambridge Chronicon, that Abu'l Kasem sent a body of his troops into Italy, that reduced the city of Genoa, and made a descent upon the island of Sardinia, the following year<sup>e</sup>.

BEFORE we conclude our account of the transactions of the year of the Hejra 322, it must be observed, that the famous, or rather infamous, Mohammed Ebn Ali Al Shalmagâni,<sup>e</sup> so denominated from Shalmagân, a town in the territory of Wâset, the place of his nativity, was crucified, together with Ibrahim Ebn Abu Awn, one of his disciples, for the impious opinions he maintained. This impostor held, that as much of the Deity resided in created beings, and particularly men, as their respective capacities would admit; that every human soul passed from one body to another, through an indefinite and indeterminate series of ages; and that Ali was the most excellent of mortals, nay that he was either God himself, or at least a partaker of the divine nature, and extremely like him. Al Shalmagâni, with many

(C) Erpenius, in his Latin version of Al Makin, makes Al Mobdi to have been 53 years old at the time of his decease; whereas, according to the original Arabic, both in the Oxford manuscript, and that which he translated, this prince was only thirty years of age when he died. However, it must be owned, that Al Makin (3), or rather the historian he follows, affirms the founder of the dynasty of the Fâtemites to have been born in the year of the Hejra 269, and consequently to have been about fifty-three years old at the time of his death. Notwithstanding which, Abu'lfeda (4) and Ebn Shab-nab (5) make the 322d year of the Hejra, in which he died to have been coincident with the 63d year of his age.

- a of his followers, kept himself for some time concealed; but at last, in the month of Shawâl, this year, he came out of his lurking-place, and endeavoured to poison the minds of the Khalif's subjects with his impious tenets. Being brought before Ebn Moklab, upon whom Al Râdi, at Simâ's persuasion, had conferred the post of Wazîr, he denied the erroneous opinions laid to his charge; though he owned, that his followers asserted God to have taken up his residence in him. Ebn Moklab, not satisfied with what he alleged in his defence, sent him, for farther examination, to the Khalif; Ibrahim Ebn Abu Awn and Mohammed Ebn Abdûs, two of his disciples, at the same time attending him. Upon the appearance of these impostors before the Khalif, he commanded Ebn Abu Awn and Ebn Abdûs to beat Al Shalmagâni with their fists, though they had not scrupled to attribute divinity to him; which the latter of them, with no small reluctance, did, though the other, instead of doing it, kissed his head and his beard, crying out, "My Supporter, my Lord, and my God!" Al Shalmagâni was then asked, whether he had not a little before denied, that he ever arrogated to himself divine honours? to which he answered in the affirmative, and seemed to blame Ebn Abu Awn for his extravagant conduct. However, being at last, on a certain day, examined by all the great doctors of the law, he was by them judged worthy of death; and, in consequence of the sentence then passed upon him, he was, with Ebn Abu Awn, executed, in the month of Dbu'lkaada, at Baghdâd. After the execution, the bodies of both of them were reduced to ashes, in order to inspire the populace with the greater abhorrence of their impiety. For a more particular account of all the blasphemous tenets propagated by Al Shalmagâni and his followers, as well as the Sâfis, who were at least nearly related to them, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to the authors cited here<sup>r</sup>.

- In the year of the Hejra 323, beginning December 11th, 934, Mardawij Ebn Ramâz, or The principal Ebn Zayyâr, the king of Deylam, who had made himself master of Al Jebâl, and other adjacent provinces, was assassinated by some of the Turks in his service, and succeeded by his brother Wafmakîn, Washmakîn, or Washmakîr. But of this we shall give our readers a more particular and circumstantial account hereafter. The same year Abu Thâber, the Karmatian general, and prince of Hajr, plundered a caravan, and put a great number of pilgrims to the sword. Abu Mohammed Naserc'ddawla Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Hamdân likewise delivered up to his brother Ali Abu'l Hasan Saifo'ddawla Mayâfârkin, or Mayyâfârakîn, and Diyâr Beer, the present year. About the same time, Amado'ddawla Ali Ebn Bûyia possessed himself of Esfabân, and proposed afterwards to reduce to his obedience Hamadân, Komm, Kâsbân, Karaj, Al Ray, Kazwîn, Kenkewar, and all the territories of Wafmakîn. In the month of either the former or latter Jomâda, the troops mutinied at Baghdâd, broke open the house of Ebn Moklab, Al Râdi's Wazîr, and obliged him and his son to fly over the Tigris into the western town; though the commotion, raised by them on this occasion, was afterwards appeased. The same year, died Ibrahim Ebn Mohammed Ebn Arasab, commonly called Nasthuyah, descended from the famous Al Mohalleb Ebn Abu Sâfra, who had formerly been the Khalif's governor of Khorasân. He bore the character of a most celebrated grammarian, and was born in the year of the Hejra 244. Abu Beer Mohammed Ebn Ta'j, or Mohammed Ebn Tagaj, surnamed Al Akhsîd, subjugated also Egypt, which he entered in the month of Ramadân, and annexed it to the opulent province of Syria, which he had before wrestled out of the Khalif's hands. Several violent shocks of an earthquake were felt in Egypt, the third of Dbu'lkaada, soon after Anba Theodosius, or Stephen, who had been with Mînes, the eunuch, at Baghdâd, was constituted patriarch of Antioch in Syria. About the same time, many of those meteors called falling stars, of a very remarkable kind, likewise appeared in Egypt. This year the followers of the famous Almed Ebn Hanbal, who were now become very numerous, raised a great commotion in Baghdâd, entering people's houses, spilling their wine, if they found any, beating the singing-women they met with, and breaking their instruments to pieces; infomuch that a severe edict was published against them, before they could be reduced to their duty. We must not forget to observe, that Rendâsb, the Moslem governor of Tabermîn, or Taormina, died there the preceding year; nor that the Cambridge Chronicle mentions a dreadful tempest and inundation, as happening at Palermo in Sicily, and destroying many men and houses there, in that we are now upon<sup>s</sup>.

THE following year, being the 324th of the Hejra, commencing Nov. 30th, 935, the Khalif Al Râdi, finding himself pressed on all sides by the usurpers who had dismembered the Moslem empire, and reduced to great straits by the incapacity of his Vizîr, created Abu Al Râdi creates a minister superior to his Vizir.

Becr Mohammed Ebn Rayek Emîr Al Omrâ (D), or assigned him the charge of commandant of commandants, which the title of Emîr Al Omrâ, that is, the Emîr of Emîrs, or the supreme Emîr, imports. This great officer, or rather prime minister, was trusted with the administration of all military affairs, and had the intire management of the finances, in a much more absolute and unlimited manner than any of the Khalîf's Visirs, committed to him. Nay, he officiated for the Khalîf in the great mosque at Baghdâd, and had his name mentioned in the public divine service throughout the empire. In a word, Al Râdi was intirely governed by this Abu Becr Mohammed Ebn Rayek and his secretary, insomuch that he could not take out of the treasury a single dinâr for his own use, without their permission. As for Ebn Moklab, who was a person of considerable abilities, though not equal to the post in which he had been placed, the Khalîf left him for some time in possession of the charge of Visir; but at last, on account of his shuffling and pragmatial disposition, he found himself obliged to dismiss him. Ebn Rayek came from Wâset, over the people of which city he then presided as governor, or rather sovereign, the 25th of Dbu'lhajja, to Baghdâd. Soon after which, he appointed Abmed Ebn Ali of Cûfa his secretary of state. Abu'lfeda relates, that the Hajarîans, with Al Modbaffer Ebn Yâkût at their head, deposed Ebn Moklah, and after him Ali Ebn Isa, Abd'alrahmân Ebn Isa, and Abu Jaafar Ebn Al Kasem, whom they had successively appointed to officiate as Visir, within the space of a few months. He also writes, that Ebn Rayek, who had assumed to himself the sovereignty of Wâset and Basra, Al Barîdi, who had seized upon Abwâz, and the other governors of provinces, having refused to send their respective tributes to Baghdâd, the Khalîf's treasury was quite exhausted, insomuch that he found himself obliged to employ Ebn Rayek, who had amassed considerable sums, as the Emîr Al Omrâ; which put the government of the Moslem empire, without any restriction or reserve, into his hands. The same author likewise intimates, that he disarmed the Sâjiâns immediately after his arrival at Baghdâd; which inspired the Hajarîans with an aversion to him. Mohammed Ebn Tagaj, and some of his officers, assembled a body of troops at Barka, whither they had been obliged to retire out of Egypt, with which they returned to Alexandria, drove the garison of that city to the river of Rashîd, pursued them thither, and intirely defeated them. Many of the Egyptians were killed in the action, and most of the rest taken prisoners; after which, the citizens of Alexandria, that had been forced to abandon the place, returned home. About the same time, Al Râdi granted the investiture of Egypt, in the fullest and most solemn manner, to Al Akhsîd, and recalled Abmed Ebn Keigalag from that country. This year, Adado'ddawla Abu Shajâ' Fanakbofrû Ebn Rocno'ddawla Al Hasan Ebn Bûiya, afterwards lord, or king, of Persia, was born at Esfahân: and, before the close of it, Hajaza Al Barmaki, descended from Yabya Ebn Kbâled Ebn Barmak, or Barmac, extremely well versed in various parts of learning, Abd'allah Ebn Abmed Ebn Mohammed, surnamed Ebn Al Moflesi, the author of a great number of books of good repute, and the Imâm Abd'allah Ebn Mohammed Al Nisâbûri, a follower of the famous Al Shâfeî, born in the 238th year of the Hejra, departed this life. An east-wind, that blew with great violence in Sicily the 11th of July, utterly destroyed the vintage there. From this time the office of Visir became only a nominal post, the Emîr Al Omrâ continuing to govern the Khalîfat with an absolute sway, till the power of the Seljûkiâns, or oriental Turks, began to decline at Baghdâd.

An inglorious treaty concluded with Abu Thâher.

THE next year, being the 325th of the Moslem æra, Ebn Rayek, who possessed the charge of Emîr Al Omrâ, and, in consequence thereof, had the intire direction of the state, concluded a treaty of peace with Abu Thâher, prince of the Karmatians, who had made himself master of Cûfa, by no means glorious to the Khalîf. For, the principal article of this treaty was, that Ebn Rayek should remit the Karmatian from Baghdâd the annual sum of 120,000 dinârs. However, Abu Thâher, in consideration of this tribute, engaged never for the future to molest the caravans of pilgrims in their passage to Mecca.

Al Barîdi becomes tributary to the Khalîf.

THE same year, Ebn Rayek, and the Khalîf in person, marched with a powerful army to Wâset, in order to drive from thence the rebel Abu Abd'allah Al Barîdi, who had seized upon that city. Al Barîdi, finding himself not in a condition to make head against the Khalîf's forces, purchased a peace of Al Râdi, by submitting to pay a monthly tribute of

(D) That the name of this great officer was Emîr Al Omrâ, and not Emir Al Omara, as we find it written (6) by M. D'Herbelot, will be acknowledged by every one who is not an intire stranger to the genius of the Arabic language. Hence the word Omrâ, the plural of Emîr, is given as a title (7) to all the nobility of the first rank, in the empire of the Mogul, or Megbol, and in Tartary.

- a 30,000 dinârs. But, after the Khalîf's departure to Baghdâd, he rebelled again, took Basra, together with the district belonging to it, and in a short time grew more powerful than he was before *.

THIS rebellion greatly embarrassing the Khalîf's affairs, the scene of it being in the Al Barîdî is very neighbourhood of Baghdâd, Ebn Râyek sent Yahcam, the Turk, with a numerous army <sup>driven from</sup> to extinguish it, and, if possible, to get the author of it into his hands. But Al Barîdî, <sup>Wâset, Ah-</sup> finding himself not in a condition to oppose Yahcam, fled at his approach; upon which, <sup>wâz, and</sup> Wâset, Abwâz, and Basra, immediately submitted to the Khalîf's forces, and Ebn Râyek <sup>Basra, and</sup> appointed Yahcam to preside over Abwâz in quality of governor, who thereupon engaged him- <sup>flies to Ama-</sup> self to pay an annual tribute to the Khalîf of 38,000 dinârs. After Al Barîdî had been driven <sup>do'ddawla's</sup> from Wâset, Abwâz, and Basra, he took sanctuary at Amado'ddawla Ali Ebn Bûiya's court; who sent his brother Moezzo'ddawla Ahmed Ebn Bûiya with him, attended by a strong body of troops, to dislodge Yahcam from his new acquisitions, the following year. The Moslems, about this time, plundered the church of the resurrection at Jerusalem, and reduced a considerable part of it to ashes; one Christopher, a native of Askalon, or Askelon, being then the patriarch there. The same year, died Abd'allah Ebn Mohammed Al Kbûrraz, a grammarian, who wrote a pretty large commentary upon the Korân. An insurrection happened at Gergenti, the Agrigentum of the ancients, in Sicily, April 17th, when the people of that city assembled in great numbers, drove Ebn Amrân from Calata-Bellotta, called by the Arabs Ka'lat-Al-Bellât, and pillaged the garison of that place. Al Emîr Sâlem, receiving advice of what had happened, marched against the insurgents with an army of Sicilians and Cottâmians, or Catâmians, a very powerful and warlike Arab, or Moorish, nation, and laid siege to Ajrab, or Ojrab; of which the Gergentines being informed, they advanced to the besiegers camp, engaged the Emîr's forces, on Saturday, June 24th, and overthrew them with incredible slaughter. A prodigious number of the Cottâmians, together with Abu Dekâk, their general, perished in the action. After this defeat, they made excursions as far as the gates of Palermo, and even attempted to form the siege of that city. For which purpose, they advanced to a place going under the name of Mesîd Bâlis, not far from the town; but were repulsed by the inhabitants of Palermo with very considerable loss; who, being supported by Al Emîr Sâlem Ebn Al Rasîd, and Al Maimûn Ebn Mûsa, pursued them as far as Marnûa, and put many of them to the sword. This Emîr had been appointed governor of the Moslem conquests in Sicily by Abu'l Kasem, or Al Kayem, the Khalîf of Kairwân, and grievously oppressed the Sicilians, particularly the Gergentines, who could not bear his yoke, and therefore expelled the Moslem garison out of their city. This so enraged the African Khalîf, that he sent an army to reduce them; which shut them in on all sides, cut off all communication between them and the other Sicilians, and reduced them to very great straits. However, they found means to apply to the Greek emperor for assistance, who thereupon sent a body of his best troops to their relief; which enabled them to repulse the besiegers in all their assaults, to destroy vast numbers of their men, and, in fine, to sustain a sharp and vigorous siege for four whole years *.

- e THE provinces of the Khalîfat at this time were divided in such a manner amongst divers <sup>The Khalîf at</sup> princes, that the Khalîf possessed only an appearance of pre-eminence in dignity, which <sup>this time is only</sup> regarded more the affairs of religion than those of the state. This will be sufficiently <sup>in possession of</sup> manifest from the following list of the tyrants, or usurpers, who had set up for themselves, <sup>the city and di-</sup> in different parts of the Moslem empire, at the commencement of the year we are now <sup>strict of Bagh-</sup> dâd. upon.

THE cities of Wâset, Basra, and Cûfa, with the rest of the Arabian Irâk, were considered as the property or peculium of Ebn Râyek, the Emîr Al Omrà; though Al Barîdî seized upon them, in the beginning of the present year.

- f THE country of Fârs, Farsistân, or Persia properly so called, was possessed by Amado'ddawla Ali Ebn Bûiya, the first prince or chief of the dynasty of the Bûiyans, who held his residence in the city of Shîràz.

PART of the tract denominated Al Jebâl, together with the remainder of the Persian Irâk, which is the mountainous part of Persia, and the country of the ancient Parthians, recognized for their master Rocno'ddawla, or Rucno'ddawla, Al Hasan Ebn Bûiya, the brother of Amado'ddawla Ali Ebn Bûiya, who resided at Esfabân.

THE other part of that country was possessed by Wasmakîn, Washmakîn, or Washmakîr, the Deylamite, the brother of Mardawîj.

DIYAR RABIA, Diyâr Becr, Diyâr Modar, and the city of Al Mawfel, or Mesul, acknowledged for their sovereigns the Hamdânites, or the princes of the race of Hamdân.

EGYPT and Syria no longer obeyed the Khalifs, but only Mohammed Ebn Ta'j, or Tagaj,<sup>a</sup> surnamed Al Akhsîd, who had been formerly appointed governor of those provinces by the same Khalifs.

AFRICA had been subjugated by the Fâtemites, who had chased from thence the Aglabites, governors of the city of Kairwân and its dependencies for the Khalifs. The master of that country at this time was Al Kayem Abu'l Kasem Ebn Obeid'allah Al Mohdi, whose successors founded a new Khalifat in Egypt.

SPAIN, or at least the Moslem part of it, was governed by Abd'alrahmân Al Nasr Ebn Mohammed, of the house of Ommiyah, who soon after this time assumed the title of Emîr Al Mûmenîn, prince, king, or emperor, of the faithful, which was peculiar to the Khalifs.

THE Moslem provinces in Sicily, except the city of Gergenti, whose inhabitants had<sup>b</sup> expelled the Magrebian garison, had for their immediate governor Al Emîr Sûlem Ebn Al Rasbîd, who was the Khalif of Kairwân's lieutenant there.

THE Moslem territories in Crete owned for their sovereign one who probably was a descendant of Apockapsus, or Abu Kabs, the Spanish Magrebian admiral, who reduced that island, about the year of our LORD 812.

THE provinces of Khcrâsîn and Mawarâ'lnabr, or the Transoxana, were under the domination of Al Nasr Ebn Ahmed, of the dynasty of the Sammânicus.

THE provinces of Tabrestân, Ferjân, or Georgiâna, and Mazanderân, had kings of the first dynasty of the Deylamites.

THE province of Kermân was occupied by Abu Ali Mohammed Ebn Eylû, or Elias, Al Sam-<sup>c</sup> mâni, who had made himself master of it, before the commencement of the present year.

AND, lastly, the provinces of Yamâma and Babrein, including the district of Hajr, were in the possession of Abu Thâber, the Kermatian.

HENCE it appears, that, in the 325th year of the Hejra, the Khalif Al Râdi, or rather Abu Becr Mohammed Ebn Râyek, the Emîr Al Omrâ, kept possession of only the city of Baghdâd, and its dependencies; scarce even the very shadow of sovereignty remaining in any other part of the empire to him. It is true, at first the name of the Khalif was revered by the princes, who had set up for themselves, in all the provinces, mentioned in the mosques, during the time of public service there, throughout the empire, and imprest upon the current coin. But their veneration for him being gradually diminished, the princes, or Emîrs,<sup>d</sup> considered him only as the great Imâm, or sovereign pontiff of the religion of the Moslems, who had nothing more to do than to perform divine service, harangue the people in the great mosque at Baghdâd, and decide certain points of right; in the last of which particulars his power was likewise very much limited. It is also true, that the same Khalifs, in process of time, shook off the yoke of these Emîrs, and asserted their independency on them. But notwithstanding this, their power gradually declined, and was scarce the shadow of what it had formerly been, from the period we are now upon to the taking of Baghdâd by the Tartars, or Moguls, who intirely abolished the Khalifat.<sup>e</sup>

is removed from the post

IN the 326th year of the Hejra, beginning Nov. 8th, 937, Ebn Moklah, who, after the amotion of Abd'alrahmân Ebn Isa and Al Fadl Ebn Jaasar from that post, had been re-esta-<sup>e</sup> blished in the charge of Visir, wrote, on the part of the Khalif Al Râdi, a letter to Yahcam, the Turk, telling him that now it was time for him to advance to Baghdâd at the head of a body of troops, in order to deliver the Khalifat from the tyranny of Ebn Râyek, and to occupy his place. But this letter having been intercepted, Ebn Râyek discovered to the Khalif the treason of the Visir, who had dared to write such a letter to Yahcam, without his master's knowledge, and even against his express orders. Ebn Moklah, upon his appearing before the Khalif, at first denied the fact; but the letter in his own hand-writing being produced against him, he was found guilty of what had been laid to his charge, sent immediately to prison, brought afterwards to his trial, and condemned by the judges to have his right hand cut off, for having committed so heinous a crime. When sentence was pronounced, he complained bitterly of the severity of it, and of the iniquity of cutting off the right hand<sup>f</sup> of a man who had invented the most beautiful character that had ever been in use amongst the Arabs, had written several copies of the Korân, the book held in the highest veneration and esteem amongst the Moslems, in so elegant a manner that they passed for master-pieces in the art of writing, and had finally been Visir to three successive Khalifs. Nor did he content himself with bare complaints. He inveighed bitterly against the judges, Ebn Râyek, and the Khalif himself. Wherefore, the executioner, in pursuance of the sentence that had been passed upon him, did not only deprive him of his right hand, but likewise, some days afterwards, cut out his tongue. After which, he was confined in one of the dungeons belong-

He died, according to Al Makin, in the month of Shawwāl 329, or, as Abu'l-huda will have it, in the year 338, and was no less than three times interred; first, in the prison where he died, afterwards in his son Abu'l-Hasan's house, and lastly in his own. He is said likewise to have written three copies of the Korân that in beauty surpassed all the rest, and to have performed three times the pilgrimage to Mecca. It has also been remarked, that when he beat Ebn Sibâd for reading to him in a careless manner, that reader wished he might lose his hand; which afterwards came pass. We are informed by Abu'l-Faraj, that Ebn Moklab wrote a letter to the Khalîf himself, advising him therein to dismiss Ebn Râyek, and all his adherents, and telling him, that this would bring into his coffers 3,000,000,000 dirhams. But the Khalîf, continues that writer, communicated the contents of this letter, in which Ebn Moklab likewise pressed him to confer the post of Emîr Al Omrà upon Yabcam, to Ebn Râyek; which, at last, proved the total ruin of the Vîfir. A specimen of his poetical performances, which were tolerably good, has been preserved by Al Makin. Notwithstanding what has been here observed, a certain writer affirms, that not Ebn Moklab, but his brother Abd'allah Al Hasan was the inventor of the modern Arabic character; though this was brought to a greater degree of perfection by Ali Ebn Bow.îb, who flourished in the following century, and reduced to its present form by Takût Al Mufîssîmî, secretary to the Khalîf Al Mufîssîm, the last of the Khalîfs of the house of Al Abbâs.*

This Emîr Al Omrà obliged Ebn Râyek to betake himself to flight, and to abandon the post of Emîr Al Omrà, which was immediately occupied by Yabcam. The Khalîf himself, however, gained nothing by this change; still living in an intire dependence on his minister, and even without the least appearance of authority. The affairs of the Karmatians this year were in a very declining condition, insomuch that Abu Thâber found it extremely difficult to maintain himself
- d in the possession of Hajr. We must not forget to observe, that Moezzo'ddawla Akmed Ebn Bûiya took Abwâz in the beginning of the campaign, and put Basra once more into the hands of Al Barîdî; though he could not possess himself of Wâset. Here Yabcam still kept his ground, forced Moezzo'ddawla to retire, and afterwards drove Ebn Râyek from Baghdâd. Upon Yabcam's expulsion of his predecessor from the Khalîf's councils, after he had remained in the sublime post of Emîr Al Omrà one year, ten months, and sixteen days, he himself immediately entered upon that charge, and made Mohammed Ebn Yahya Ebn Shîrazâd his secretary of state. This year, the Sicilians, under the conduct of Ebn Al Sabâyah and Abu Târ, revolted against Al Emîr Sâlem; but were routed by him Sept. 17th, though he lost one of his principal officers in the action, named Abu Nattâr Al Afwad, who seems to
- e have been of Moorish or Magrebian extraction. Several of the ringleaders, that fell into his hands, the Emîr ordered to be impaled the 20th of the same month, to deter others from joining the revolters; but this severity produced a quite contrary effect. For the Sicilians, being exasperated at Sâlem's cruelty, assembled a numerous army, and engaged the Magrebian forces, commanded by the Emîr in person, October 7th, with very great

(E) The passage here referred to in Al Makin, Tekâl annabo labako darb, has been translated by Erpenius, "Aiunt autem illic apud eum fuisse puteum;" whereas it ought to have been rendered, "Aiunt autem magnam eum prehensisse miseriam (vel angustiam)" in conformity to the parallel passage in Abu'l Faraj (8), W'ala-bako j'akâ shakid ela an mat, "Et magna eum prehensit miseria, donec moreretur." Which passages imply, that Ebn Moklab was reduced in prison to a state of great misery, and continued in such a state to the time of his death. Mr. Guise (9) has the following marginal note on Erpenius's translation of these words of Al Makin: "Hæc non significant voces Arabicæ; videntur potius

"idem valere quod apud Abul Pharagî" rectius Abu'l Faraj) "de eodem—Magnaue miseria afflictus est, donec moreretur." And that this observation is just, as well as our translation of the foregoing were of Al Makin, seems to be clearly evinced by Abu'l Faraj (10), when he relates, "that to Ebn Moklab's other MISERIES was added a diarrhoea; of which, not being allowed the use of a servant, he MISERABLY perished." Other arguments might be offered, would the limits prescribed us in this part of our work permit, in support of the emendation of Erpenius's Latin version of Al Makin here submitted to the consideration of the learned.

bravery; but, after an obstinate dispute, they were intirely defeated, and pursued as far as the gates of Palermo, which the victors entered without opposition, and immediately formed the siege of the citadel there. Abu'l Kasem, or Al Kayem, the Khalif of Kairwân, having received advice of this rebellion, sent Khalil with a powerful fleet, and a strong body of land-forces on board, to extinguish it. Khalil soon arrived on the coast of Sicily, made a descent with his troops, took possession of the city of Palermo, Oct. 23d, and intirely dismantled it; which so incensed the Gergentines, that they sallied upon the Khalif of Kairwân's troops with such courage, that they put them to flight, killed many of them upon the spot, amongst which were Ebn Abu Hierir and Ali Ebn Abu'l Hosein, Sâlem's son-in-law, two officers of distinction, and dispersed the rest in such a manner that they could never afterwards rally. But, notwithstanding this blow, Khalil continued the siege of Gergenti; tho', for the space of eight months, he could make little or no impression upon the town. It must be remembered, that the Moslems concluded a treaty of peace with the Greeks, by one article of which a mutual release of prisoners was agreed upon, the present year <sup>a</sup>.

The transactions of the year of the Hejra 327.

In the 327th year of the Hejra, the Khalif Al Râdi, with a powerful army, commanded by Tabcam, marched against Nasero'ddawla Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Hamdân, who presided over the people of Diyâr Rabia, Diyâr Becr, and Al Mawfel, or Mesul, overthrew him with great slaughter, and pursued him to the gates of Al Mawfel; to which city he afterwards laid siege, and obliged Nasero'ddawla to fly to Amed; but whilst the Khalif was engaged in this expedition, Ebn Râyek appeared at the head of a body of troops in the neighbourhood of Baghdâd; of which Tabcam being informed, he concluded a peace with Nasero'ddawla Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Hamdân, on condition that he paid him an annual tribute of 500,000 dinârs. In order to pacify Ebn Râyek, he also put him in possession of Harrân, Al Kobâ, or Edeffa, Al Aweisem, Kinnisîn, and several districts bordering upon the Euphrates. This year, Abu Thâker, prince of the Karmatians, permitted the caravans of pilgrims, together with the escorte that attended them, to pass, for the first time since the year 319, out of Syria to Mecca; though he obliged them to pay, for this permission, the sum of 25,000 dinârs. Omayyab Ebn Ishak, according to Abu'lfeda, rebelled against Abd'alrahmân Al Nasr Ebn Mohammed, the Emîr, or lord, of Andalusia, in the city of Skantarîn, the present year. Ebn Ishak, being supported by a body of Gallician troops, defeated a Moslem army, that was sent against him; but, in a second engagement, he was overthrown by Abd'alrahmân's forces, and lost the greatest part of his men; which obliged him to submit immediately, upon the terms prescribed, to the Emîr. Abd'alrahmân Ebn Abu Hâtem Al Râzi, the author of the piece, intituled, Al Harjo wa Al Tadilo, and Abu'l Donya Othmân Ebn Al Khattâb Al Ashajjo, two famous traditionists, as likewise Mohammed Ebn Jaafar, of Jaffa, or Joppa, a celebrated author, and Abu'l Kasem Abd'allah Ebn Ahmed Ebn Mahmûd, commonly called Al Alani, the Môtazalite, who entertained several heterodox tenets, died before the close of this year. About the same time, Khalil, the Magrebian general, who commanded the Khalif of Kairwân's forces that carried on the siege of Gergenti, returned with the greatest part of his troops to Palermo, where he exacted a large sum of money of the inhabitants, by way of mulct, or fine, which he sent immediately to Africa. This enabled the Khalif to order him from thence a reinforcement; after the arrival of which in Sicily, he took Abuthâr, or Buteria, Al Sirât, the Afforus, or Afforium, of the antients, and the modern Azaro, or Ajaro, Asklûfinah, or Sciasanum, and Kalbarah, all of them places of considerable strength. He also advanced at the head of his army to Calata Bellotta, to form the siege of that town; of which the Gergentines, to whom the preservation of that fortress was of the utmost consequence, receiving advice, they fell upon the besiegers with such fury, that they put a great number of them to the sword, and, as the Cambridge Chronicle seems to insinuate, forced the rest to abandon the siege. This action happened on the 10th of July, and proved so fatal to the Magrebian troops, that they durst not appear again in the neighbourhood of Calata Bellotta before the commencement of the following campaign <sup>b</sup>.

Ebn Râyek is defeated by Al Akhsîd.

The next year, being the 328th of the Hejra, Abu Becr Mohammed Ebn Râyek made himself master of Hems, Damascus, and Al Ramla; after which, he penetrated to Arîsh in Egypt. But here Mohammed Al Akhsîd Ebn Tagaj met him, and gave him battle, about the middle of the month of Ramadân. Ebn Râyek's troops behaved with such bravery in the beginning of the action, that they bore down all before them, and forced the Egyptians every-where to give way. But, instead of following their blow, and pursuing the fugitives with the ardour they ought to have done, they amused themselves with plundering their camp; upon which, a body of Al Akhsîd's troops that had been placed in ambuscade, and observed the disorder they were in, rushed out upon them, and charged them with such a fury, that they soon put them to flight. The greatest part of Ebn Râyek's forces were killed upon the spot, and the rest of them so effectually dispersed, that they could never afterwards rally; Ebn Râyek himself not having been able to make his escape to Damascus with above 70 men. After this, Ebn Râyek defeated Abu Nafr (F), Al Akhsîd's brother, in the month of Dbu'lkaada, and put a vast number of his men to the sword. This victory was soon followed by a peace between Ebn Râyek and Al Akhsîd, by the principal articles of which the city of Al Ramla was ceded to Al Akhsîd, upon condition that he paid to Ebn Râyek the annual sum of 140,000 dinârs; and the latter of these Emîrs remained in peaceable possession of the remaining part of Syria, which he had before in a great measure reduced by force of arms<sup>c</sup>.

b THIS year, Al Sabkari was killed in that part of Syria, or Al Shâm, called by the Arabs Thogâr; which seems to answer to the Syria Antiochena of the antients. About the same time, died Mohammed Al Calini, one of the Imânian Imâms, generally denominated Ebn Shambûd, Al Mckri Mohammed Ebn Ahmed, and Abu Mohammed Al Mortasb, a doctor of the Sûfis; as also Abu Becr Mohammed Ebn Al Kasem, going for the most part under the name of Ebn Al Ambarek, a celebrated grammarian, and the author of the book, intituled, Kitâb Al Wacfi wa Al Ibtidâi, a piece held in good esteem amongst the Moslems, who was born in the year of the Hejra 271. Abu Omar Ahmed Ebn Abd Rabbih Ebn Janib Al Corthebi likewise departed this life, before the close of the year we are now upon. His grandfather Janib, who was a native of Corduba, is said to have been first one of Heshâm Ebn Abd'arab-mân's slaves; though he had afterwards his liberty given him by that prince, who was the second Emîr of the house of Omniyah that presided over the Moslems in Spain. As for Abu Omar, he was one of those learned men who spent their time chiefly in forming volumes of the traditions that had before been only committed to memory. The book that bears the title of Al Acd, or Al Akd, one of the most excellent of its kind, is a proof of his singular merit. At the time of his death, he was about eighty-two lunar years of age<sup>d</sup>.

It appears from some of the authors followed by Al Makîn, that Sa'id Ebn Batrîk, known also by the name of Anba Eutychius, an excellent physician, and a native of Al Fostât, who had been advanced to the patriarchate of Alexandria in 321, died the present year. This author, who was a Melchite, began his annals with the creation of the world, and brought them down to the year of the Hejra 327. This work, intituled Nadhm Al Jawhar, a texture of gems, or a string of pearls, has been published with a Latin version by the famous Dr. Pocock, professor of the Hebrew and Arabic languages in the university of Oxford, where it was printed in the year of our LORD 1656. We are told by M. Renaudot (G), that it is incomparably better than any general history to be met with amongst the *Oriental*s; and that it has been followed not only by the Christian writers, but likewise by Al Makrizi, and other Mohammedan authors. Eutychius is also said to have composed a physical treatise, that bore the title of Kitâb fil thebb, and to have been extremely well versed in all the branches

(F) Abu Nafr himself, according to Abu'lfeda, was killed in the action; which so affected Ebn Râyek, that he sent an embassy to Al Akhsîd, to carry to that prince his compliments of condolence, and to assure him, that he had no hand in, and was extremely sorry for, his brother's death. To which this author adds, that Ebn Râyek sent his own son Mozahem to Al Akhsîd, and desired that prince to sacrifice him to the manes of his brother if he thought proper. But Al Akhsîd, continues he, was so far from being acted by any vindictive sentiments on this occasion, that he made Mozahem a present of several sumptuous mantles, or clokes, treated him with the highest marks of distinction, and at last sent him back loaded with honours to his father in Syria (11).

(G) Our learned and polite readers will not expect, that we should here give any formal answer to the false and injurious reflection thrown out by M. Renaudot against Mr. Selden, whom he represents as intirely unacquainted with oriental history, and to his unpolite treatment of the great Dr. Pocock, to whom he affects to shew an apparent disregard, almost as often as he speaks of him. For, in order to expose such treatment of those shining ornaments of oriental literature as this, it is sufficient barely to mention it. We must, however, beg leave to observe, that M. Renaudot treats the very learned Job Ludolfus in much the same manner; and that he scarce ever bestows encomiums upon any but some few of his own nation. This indicates a meanness of soul, which cannot fail of drawing down upon that writer the contempt of all men of real learning, who must be acted by more elevated sentiments, and indued with a more generous turn of mind. But, notwithstanding the high notion he entertained of his own superior abilities, with regard to eastern literature, which discovers itself in almost every page of the book here referred to, were we disposed to recriminate, we might very justly remark, that scarce any piece of the same size abounds more with inaccuracies, not to say egregious blunders, than the performance he so highly valued himself upon (12.)

of literature then in vogue. Another piece has likewise been ascribed to him of the controversial kind, which was written against the Egyptian heretics, who gave him no small trouble, during the time that he sat in the patriarchal see of Alexandria, which was seven years and six months. He was at last attacked by a diarrhoea, which from the beginning he judged would prove fatal to him, and therefore removed to Alexandria, where he died on Monday, the last day of the month Rajeb. His brother, Isa Ebn Batrik was likewise a physician of great note, on whose account he compiled the general history above-mentioned. Other books of considerable erudition have likewise been attributed to him. The learned Dr. Cave and the abbot Martin la Farina took Eutychius to have been the author of the Chronicon Siculum, in the public library at Cambridge; which Arabic MS. formerly belonged to the famous Thomas Erpenius, and has been published, with a Latin version, by Joannes Baptista Carusius, a Sicilian writer. But that Eutychius could not have been the author of this Chronicon, we may fairly infer from the following considerations. First, the history itself ends with the year of CHRIST 965; whereas Eutychius died in the 328th year of the Hejra, which nearly corresponds with the 940th of the Christian æra. Secondly, the compiler of it appears to have been a Sicilian, from the perfect knowledge he had of the cities, towns, and villages, of Sicily; and from his supputation of years, which exactly answers to that of the Sicilians, who begin their year on the first of September, in common with almost all the Greeks, and make the creation of the world to have preceded the birth of CHRIST 5508 years, not 5491, or 5492, as the church of Alexandria maintains. Thirdly, the person who penned the Chronicon makes use of only the Roman or Latin names of the months, and never computes by the years of the Hejra, as Eutychius does; which of itself sufficiently demonstrates, that this history ought not to be attributed to him. As the Cambridge manuscript is found at the end of a MS. copy of Eutychius's annals, we are not to be so much surprised at what has been advanced by the learned men above-mentioned in the point before us; but we cannot so well account for the palpable mistake of Dr. Cave and Carusius, when they assert that Eutychius died in the year of our LORD 950, except we suppose that they never perused the Târikh Al Moslemân, or the history of the Moslems, written by Al Makin, which has been so often referred to here <sup>a</sup>.

THE same year, Khalil with the Magrebian forces took post again before Calata Bellotta, and formed a second time the siege of that place; of which the Gergentines being apprized, they sent a body of troops to the relief of the town, which in the month of November surprized the besiegers by night, and made themselves masters of their camp. About the same time, Al Emîr Sâlem, who had presided over the Moslem conquests in Sicily twenty-two years, and had been a victorious prince, departed this life in his castle. A grievous famine likewise raged in Palermo and the neighbouring villages to such a degree, that parents found themselves obliged to eat their children, for want of other food. The *Magrebian*s laid siege a third time to Calata Bellotta, notwithstanding the blow they had formerly received, and took it in the month of March, the present year <sup>c</sup>.

The Khalif Al Râdi dies.

THE following year, being the 329th of the Hejra, commencing October 6th, 940, the Khalif Al Râdi died, the 16th of the former Rabî, of a dropsy, at Baghdâd. Some authors, however, relate, that immoderate coition was the cause of his death. He reigned six years, ten months, and ten days; and had completed the 30th year of his age a few months before his decease, according to Al Makin. As to his person, he had, if Abu'lfeda may be credited, a thin beard, and was of a swarthy complexion. With regard to his disposition, he was liberal, munificent, mild; well versed in the literature of the Arabs, eloquent, a good poet, and a great admirer of the conversation of learned men. He was the last of the Khalifs that wrote verses, at least of the Khalifs that wrote such verses as were thought worthy of having a place assigned them in the Moslem annals. A specimen of his poetical performances has been preserved by Abu'lfeda and Al Makin. He was the last likewise of the Moslem emperors that officiated constantly in the mosque, that commanded the forces, that had the disposal of the public money, and that in short exercised any kind of real authority over the Arabs. His successors, for a considerable period at least, enjoyed little more than the bare title of Khalif, and of this they were even at last deprived by the Tartars. Ebn Moklah was his first Wazîr, or Vîsir, and Mohammed Ebn Yâkût his first chamberlain. The latter of these was succeeded in his post by Dacâ, who had before served the Khalif in an

The first day of Al Râdi's reign was Thursday, and the last Saturday, according to Al Makin. Macarius was constituted patriarch of the Jacobites at Alexandria, in the year of the Hejra 323, about a year after this prince's accession, and sat in that see, if we will believe the above-mentioned author and Al Makrizi, about twenty years. His mother, who was one of his father Al Moktader's concubines, has been denominated Thalûm by Abu'lfeda; and the name of Talûm has been given her by Al Makin. Senân Ebn Thâbet Al Herrâni, that most celebrated physician, was one of his constant companions, and in the highest favour with him. Amongst the memorable events of this year we may likewise rank the death of Bakhtîshâ Ebn Yakya, who had been physician to the Khalîf Al Moktader, and made no inconsiderable figure at that prince's court. Mati Ebn Yûnes, Mata Ebn Yûnes, b or Matta (Matthew) Ebn Yûnas, surnamed the sage, and the philosopher, who, according to Mohammed Ebn Ishak Al Nadîm, his companion and intimate friend, was the greatest logician of the country and age wherein he lived, died about the time we are now upon, in the Khalîfat of Al Râdi. He instructed many young men in the principles of logic, which he himself learned of Râfîl and Benyâmîn, two Jacobite monks; though he laid the first foundation of his knowledge in the school of one Mâr Mâri. He was a native of Dair Kani, or Dair Kana, and a strenuous assertor of the tenets of the Nestorian sect. Some of the eastern writers have represented Al Râdi as endued with many virtues highly becoming a great prince, several of which have been just touched upon; but, for a detail of these, the learned and curious reader must have recourse to those writers themselves, the limits we have prescribed ourselves in this part of our work not permitting us to expatiate any farther upon them here<sup>f</sup>.

S E C T. XLIII.

- c WHEN the Khalîf Al Râdi expired, Yahcam, then Emîr Al Omrà, was at Cûfa; and, upon his receiving advice of that prince's death, he immediately dispatched one of his secretaries to Baghââd, with orders to Abu'l Kasem Solimân, the nominal Vîsir, to convoke the descendants of Ali, the judges, the house of Al Abbâs, and all the principal officers of the empire, to elect a new Khalîf. They had not been long assembled, before they pitched upon Ibrahim Abu'l Ishak Ebn Al Moktader, surnamed afterwards Al Mottaki, or Al Mottaki Bi'llah, whom they unanimously saluted emperor of the Moslems. Al Mottaki, after his inauguration, sent a sumptuous vest and a banner, or standard, to Yahcam at Wâset, and continued him in the sublime post of Emîr Al Omrà. He also confirmed Abu'l Kasem Solimân, on whom that post had been conferred by his predecessor, before his death, in the office of Vîsir, though he had then not the least authority in the state; the empire
d being absolutely governed by Yahcam's principal secretary, Abu Abd'allah, who was a native of Cûfa. Salâma Al Tolûni was made the Hâjeb, or chamberlain, by Al Mottaki, at the recommendation of Yahcam. The new Khalîf, whose mother's name was Halût, or Halûta, was proclaimed the 17th of the former Rabî; and, on the 20th of the same month, the grandees of the empire took the oath of allegiance to him. It is remarkable, that Al Makin, if we can depend upon Erpenius's edition of that author, calls this Khalîf Al Moktasi; though he is named Al Motaki, or Al Mottaki, by Abu'l Faraj, Ebn Shohnah, Khondemir, and other oriental historians<sup>g</sup>.

- THIS year, Mabcân Ebn Mâli, Ma'bcân Ebn Mâli, or Macan Ebn Cali, as he is called by the learned M. Reiske, in his Latin version of part of Abu'lfeda's Chronicon, was driven out of e Jorjân, of which he had taken possession some time before, by Abu Ali Ebn Mohammed Ebn Modkaffer Ebn Al Mokhtaj, one of Al Emîr Sa'id Nasr Ebn Ahmed Al Sammâni's generals. This Mabcân, Ma'bcân, or Macan, according to some of the oriental writers, was king, or prince, of Deylam, and received an overthrow from Nasr, who made war upon him; but whether or no this was the defeat hinted at by Abu'lfeda, in the place here referred to, we cannot take upon us to determine. Be that, however, as it will, Mabcân, finding himself obliged to abandon Jorjân, retired into Tabrestân, and from thence marched at the head of his forces to join Washmakîn, whom Abu Ali, after his late victory, was then advancing against with a powerful army, in order to expel him from Ray, and the district appertaining to it. After the junction of these two Deylamite princes, they moved against Abu Ali with all their forces, and gave him battle; but were overthrown with very great slaughter, and lost the most considerable part of their troops, the rest being so intirely dispersed, that they could never afterwards be rallied. As for Mahcân Ebn Mâli himself, he was killed in the action; having been shot through the head by an arrow, that pierced his helmet, and laid him dead upon the spot. After this defeat, Washmakîn fled into Tabrestân, and left Ray to the mercy of the victor; which immediately submitted to him, the place at that time not being in any posture of defence. The victory gained on this occasion was very glorious to the arms of Al Emîr Sa'id Nafr Ebn Ahmed Al Sammâni, and enabled Abu Ali Ebn Mohammed to annex a large extent of territory to the dominions of that prince <sup>b</sup>.

assassinated
by a party of Curds.

THE same year, that is, the 329th of the Hijra, a party of Curds, according to Abu'l Faraj, assassinated Yahcam, as he was hunting on the banks of the Jaur, the 24th of the month Rajeb, after he had possessed the charge of Emîr Al Omrâ two years, eight months, and nine days. Of this unexpected event Abu'lfeda has handed down to us the following particulars. Yahcam, or, as he is called in the Leyden MS. of that author's Chronicon, Bahcam, having sent a body of troops from Wâset to reduce Abu Abd'allah, or, as he is denominated in this MS. Obeid'allah, Al Barîdi, set out from that city, to take the command of these troops upon him. But he was met upon the road by an express, who informed him, that his forces had already proved superior to the enemy, and obliged Al Barîdi to betake himself to flight. Upon this, Yahcam directed his course towards the banks of the Jaur, or, as it is named in the above-mentioned MS. of Abu'lfeda, the Kbûr, or Kaur, hunting through all the tract he traversed. Being arrived near the Jaur, he made an incursion, with a small party, into a district bordering upon that river, inhabited by a rich and numerous tribe of Curds, in order to pillage them. Having surprized this people, who by no means expected such a visit, he killed several of them, and dispersed the rest. However, a young Curd, observing the barbarity and rapacity of this plunderer, whom he did not know to be Yahcam, made directly at him, and ran him through with his lance; upon which, he fell instantly to the ground, and soon after expired. The Khalîf, receiving advice of what had happened to Yahcam, immediately took possession of his palace, where he found immense treasures, buried under ground; all which he seized, and gave orders to have them expended in the service of the state. He also found there the rich tapestry, and other valuable furniture, of which Yahcam had caused the imperial palace to be stripped, immediately before the elevation of Al Mottaki to the Moslem throne. After Yahcam's death, the Khalîf conferred the post of Emîr Al Omrâ upon Cûrtakîn the Deylamite; but not being pleased with his conduct, he soon dismissed him, and appointed Abu Becr Mohammed Ebn Râjek, who came from his residence in Syria to Baghdâd for that purpose, to succeed him. Before the dismissal of Cûrtakîn, Abu Abd'allah Al Barîdi, prince of the city of Basra, and its dependencies, who had possessed himself of those territories and Abwâz in the Khalîfat of Al Râdi, and had been lately defeated by Yahcam, aspired to the dignity of generalissimo of the Khalîf's forces, entered Baghdâd, and demanded of Al Mottaki the sum of five hundred thousand dinârs, to distribute amongst his troops. With this demand the Khalîf was at last obliged to comply. But Al Barîdi having got the money into his hands, refused to bestow any part of it upon the soldiery; who thereupon mutinied for their pay, drove him, his brother, son, and many of his attendants, out of Baghdâd, and forced them all to go by water to Wâset. About this time, so grievous a famine raged in several parts of Sicily, that many of the towns and villages of that fruitful island were thereby intirely depopulated. Nay, we are told, that parents were so pressed with hunger on this melancholy occasion, that they were obliged to feed upon their own children, in order to preserve themselves alive. The Khalîf of Kairwân's forces, under the command of Khalîl, made themselves masters of Calata Bellotta and Gergenti, in Sicily, before the close of the present year. The latter of those cities had been besieged about four years by the Magrebian troops. Soon after it had surrendered, Khalîl sent a considerable number of its inhabitants, who had been the most active in the late revolt, prisoners to Africa; but before they had reached the African coast, the ship, in obedience to a private order Khalîl had received from Al Kayem, was sunk, and all the wretches on board it drowned. It may not be improper to remark, that Yahcam's (A) successor is named Cûrtakîn,

(A) We must beg leave to observe here, that the different positions, and omissions, of the diacritical points, in the Arabic proper names, as they appear in different manuscripts, render it difficult to determine of what letters such proper names were originally formed. Thus, for example, the word Yahcam, in the MSS. of Al Makîn and Abu'l Faraj, is written Bahcam, in the Leyden MS. of Abu'lfeda's Chronicon, or general history,

- a Cûrtakîn, or Kûrtakîn, in Dr. Pocock's printed copies of Abu'l Faraj, Cutekin in M. Reiske's Latin version of part of Abu'lfeda's Chronicle, and Cûtelîn in Gellius's edition of Al Makin. The affinity of character between the Arabic letters Câf and Lâm has undoubtedly occasioned the difference of lections in the manuscripts of Abu'lfeda and Al Makin; but which of these approaches the nearest to truth, we shall not take upon us absolutely to determine. However, as Erpenius's manuscript of Al Makin, in the orthography of proper names, is extremely corrupt; and as the Arabic name, formed of its proper elements, has no-where been exhibited by M. Reiske; our readers will not be displeased to find the word Cûrtakîn, that occurs in Dr. Pocock's printed copies of Abu'l Faraj, and differs but little from Cutekin, preferably to the others, made use of here <sup>c</sup>.
- b In the 330th year of the Hejra, beginning Sept. 26th, 941, Al Barîdi, according to Abu'lfeda and Al Makin, marched at the head of his forces to Baghdâd, in order to make himself master of that city, and the imperial palace there; which obliged the Khalîf Al Mottaki, who was not in a condition to sustain a siege, to retire to Al Mawfel. He was attended by Abu Becr Mohammed Ebn Râyek, Abu'l Hasan Ebn Abu Ali Ebn Moklab, and Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Hamdân; the last of which persons joined him and his retinue near Tecrit. That city, called by the Syrians Tagrit, is, according to Abu'lfeda, situated near the confines of Affyria, about six days journey from Al Mawfel, and not far from the source of one of the branches of the Tigris, that waters the adjacent tract as far as Baghdâd. Al Mottaki was supplied on this occasion with carriages, beasts of burthen, money, and all kinds of provisions, by Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Hamdân, who conducted him, and his train of attendants, in a proper manner, to Al Mawfel. Abu'lfeda relates, that the Khalîf, after his arrival at Tecrit, wrote to Abu Mohammed Al Hasan Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Hamdân, the prince of Al Mawfel, to desire his assistance and protection; and that this Emîr not only ceded to Al Mottaki one part of the city of Al Mawfel for his residence, but likewise, as he expresses it, poured out upon the head of his son dimîrs, that is, gave him a large sum of money. To which another writer adds, that the Khalîf was so well pleased with his reception at Al Mawfel, that he dignified Abu Mohammed Al Hasan Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Hamdân with the title, or surname, of Nasero'ddawla; that is, the protector, or defender, of the state. In order to re-establish the Khalîf in the sovereignty of Baghdâd, this prince sent an army, under the command of his brother Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Abd'allah, to that city; which drove from thence Al Barîdi, overthrew him with great slaughter, and took above 2000 Deylamites prisoners; all which Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Abd'allah sent under an escorte to Al Mawfel. Before the Khalîf's return to Baghdâd, Nasero'ddawla ordered a party of his guards to dispatch Abu Becr Mohammed Ebn Râyek, the 24th of Rajeb, and caused himself to be created Emîr Al Omrâ in his room. After the defeat of Al Barîdi, the Khalîf conferred upon Abu'l Hasan Ali history, as may be inferred from the learned M. Reiske's Latin (1) version of part of that celebrated piece. So Al Akhsîd's son is denominated, in one or (2) both the MSS. of Abu'l Faraj, followed by Dr. Pocock, Abu Jawr, or Abu Jawor; in that of Al Makin, translated into Latin by Erpenius, and published by Gellius, Abu Hir, or Abu Havor; and, in the Leyden MS. of Abu'lfeda's Chronicle, Anîfîr, as we learn from (3) M. Reiske. To mention only one proper name more, though many might be offered, the same Emîr Al Omrâ is called, in the above-mentioned MS. or MSS. of Abu'l Faraj, Tûzîr; in that of Al Makin, Bûzîr; and, in the Leyden MS. of Abu'lfeda's general history, according to (4) M. Reiske, Tûrîr. All which orthographical differences arise from the different positions, and an omission of some of the diacritical points. For, in the first instance, the same character, only a little diversified by the diacritical points, forms the Arabic letters Ya and Ba, or Y and B; in the second, Ba and Nûn, Hâa, and Gim, or rather Jim, that is, B and N, H and J, are represented by the same characters, and determined by an omission, and the different positions, of the diacritical points; and, in the third, the powers of Ta and Ba, Za and Ra, that is, T and B, Z and R, are represented and determined (5) in the same manner. This we have thought proper, once for all, to take notice of here, that our readers may not be surprised, if the orthography of proper names should not appear to them perfectly uniform in the different parts of this work. To which we may add, that such an uniformity is likewise prevented from taking place by other concurring causes; since the same words may be considered either as with or without the vowel points, and the same Arabic elements may be expressed differently by our letters with sufficient propriety. So we may write the Arabic proper name answering to Solomon, Solimân, Solymân, Solaimân, Soleiman, Solaymân, or Soleymân; that of the city to which the Moslems go in pilgrimage, either Mecca or Mekka; and that of the metropolis of Khorasân, Nisabûr, Naisabûr, or Neisabûr; to omit a vast number of instances of the same kind, that might with equal facility be produced. However, we chuse to follow that orthography in such words as these, where it may be done with equal propriety, which has been the most generally received; as the contrary practice might seem to favour of pedantry and affectation, the imputation of which we would very willingly avoid (6).

Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Hamdân the honourable surname, or title, of Saifo'ddawla, or Seifo'ddawla,<sup>a</sup> that is, the sword of the state, or of the court. Nay, according to Abu'lfeda, he made him a present of several sumptuous mantles, or clokes, and even constituted him Emîr Al Omrà; though this, it must be owned, runs counter to what has been handed down to us by Al Makîn. Al Barîdi was chased from Baghdâd three months and twenty days after he had possessed himself of that city. The first thing that Nasero'ddawla took upon him to do, after the expulsion of Al Barîdi from Baghdâd, was to reduce the gold coin of the empire to its primitive and original standard; the dinârs at that time having been so much debased, that they were not in reality worth above ten, though they went for thirteen, dirhems. This year, Al Mottaki took Nasero'ddawla's daughter in marriage for his son, and gave her a dower of 500,000 dirhems, and 100,000 dinârs; by which means, Nasero'ddawla reduced the Khalîf to the necessity of alienating his own and his mother's domains, emptied that prince's coffers, and secured to himself all the ready money which could then be raised. This excited great murmurings amongst the Turkish soldiery, and disposed them to come to a rupture with him as soon as a favourable opportunity offered. Nay, they soon after drove his brother Saifo'ddawla from his camp, and even obliged Nasero'ddawla himself to retire to Al Mawfel, if we will believe Abu'l Faraj. It seems to be intimated by the Cambridge Chronicle, that Khalîl, the Magrebian general, returned to Africa, and left Ebn Al Cûfi and Ebn Attâf at Palermo to preside over the Moslems in Sicily, either this or the preceding year. We must not forget to observe, that the Khalîf and Nasero'ddawla entered Baghdâd in the month of Shawâl, attended by a strong body of troops, and put an end to all the disorders that had for some time before been committed in that metropolis. It appears from some of the oriental writers, that Nasero'ddawla was not only master of Al Mawfel, but likewise of a considerable part of Syria and Mesopotamia, when the Khalîf Al Mottaki had the misfortune to be driven this year from Baghdâd.<sup>b</sup>

Mohammed
Ebn Abd'allah Al Mojamelic and Abu'l Hasan
Ali Ebn Abu
Bashar Al
Ashâri die
this year.

THE same year, died Abu Becr Ebn Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Al Mojamelic, a noted Fakih of the sect of Al Shâfi'i, who was born in the year of the Hejra 235; as did also Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Ismael Ebn Abu Bashar Al Ashâri, who was buried in the street called Mashraat Al Zawâya, at Baghdâd. The latter of these was one of the most celebrated doctors of the Moslems, and descended from the tribe to which the famous Abu Mûsa Al Ashâri, whom he ranked amongst his ancestors, belonged; from whence he deduced the surname of Al Ashâri,<sup>c</sup> according to the Mohammedan writers. He was born at Baghdâd, in the 260th year of the Moslem æra, and at first a Môtazalite. But, having differed from his master Abu Ali Al Jobbâi in opinion, as to God's being bound, or obliged, as the Môtazalites assert, to do always that which is best, or most expedient, he left him, and set up a new sect of himself. The occasion of this difference was the putting a case concerning three brothers, the first of whom lived in obedience to God, the second in rebellion against him, and the third died an infant. Al Jobbâi being asked what he thought would become of them, answered, that the first would be rewarded in paradise, the second punished in hell, and the third neither rewarded nor punished. But what, objected Al Ashâri, if the third say, "O LORD, if thou hadst given me longer life, that I might have entered paradise with my believing brother, it would have been better for me." To which Al Jobbâi replied, that God would answer, "I knew that if thou hadst lived longer, thou wouldst have been a wicked person, and therefore cast into hell." Then retorted Al Ashâri, the second will say, "O LORD, why didst thou not take me away while I was an infant, as thou didst my brother, that I might not have deserved to be punished for my sins, nor to be cast into hell?" To which Al Jobbâi could return no other answer, than that God prolonged his life, in order to give him an opportunity of obtaining the highest degree of perfection, which was best for him. But Al Ashâri demanding farther, why he did not for the same reason grant the other a longer life, to whom it would have been equally advantageous; Al Jobbâi was so put to it, that he asked whether the devil possessed him? "No," says Al Ashâri,<sup>d</sup> "but the Sheikh's ass will not pass the bridge;" i. e. "he is posed," or "the dispute is ended." From Al Ashâri's manifest superiority in this dispute, the above-mentioned opinion of the Môtazalites seemed to great numbers of the Moslems indefensible; so that they left Al Jobbâi, and thenceforth adhered to the decisions of Al Ashâri. This gave such offence to the Hanbalites, who in the aforesaid point agreed with the Môtazalites, that they branded Al Ashâri and his followers with the imputation of infidelity; asserted it not only to be lawful, but even meritorious, to kill him, and conceived the most implacable aversion to every one that entertained any favourable sentiments of his sect. Hence it came to pass,

- a that the monument erected over him was afterwards demolished, and even all traces of it destroyed, by his friends, lest the Hanbalites, who were very numerous and powerful in Baghdâd, should dig up his body, and commit it to the flames. Some authors, however, relate, that he was interred very privately; and consequently insinuate, that no monument was ever erected over him, for the reason above assigned. With regard to the conference, or dispute, above-mentioned, between Al Asbâri and Al Jobbâi, we must beg leave to observe, that it has been related by different writers in a different manner; though these relations, in the main, and all the most material circumstances, agree. The principal opinions of the Asbârians were, 1. They allowed the attributes of God to be distinct from his essence, yet so as to forbid any comparison to be made between God and his creatures.
- b This was also the opinion of Abmed Ebn Hanbal, Dawd Al Esfahâni, and others. 2. As to predestination, they held, that God had one eternal will, which is applied to whatsoever he willetb, both of his own actions and those of men, so far as they are created by him, but not as they are acquired, or gained, by them; that he willetb both their good and their evil, their profit and their hurt, and as he willetb and knoweth, he willetb concerning men that which he knoweth, and hath commanded the pen to write the same in the preserved table: and this is his decree, and eternal immutable counsel and purpose. 3. With regard to mortal sin, they taught, that if a believer, guilty of such a sin, die without repentance, his sentence is to be left to God, whether he pardon him out of his mercy, or whether the prophet intercede for him, or whether he punish him in proportion to his demerit, and afterwards, through his mercy, admit him into paradise: but that it is not to be supposed he will remain for ever in hell with the infidels, seeing it is declared that whoever shall have faith in his heart but of the weight of an ant, shall be delivered from hell-fire. And this is generally received for the orthodox doctrine in this point, and is diametrically opposite to that of the Môtazalites. In fine, the chief reason why the Hanbalites bore such a mortal hatred to Al Asbâri and his followers seems to have been this, that the latter maintained, that God only acted according to the general laws he had established; whereas the former, on the contrary, believed, that God always acted according to the particular determinations of his will, and ordered all things for the good, or benefit, of every creature. This hatred rose to such a height, that the Hanbalites breathed nothing
- d but vengeance against the Asbârians, for daring to differ in opinion from them, and even endeavoured to effect their utter excision. They also attempted several times to dig up Al Asbâri's body, in order to reduce it to ashes; but were hindered from carrying their design into execution by the Emîr Al Omrâ, or person placed at the head of the administration in the city of Baghdâd <sup>c</sup>.

- THE next year, being the 331st of the Hejra, beginning Sept. 15th, 942, Nasero'ddawla <sup>Tûzûn is apud</sup> went to Al Mawfel from Baghdâd; of which the Deylamite troops being informed, they <sup>pointed Emîr</sup> plundered his house. His brother Saifo'ddawla soon after followed him thither; having, <sup>Al Omrâ.</sup> with great difficulty, escaped the fury of a body of Turks he commanded at Wâset. However, in a short time, he left Al Mawfel, made the best of his way to Baghdâd, and prevailed upon the Khalîf to put into his hands the sum of 400,000 dinârs, to distribute amongst his forces, in order to engage them to drive Tozûn, or Tûzûn, the Turk, out of the city. But, as soon as the money was paid him, he abandoned the metropolis to Tûzûn, who entered it without opposition the 25th of Ramadân; which obliged the Khalîf to confer upon him the sublime post of Emîr Al Omrâ, though he entertained very unfavourable sentiments of him. About the same time, Al Emîr Sa'id Nasr Ebn Abmed Al Sammâni, the lord, or sovereign, of Khorasân, and several adjacent provinces, after a lingering illness, during which he built a sort of oratory, or private chapel, in his palace, wherein he constantly for some time before his death, performed his devotions, departed this life. He has been represented as a just, pious, merciful, and magnanimous prince; and was
- f succeeded by his son Nûh Al Sammâni, surnamed Al Emîr Al Hamîd, of whom we shall speak more fully hereafter, in the government of Khorasân and Mawarâ'lnabr. Mohammed Ebn Isbak Al Fargâni, a famous doctor of the Sûfis, and Senân Ebn Thâbet Ebn Korra, a most celebrated physician, according to Abu'lfeda, died also before the close of the year we are at present upon. This year, Al Mottaki also sent as a present to the Greek emperor the handkerchief with which our Saviour wiped his face, and wherein the print of his face was to be seen, which had been preserved in the church of Al Robâ, or Edeffa, at present called Orfa; who thereupon released a great number of Moslem prisoners. It appears from Al Makîn, that, before this event happened, the Greeks had made an irruption into the province of Diyâr Beer, laid waste a considerable part of it with fire and sword, killed a vast
- g number of the Moslems there, and carried off many others with them into captivity. They also had taken the cities of Arzan Al Râm, at present Erzerum, and Daras, or Dârâ, and even penetrated to Nisibis, or Nasîbin, called by the latter Syrians Soba. The same author likewise relates, that our Saviour sent the handkerchief above-mentioned to Abgar, the black king of Al Robâ; and that, upon its arrival at Constantinople, it was conducted in great pomp by the patriarch, bishops, Greek nobility, &c. to the church of Santa Sophia, where it was then deposited, and for a long time afterwards remained<sup>f</sup>.

The Khalif is obliged a second time to abandon Baghdâd.

THE following year, being the 332d of the Hejra, commencing Sept. 4th, 943, a robber, supported by Ebn Shîrazâd, one of Tûzûn's chief commanders, to whom he paid monthly for his protection 15,000 dinîrs, appeared in the neighbourhood of Baghdâd, and committed even within sight of that capital terrible depredations. In the mean time, the Khalif Al Mottaki, perceiving that Tûzûn took every day more and more upon him, discovered an inclination to deprive his prime minister of the office he had assigned him the preceding year; which so incensed the Turk, that he obliged the Khalif to abandon a second time the city of Baghdâd. That prince, being thus reduced to the necessity of leaving his capital, formed a design to retire to Al Mawfel. Of which the house of Hamdân, then in possession of that place, having been apprized, Saïfo'ddawla met him first upon the Tigris, at a small distance from Tecrit; and was followed by Nasero'ddawla, who, in short time, joined them there. These princes conducted Al Mottaki to Al Mawfel, attended by an escorte, and for some time treated him there in a manner suitable to his dignity and high rank. But, finding at last that they began to grow weary of him, he meditated a return to Baghdâd; and was accompanied by them to Al Rakka, upon the Euphrates, where, for a short time, he thought fit to reside. From this place he wrote to Tûzûn, and made him some overtures for a reconciliation; intimating in his letter, that, if these proved acceptable to him, he would soon follow them to Baghdâd. This year, the Russians, by means of a fleet they had equipped on the Caspian sea, and the river Corr, or Kor, made an irruption into the Greater Armenia, penetrated as far as the city of Barda'c, or Bardaa, which they took and sacked, and then returned home without having sustained any considerable loss. About the same time, Nasero'ddawla appointed one Mohammed Ebn Ali to preside over the provinces of Kinnisrîn, Hems, and Al Awâsem, which he had annexed to his territories in Mesopotamia. Such a scarcity of all sorts of grain continued now several months at Baghdâd, that the inhabitants of that metropolis were terrified with the thoughts of a famine. The famous Abu Thâber, prince of the Karmatians, died of the small-pox in the year we are now upon. He left behind him three brothers, Sa'îd Abu'l Kasem, the eldest, Abu'l Abbâs, who was of a very weak and infirm constitution, and Abu Yakûb, who was greatly addicted to gaming. The Greeks are said to have taken Râjo'lain, Râs Al Ain, Resaina, or Resena, on Tuesday, the twelfth of the former Rabî, the present year, and to have pillaged the town two whole days. We are likewise told, that they took about 1000 Moslems prisoners in this expedition, and put a very considerable number of the Khalif's subjects to the sword<sup>g</sup>.

Al Mottaki is deposed.

IN the 333d year of the Hejra, beginning Aug. 24th, 944, the Khalif Al Mottaki was deposed by Tûzûn, before he had sat quite four years upon the Moslem throne. In answer to the Khalif's letter, sent him from Al Rakka, towards the close of the preceding year, the usurper assured this prince, that the proposals he had made him for an accommodation were perfectly agreeable to him; that he would engage himself by oath, if required, to perform all the articles of the future treaty demanded of him by the Khalif; and that Al Mottaki might depend upon being received with all the honours due to a person in his sublime station, by him at the head of the troops, and the people of Baghdâd. In the mean time, Al Akhsîd, to whom the Khalif had likewise written, complaining of the miserable situation of his affairs, and desiring that general's assistance against Tûzûn, arrived at Al Rakka, with many rich presents, for Al Mottaki's use; which, with the promise of large sums of money, and a proper body of troops to support his interests, raised the drooping spirits of that prince. However, Tûzûn's answer had such an effect upon him, that he resolved to return to Baghdâd; though both Al Akhsîd and the princes of the house of Hamdân did their utmost to divert him from that resolution, not thinking it safe for him to rely upon the faith of Tûzûn, whom they considered as an insolent and perfidious traitor. But, not being able to prevail upon him to follow such salutary advice, Al Akhsîd departed from Al Rakka for Egypt, taking the route of Haleb, or Aleppo, in his way to Mejr, or Al Fostât; and Nasero'ddawla set out at the same time for Al Mawfel. Soon after which, the Khalif Al Mottaki, who had refused to fix his residence in Egypt, under the protection of Al Akhsîd, left Al Rakka upon the Euphrates, and arrived at Hît, or Heit, a town of Irâk, seated on

- a the northern bank of the Euphrates, at a small distance from the deserts of Al Jazîra, and about twenty-one parasangs off Al Anbâr. Here he staid till he received advice, that Tûzûn had promised again, and even engaged himself by oath, to obey and defend him, upon his arrival at Baghdâd; after which, he set out, with a considerable retinue, for that city. At some distance from which, he was met by Tûzûn, at the head of a body of troops, that formed a camp in a place called Al Sendiya, who lighted off his horse, walked by the Khalîf's stirrup on foot, prostrated himself before him, and assigned him a proper place in his camp, where he treated both him and his family with all possible deference and respect. But, notwithstanding these marks of submission, by which he pretended to have fulfilled his promise, he had no sooner got the poor prince into his hands, than he dispatched
- b a courier to Baghdâd, to bring Abu'l Kasem Abd'allah Ebn Al Mostafi to the camp; whom, in open violation of his oath, and defiance of the most solemn engagements; he caused to be proclaimed Khalîf in the presence of Al Mottaki, and gave him the surname of Al Mostafi. As for the deposed Khalîf, he was soon after deprived of his sight, and reduced to the condition of a private person; in which he lived till the month of Sbaabân, and the year of the Hejra 357, when he departed this life in the 60th, or 61st, year of his age. He was deposed on Saturday, the 20th of Safar, after he had almost completed the fourth year of his Khalifat, according to Al Makin. With regard to his disposition, he has been considered by the eastern writers as a just and religious prince, that had scarce any thing left him besides the bare title of Khalîf, the privilege of having his name impressed upon
- c the current coin, and the liberty of officiating as Imâm in the public mosques. His chamberlains were Salâma, the servant of Hamârûiya, Bedr Al Jersani, and Abmed Ebn Khâkân. In the year of the Hejra 329, when this prince sat upon the Moslem throne, a grievous famine visited several parts of Syria, Mesopotamia, and Irâk; which was succeeded by a dreadful pestilence that raged till the beginning of the next year. At Baghdâd, in particular, the people were forced to live upon bran and hay for a considerable time, and such a frightful mortality hereupon ensued amongst the Moslems there, that many of them were frequently buried in the same grave, and that without either funeral-service or ablution. We are likewise told that the Russians laid siege to Constantinople, and were obliged to abandon that siege, after they had sustained no inconsiderable loss, the very

S E C T. XLIV.

- e THE same day on which Al Motakki was deprived of his power, that is, on Saturday Al Mostafi the 20th of the month Safar, Abu'l Kasem Abd'allah Ebn Al Mostafi Bi'llah was elected <sup>is elected</sup> Khalîf, and had the surname, or title, of Al Mostafi, or rather Al Mostafi Bi'llah, given <sup>Khalîf.</sup> him, at Al Sendiya, by Tûzûn and the other Moslem commanders, then present, who all took the oath of allegiance to him. His mother's name was Gafû, or Ghafû; but from whence she came, or in what country she was born, does not clearly appear from any good author. We are told by Abu'l Faraj, that a woman, named Alam, who was one of Al Mostafi's greatest favourites, having assured a Moslem, very intimate with Tûzûn, that he was an exceeding prudent, pious, and opulent prince, and this having been immediately imparted to Tûzûn, he was, without delay, saluted Emîr Al Mûmenîn, or emperor of the faithful.
- f Upon his accession, he continued his benefactor Tûzûn in the post of Emîr Al Omrà; who, in consequence of this, had the government of Baghdâd, with the district belonging to it, intirely committed to him <sup>1</sup>.

- THE same year, one Abu Yezid Ebn Condâd, of the tribe of Zenat, or Zanat, whose mother was an Ethiopian slave in the city of Tofer, or Tozer, the Tifurus of Ptolemy, rebelled <sup>rebels against</sup> against Al Kayem, the Fâtemite Khalîf of Kairwân, in Africa. His arms were attended <sup>Al Kayem in Africa.</sup> with such wonderful success, that he reduced the cities of Kairwân, Al Rakkâda, and Tunis, besides all the other fortresses of lesser note, overthrew, in a bloody battle, an army sent against him by Al Kayem, besieged that prince himself in the citadel of Al Mohâia for seven months, that is, from the former Jomâda to the last day of Dbu'lhajja, or the conclusion of the present year, and flattered himself with the hopes, as he was reduced to great straits for want of provisions, of starving him to a surrender. We must not forget to observe, that the new Khalîf Al Mostafi released his predecessor Al Kâber from his confinement in the imperial palace, in the latter Rabî, of the year we are now upon, and sent him to the house of Ebn Thâber, that he might not be in a condition to disturb his a future repose, Abu'lfeda relates, that this poor prince had only a cotton shirt on his back, and wooden shoes on his feet, when he was conducted to the place destined for his reception <sup>k</sup>.

The operations of this campaign in Syria.

NOT long after the deposition of Al Mottaki, Saifo'ddawla, according to Abu'lfeda, made himself master of Hems and Aleppo; but was forced to raise the siege of Damascus by Al Akhsîd, who pursued him into the prefecture of Kinnisrîn, and brought him to a general action there. Victory, however, declared absolutely on neither side; upon which, Al Akhsîd returned to Damascus, and Saifo'ddawla to Al Mawfel. Soon after which, the Greeks made an irruption into Syria, and penetrated almost as far as Aleppo; but were b overthrown by Saifo'ddawla, and forced to fly into the Christian territories, with very considerable loss. Some authors, however, have related the operations of this campaign in Syria in a different manner; of which farther notice will hereafter be taken in a proper place <sup>l</sup>.

Moezzo'd-dawla assumes
the title and office of Emir
Al Omrà.

THE next year, being the 334th of the Hejra, commencing August 13th, 945, Tûzûn departed this life, in the month of Al Moharram, at Baghdâd. He was succeeded in the sublime office of Emîr Al Omrà by Zairac Ebn Shîrazâd, a Turk, in the violence and impetuosity of his disposition no way inferior to his predecessor, to whom the army took the oath of fidelity, as well as to the Khalîf. Zairac was at Hît, or Heit, a town of Irâk upon the Euphrates, when that honourable post was conferred upon him; but being obliged to take upon himself the government without delay, he immediately set out from thence for c Baghdâd. In the mean time, Moezzo'ddawla Ebn Bûiya, having received advice of the death of Tûzûn, moved with a strong body of troops from Abwâz, into the neighbourhood of Baghdâd; of which the Khalîf and Ebn Shîrazâd being informed they hid themselves, and the Turks abandoned the city to Moezzo'ddawla, retiring with great precipitation towards Al Mawfel, at his approach. Soon after the retreat of the Turkish forces, Moezzo'ddawla took possession of Baghdâd, recognized the authority of Al Mostacî, who appeared in his imperial robes before him, appointed Ebn Shîrazâd to preside over all the officers employed in collecting the tribute and public revenues, and assumed to himself the charge of Emîr Al Omrà. This pacification was effected by the intervention of Al Hasan Ebn Mohammed Al Mohallebi, one of Moezzo'ddawla's most intimate friends, on the twelfth of the former d Jomâda, the day on which that prince entered Baghdâd. And, in commemoration of this happy event, the Khalîf gave him the name, surname, or title, of Moezzo'ddawla, or the strength and support of the court, or of the state. His brother Ali also, at the same time, was denominated by Al Mostacî Amado'ddawla, or the pillar of the court, or of the state; and his other brother Al Hasan Rucno'ddawla, or Rocno'ddawla, that is, the angular stone of the court, or of the state. The Khalîf, in order to testify the high regard he had for them, likewise commanded all their names, surnames, and titles, to be stamped, or impressed, upon the current coin. As for Moezzo'ddawla, he distributed his troops over all parts of the city of Baghdâd, occupied himself the house, or palace, that had been built for Mînes, and assigned Al Mostacî, for the subsistence of himself and his family, a daily allowance e of 5000 dirhems <sup>m</sup>.

The Khalîf
is deposed.

BUT the repose of the Khalîfat was soon disturbed by the intrigues of Alam, Al Mostacî's female favourite, who was now no less instrumental in his deposition, than she had before been in his elevation to the Moslem throne. For Moezzo'ddawla having been apprized, that she was caballing with some of the great men at court, who formed a faction there, in order to remove him from the post of Emîr Al Omrà, he appeared at the head of a strong party in the Khalîf's palace, on the 22d of the latter Jomâda, being the day appointed by that prince for granting an audience to the ambassador of the Emîr of Khorasân. Moezzo'ddawla, according to custom, took his seat close by the Khalîf, and prostrated himself before him; which ceremony was scarce over, when two Deylamite officers approached Al f Mostacî, who held out one of his hands to each of them to kiss; but, to his great surprize, they seized upon him, dragged him from his throne, tied his turban, which they had before unfolded, about his neck, and hurried him away to Moezzo'ddawla's palace, where he was immediately thrown into irons. As for Alam, who had been the principal cause of this new revolution, the conspirators seized upon her, and cut out her tongue. They also, by Moezzo'ddawla's order, deprived Al Mostacî of his sight, and plundered the imperial palace. This Khalîf reigned only one year, four months, and two days; though he did not die before the year of the Hejra 338, being then in the 41st year of his age. Helâl

He served likewise, in the capacity of physician, Tûzûn, Al Mostacfi's first Emîr Al Omrâ; of whose knowledge and abilities he entertained a very mean opinion, according to Abu'l Faraj. It appears from Al Makin, that the emperor Romanus was deposed by his sons, Constantine and Stephen, on the 26th of the latter Rabî, in the year of the Hejra 333; and that they confined him afterwards to a monastery in the island of Prote, called Al Abrûi by the Arabs. ## S E C T. XLV.

- c THE same day that Al Mostacfi was deposed, that is, the 22d of the former Jomâda, Al Motî is Abu'l Kasem Al Fadl Ebn Al Moktader was created Khalif, and inaugurated at Baghdâd. <sup>created Kha-</sup>
The new Khalif, whose mother's name was Masa'la, received the surname, or title, of Al<sup>1st</sup> Motî, or rather Al Motî Li'llab, and continued Moezzo'ddawla Ahmed Ebn Bûiya in the office of Emîr Al Omrâ; having himself no other share of the public revenues, nor of the power and authority formerly annexed to his sublime station, than what that prime minister, or rather haughty usurper, was pleased to allow him. Nor would Moezzo'ddawla permit him to have a Wazîr, or even any servant whatsoever, except a secretary, whose sole business it was to keep an exact account of the money with which he was supplied out of the treasury, and the expences of his family <sup>o</sup>.
- d THE unsettled state of affairs at Baghdâd excited Nasero'ddawla Al Hasan Ebn Abd'allah <sup>Nasero'ddawla</sup> Ebn Hamdân, the lord, or Emîr, of Al Mawfel, to undertake an expedition against that city, or rather against the Deylamite forces, under Moezzo'ddawla Ahmed Ebn Bûiya, then <sup>la posses- himself of the east rn part of</sup> Baghdad.
cantonèd in it. As the people of Baghdâd, according to Khondemir, had before requested Moezzo'ddawla Ahmed Ebn Bûiya to deliver them from the tyranny of Zairac Ebn Shîrazâd, the Turk; so now, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, they seem to have called in to their assistance Nasero'ddawla, in order to expel the Deylamites, whose yoke at this time began to sit very heavy upon them. Moezzo'ddawla having received advice of Nasero'ddawla's approach, quitted the city with great precipitation, and conducted the Khalif Al Motî, whom he took along with him, to Tecrit, a place belonging to Nasero'ddawla; which he gave up to his
- e troops to be plundered, ravaged the adjacent territory in a dreadful manner, and then returned to Baghdâd. Upon his arrival there, he found that Nasero'ddawla had possessed himself of that part of the town seated on the eastern bank of the Tigris; and that it would be extremely difficult, if not impracticable to dislodge him from thence. However, he took post with all his forces in the other part, and made the proper dispositions for attacking the enemy. Before the close of the year, the Deylamite parties frequently skirmished with those of the Hamdânites, which occasioned a considerable effusion of Moslem blood; but nothing decisive happened on either side. In the mean time, the Khalif himself seems to have been treated with great contempt; not the least mention being made of his name, during these troubles, in any of the mosques of Baghdâd <sup>p</sup>.
- f IN the month of Safar, this year, the rebel Abu Yezid raised the siege of Al Mokdîa; Al Kayem and, in that of Shawâl, Al Kayem Abu'l Kasem Mohammed Ebn Al Mohdî, the Fâtemite Khalif and Al Akh- of Kairwân, died in his capital city. He was succeeded by his son Ismael, who assumed <sup>this die, and</sup> the surname, or title of Al Mansûr. On the 22d of Dbu'lhajja, the famous Mohammed <sup>Saifo'ddawla is driven from</sup> Al Akhsbid, the sovereign of Egypt, and part of Syria, departed this life at Damascus. He was born, in the 268th year of the Hejra, at Baghdâd. A little before he left Egypt, in order to march against Saifo'ddawla, and not long before his death, he found in his palace a satirical schedule, written by an unknown hand. This piece was penned with great bitterness and virulence, censured his conduct in the most severe terms, and contained some menaces, which made no inconsiderable impression upon him. After his decease, Abu'l
- g Kasem Mahmûd, or, as he was called in the Turkish language, Abu'l Kasem Anûjûr, his son, mounted the throne of Egypt; but being a child, Câfûr, an Ethiopian, one of his father's eunuchs, took the government of that kingdom upon him. In the mean time, Saifo'ddawla made himself master of Damascus, and fixed his residence there. But having, by his indiscreet behaviour, alienated the affections of the people of that large and opulent city from him; they implored the protection of Câfûr, and, by the assistance of the Egyptian forces, expelled him from thence. Before Câfûr returned to Mesr, Misr, or Al I'ojât, he appointed Badr, or Bedr, who had formerly been one of Al Akhsîd's slaves, to preside over Damascus, and all the circumjacent tract. Bedr continued about a year in that post, and was succeeded by Abu'l Modhaffer Ebn Tagaj, Al Akhsîd's brother. After his expulsion from Damascus, Saifo'ddawla went to Aleppo, and shut himself up in that place. About the same time, died the Wazîr Ali Ebn Isa Ebn Al Farra, in the 91st year of his age; Omar Ebn Al Hosein Al Kharaki, a doctor of the sect of Abmed Ebn Hanbal; Abu Becr Al Shabali, a Sûfi of great austerity of life, whose father had been chamberlain to Al Mowaffek, brother to the Khalîf Al Mo'tamed, and Mohammed Ebn Isa, commonly called Abu Mûsa, a celebrated Fakih of the Hanefite sect. It appears from Al Makîn, that there was so great a scarcity of grain the present year at Baghdâd, that it occasioned a dreadful famine; and that, during part of the time of this public calamity, several women roasted and boiled children, in order to eat them; for which they were put to death, and their bodies thrown into the Tigris. We are likewise told by Abulfeda, that so grievous a famine raged this year at Baghdâd, that a person was taken up, when he was upon the point of eating a child he had roasted for food; and that this was followed by a pestilence, which swept away a vast number of the inhabitants of that miserable city <sup>a</sup>.

The military operations of the year 335.

IN the 335th year of the Hejra, beginning Aug. 2d, 946, it was rumoured at Baghdâd, that Rucno'ddawla Al Hasan Ebn Bûiya had seized upon Ray, and subdued all the neighbouring mountainous tract. The same year, Saifo'ddawla took the castle of Ziyâd, and made an irruption into the Christian territories, where he committed dreadful ravages and depredations. A great number of prisoners likewise fell into his hands. He also defeated an imperial army, sent to oppose him, killed 200,000 Greeks upon the spot, took 2000 prisoners, and then retired into his own dominions, without having sustained any considerable loss. We must not forget to observe, that Abu Becr Al Sawli, a man extremely well versed in all kinds of polite literature, and particular history, who had for one of his scholars the famous Al Darcathani, and wrote many excellent books, departed this life, the present year <sup>c</sup>.

Saifo'ddawla's success, in the year 336.

THE following year, being the 336th of the Hejra, commencing July 23d, 947, Saifo'ddawla besieged the castle of Bursa, or Bursia, in Bithynia, the Pruja of the antients; which surrendered to him the beginning of the next campaign. The imperial general also took the fortress of Al Hadb, and dismantled it, as we learn from Al Makîn. Saifo'ddawla likewise demolished the walls of Bursa, and ruined its fortifications, as appears from the same author. About this time, Al Moterassi, prince of the Karmatians, with a body of Arabs, overthrew Abu Awîl Ebn Dawd Ebn Hamdân, who had been made by his cousin-german Saifo'ddawla governor of Hems. This defeat put that city, with all its dependencies, into the victor's hands. Of which Saifo'ddawla being informed, he marched with a body of troops from Aleppo, and came up with Al Moterassi in the territory of Damascus; upon which a sharp and bloody conflict ensued. This battle ended in the entire defeat of Al Moterassi, who was killed in the action, and all his men, except a few that made their escape, put to the sword. Saifo'ddawla ordered the head of the Karmatian to be cut off, and carried in triumph upon the point of a lance to Aleppo; on which occasion, an elegant distich of Arabic verses was composed by Abu Farâs Ebn Hamdân, that has been preserved by Al Makîn. That prince reached Aleppo in about ten days time, attended by his cousin-german Abu Awîl Ebn Dawd Ebn Hamdân, whom he had delivered out of the enemies hands. Soon after this, Moezzo'ddawla Abmed Ebn Bûiya had an interview at Al Marwef with Saifo'ddawla; which terminated in a treaty of peace, or rather an alliance, between those two powerful princes. The treaty was no sooner concluded, than Moezzo'ddawla, pleased with the success of this negotiation, took his leave of Saifo'ddawla, and returned to Baghdâd <sup>d</sup>.

The Fâtemite Khalîf, Ismael Al Mansûr, extinguishes the rebellion in Africa.

THE same year, Ismael Al Mansûr, the Emîr of Libya, as he is called by Abu'lfeda, or rather the Khalîf of Kairwân, in the month of Ramâdan, returned in triumph to Al Mohdîa. The rebellion in Africa had been extinguished by that prince, who overthrew Abu Yezid in two engagements, the preceding year, by the reduction of Al Catâma, or Al Cottâma, a fortress of very great strength, that surrendered to him in the month of Al Moharram, 336. The rebel Abu Yezid had defended this place with great bravery, for a considerable time; and, when it was obliged to capitulate, he endeavoured to make his escape. But, a being closely pursued by a detachment of the Khalif's forces, he was at last taken, loaded with irons, and thrown into prison; where, being grievously wounded, a few days after the surrender of Al Catima, he expired. After his death Al Mansûr ordered him to be flay'd, and his skin to be stuffed with hay; which was no sooner done, than expresses were dispatched into all the provinces that formed the Khalifat of Kairwân, in order to communicate to the people of those provinces the news of the success that had attended the Khalif's arms. But the transactions of this part of the world, during the present period, will be more largely descanted upon hereafter, in a place to which they more properly belong <sup>1</sup>.

In the 337th year of the Hejra, beginning July 11th, 948, Moezzo'ddawla Ahmed Ebn Bâiya made himself master of Al Mawfel; Nasero'ddawla, then the Emîr of that place, retiring at his approach to Nasîbîn. But receiving advice that the Emîr, or lord, of Kho-raçân had broke into his territories with a very respectable force; he thought fit to abandon his new conquest, which thereupon returned to its former sovereign, who took immediate possession of it. About the same time, Saifo'ddawla made an irruption into the imperial provinces; but was defeated by the Greeks, who after the action, took Ma'raçh, and laid siege to Tarsus. Either this or the preceding year, Ismael Al Mansûr, the Khalif of Kairwân, sent Al Hâsan Ebn Ali Ebn Abu'l Hosein Al Calbi from Africa to preside over the Moslem conquests in Sicily. The new Emîr's father, Ali Ebn Abu'l Hosein Al Calbi, married the daughter of Sâlem Ebn Al Rasbîd, a former governor of Sicily, and was killed in an action between the Gergentines and Khalil, the Magrebian general, already taken notice of, in the year of the Hejra 327. Al Hasan reduced most of the Christian part of the island to the obedience of the Magrebian Khalif, and governed the people committed to his care with great prudence, equity, and moderation. This we learn from the Cambridge Chronicle, from Abu'lfeda, from Al Kâdi Shabâbo'ddîn Ebn Abildâm Al Hamawî, and from Abu Mohammed Abd'alaziz Ebn Shedad Tamim Al Sanhâjî, the author of the Akbbâr Kairwân, or the history of Kairwân, who gives a very particular account of Al Hasan, and his administration, in his piece, intituled, The annals of Sicily. It seems to appear from some writers of good repute, that this Emîr had the investiture of the island of Sicily granted him by Al Mansûr; and that he assumed to himself at this time, by a sort of hereditary right, the government of it. We are informed by the authors followed by Al Makîn, that Mohammed Ebn Nasero'ddawla attacked the Greeks that made an irruption into the Moslem provinces, killed 400 of them upon the spot, and took a great number of them prisoners, the present year <sup>2</sup>.

The next year, being the 338th of the Hejra, commencing July 1st, 949, Amado'ddawla Abu'l Hasan Ebn Bâiya, who had laboured under a long illness at Shîràz, where he had fixed his residence, departed this life. An old ulcer in his kidneys, and a complication of disorders proceeding from thence put a period to his days, in the latter Jomâda. At the time of his death, he had reigned at Shîràz sixteen years, and was about fifty-seven lunar years old. He was the eldest of the sons of Bâiya, and a prudent and magnanimous prince. The Khalifs, in their letters to him, always gave him the title of Emîr Al Omrà; and the Khalif Al Motî Li'llah honoured his heir and successor Adado'ddawla, after his death, with the same title. In the last year but one of his life, perceiving his end to be at no great distance, he wrote to his brother Rucno'ddawla to send him his son Adado'ddawla Fanâkbofrâ, whom he had appointed to succeed him, as he should leave no male issue behind him. Nor did Rucno'ddawla refuse complying with his request. Upon his nephew's arrival, therefore, at Shîràz, Amado'ddawla dignified him with the title and power of Soltân (B), placed him upon his throne, and commanded all the nobles and grandees of his court

(B) Though the word Soltân, or Al Soltân, occurs as a title in the passage of Abu'lfeda here referred to, yet it seems not to have been directly applied to any of the eastern princes in that sense before the year of the Hejra 393. For, we are informed by some good oriental writers, that Mahmûd Gazni, the son of Sabektekin, was first dignified with this title by Khalaf Ebn Ahmed, the governor of Serjîstân, or Sijîstân, in that year. It was then, according to them, first adopted in the room of the term Emîr, which till that time had been constantly used. The word Soltân is common to the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic language; and denotes a king, prince, lord, or emperor. The princes of the dynasties preceding the Gaznawids, such were the Tâberian, Sassânian, Sammânian, Deylamite, &c. went amongst their subjects under the denomination of Emîr, or Al Emîr; whereas the Gaznawids, Khorârazmians, Seljukians, and the later Mohammedan potentates, were generally styled by the people they governed Soltân, or Al Soltân. Nay, the title of Soltân, or Sultan, is at court to obey him. After his uncle's decease, Adado'ddawla ascended the Persian throne; a but, being despised by the army, that refused to execute his orders, his father Rucno'ddawla came from Al Ray to Shiráz, to settle his government upon a solid and lasting foundation. The first thing Rucno'ddawla did after his arrival was, to walk bare-legged to Estakbr, to visit his brother's tomb; all the troops following him with their legs likewise bare, and forming a sort of august procession, on this doleful occasion. After he had staid three days at the tomb, performing his devotions there, he was with some difficulty, prevailed upon by the officers of the army to return to Shiráz. It seems to appear from Abu'lfeda, that Rucno'ddawla succeeded his brother Amado'ddawla in the dignity and title of Emír Al Omrá; and that Moezzo'ddawla, the youngest of the sons of Báiya, was never really dignified with that title. For, though he was possessed of Irák, in which b the capital of the Moslem empire was seated, and the Emírs Al Omrá did consequently reside there; yet, according to this author, he was considered only first as his brother Amado'ddawla's, and afterwards as Rucno'ddawla's, deputy, or lieutenant, in that province *.

The Sicilians
conspire against Al Hasan,
their Emír.

THE same year, some of the principal Sicilians entered into a conspiracy against Al Hasan Ebn Ali Ebn Abu'l Hosein Al Calbi, the Emír of that island; but it was discovered, by the policy and address of the Emír, when it was upon the point of being carried into execution. The ringleaders being seized, the most guilty of them had their hands and feet cut off, and were afterwards either hanged or impaled. The chief of these were one Koreish and his associates. After condign punishment had been inflicted upon the principal of the conspirators, a calm immediately ensued, and the public tranquillity in the Moslem part of c the island was intirely restored. We must not forget to observe, that the Khalif Al Mostacfi Bi'llah, who had been deposed in 334, died in prison, the present year *.

Saifo'ddawla
defeats the Greeks, and is overthrown
by them in his turn.

THE following year, being the 339th of the Hejra, beginning June 20th, 950, the Karmatians sent back to Mecca the celebrated black stone, belonging to the temple there, after a detention of it in their custody twenty-two years. About the same time, Saifo'ddawla penetrated into the territories of the Greek emperor, laid a considerable tract therein, which he ravaged for two months together without controul, waste with fire and sword, and carried off with him a vast number of that prince's subjects into captivity. He also at last came up with the imperial general at Al Malakát, beyond Kbarsena, and attacked him d with such bravery that he put him to flight, killed 30,000 of his men upon the spot, and took 2000 of them prisoners. But he was soon after himself attacked by the Greeks, in the mountainous defile of Maki'alathafár, or Makt'aladhafár, near Al Massífiya, in Al Rám, and overthrown with véry great slaughter; having scarce been able, with a few of his shattered troops, to make his escape. The next day, according to Al Makín, the imperial general put 5000 of the country people, who probably had assisted the enemy in this invasion, to the sword, and made 3000 of them slaves. To which we may add, from Abu'l Faraj, that the Greeks recovered all the spoil and prisoners that had fallen into the hands of Saifo'ddawla, as well as seized upon all the baggage, military chest, &c. of the Moslems, whose retreat they found means to cut off, on this memorable occasion *.

THE same year, died Abu'l Kasem Abd'alrahmán Ebn Ishak, known by the name of Al e Zajjaj, the most celebrated grammarian of his age, and particularly famous for the excellent grammar he composed, intituled, Al Jaml; as did likewise Abu Nasr Mohammed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Tarkhán Al Fârábi, a Moslem philosopher of exceeding great note. The latter of these learned men was by nation a Turk, born at Otrár, a very large city of Turkestán, or Mawarâ'lnahr, known also amongst the Arabs by the names of Fâráb and Fâriáb; from whence Abu Nasr derived the appellation of Al Fârábi. He understood several languages besides the Turkish, which was his mother-tongue; and, after his arrival at Baghdád, applied himself to the study of the Arabic, a competent knowledge of which he soon acquired. He was instructed in logic and philosophy by Abu Basfar Matta Ebn Túnes, one of the most eminent logicians and philosophers of the age in which he lived. Having made a f considerable progress in these studies, he removed to Harrán, where he farther improved himself, by the assistance of Abu'l Haya, a Christian philosopher; and, after his return to Bagh-

- a dād, finished the studies he had so happily begun there. From thence he undertook a journey through Damascus to Mesr, Misr, or Al Fostât; and, after some stay there, retired to the former of those cities. Here he resided, when Saifo'ddawla was sovereign of the place, and had many favours conferred upon him by that prince. His speeches and harangues were always received with uncommon applause, and he soon outshined all the learned that resorted to Saifo'ddawla's court. But, notwithstanding this, and the due encouragement given his rare merit, he affected solitude, and seemed extremely fond of a retired life. He was exceedingly well versed in the Aristotelian philosophy, understood music, translated Aristotle's Analytics, and left many monuments of his vast erudition behind him. He generally appeared either in the Turkish dress, or that of the Sûfis, and had riches and every species of luxury in the greatest contempt; being himself so temperate and abstemious, that he lived upon four dirhems a day, which Saifo'ddawla allowed him for his subsistence. After his death, which happened at Damascus, he was buried without the little gate there, and died in the 80th lunar year of his age. With regard to Otrâr, the place of his nativity, it may not be improper to remark, that it is situate upon the bank of a small river, called by Abu'lfeda the river Al Shâsh, towards the frontiers of the Kalmaks, not far from Balâsâgûn, or Balâshâgûn; though Sharîfaddîn, in his life of Timûr Bek, removes it two parasangs from the northern bank of the Sihûn, or Sîr. The last author likewise observes, that the river Arj, with a bridge over it, runs about a league to the east of this city; as also that it is six stages from Tâsh-kunt, and twenty-six parasangs from Samerkand. It was the capital, or metropolis, of Turkestan in the year of our LORD 1200, when Soltân Kotboddîn Mokammed Ebn Taccash Khwarazm Shâh took it from Karakitay Kûrkhan, king of Turkestan. The city of Otrâr, whose inhabitants are for the most part of the sect of Al Shâfeï, has been described by Al Berjendi, the geographer. The famous Timûr Bek, or Timûr Beg, died here, in the year of the Hejra 807, and of CHRIST 1405; a more distinct and circumstantial account of which event our readers may hereafter expect, in a future part of this work <sup>2</sup>.

- IN the 340th year of the Hejra, commencing June 9th, 951, Faraj Mobaddad, surnamed Saklabi, arrived at Palermo from Africa, with a powerful fleet, and a strong body of land-forces on board. The African troops being joined by the Sicilian auxiliaries, under the command of Al Hasan, the Emîr, Saklabi set sail with them for Reggio; but, upon his arrival there, found that both the inhabitants and the garison had abandoned the place at his approach. After which, the Moslems besieged Kassâna and Jerûja, two fortresses subject to the emperor; but could not reduce them to the obedience of the African Khalîf. However, according to the Cambridge Chronicon, Saklabi concluded a treaty with them, took hostages from them for their future good behaviour, and then returned to Sicily. This year died
Abd'allah Ebn Al Hossein Al Karkhi, a celebrated Hanefite Fakih, a Motazalite, of uncommon sanctity and austerity of life, who was born in the year of the Hejra 260; as did also Abu Ishak Ibrahim Ebn Ahmed Ebn Ishak Al Merûzi, or Al Marwazi, a Fakih of the sect of Al Shâfeï, at Mesr. This Abu Ishak wrote many books, that were held in good esteem, and was confiered as the general of his order, or principal of the followers of Al Shâfeï, in the province of Irâk <sup>3</sup>.
- THE next year, being the 341st of the Hejra, beginning May 29th, 952, Yusef Ebn
Wajîb, the lord, or Emîr, of Omân, being joined by a body of Karmatian troops, besieged both by sea and land the city of Basra. But Al Mohallebi, Moezzoddawla's Wazîr, having put himself at the head of the Khalîf's forces, in order to attack him, Ebn Wajîb thought fit to abandon the siege, after he had lain only a few days before the town, and to retire with such precipitation that the Wazîr could not come up with him. This precipitate retreat, or rather flight, occasioned such an intire dispersion of his troops, that they could never afterwards be brought into the field. The Magrebian general Saklabi, who seems to have remained in a state of inaction this year, in Sicily, took up his winter-quarters at Palermo, and left his ships at Messina; fully intending to pay the enemy a visit in Calabria, the following spring. Abu Thâker Ismael Al Mansûr, the Fâtemite Khalîf of Kairwân, died in the month of Shawâl at Al Mohdia, after he had sat upon the Magrebian throne seven years and sixteen days, in the thirty-ninth year of his age. He was an eloquent and magnanimous prince, and left the Khalîfat of Kairwân to his son Abu Tamîm Mo'ad, or Ma'bad, surnamed Al Moezz Ledin'llah, the first Fâtemite Khalîf of Egypt, of whom we shall have occasion hereafter more fully to speak. About the same time, Abu Ali Ismael Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ismael Al Saffar, a celebrated grammarian and traditionist, who had been one of the scholars of the famous Al Mobarred, likewise departed this life. The Greeks made an irruption into Mesopotamia, pillaged the city of Sarug, or Saruj, antiently called Batnan, being the Batnæ of Stephanus, and the Batnæ of Procopius, about ten miles from Idessa, and as many from Birta and Harrân, according to the Itinerary of Antoninus, plundered the mosques there, and carried away with them a vast number of the Moslems into captivity, the present year <sup>b</sup>.

The Greeks are overthrown by the Moslems in Calabria. THE following year, being the 342d of the Hejra, commencing May 18th, 953, Saklabi, according to the Cambridge Chronicle, invaded Calabria with a powerful army, and overthrew the imperial forces commanded by Meljân, Malacianus, or Malacanus, as he is called by Curopolates, who was himself taken prisoner in the action, together with several other officers of very considerable note. The Moslem admiral, Abu Mohel, for some heinous offence, was sent by Saklabi in chains to Africa, where he was afterwards hanged. Al Hasan left the government of Sicily to his son Abmed, and returned to Kairwân. Nothing remarkable seems to have happened this year either in the remoter eastern provinces, or on the side of Baghdâd <sup>c</sup>.

The principal events of the year 343: IN the 343d year of the Hejra, beginning May 7th, 954, died Nûb, or Noab, Ebn Nafr Ebn Abmed Ebn Ismael Al Sammâni, the Emîr of Khorasân and the Transoxana, in the latter Rabî, after he had reigned there about twelve years. His subjects honoured him with the title of Al Emîr Al Hamîd, the laudable prince, upon account of his rare merit and most excellent administration. He was succeeded by his son Abd'almalec, the principal events of whose reign will hereafter be related at large. In the former Rabî, Saifo'ddawla made an irruption into the imperial territories, and overthrew the Greeks with exceeding great slaughter; though he himself sustained a very considerable loss. About the same time, according to Abu'lfeda, Moezzo'ddawla, sent Sabektekin, with a body of troops to reduce Shaharzûl, Shaharzûr, or Sharczûr, a city of Al Jebûl in the Persian Irâk; but without effect. The emperor Constantine, surnamed Porphyrogenitus, dispatched Joannes Xieratus, called by the Cambridge Chronicle Asûrbâs, into Sicily, this year, to beg a truce of the Moslems there; which being granted, the Magrebian troops under Saklabi returned to Africa. We must not forget to observe, that Mohammed Ebn Al Abbâs, surnamed Ebn Al Nabwi, a celebrated Fakih, and Mohammed Ebn Al Kasem Al Karkbi, departed this life, the present year <sup>d</sup>.

and of the year 344. THE next year, being the 344th of the Hejra, commencing April 27th, 955, an accident happened, that occasioned an open rupture between Al Moezz and Abd'alrahmân, the Khalifs of Kairwân and Andalusia; of which Abu'lfeda, not to mention other authors, has handed down to us the following particulars. Abd'alrahmân having sent a merchantman to Alexandria, this ship gave chase to, and took, another, sent by the Emîr of Sicily to Al Moezz, with an ambassador and his dispatches on board; which so incensed the Khalif of Kairwân, that he immediately fitted out a fleet, with a body of land-forces on board, to make reprisals on the Khalif of Andalusia's subjects. This fleet, which was reinforced with a Sicilian squadron, soon after entered the port of Almeria, and burnt all the ships riding at anchor there, except the large merchantman above-mentioned, which Al Hasan, the late Emîr of Sicily, who commanded Al Moezz's fleet, seized upon, with a number of singing-girls and a very valuable cargo on board, belonging to Abd'alrahmân himself, as lawful prize. Not content with this, Al Hasan made a descent with the troops on board the combined fleet upon the coast of Granada, which he ravaged in a dreadful manner, put many of the Spanish Moslems to the sword, and then returned safe to Al Mohdia, without having sustained any considerable loss. Abd'alrahmân, having received advice of these hostilities and depredations, immediately equipped a strong squadron to cruise on the coast of Africa, and, if possible, to land a body of troops there. But this squadron, having been worsted in an engagement with Al Moezz's fleet, was obliged to return home, without having effected any thing of note. This year, died Abu Ali Ebn Mobtaj, Nûb Al Sammâni's general in Khorasân; who having been dismissed by that prince, took on in Rucno'ddawla Ebn Bûiya's service, and in his service ended his days <sup>e</sup>.

Saifo'ddawla is defeated by the emperor's forces. THE following year, being the 345th of the Hejra, beginning April 15th, 956, Saifo'ddawla broke into the Christian provinces; and made himself master of Tel Batrik, or Tel Patricia, a strong fortress not far from Malatia, Malathia, or Melitene, the capital of the Lesser Armenia. The imperial troops, under the command of Zimisces, being too weak to oppose him, retired at his approach. However, the imperial general posted a detachment of his troops in a defile on the mountains, through which Saifo'ddawla was to pass; who, upon his arrival there, was surprised by the Greeks, and attacked with such fury, that he a was obliged to betake himself to flight. A considerable part of his men were slain on the field of battle, and many of them taken prisoners. His military chest likewise, and all his baggage, fell into the enemies hands; and had not the darkness of the night hindered the pursuit, not one of the Moslems would have escaped. Abu'l Ashbyer, Saifo'ddawla's Wazir, was taken prisoner by Leo, another imperial commander, and sent to Constantinople, where he died in chains. As for Saifo'ddawla himself, after his defeat, he retired to Adana in Cilicia, and from thence made the best of his way to Aleppo, not a little chagrined at his ill success. This year, Theophanius, a native of Alexandria, was constituted patriarch of the Jacobites there; who, after he had sat about four years and an half in the patriarchal see, came to a violent death. About the same time, Anmâr, or Ebn Anmâr, arrived with another *Magreb-

b*ian fleet on the coast of Sicily from Africa, wintered at Palermo, and advanced to the borders of Calabria, the following spring. Basilus Protospatharius, the imperial admiral, landed a body of troops at Reggio, demolished a mosque there, made a descent on Sicily, reduced the city of Thermab, the Thermæ Himerenses of the antients, and the modern Termini, and overthrew the Emîr with very great slaughter near Mazara, in the year we are now upon<sup>1</sup>.

THE same year, the king of Nubia laid siege to Afwân, or, as Ebn Khalecân thinks it ought to be pronounced, Ufwân, the Syene of the antients, a city of Al Sa'id, or the Upper Egypt, seated on the eastern bank of the Nile, and the confines of Ethiopia. The Nubian forces, meeting with no enemy to oppose them, soon made themselves masters of the place, levelled it with the ground, carried off many of its inhabitants into captivity, and put the rest to the sword. The Egyptians, receiving advice of what had happened, sent an army in quest of the king of Nubia; which at last came up with him, intirely defeated him, took a great number of his men prisoners, and dispersed the rest. After this, they penetrated into the Nubian territories, and carried a fortress there called Al Rîm by assault; with which they concluded the operations of the campaign. For a farther account of Afwân, at present a poor small town, with a sort of fortress, or rather barrack for Janizaries, under their governor, on the height over which are the ruins of the antient Syene, exactly under the tropic of Cancer, according to Dr. Pococke, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to the authors cited here<sup>2</sup>.

BEFORE we conclude our relation of the principal events of the present year, it may not be improper to remark, that Abu Omar Mohammed Ebn Abd'al Wahed, a person of uncommon sanctity, who had formerly been servant to Al Thalabi, the grammarian, and therefore was sometimes denominated Golam Al Thalabi, but more frequently Al Motharrez, departed this life, before the close of it. He was one of the most excellent philologists of the age wherein he lived; but so eagerly bent upon pursuing his studies, that he scarce found time to supply himself with food, and was always in very necessitous circumstances. He has been represented by Abu'lfeda as a person of such extensive reading, and so prodigious a memory, as will not easily be admitted for truth by the readers of that celebrated historian. Nor, indeed, does that writer himself seem to give a full and absolute assent to what he has extracted from other authors on this head<sup>3</sup>.

IN the 346th year of the Hejra, commencing April 5th, 957, died Al Sallâr Al Marzabân, the lord, or Emîr, of Adherbijân, and left for his heir his son Al Hasan; who, however, never ascended his father's throne. For, Wahsbûdân, Al Marzabân's brother, having found means to sow the seeds of discord amongst his nephews, easily possessed himself of Adherbijân, and wrested from them all the government of that province. This year, likewise, died Abu Ishak Ibrahim Ebn Mohammed, a Fakih of Bokhâra, surnamed Al Amin, that is, the faithful, or trusty; as did also Abu'l Abbâs Ebn Yakûb, of the house of Ommiyah, born in the city of Nisâbûr, or Naisâbûr, and known by the surname of Al Asammî, or the deaf, the series of whose traditions is of the most noble kind, as having been derived from Al Rabî, a disciple of the famous Al Shâfe'i himself. Amongst the memorable events of the present year, Ebn Al Atshîr mentions a wonderful reflux, or rather, as he terms it, a decrease, of the sea, by which it ebbed eighty ells, and thereby discovered several whole islands and high mountains, that had never before appeared; but in what part of the world this surprising phænomenon happened, or what were the consequences of it, we neither learn from him nor any other good writer<sup>4</sup>.

THE next year, being the 347th of the Hejra, beginning March 25th, 958, Al Mawfel dawla Ebn Bûiya seized upon Al Mawfel; upon which, Nasero'ddawla Ebn Hamûlîn fled first to Nasibin, and afterwards to Aleppo. After the reduction of Al Mawfel, Moezzo'ddawla possessed himself of the whole province of Diyâr Rabia, Al Jazira, or rather Diyâr Al Jazira, Nasibin, Sinjâr, or Senjâr, Al Rababa, Râfalaîn, or Râs Al Ain, and Al Khâbûr. But, by the conclusion of a peace with Nasero'ddawla, the following year, those places all returned to their former master. This treaty was no sooner signed, than Moezzo'ddawla left Al Mawfel, and returned to Baghdâd<sup>k</sup>.

Abu'l Hasan
Jawhar extends the Kha-lif of Kair-wân's conquests
in Africa.

THE same year, in the month of Safar, Al Moezz sent a formidable army, under the command of Abu'l Hasan Jawhar, one of his slaves, whom he had advanced to the dignity of Wazîr, to the western extremity of Africa. Abu'l Hasan Jawhar first advanced to Tabârt, which he for some time besieged; but without effect. From thence he marched, in the latter Jomâda, to Fez, and made the proper dispositions for attacking that city. But, finding that Ahmed Ebn Becr, the Emîr of the place, was resolved to defend it to the last drop of blood, he thought fit to draw off. However, having traversed all the interjacent tract between that capital and the Atlantic ocean, he sat down again before Fez, and took it by storm, in the month of Ramadân, the following year. This conquest was chiefly owing to the reinforcement Abu'l Hasan Jawhar had received from Zeir Ebn Menedz Al Sanhâji, an officer of great merit, who had been joined with Abu'l Hasan Jawhar himself in the command of the troops employed in this expedition<sup>l</sup>.

Abu'l Hasan
Ali Al Fûshanji, and other learned men, die this
year.

THE same year, likewise, died at Naisâbûr, or Nisâbûr, Abu'l Hasan Ali Al Fûshanji, a famous doctor of the Sûfis; Abu'l Hasan Mohammed, a descendant of Abu'l Shawâreb, the Kâdi of Baghdâd, who was born in the year of the Hejra 292; Abu Ali Al Hosein Ebn Ali Al Naisâbûri; and Abu Mohammed Abd'allah Al Fârîsî, an excellent grammarian, and one of the scholars of the celebrated Al Mobarred. About this time the Greeks, under the command of Zimisces, according to some of the Christian writers mentioned by Al Makin, took Someisât, or Samosata, and Raabân, or Ra'bân, and overthrew Saifo'ddawla, with very great slaughter. They also took a vast number of his men, amongst whom were many of his principal officers, and 1700 horse, prisoners. These they conducted to Constantinople, and entered that city with them, in great triumph. Al Hâsan, the former Emîr of Sicily, and his brother Ammâr, appeared with another fleet on the coast of Italy, and gave chase to an imperial squadron, that was not strong enough to oppose the Moslems; who, however, lost one of their ships, before the close of the present year<sup>m</sup>.

The principal
the year 348.

THE following year, being the 348th of the Hejra, commencing March 14th 959, Theodorus, a Greek, made an irruption into the Moslem territories, with a detachment of 1000 horse, penetrated to Manbij, and took Abu Farâs Al Harat, a near relation of Saifo'ddawla, prisoner. That prince, then hunting in the neighbourhood of Manbij, at the head of a party of seventy horse, fell in with the Greek detachment, and for some time defended himself with very great bravery; but, having received several wounds, and being weakened by the loss of blood occasioned thereby, he was at last taken prisoner, and sent to Constantinople, under an escorte. Here he was detained for a certain period, and then sent back to Saifo'ddawla's court. This year, died Abu Becr Ebn Solimân, commonly called Al Najjad, a Fakih and follower of Ahmed Ebn Hanbal, in the 95th year of his age; and Jaafar Ebn Mohammed Al Jalâdi, a Sûfi, and scholar of Jonaid. At this time, the weather was extremely dry for several months all over the east, which produced a general scarcity of all kinds of grain. The Magrebian fleet suffered shipwreck on the coast of Sicily, according to the Cambridge Chronicon, the 24th of September, the present year; having been so roughly handled by a dreadful tempest, which then arose, that not a single ship of it escaped<sup>n</sup>.

Saifo'ddawla
is defeated by
the Greeks.

IN the 349th year of the Hejra, which began March 3d, 960, Saifo'ddawla invaded the dominions of the Greek emperor with a powerful army, took several castles and towns, laid all the country through which he passed waste with fire and sword, and penetrated as far as Kharfena, or Karshena. The cattle, and other spoil he acquired in this expedition, he brought with him to that place, intending to conduct them afterwards into the Moslem territories. As he was loaded with pillage, and consequently not so fit for action, some of the people of Tarsus in his army, who knew the country perfectly well, advised him not to return by the same way that he came, lest the Greeks should cut off his retreat. But he was deaf to this salutary advice, and paid dear for his temerity on this occasion. For the Greeks waited for him in a defile, surprized him upon his arrival there, and, after a sharp conflict, intirely defeated him; putting his whole army to the sword, except 300 men, who, with their general, found means to make their escape. This terrible blow did not only put the enemy in possession of all the plunder that had been carried off, but likewise of all Saifo'ddawla's baggage, and his military chest. The Arab writers blame that general for a his conduct at this juncture, which they attribute to the high opinion he entertained of his own superior wisdom and abilities, and the little regard he had for those of other men. But whatever was the cause of such a strange infatuated behaviour, this seems to have been one of the greatest victories that the Greeks had for a considerable time obtained °.

THE same year, Wabshūdān found means to get into his hands all his brother Al Marzabān's sons, as well as their mother; the latter of which, together with Al Hasan and Nasr, the two eldest sons, he first threw into prison, and afterwards put to death. By which barbarous and most iniquitous actions, committed in violation of the most solemn engagements, he fixed himself upon the throne of Adberbijān. Several other remarkable accidents likewise happened, in the year we are now upon. A considerable number of Egyptians and Magrebians were swept away in the night-time by a torrent, that broke in suddenly upon them, when they were upon their return home from Mecca, in a certain valley, with all their baggage and camels, into the Red Sea. Two hundred thousand villages, inhabited by Turks, embraced Islamism. Abu'l Hasan Al Tinati, a person of 120 years of age, and famous for the miracles he had wrought, departed this life; as did likewise Anājūr, Abu Hawr, or Abu Jawr, the son of Al Akhsid, who was succeeded by his brother Ali, though Cāfūr was in reality the sovereign of Egypt. Al Hasan having equipped another fleet, and in a great measure repaired the loss sustained by the late dreadful tempest, the Magrebian Moslems began again to make a figure by sea. And, lastly, the same Emir took prisoner Afrina, or Afrina, one of the principal commanders of the Greeks; who, nevertheless, made Ebn Baslās, a Magrebian general, prisoner, and sent him to Constantinople, the present year °.

THE next year, being the 350th of the Hejra, which commenced February 20th, 961, in the month of Dhu'lkaada, Abd'almālec Ebn Nūb Ebn Nasr Al Sammāni, the lord, or Emir, of Khorasān, was killed by a fall from his horse; having been dashed against the ground with such force, that he expired upon the spot. His brother Mansūr succeeded him, and was the sixth prince of the Sammānian dynasty. In the month of Ramadān, the same year, died Abd'alrahmān Al Nasr Ebn Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah, of the house of Ommiyah, the lord, or Emir, of Andalusia, after he had swayed the sceptre there about fifty years. He was seventy-eight years old at the time of his death; and, according to Abu'lfeda and Roderic of Toledo, who differ however in this point from some authors, was the first Emir of Andalusia that assumed the title of Emir Al Mūmenīn, that is, prince, or emperor, of the faithful, in imitation of the Khalifs; his predecessors having contented themselves with the simple one of Emir, or that of descendant of the Khalifs. Nor did Abd'alrahmān himself depart from the custom of his ancestors in this particular, during the first twenty-seven years of his reign; but having then received advice, that the Khalif of Irāk was reduced to the lowest ebb, and that the Fatemite princes in Africa were styled Emir Al Mūmenīn by their subjects, he thought fit to arrogate to himself the same title. However, in letters and all public instruments, as well as on the current coin, he was only styled Al Nasr, or Al Nasser, Ledini'llah, that is, the defender of the divine law. He had, at least in his younger years, a handsome face, grey eyes, and was of a fair complexion. This prince, whose mother's name was Madana, was disturbed, according to Roderic of Toledo, with divisions in his own family; but, by his great prudence, sagacity, and resolution, he prevented them from producing any fatal effects. He was engaged at least twenty years of his long reign in wars, partly with his rebellious subjects, and partly with some of the neighbouring powers; which enabled him to extend his conquest, and give law to all his enemies. He built a fortress near Corduba, and made himself master of Septa, or Ceuta, in Africa; leaving there one of the grandees of his realm with the authority of an Emir. He also beautified and enlarged the great mosque at Corduba, and several others, as well as finished some stately structures, executed in a very grand taste, after he had put an end to all his wars. His son Al Hakem, who had ten brothers, assumed the title of Al Montaser, or Al Montaser Bi'llah, and ascended the throne of Andalusia, after his father's decease °.

THIS year, the office of Kādi of Baghdād was first exposed to sale, and bought by Abu'l Abd'allah Ebn Al Hasan Ebn Abu'l Shawāreb for the annual sum of 200,000 dirhams, to be paid out of the profits of it to Moezzo'ddawla, the Emir Al Omrā. Such a flagrant instance of venality as this was never before heard of in the Moslem empire; but, from this period, all the principal posts in the state, according to Abu'lfeda, were disposed of at Baghdād in the same manner. Nor can our readers be ignorant, that in a country much nearer home, after a spirit of venality and corruption had been once introduced, it soon began to sap the foundations of the antient constitution there, and gradually diffused itself over the minds of all orders and degrees of men °.

Abu Shajir
dies.

THE same year, died Abu Shaja' Futek, by nation a Greek, and purchased at Al Ramla as a slave by Al Akhsbid; who did not only manumit him, but likewise loaded him with honours to such a degree, that he became a formidable rival to Casir, the person that, during the minority of this prince's son, took upon him the administration. However, after Al Akhsbid's death, Abu Shaja' retired to Al Fayyum, a very antient city of Egypt, of which he had been in a manner made the sovereign, or Emir, by Al Akhsbid. As he could by no means prevail upon himself to obey an equal, and one too of whom he had never entertained the highest opinion, he was determined to leave Mesir, and take up his residence at the above-mentioned place, as soon as the government of Egypt was seized upon by Casir. But the air of Al Fayyum, or Al Fayyüm, not agreeing with Futek, he found himself obliged, some time before his death, to return to Mesir. Casir being informed of his arrival, and dreading his superior abilities, studied by all means he could think of to make him his friend; and, amongst other instances of his inclination to please him, permitted, or rather commanded, his poet Al Motanabbi, to celebrate his praises in a copy of verses that should do justice to his rare merit. As a specimen of these verses has been preserved by Abu'l-feda, in the piece so often referred to here, the poem itself was undoubtedly extant at the time in which he wrote, and consequently was, for many years after it was composed, held by all Arabs of taste in great esteem<sup>s</sup>.

Two or three remarkable events, that happened this
year.

BEFORE we conclude our account of the transactions of the present year, we must beg leave to mention two or three events, that have been taken notice of by the Cambridge Chronicle as happening within the course of it. One Socrates was sent as a sort of ambassador, or commissioner, from the imperial court to Sicily, in order to ransom all the Christian prisoners there. The principal person ransomed on this occasion was Africa, or Afrina, who had been taken prisoner by Al Hasan the preceding year; for whose release a pretty considerable sum of money seems to have been paid. Al Hasan returned to Africa, and took with him thither the chief of the Sicilian noblesse, in order to get them perfectly instructed in the principles of the Mohammedan faith. The same thing has been related of Abmed Abu'l Hasan, this Emir's son, by Al Kâdi Shababo'ddin Ebn Abildam Al Hamawi, who tells us that it happened in the year of the Hejra 347. But as a particular account of this affair will be inserted in our history of the Fâtemite Khalifs of Kairwân, to which it more properly belongs, we shall not expatiate any farther upon it here (C)<sup>t</sup>.

The Greeks,
under the command of Nicephorus Phocas, take Ain-Zarba.

THE following year, being the 351st of the Hejra, beginning February 9th, 962, Nicephorus Phocas, the imperial general, penetrated into the Moslem territories with an army of 60,000 men; and, in the month of Al Moharram, laid siege to Ain-Zarba, the Anazarbus of the antients, which in a short time surrendered to him. Soon after he had entered the town, he commanded all the inhabitants, by the public crier, to retire into the great mosque; threatening to put all those who should be found in their own houses after sun-set to the sword. This order was obeyed by all whom the shortness of time allowed them to reach the mosque in would permit to comply with it. The next morning the Greeks found a great number of men, women, and children, without the mosque, whom they cruelly massacred. Which was no sooner done, than an order was issued by the Greek general, requiring every one of the Moslems confined in the mosque to depart the city before night, upon pain of being treated in the same manner as those who slighted the former command. Upon this, those poor people quitted the mosque in such a confusion and hurry, that many of them were pressed to death; and others, not knowing which way to take, perished on the roads, being quite void of all necessaries and assistance. Nor did the Greeks fail to butcher those the next day whom they met with in any part of the town. However, they abandoned the place at the approach of Lent; threatening to return, after the expiration of that solemn season. This account we have chiefly extracted from Abu'l Faraj; tho' according to Abu'l-feda, Ain-Zarba surrendered upon terms to the Greeks, as soon as they appeared before the town. To which he adds, that, by virtue of the capitulation, the citizens were

(C) It may not be amiss to observe, that Carusius (7) absurdly takes the word Africa, or Afrina, to be the name of a city, and not of a man; which notion is so far from being supported by the Cambridge Chronicle, wherein that word twice occurs, that it is directly repugnant to the authority of this curious piece. It ought to be likewise remarked, that the words in the Arabic original should have been rendered, captus AFRINA, and not captus est AFRINA, as they at present stand in the Latin version of this Chronicle; which will point out to us another instance of Signor Affmani's oscitancy and inattention, when he revised and corrected the translation now in view (8).

a for the most part permitted to retire, without having the least injury offered them; though he likewise admits, that some few of them lost their lives on this occasion <sup>u</sup>.

THE same year, Nicephorus, after the reduction of Ain-Zarba, marched with an army of 200,000 men, of which 30,000 were cuirassiers, to Aleppo, in order to make himself master of that place. He was attended by 4000 mules, carrying caltrops, or instruments with four iron points so joined that, being cast on the ground, one of them always stood upright, according to Al Makin. These, after he had pitched his tents before the town, he threw round his camp, in order to keep off the enemies horse. Saifo'ddawla, having received advice of his approach, sent Najâ at the head of his forces against him, and remained himself with a small body of troops in the neighbourhood of Aleppo, expecting soon to hear of a decisive action between the army commanded by Najâ and that of the Greeks. In the mean time, Nicephorus having been informed, probably by some of his spies of the enemies motions, gave Najâ the slip, by taking a route different from that which he had first intended to pursue, surprized Saifo'ddawla, expecting nothing less than such a visit, and then presented himself before the town. Having applied his military engines to the walls, he attacked the place with incredible fury; but was repulsed by the bravery of the besieged, in every assault that he made. But, after three days siege, a dissension arising between the citizens and the garison, the soldiers that composed the latter retired from the walls into the market-place, to chastise the insolence of the former; which gave the Greeks an opportunity of forcing open the gates, and entering the town. They put great multitudes of men and women to the sword, and carried off with them above 10,000 children of both sexes, together with an immense quantity of spoil. After the reduction of the city, Nicephorus laid siege to the citadel, and pushed it on with such vigour, that it must inevitably have fallen into his hands, had not Dbâlem, or Tbâlem, Al Akali, the governor of Damascus, for Ali Ebn Al Akhsîd, advanced with a body of 10,000 men, intended as auxiliaries to Saifo'ddawla, to its relief. Of which the Greeks being apprized, they drew off, on Wednesday, in the beginning of Dbu'lhajja, and immediately abandoned the siege. This happened about ten days after they had taken the city by storm. In their retreat, they offered not the least injury or violence to any of the people in the district of Aleppo, but ordered them to sow and till their ground as usual; telling them they would return the following year, and carry off all the fruits of the earth with them. As for Saifo'ddawla, he had taken post on mount Bankûsa, or Bankowsa, before he was surprized by Nicephorus; but found himself obliged to desert that post, after his defeat. His palace, called Al Daran, situated a little without the city, together with 300 leathern bags full of silver, 1400 mules, and a vast number of arms, fell into the victor's hands. It may not be improper to intimate to our readers, that Bankûsa, Bankousa, or Bankowsa, is a hill near Aleppo, on which part of the present town stands. This quarter is inhabited chiefly by the Janizaries, that form the garison, or city-guard. It is seldom visited by the Franks, on account of the insolence of that body of men. The people (D) of Aleppo at this day call the hill Bankousa, and thereby ascertain the true reading of its name in Erpenius's MS. copy of Al Makin. For, as the fourth letter of this name wants there both the diacritical points of Kâf, and that of Fa, the lection of the word in the aforesaid MS. copy would be equivocal, and consequently by no means determinable, without the assistance of the modern name <sup>v</sup>.

ABOUT the same time, according to Al Makin, Abu'l Werd, the prince of Kbalât in Armenia, departed this life, and was succeeded in the sovereignty of that city and district by Najâ, Saifo'ddawla's general; who, being grown formidable, by the accession of power he acquired hereby, rebelled against his master, and set up for himself. Soon after which event, the Greeks took the castle of Daluc, and three other small fortresses in the neighbourhood of that place. They also made an excursion as far as Manbij, and carried off with them Abu Farâs Al Harat Ebn Sa'id Ebn Hamdân, the governor of that place, in the month of Shawâl, the present year <sup>x</sup>.

(D) The author of this history is obliged, for the remark here laid down, to his worthy and learned friend, the reverend Thomas Crofts, M. A. formerly of Wadham college, Oxford, and at present a member of Magdalen college, in that university, who was chaplain to the British factory at Aleppo several years. This gentleman, who is highly esteemed by all his acquaintance, for his great urbanity and erudition, made many useful and curious observations in the East, during his residence there, with which we cannot help expressing our ardent desire he would in a short time favour the learned world.

Ommiyah is curfed by Moezzo'ddawla's
order.

THE following solemn form of malediction was drawn up by the Shiites (E), and inscribed, a by Moezzo'ddawla's order, upon the doors of the mosques at Baghdád, in some part of the year we are now upon: "May God for ever abominate, and remove from himself, Mosâ-
" wiyah Ebn Abu Sofiân! and him who took from Fâtema's family the territory of Fadac!
" and him who refused to permit Al Hasan to be buried in his grandfather Mohammed's
" tomb! and him who banished Abu Dhor! and him who excluded Ebn Al Abbâs from the " number of those who were candidates for the Khalifat!" But this being defaced by some of the Sunnites of Baghdád, Moezzo'ddawla thought fit, by the advice of Al Mohallibi, his Wazîr, to substitute in the room of it only the following words. "May God's curse fall " upon Moûwiyah, and all those who have treated ill the family of his apostle!" Before the close of the year, died Abu Becr Mohammed Ebn Al Hasan, commonly called Al Nak- b kash, that is, the painter, or engraver, the author of the book, intituled, Shafa Al Soduri, or the healing of breasts, a person of considerable note. We must beg leave to remark here, that Joannes Curopalates gives Saifoddawla Ebn Hamdân, the name of Chabdan, or Chabda- nus, which is only a corruption of Hamdân, and confers on him the title of Khalif of Syria.
From the same author it appears, that the city named Haleb by the Arab historians, which Nicephorus possessed himself of this year, was denominated Berea, or Berrhwa, by the later Greek writers; and consequently, that those learned men must be allowed to deviate from truth, who make Haleb, or Aleppo, to be the Hierapolis of the antients, which can in reality be considered as no other place than the present Manbij. But this may be likewise evinced by other incontestable proofs, which the limits of the work wherein we are now engaged will c not permit us at present so much as to touch upon <sup>1</sup>.

The Emîr of Sicily takes Taormina, or Tavormina, from the Greeks.

THE Emîr of Sicily, according to the Cambridge Chronicon, moved at the head of his forces towards Tabermîn, the antient Tauromenium, and the Taormina, or Tavormina, of the moderns, one of the strongest places in the island, towards the close of the preceding year.
The same prince, with the African and Sicilian troops under his command, in the following
May, or, as the Arabs call that month, the former Jomâda, besieged the city in form; and being joined, the first of August, or Shaabân, by his uncle Ebn Annâr, who then arrived off that town with a powerful fleet, and a body of land-forces on board, he took it in the month of Dbu'lhajja, or December, the present year. As Tabermîn, or Tauromenium, was thus reduced by Al Moezz's troops, it was denominated by the Magrebian Moslems Al Moez- d zia; which name, for a considerable time, it retained. The Cambridge Chronicon and Abu'l- feda differ a few months, as to the time of the reduction of this place; but the writer of that chronicle having been in all probability either a native of Sicily, or extremely well acquainted with the Sicilian affairs, a greater degree of credit is due to his testimony than to that of Abu'lfeda, in this particular. It ought to be remarked, that either Abmed Ebn Al Hasan, the Emîr of Sicily, or Al Moezz himself, in the passage of the Cambridge Chronicon here referred to, is styled Al Soltân; though in every other paragraph of this piece, except one, the word Emîr is used as a title of the same import. From whence we may infer, that the Cambridge Chronicon was penned not many years after the title of Soltân, or Al Sol- tân, began to be in vogue amongst the Moslem princes. If, therefore, this title was first e given Mahmûd Gazni, the son of Sabektekin, by Khalaf Ebn Abmed, the governor of Sejîstân, or Sijîstân, in the year of the Hejra 393, or of CHRIST 1003, as we find clearly enough intimated by some of the eastern writers; it will seem to follow, that it could not well have reached Sicily, which was at a vast distance from the territories of Mahmûd Gazni, before the year of the Hejra 415, or of CHRIST 1024, or something later, and consequently that the Cambridge Chronicon cannot be supposed to have been written much sooner or much later than the year of our LORD 1030. If this be admitted, it will seem farther to follow, that the

(E) This affair is something differently related by M.
D'Herbelot (9). The malediction here mentioned, according to some of the authors made use of by him, was drawn up in the following terms: "God's curse
" fall upon Moûwiyah Ebn Abu Sofiân, and him who has " taken away the territory of Fadac from the heirs of " Fâtima; and him who hindered Al Hasan Ebn Ali Ebn
" Abu Tâleb from being buried near his grandfather
" Mohammed, and him who would not permit Al Abbâs
" to be in the number of those that Omar nominated
" lawful candidates for the Khalifat! and may God
" shower down his blessings upon, and grant perpetuity
" to, the city of peace," i. e. Baghdád. Which excommunication, as it was never before fulminated in any other manner than by word of mouth, some of the inhabitants of Baghdád, if we will believe the aforesaid writers, were hardy enough to efface, and to substitute in its room the following words:—"God curse those " who offer violence to them that are descended from " the prophet's family." This was intended as a severe reflection upon Moezzo'ddawla himself, who had usurped the authority of the Khalif, and made himself master of that prince's person. But what historian, or historians, this article was extracted from, M. D'Herbelot has not been pleased to inform us.

- a annals it originally contained were continued at least almost to that year; and, therefore, that above a quarter of this curious chronicle has been lost, as the fragment of it still extant concludes with the year of CHRIST 965. Who the true author of it was, we cannot pretend to say; though we are by no means inclined to think, that it was composed by Abu Moham-med Abd'alaziz Ebn Shedad Tamim Al Sanbâji, the writer of the history of Kairwân, corruptly called by Carusius Aſcanſius, as the last-mentioned author seems to suppose. For, that the composer, or rather compiler, of the Cambridge Chronicle must have either been born, or lived from his infancy, in the island of Sicily, Carusius himself has clearly evinced; whereas, from a variety (F) of circumstances, of which we have not time at present to give our readers a detail, that Al Sanbâji was either a native of, or lived most of his days in, one of
- b the African provinces dependent on Kairwân, we have all the reason in the world to believe <sup>z</sup>.

- In the 352d year of the Hejra, which commenced Jan. 29th, 963, on the 10th of Al Moharram, Moezzo'ddawla ordered all the shops, taverns, and market-place, of Baghdâd to be shut up; appointing that day to be observed as a solemn fast, and commanding the women there to walk in the streets with dishevelled hair, a sorrowful countenance, and tattered garments, as also to beat their faces as they went, in honour of Al Hosein, the son of Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb. This greatly chagrined the Sonmites of that city. But as the Shiites at this time were extremely numerous in Baghdâd, and Moezzo'ddawla himself at the head of that sect, the fast was kept in the strictest manner. Soon after this, Ebn Abu'l Shawâreb, the Kâdi of Baghdâd, was dismissed from his employment; and Al Mohallebi, Moezzo'ddawla's Wazîr, departed this life. The latter of these was a person distinguished by his prudence, magnanimity, and other excellent virtues, as well as learning, with which his mind was cultivated and adorned. He remained in the sublime post of Wazîr to Moezzo'ddawla, who was Emîr Al Omrà to the Khalîf Al Motî, thirteen years and three months. This year, Moezzo'ddawla expelled Nasero'ddawla from Al Mawſel and Nasîbin, and seized upon those cities. But, having soon after received a stipulated sum of money from Nasero'ddawla, and concluded a treaty with that prince, he abandoned them both, and returned to Baghdâd. Abu'lfeda relates, that Moezzo'ddawla ordered the 8th of Dhu'lhajja to be observed as a day of public festivity and rejoicing in that capital. It appears from some of the Christian writers, that Manuel, or Emmanuel, the imperial general, took Syracuse, Palermo, Taormina, or Tavormina, and other places in Sicily, from the Magrebian Moslems, the present year <sup>a</sup>.

THE next year, being the 353d of the Hejra, commencing Jan. 18th, 964, the Greeks besieged Masîsa, or Masîſhya, in Cilicia; but without effect. For, the imperial general having received advice, that a numerous body of Moslems was marching from Tarsus, in order to attack him; he immediately raised the siege, advanced against them with all his forces, and at last came up with them. The two armies had not long been in sight of each other, before a sharp engagement between them happened; in which the Moslems lost 5000 men, and the Christians a greater number. But the action seems to have been by no means decisive; since Al Makîn, from whom we have extracted this account, does not so much as inform us to which side the victory inclined <sup>b</sup>.

- e THE same year, Najâ, Saifo'ddawla's general, laid siege to Mayâfârkin, or Mayyâfâarakîn, Najâ defeats in Mesopotamia, with an intention to put that fortress into the hands of Moezzo'ddawla Ebn Ab'ul Werd. Bûiya, if he could make himself master of it. But having been apprized, according to Abu'lfeda, that one Abu'l Werd had penetrated into Card, or Curd, he found himself obliged to abandon the siege, and to march with all possible celerity to Khalât. Soon after his arrival there, he came up with Abu'l Werd, intirely defeated him, and drove him out of the province, or district, of Curd. Nor does it appear, that he sustained any considerable loss in this successful expedition <sup>c</sup>.

- f AL MOEZZ, the Fâtemite Khalîf of Kairwân, sent a strong squadron of ships, with a Al Hasan numerous body of land-forces on board, under the command of Al Hasan Ebn Ali Ebn Abu'l Hosein Al Calbi, to Sicily, and obtained a complete victory over the imperialists in that island, <sup>d</sup> overthrowing the Greeks in Sicily.

(F) To omit other incontestable proofs, that might with equal facility be produced, this evidently appears from the gentile term, or surname, Al Sanbâji itself. For this gives us sufficiently to understand, that the Kairwân annalist, or historian, was one of the Sanbadgah, or Sanbâjîan, Arabs, mentioned by Dr. Shaw (10) as inhabiting some of the maritime parts of Numidia. These Sanbâjîan Arabs seem to be the tribe called Zanbagi and Sanbagi by John Leo (11), in the first book of his geographical description of Africa.

the present year. If we will believe Abu'lfeda, ten thousand of the Christians were killed in the action; but, according to Al Kâdi Shababo'ddin Ebn Abildâm Al Hamawi, twenty thousand of them fell upon the field of battle. Amongst the spoils taken on this occasion, which were immense, there was found an Indian sword, weighing 170 methkâls, or Arabic drachms, that, according to an Arabic inscription preserved upon it, had sent the souls of many unbelievers to hell, in the time of the prophet Mohammed. This sword, together with a vast number of prisoners, arms of all kinds, &c. Al Hasan sent to Al Moezz at Kairwân. As for Al Hasan himself, after this victory, he retired to a stately palace he had in Sicily, where he died the following Dbu'lkaada, in the fifty-third year of his age. Abu'lfeda writes, that this Al Hasan sent likewise to Al Moezz a prodigious quantity of plunder, which he had amassed at the taking of Taormina, the preceding year <sup>a</sup>.

The Greeks
take Mafisiya
and Tarsus.

THE following year, being the 354th of the Hejra, beginning January 7th, 965, the Greeks took the city of Mafisiya by storm, on Saturday, the 13th of Rajeb, put a great part of the inhabitants to the sword, and carried the rest away with them into captivity. Before the commencement of the siege, the citizens were said to amount to two hundred thousand souls. From Mafisiya the imperial general marched to Tarsus, which immediately surrendered to him. The people of the place the Greeks permitted to retire to Antioch, and transplanted a colony of Christians thither. They likewise adorned the town with many new buildings, strengthened the fortifications with several additional works, and converted the mosque into a stable. After which, the imperial general returned to Constantinople, extremely well pleased with the success that had attended him this campaign <sup>c</sup>.

Saifo'ddawla's troops defeat Rashik, and reduce Najâ.

AMONGST the Moslems that had retired to Antioch, there was an officer named Rashik; who found it no difficult matter to prevail upon the people of that place to acknowledge him for their sovereign, and shake off the yoke of Saifo'ddawla. After which, he marched with a body of them to Aleppo, in order to make an attempt upon that city. But Saifo'ddawla, who was then at Maiyâfârakîn, having received advice of Rashik's march, sent a reinforcement to Curuba, the governor of Aleppo, under the command of Basbara; who took his measures so well, that he joined Curuba, and consequently executed Saifo'ddawla's orders, without the loss of a man. After this junction, Curuba and Basbara fell upon Rashik with such fury, that they put his forces to the rout, and drove the Antiochians from their camp. Saifo'ddawla likewise reduced the city of Khalât, got the rebel Naja into his hands, and immediately cut off his head. As the Sicilians began their year on the first of September, it is no wonder the Cambridge Chronicle should place the intire defeat of Manuel, or Emmanuel, the imperial general, by the Magrebian Moslems, in the month of October, and the year we are now upon; though Abu'lfeda and Al Kâdi Shababo'ddin Ebn Abildâm, as has been already observed, affirm the battle that terminated in this defeat to have been fought, the preceding year <sup>f</sup>.

The famous
Al Motanabbi
and Al Bosli
die, in the year of the Hejra 354.

THE 354th year of the Hejra was likewise remarkable for the death of the famous Abu'l Teyyeb Ahmed Ebn Al Hosein Ebn Al Hasan Ebn Abd'alsamad Al Kendi, of the tribe of Jôfa. He was born at Cûfa, in a street called Kenda, from whence he derived the surname of Al Kendi. His father is said to have been only a carrier of water, in the city of Cûfa; which occasioned an envious Arabian poet to write a pretty severe epigram upon him. He was born in the 303d year of the Hejra, and laid the foundations of his future fame at Damascus; where he first applied himself to the study of the Arabic tongue, of grammar, of philology, and of every branch of the belles lettres, with surprizing success. He was one of the most excellent poets among the Arabians, there being none besides Abu Temâm who can dispute the prize with him. His poetical inspiration was so warm and exalted, that he either mistook it, or thought he could persuade others to believe it to be prophetical, and therefore gave himself out to be a prophet indeed; and thence acquired the surname of Al Motanabbi, by whom he is generally known. His accomplishments were too great not to have some success; for several tribes of the Arabs of the deserts, particularly that of Kelûb, acknowledged him to be what he pretended. But Lûlû, governor of Hems, and the adjacent district, for Al Akhsîd, king of Egypt and Syria, soon put a stop to the further progress of this new sect, by imprisoning their prophet, and obliging him to renounce his chimerical dignity; which having done, he regained his liberty, and applied himself solely to his poetry; by means whereof he got very considerable riches, being in high esteem at the courts of several princes. He was first received with uncommon marks of distinction by Saifo'ddawla, who was a great encourager of learned men, in the year of the Hejra 337, afterwards by Câfur, in 346, and lastly by Adado'ddawla, king of Persia, in 350, from

<sup>a</sup> whom he drew several pretty large sums. Al Motanabbi lost his life, together with his son, at Al Nomania upon the Tigris, at a small distance from Baghdâd, in defending the money he had acquired, against some Arabian robbers, of the tribe of Asad, or Affad, who demanded it of him; he being then returning with it to Cûfa, his native city. About the same time, Abu Hatem Mohammed Ebn Ahmed Ebn Heban Al Bostî, the celebrated author of some curious pieces, held in no small repute, also departed this life <sup>5</sup>.

In the 355th year of the Hejra, which commenced Dec. 28th, 965, a cartel, for the exchange and redemption of prisoners, was settled between the Greeks and Saifo'ddawla; on which occasion, Abu Farâs, that prince's cousin-german, recovered his liberty. He had been carried a prisoner from Manbij by a Greek detachment, in the year of the Hejra 348, according to Al Makîn; though Abu'lfeda makes that event to have happened in the 351st year of the Moslem æra. He was a prince of an excellent disposition, and a poet of considerable note. One of his verses, importing that every person ought to acquiesce in the situation assigned him by the sovereign of the universe, has been preserved by Al Makîn. He died soon after his return to Saifo'ddawla's court, according to the last-mentioned author; though this runs counter to what has been related of him by a noted Arab historian. This year, the Greeks made an irruption into the Moslem territories, sat down successively before Amid, or Amed, Nasîbîn, and Antioch; but without effect. They ravaged, however, the country through which they moved, and at last returned, with the pillage they had acquired, to Tarsus. A vast number of Moslem captives regained their liberty, by the cartel above-mentioned. Ali Ebn Al Akhsîd, the prince, or lord, of Egypt, died in the year of the Hejra 355, if we will believe Al Makîn; though, according to Abu'lfeda, that prince's death, and, in consequence of it, Câfûr's accession to the Egyptian throne, happened, the following year <sup>b</sup>.

The next year, being the 356th of the Hejra, commencing Dec. 17th, 966, proved fatal to several great men. Moezzo'ddawla Ebn Bûiya died of a looseness, or rather a dysentery, the 17th of the latter Rabî, at Baghdâd. He was upon his march against Omrân Ebn Shâhin, the lord of Al Bathikab, Al Batîha, or the marshy district, bordering upon the Tigris, at the time of his death. He had acted as Emîr Al Omrâ almost twenty-two years, and was succeeded by his son Bakhiyâr, surnamed Azzo'ddawla, i. e. the strength of the palace, or the court, in the sublime post to which he had been advanced, with the approbation only, according to Abu'lfeda, or, as Al Makîn will have it, by the appointment, of the Khalîf Al Motî. With regard to Moezzo'ddawla's disposition, he is said to have been intrepid and brave; though, if we will believe Al Makîn, on certain occasions, he discovered something of malice and imprudence in his actions. However, as the same writer observes, he grew wise by experience, and, by his subsequent knowledge of men and things, corrected the errors of his younger years; so that, upon the whole, he may be considered as a prosperous and happy prince. At the approach of death, he appeared extremely penitent, left the greatest part of his immense wealth to be disposed of in charitable uses, and manumitted all his slaves. He was buried in the place called Bab Al Tabni, the straw-gate, where the bodies of many deceased members of the tribe of Koreish lay interred. Abu'lfeda writes, that Moezzo'ddawla lost one of his hands in an action in the province of Kermân; but this very thing has been related of his son Azzo'ddawla (G) by Abu'l Faraj. He is likewise said by the same author to have been the first who used running footmen, or foot-posts, Al Soat, at Baghdâd; which he did, in order to send his brother Rucno'ddawla the quickest intelligence of every thing he intended to communicate to him. Of these Fadl and Marûsh in swiftness excelled all the rest, as each of them could run between forty and fifty parasangs in a day. One of them was considered as the Sonnite express, or courier, and the other as that of the Shiites; from which single circumstance, the violence of party, that now agitated the minds of the

(G) The word Azzo'ddawla is exhibited in the passage here referred to by Dr. Pocock's MSS. of Abu'l Faraj. But that the true reading there is Moezzo'ddawla, appears very clearly, not only from the (12) parallel passage of Abu'lfeda, but likewise from this author himself; who (13), in the next page but one, calls Moezzo'ddawla Al Akta', and consequently informs us, that one of his hands had been cut off. It is true, Dr. Pocock supposes, that the word Ebn, or son, has been erased in the last passage of Abu'l Faraj; which, if it be allowed, will evince the appellation Al Akta' to have been applied to Azzo'ddawla, Moezzo'ddawla's son. But then, it is as true, that this is only a bare conjecture, or rather an arbitrary supposition, void of all foundation and authority; nay, that it runs counter to the testimony of Abu'lfeda, a writer of the best repute: whereas the emendation here proposed is much more easy and natural, as being effected only by adding Mim, which may have been effaced by time, to Ain, and making it the initial letter; and has moreover the express assertion of Abu'lfeda to support it. We doubt not, therefore, but it will be readily admitted by all our learned and intelligent readers.

citizens of Baghdād, does in some measure appear. As for Eakblīyār, or Al-zo'ldawla, he was so attached to his pleasures, and treated so ill the Deylamite grandees, that he lost much of the influence he first set out with at the Khalīf's court <sup>1</sup>.

is killed, by a fall from his horse.

THE same year, Washmakīn, or Washmakīr, Ebn Zayyār, the brother of Mardawīj, lost his life. As he was one day hunting, his horse, being frightened by a wild boar, threw him with such violence, that he almost immediately expired. This we learn from Abu'lfeda; who likewise tells us, that, according to some writers, this event happened in the month of Al Mobarram, the following year. Be that as it will, Washmakīn, Washmakīn, or Washmakīr, for he goes by all those names, was succeeded by his son Bijīn, or Tanbūn, as he is called by some of the eastern authors followed by M. D'Herbelot <sup>2</sup>.

Cāfūr, according to Abu'lfeda, dies
this year.

ON Monday, the 20th of the former Jomāda, Cāfūr, the Ethiopian slave purchased by Al Akhsbīd, and thence called Al Akhsbīdī, for eighteen dinārs, who governed that prince's dominions, after his death, according to Abu'lfeda, departed this life. But Al Makīn and D'Herbelot place his demise in the year of the Hejra 358. This Cāfūr was prime minister to Anūjūr and Ali, Al Akhsbīd's sons; and, after the latter of those princes death, in 355, his authority was recognized by the people of Al Hejāz, Syria, and Egypt. Nor, indeed, did either Anūjūr or Ali enjoy any thing but the bare title of prince, or lord, of the territories left them by their father Al Akhsbīd; Cāfūr being in reality, during their lives, the actual and absolute sovereign of all those countries. After his death, he was interred in the common burying-place, denominated Al Carafah, at Mesr. The Egyptian grandees, after many and long debates, pitched upon Abu'l Farwāres Ahmed Ebn Ali Ebn Al Akhsbīd, if Abu'lfeda may be credited, to succeed him; though Al Makīn has not scrupled to assert, that Ali Ebn Mohammed Ebn Al Akhsbīd, then only eleven years of age, ascended the Egyptian throne after Cāfūr. Abu'lfeda seems to intimate, that there was a sort of interregnum in Egypt at this time for about the space of a year; as he gives us to understand, that Abu'l Farwāres was not publickly prayed for before the former Jomāda, 357, in the mosques at Mesr. But whatever was the name of the prince that succeeded Cāfūr, or in whatever year he was first prayed for at Mesr, he did not long enjoy the sovereignty of Egypt; that country having been soon after conquered by the forces of Al Moezz, the Fātemite Khalīf of Kairwān, as will in a short time more fully appear <sup>3</sup>.

Saifo'ddawla dies at Aleppo.

ON Thursday, the 24th of Safar, this year, died Saifo'ddawla Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Abd'al-lah Ebn Hamdān, of the tribe of Taglab, at Aleppo, of a retention of urine. He was born in the year of the Hejra 303; so that, at the time of his death, he was about fifty-three lunar years old. His remains were carried to Mayyāfīrākīn, and there interred. Saifo'ddawla is said to have been the first prince of the house of Hamdān, that made himself master of Aleppo, and expelled from thence Ahmed Ebn Sa'id Al Kelābi, who was governor of the place for Al Akhsbīd. Others, however, affirm, that Abul Hosein Ebn Sa'id Ebn Hamdān, brother to Abu Farās, of that family, reduced Aleppo, before it fell into the hands of Saifo'ddawla. This prince, notwithstanding what is asserted to the contrary by Abu'lfeda, was fifty-five years old, at the time of his demise, according to Al Makīn. He was remarkable for his greatness of soul, bravery, learning, liberality, or rather munificence, love of justice, beneficence, and strict performance of all religious duties. His palace was the receptacle of poets and learned men. Nor did any of these ever leave his court, without sufficient reason to praise his bounty and benignity to him. As he was the greatest encourager of learning of the age in which he lived, it is no wonder that such numbers of learned men should flock to him from all parts; and that Aleppo, where, if we will believe Al Makīn, he reigned twenty-three years, should in his time have been the general seat of literature of the East. The poets that resorted to his court were Al Motanabbi, who wrote some verses upon him, Abu'l Farab Al Wāwā, Al Khāldī, Abu'l Farab Al Bagā, and many others. He was also himself a good poet, and we have three specimens of his poetical compositions preserved by Abu'lfeda and Al Makīn. One of these is a short copy of verses sent to his brother Nasero'ddawla, on what occasion we have not been told; and another a few verses on a favourite girl of royal extraction, with whom he was desperately smitten, and whom he kept in a castle by herself, to prevent her from being poisoned by his other wives, who were all grown jealous of her. After his death, his son Sharīf, surnamed Saado'ddawla, succeeded him in the sovereignty of all the extensive territories he had conquered; of whom our readers may expect a fuller account in a future part of this work, to which it will more properly belong <sup>4</sup>.

a THE same year, Abu Ali Mohammed Ebn Eyllâ, or Elias, the lord of Kermân, departed this life; as did likewise Abu'l Faraj Ali Ebn Al Hosein, of the house of Ommiyah, commonly known by the surname or title, Al Kâteb Al Esfahâni, i. e. the scribe, or notary, born at Esfahân. The latter of these was extremely well versed in history, and received his education at Baghdâd. Though he was a member of the house of Ommiyah, he was a great admirer of Ali and his family, and of the Shiite sect, at this time in great repute at Baghdâd. He is said by Abu'lfeda to have been fifty years in compiling, and drawing up, his book, intituled, Al Kitâb Al Agan, the book of songs, the most excellent part of his works; a copy of which he presented to Saifo'ddawla; who, perfectly well understanding the value of this piece, gave him 1000 dinârs, and at the same time made an apology for offering him a sum so much inferior to the merit of so singular a performance. He wrote several pieces in favour of that branch of the house of Ommiyah seated in Spain, the princes of which were styled lords of Andalusia, and even emperors of the faithful. These he sent privately to those princes, and was privately, though amply, rewarded by them for such valuable presents. Of this kind were the following books: one written upon the genealogy of the family of Abd Shems, or Abd Shams; another upon the battles of the Arabs, in which 1070 actions of éclat are described; another, intituled, Jombarat Al Nasbi, or the principal and most select part of the genealogical science; and another, exhibiting the genealogy of the Banu Shaiban. His great friend and patron was Al Moballebi, Moezzo'ddawla's Wazîr. We are told by Abu'lfeda, that he was born in the year of the Hejra 284<sup>n</sup>.

b ABOUT the same time, or rather towards the close of the former Jomâda, Abu Taglab seized upon his father Nasero'ddawla, who by his morose temper had rendered himself extremely disagreeable both to his own family and the great men of his court, and confined him in the castle of Ardman. Al Makin relates, that Nasero'ddawla was so affected with the death of his brother Saifo'ddawla, that he became distracted thereupon; which induced his family, who were greatly concerned for him, to desire his son Abu Taglab to secure his person, and take upon him the government of Al Marwef. But the last article does not so well correspond with what has been handed down to us, in relation to Abu Taglab's motive to the measure here mentioned, both by Abu'lfeda and Abu'l Faraj °.

c BEFORE the close of the present year, according to Al Kâdi Shababo'ddin Ebn Abildâm Al Hamawi, Ahmed Ebn Al Hasan, the Emîr of Sicily, received an order from Al Moezz Ledini'llah, the Khalîf of Mobdia, to leave that island, and return to Africa. In obedience to which order, continues the same historian, Ahmed, with his wife, children, domestics, and all his substance, set sail for Mobdia, as soon as he had made the proper dispositions for his departure. He had, says Shababo'ddin, been governor, or Emîr, of Sicily thirteen years and eleven months, when he took his leave of the island, and appointed one of his father's slaves, that had been manumitted by him, named by Abu'lfeda Taish, to preside over the Moslems there, till a new Emîr should arrive from Africa. Notwithstanding which, we are told by Abu'lfeda, that Ahmed was not recalled from Sicily before the year of the Hejra 358; and that when he left the island, he had remained there sixteen years and nine months, in quality of Emîr <sup>p</sup>.

d THE following year, being the 357th of the Hejra, beginning Dec. 7th, 967, some disputes arose between Abu Farâs, who then resided at Hems, and Saado'ddawla, Saifo'ddawla's son; which ended in the destruction of the former. For, Abu Farâs, not thinking it safe to stay at Hems, retired with great precipitation to Sadâd. Of which Saado'ddawla being informed, he sent Curubab, or Curuba, his father's general, with a body of troops to that place; who soon got Abu Farâs into his hands, and put him to death. This event has, however, been something differently related by Ebn Kbalîyah; who tells us, that Abu Farâs having formed a design to make himself master of Hems, Saado'ddawla sent Curuba, who had been one of his father's slaves, with an army against him. Curuba, continues this writer, in pursuance of the orders he had received, advanced to Sadâd, where Abu Farâs waited for him, vanquished that prince in battle, and put him, with a very considerable number of his men, to the sword. This, however, runs counter to what has been handed down to us concerning Abu Farâs, after his return from Constantinople, by Al Makin, as has been already observed. That poor prince was born in the year of the Hejra 320; so that he was scarce 37 years old, at the time of his death. Soon after this, Ali Ebn Kidar Al Naifâbûri, a Sûfi, departed this life; as did likewise the Khalîf Al Mottaki, in the month of Shaabân, at Baghdâd, and was buried in that city. Al Kâdi Shababo'ddin intimates, that Ahmed Ebn Al Hasan, notwithstanding what we have already remarked, did not take his final leave of Sicily before the commencement of the present year. It appears

forces conquer
Egypt and part of Syria.

In the year of the Hejra 358, Al Moezz Lediñ'llah's forces, under the command of Jawbar Al Kayed, a Greek renegado and slave, seized upon Egypt. That prince, taking advantage of the civil dissensions that reigned amongst the Egyptian nobility, who could not agree in their sentiments of a proper person to succeed Cüsir, sent Jawbar with a numerous army, to annex to the territories of Kairwân that opulent region. Jawbar, meeting with no enemy to oppose him, entered Egypt, according to Abu'lfeda, the 17th of Shaabân, and marched directly to Mesr; where Abu Mohammed Abd'allah Ebn Al Hossein Al Someisiti, a celebrated preacher, prayed publickly in the old mosque for Al Moezz Lediñ'llah, the Fâtémite Khalif, on Friday, the 20th of the same month. As for Jawbar, the Magrebian general, he laid the foundations of Cairo, Kairo, or Al Kábirab, in Egypt, in the month of Ramadân; and ordered both the officers and soldiers of his army to build themselves houses in the new city. After this, he detached Jaafar Ebn Fallaj, with a strong body of troops, against Al Hasan Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Tagaj, then posted at Al Ramla in Palestine, to oblige him to submit to the Magrebian Khalif. Jaafar executed his orders with such bravery, that he overthrew Al Hasan with great slaughter, and sent both him and several of his principal officers prisoners to Al Moezz; upon which, the citizens of Al Ramla opened the gates of their city immediately to him, and took an oath of fidelity to the Fâtémite Khalif of Kairwân and Egypt. Their example was followed by the inhabitants of Tabariyah, or Tiberias; but the people of Damascus not being disposed to recognize the authority of the African Khalif, Jaafar reduced their city by forces, pillaged part of it, and put a considerable number of the Damascenes to the sword. However, they soon afterwards rebelled; but were a second time subdued, and forced to take the oath of allegiance to Al Moezz. After which, that prince was publickly prayed for in all the mosques of that part of Syria; and every other place of strength, that had been possessed by Al Akhsbid's family, readily submitted to him <sup>r</sup>.

dawla dies.

THE same year, died Nasero'ddawla Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Hamdân Al Taglabi, the prince, or lord, of Al Mawfel, in the castle of Cawatsh, where for some time he had been confined. This prince, according to Abu'lfeda, had three children by his wife Fâtéma, the daughter of one Abmed, a Curd; Abu Taglab, Abu'l Baracat, and Fâtéma. Besides these, he had a son named Hamdân by another wife, to whom he had given the cities of Rababa and Mürédîn, and who was a prince of great personal bravery. To him Nasero'ddawla found means to write, and to let him know the ill-treatment he had met with from his wife Fâtéma, and his son Abu Taglab who had confined him in the castle of Ardman, as has been already observed. But the letter, in which he had desired his son Hamdân to advance with a body of troops to his relief, was intercepted by Abu Taglab and Abu'l Baracat; who, from that time, used him much worse than before, and at length transferred him to the castle of Cawatsh, where he ended his days, in the former Rabî, the present year. This highly exasperated Hamdân, and occasioned a long and bloody war between Nasero'ddawla's three sons; in which Abu'l Baracat was cut off by Hamdân, who was himself finally stripped of all his territories by Abu Taglab. That prince, after the victories he had obtained, assumed the title of Odda-to'ddawla Al Gadhanfer, or the lion the defence of the government. We must not forget to remark, that Adado'ddawla, the son of Rucno'ddawla Ebn Bâiya, seized upon the province of Kermân, after the death of Abu Ali Mohammed Ebn Eyliâ, the preceding year <sup>s</sup>.

The Greeks
ravage Syria.

In the mean time, whilst the Moslems were thus at variance amongst themselves, the Greeks made an inroad into Syria, and penetrated as far as Tripoli. The castle of Arca they took by storm, and from thence advanced to Hems; which the inhabitants abandoned at their approach. They were no sooner in possession of the place, than they laid it in ashes, and then moved towards the maritime parts of the province; which they laid waste with fire and sword. After they had ravaged the country for the space of two months, and thrown the pulpits in eighteen mosques, which Abu'lfeda has not failed to observe, they retired into the imperial territories, loaded with the spoil they acquired in this successful expedition <sup>t</sup>.

Saado'ddawla
is driven from Aleppo by Curuba.

THE same year, Curuba expelled his master Saado'ddawla from Aleppo, and set up for himself in that city. Upon this expulsion from his capital, Saado'ddawla retired first to May-yâfûrakîn, and afterwards to Hamab, where he for some time remained. About the same time, Sabûr Ebn Abu Thâber, the Karmatian, was incarcerated by his cousin-germans, and died in prison, towards the middle of Ramadân. We are told by Al Kâdi Shahabo'ddin Ebn Abildâm Al Hamawi, that Abu'l Kasem Ebn Al Hasan was sent by Al Moezz to Sicily, in the month of Shaabân, to preside over the Moslems of that island, in the room of his

a brother Abmed. To which this author adds, that the latter of those Emirs was made by his master admiral of the Magrebian fleet, sent this year to the coast of Egypt, to forward the operations of the land-forces; and that he died at Tripoli, soon after his arrival there. But these events have been ranked by Abu'lfeda, in the piece so often referred to amongst the transactions of the following year <sup>a</sup>.

THE next year, being the 359th of the Hejra, the Greeks made another irruption into Syria, carried Antioch by assault, plundered the city, and put a great number of the inhabitants to the sword. From thence they marched to Aleppo, then in no posture of defence; which Curuba abandoned at their approach, and retired into the castle. Here he defended himself for some time, and at last agreed to pay the Greeks a certain annual tribute; upon which, having received hostages, for the due performance of what had been stipulated on his part, they returned into the imperial provinces, and carried off with them the pillage that had fallen into their hands. The district, or territory, of Aleppo at this time contained the cities of Hamah, Hems, Casar Al Thâ, Al Maarab, Apamea, or Apamia, Shaizar, and several other interjacent towns <sup>b</sup>.

BEFORE the close of the present year, the Greeks likewise made an incursion into Armenia, and attacked the city of Malâzcard, Malâzkhard, or Malazcarda; but with what success we have not been told. Malazcarda was a small town of Armenia, the houses of which, in the days of Abu'lfeda, were built of black stone. It abounded then with fountains, but was almost intirely destitute of trees. It was about two or three days journey from Arzen, or Arzen Al Rûm, the Arzerum, or Erzerum, of the moderns; and not above one or two from Bedlis, the Betlis, or Bitlis, of the European geographers. In fine, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, all the maritime parts of Syria, as well as those bordering upon the Euphrates, at this time lay open to the Greeks; who ravaged them all, even according to the Moslem historians themselves, without controul. No wonder then, that this writer should consider the untimely end of the Greek emperor Nicephorus, which, if we will pay any regard to his authority, happened this year as a public blessing to the Moslems; who, for several years past, were not able to make head against his victorious troops. We must, however, beg leave to observe, that this celebrated author, by the imperfect and inaccurate account he has given us of Nicephorus's death, to omit other instances of either the same or a similar kind, which in his annals not seldom occur, discovers himself to be as ill qualified to compose the history of the Christian emperors, as the later Greek writers undoubtedly were to hand down to posterity that of the Khalifs. Nor will such a reflection appear strange, after what has been more than once hinted upon the same head in the preceding part of this work <sup>c</sup>.

THE same year, Abu Taglab Ebn Nasero'ddawla laid siege to Harrân, and took it by capitulation; after which, he left a garison there, under the command of Al Barcaidic, one of his principal officers, and then returned to Al Mawfel. About this time, Curuba likewise ordered Saado'ddawla to be publickly prayed for in the mosques of Aleppo and Hems; in the last of which places that prince held his residence. Al Moezz Ledini'llab, the Fâtemite Khalif, was also publickly prayed for in the same cities, as well as at Medina; though Al Moî, the Khalif of Baghdâd, was mentioned in the public prayers by Mohammed Al Musurwi, who officiated as Imâm in the district of the last of those cities. The name of the Khalif of Baghdâd was, however, never omitted, during all the above-mentioned troubles, in the mosques at Mecca. This year, according to Al Kâdi Shababo'ddîn Ebn Abildâm Al Hamawi, the Fâtemite Khalif Al Moezz Ledini'llab, sent a letter to Abu'l Kasem, then presiding over the Sicilian Moslems, containing his compliments of condolence, on account of his brother Abmed Ebn Al Hasan's death, wherein he gave him the title of Emir, and exhorted him, by all means possible, to extend the Moslem conquests in his part of the world, by annexing to them some of the neighbouring provinces. He at the same time desired him not to take too much to heart his brother's death, and assured him, that he considered the government of the Moslem part of Sicily as much inferior to his merit. The last event, however, notwithstanding the authority of Shababo'ddîn, with how much reason we will not pretend to determine, is placed by Abu'lfeda in the following year. But this we may be allowed to say, that the former of those authors is egregiously mistaken, when he makes the dispute and hostilities between Al Moezz and Abd'alrahmân, the lord, or Khalif, of Andalusia, an account of which we have inserted amongst the transactions of the year 344, to have happened in the year we are now upon. For, that Abd'alrahmân died in the 350th year of the Moslem æra, we learn from Roderic of Toledo, Abu'lfeda, and the Târîkh Al Magreb. We must not forget to observe, that Mohammed Ebn Dawd Al Dainawari, commonly

The most memorable events of the year 360.

THE following year, being the 360th of the Hejra, in the month of Dbu'lkaada, the Karmatians assassinated Jaasar Ebn Fallaj, the Fâtemite Khalif's governor of Damascus, in the open field, and afterwards seized upon that city. From thence they advanced to Al Ramla, where they were joined by all who had adhered to the family of Al Akhsîd. Being thus reinforced, they marched under the command of Al Hasan Ebn Ahmed Babaram, their prince, or chief, into Egypt, and came up with Jawbar, at the head of Al Moezz's forces, near Ain Al Shems, or Ain Al Shams, the ancient Heliopolis; upon which a fierce and bloody conflict ensued. The Karmatians, in the beginning of the action, forced the Magrebian and Egyptian troops to give way; but not being properly supported, they were at last overthrown by Jawbar, who rallied his men with great bravery, and driven back into Syria, with prodigious loss. About this time, Mowayyado'ddawla Ebn Rucno'ddawla made Abu'l Kasem Ebn Abbâd, commonly called Al Sabe'h, or the companion, his Wazîr; and Abu'l Kasem Solimân Ebn Ayub Al Tabarîni, the author of the three lexicons, called by the Arabs Maajem, died, in the 101st year of his age, at Esfahân. Al Serrayo Al Raffa, a celebrated poet of Al Mawfel, likewise departed this life, the present year, at Baghdâd<sup>z</sup>.

The chief transactions of the year 361.

IN the year of the Hejra 361, beginning October 24th, 971, the Greeks penetrated into Mesopotamia, and ravaged the country about Edessa and Nasîbin, together with all the interjacent tract; the Moslems abandoning their habitations, and flying in great numbers to Baghdâd. The cries and lamentations of these poor wretches reaching the ears of Bakhtiyâr, the Emîr Al Omrà, he immediately went to the Khalif, and demanded of him a sum of money, to enable him to put the troops in motion, in order to drive the enemy from the frontiers. But the Khalif told him, that, being stript of his power, authority, and wealth, he was himself almost destitute of common necessities, and therefore had no money to spare on the present occasion. To which he added, that he would rather be in the situation of a private person, than that of Khalif, when attended with such disagreeable circumstances. But Bakhtiyâr, who was intirely attached to his pleasures and diversions, and was even then but just returned from hunting, told him in a menacing tone, that this was all chicanery and pretext; and that it would much better become him to satisfy the demands of the soldiery with a good grace, than by compulsion. This so terrified the Khalif, that he immediately sold the furniture of his palace, though he could not raise by this expedient above 40,000 dirhems (a very inconsiderable sum), which he put into the hands of Bakhtiyâr; who squandered away the money in a shameful manner, without applying a single dirhem of it to the publick service. Hence the sarcasm, at that time so current in Baghdâd; the Khalif has been fined, or mulcted, by Bakhtiyâr. In the beginning of Dbu'lkaada, the Fâtemite Khalif, Al Moezz (H) Ledinî'llah, set out from Al Mohdia, with his family, effects, and all his treasures,

(H) According to (14) Ebn Shohnah, the Fâtemite Khalif, Al Moezz Ledinî'llah, entered Egypt in the 360th year of the Hejra; notwithstanding that event is said to have happened in the 362d year of the Moslem æra by Abu'lfeda (15), Abu'l Faraj (16), and Al Makin (17). Ebn Shohnah likewise writes, that Al Moezz caused all his gold and silver to be melted down into ingots of the size, as well as the form, of mill-stones, and put each of these on the back of a single camel, that carried its load directly into Egypt. The same author adds, that Al Moezz having caused the name of Al Moti to be suppressed in the mosques, ordered his own to be mentioned publicly there, not only in Egypt, but likewise in Syria and Arabia, as far as the city of Medina; the city of Mecca being the only place of note, in the peninsula of the Arabs, that refused to recognize the authority of the Fâtemite Khalif.

However, about two years after, the Egyptians, who were at this time obliged by Jawbar to withdraw their allegiance from Al Moti, began to pronounce in their mosques the names of both the Khalifs; viz. that of Al

Moti, the lawful successor of the Khalifs of the house of Al Abbâs, his predecessors, and that of Al Moezz, the pretended successor of the family of Ali Ebn Abu Taleb, who had usurped the name of Fâtemite. The latter of which princes, in order to establish amongst the people he governed a persuasion of his being descended from the aforesaid Imâm, and consequently of his right to the Khalifat, willed and ordained, that to the solemn form of publication of prayer should be added the following words: "For ever live Ali, all whose actions have been laudable;" and that it should begin with these words, "In the name of the most merciful God;"—which, excepting the ninth, are prefixed at the head of every chapter of the Korân. This solemn form the Mohammedans call the Bismillah, and begin with it all their prayers, and the greatest part of their actions themselves. The schism here mentioned, or the recognition of two Khalifs in the Moslem world, continued from the time we are now upon to the year of the Hejra 567, in which Salah's'ddin Ebn Ayub, general to Nûro'ddin Mahmûd Ebn Zenki, the Soltân of Syria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt,

- a treasures, which he took care to have melted down into a sort of masses, or ingots, of the form of mill-stones, and carried on the backs of camels, for Egypt. He left behind him, as his governor of Kairwân, and its dependencies, Yusef Ebn Zeir Ebn Menedz Al Sanhâji, surnamed Belkîn, who had distinguished himself in his service, and Abd'allah Ebn Yokblef Al Catâmi, in the same capacity, at Tripoli in Africa; Abu'l Kasem Ali Ebn Al Hasan still continuing, by his appointment, Emîr of Sicily. Al Moezz was attended in his journey by Mohammed Ebn Hani, an Arab poet of Andalusia; who was assassinated suddenly, and by an unknown hand, at Barka. He had an excellent political genius, but was too fulsome in his flattery; making as it were a kind of divinity of Al Moezz, and bestowing upon him titles that were applied to God alone. This occasioned his being considered as
- b a deserter of the faith, gave great offence to many of the Moslems, and was probably the cause of his violent death. About this time, a treaty of peace was concluded between Al Mansûr Ebn Nûb Al Sammâni, the prince, or lord, of Khorasân, and Rucno'ddawla Al Hasan Ebn Bûiya; the principal articles of which were, that Rucno'ddawla should pay Al Mansûr annually the sum of 150,000 dinârs; and that Al Mansûr, in consideration of this money, which was to be esteemed as a dower, should marry the daughter of Adado'ddawla, Rucno'ddawla's son. Abu Taglab Ebn Nasero'ddawla likewise made himself master of the city of Mâredîn, as well as of a large magazine of arms, and all his brother Hamdân's treasures, that were found therein, and betrayed into his hands by that prince's governor of the place, before the close of the present year<sup>a</sup>.
- c THE next year, being the 362d of the Hejra, which commenced October 12th, 972, What hap- in the beginning of Shaabân, Al Moezz arrived at Alexandria, and was met by all the principal Egyptian nobility; who received him with marks of the most perfect submission, and pened in the the most profound respect. He also entered Kairo, or Al Kâbirah, the 15th of Ramadân. Moslem terri-
About the same time, the Greeks took Nasîbîn, ravaged the district of Mayyâfirakîn, and tories, the fol- over-ran the whole province of Diyâr Rabîa. Of which Abu Taglab Ebn Nasero'ddawla lowing year.
being informed, he sent his brother Hebat'allah Ebn Nasero'ddawla with a powerful army against them; who marched directly to Amed, where he was joined by Hazârmârd, one of Abu'l Hijâ Ebn Hamdân's officers, and Abu Taglab's commandant of that place. After this junction, Hebat'allah fell upon the Greeks posted in the neighbourhood of Amed with d such fury, that he overthrew them with very great slaughter, released all the Moslem captives that had fallen into their hands, and took the imperial general himself, with a vast number of his men, prisoners. The Greeks were much superior in number to the Moslems; but Hebat'allah surprizing them in a strait narrow place, where their cavalry could not act, they were easily put to the rout, and soon obliged to betake themselves to a precipitate flight.
The imperial general Hebat'allah sent to his brother Abu Taglab in chains, who immediately ordered him to be thrown into prison, where he remained till the time of his death; which happened, in the latter Jomâda, the following year. He died of a distemper, brought upon him probably from his confinement, which eluded all the art of the physicians sent him by Abu Taglab, in order to re-establish his health. This battle was fought towards e the close of Ramadân; and it intirely cleared all the Moslem territories of the Greeks, during the remainder of the campaign. Azzo'ddawla, or Bakhtiyâr, as Abu'lfeda likewise calls him, the Emîr Al Omrà, made Mohammed Ebn Bakîb, a person of mean extraction, who was born at Carwatsb, his Wazîr, before the end of the year we are now upon; which, as the last-mentioned author seems to intimate, produced some ill blood between that minister and the officers who commanded both the Turkish and Deylamite troops at Baghdâd<sup>b</sup>.

Egypt, abolished the Khalifat of the Fâtemites, and re-established that of the house of Al Abbâs, by acknowledging Al Mostadi Ebn Al Mostanjed, who then resided at Baghdad, the true and lawful Khalif and sovereign Imâm, or pontiff, of the Moslems (18).

Al Nowairi, Al Noweiri, or Al Nûiri, the historian, relates, that Al Moezz Ledini'llah, after he had reigned twenty years in Africa, passed from Al Mansûria, a city built by his father, into the island of Sardinia, in the year of the Hejra 361; having left the government of the African provinces to Yusef Ebn Zeir Ebn Mened, or Menedz, Al Sanhâji, as is here observed. The following year, continues the same writer, he set sail for Tripoli in Africa, where he soon arrived, and marched directly to Alexandria, which Jawhar, his general, had made himself master of a little time before. From thence he advanced to Mesr, or Al Fostât, where he ordered the name of Al Motî in the public prayers to be suppressed, and continued the construction of his new city, which Jawhar had founded under the horoscope of Mars, and given it the name of Al Kâbirah, or the Victorious, an epithet applied by the Arab astronomers to the planet Mars. But of this our readers will meet with a more full and ample account in our history of the Fâtemite Khalifs of Egypt, to which it more properly belongs (19).

Al Moti
abdicates the Khalifat.

THE following year, being the 363d of the Hejra, which began October 2d, 973, Azzod'- a darwlâ Ebn Moezzo'ddawla treated the Turkish troops that had attended him into the province of Abwâz, where he then was, with great rigour and severity, in order to repress the insolence they had discovered on several occasions, and revive the military discipline amongst them; after which, he returned to Wâset, in his way to Baghdâd. This so exasperated Sabektekin a Turk, formerly chamberlain to Moezzo'ddawla, who refused to go with Az- zo'ddawla into Abwâz, that he rebelled against him, assembled all the Turkish and Scenite b troops in Baghdâd, and made the necessary dispositions for preventing him from entering that capital. To these measures Sabektekin had likewise been farther excited by Azzo'd- dawla's conduct to him in particular; the Emîr Al Omrà having ordered all the cities and lands belonging to him, and which he considered as his own private property, to be confiscated. This defection produced several actions between Sabektekin's forces and the Dey- lamite troops, who, with the populace of Baghdâd, still obeyed the orders of Azzo'ddawla, which ended in the defeat of the latter; insomuch that Sabektekin at last made himself master of Baghdâd, and plundered Azzo'ddawla's palace in that city. The metropolis being thus in his hands, he prevailed upon Al Moti, who could not interpose his authority in the present dispute, and who had been rendered in a manner incapable of government by a paralytic disorder he had long laboured under, which had almost totally deprived him of his speech and the use of his limbs, and which he had in vain endeavoured to conceal from Sabektekin, to abdicate the Khalifat, in favour of his son Al Tai, or Al Tay', Li'llah; who thereupon, about the middle of Dbu'lkaada, was saluted Khalif. Al Moti died at Dair Al Akul, c a little above two months after he had been deposed, in the year of the Hejra 364. He was nominal Khalif, having been stript of all his power and authority by the family of Bûiya, then in possession of Persia and Irâk, twenty-nine years and five months; being about sixty-three years of age, at the time of his death. He was of a sweet and affable temper, modest in disputation, mild, gentle, sincere, charitable, and extremely devout in the performance of all religious duties. Dair Al Akul, or Akula, is placed by Sharif Al Edrisi, called by some the Nubian geographer, upon one of the banks of the Euphrates, five stations, or mansions, from Baghdâd. We find it denominated Dair Al Akul by Abu'l-feda and Al Makin. Bar Hebræus makes it to be the same with Cûfa; but, according to Abu'l- feda, it was a different place, situated in the neighbourhood of Baghdâd, and about ten d parasangs off Al Madâyen upon the Tigris; which seems to be confirmed by Al Makin. It is called Akula by Bar Hebræus, and the other Syriac writers; from whom we learn, that the prelate, who, by way of eminence, was styled the bishop of the Arabs, resided for the most part here. For the better understanding of which remark, it will be proper to observe, that the Jacobites, of which sect the Christian Arabs generally were, had two bishops of the Arabs subject to their Masriân, or metropolitan of the East: one of whom going under the appellation of bishop of the Arabs, held his residence at Akula; and the other, who had the title of bishop of the Scenite Arabs, of the tribe of Tbaalab in Hira, or Hirta, as the Syrians name it, resided in that city. The word Dair denotes a monastery, convent, or religious house, amongst the Arabic writers; though, amongst the modern Arabs, it is e frequently taken for a village, or small town. Abuna Minâ was constituted patriarch of the Jacobites at Alexandria, in the 350th year of the Hejra, being the 17th of the Khalifat of Al Moti, as we learn from some of the Christian historians followed by Al Makin.

S E C T. XLVI.

Al Tay' Li'lllah ascends
the Moslem throne after the abdication
of Al Moti.

AL TAY' LI'LLAH EBN AL MOTI, whose name was either Abu'l Fadl Abd'alcarim, f or Abu Becr Abd'alcarim, was saluted Khalif, the very day on which his father Al Moti had been prevailed upon, or rather constrained, by Sabektekin, to relinquish his nominal dignity. He was inaugurated, the 13th of Dbu'lkaada, the present year; being then, according to Al Makin, either forty-seven or fifty years of age; which if we admit, his father must have been extremely young, when he was born. His mother's name, if we will believe the same author, was Aini; but whether she was Al Moti's wife or concu-bine, we have not been informed. Immediately after his inauguration, he assigned the sublime post of Emîr Al Omrà to Sabektekin, who had been so instrumental in his elevation to the Khalifat. He enjoyed, however, nothing more than the empty title of emperor, or commander,

a commander, of the faithful; having been stript by the Emír Al Omrá of his power and authority, in the same manner as was his immediate predecessor<sup>d</sup>,

THIS year, the Karmatians, notwithstanding their former defeat, made a second irruption <sup>The Karmatians are overthrown by Al Moezz's troops.</sup> into Egypt, and penetrated to Mesr. But they were overthrown again with very great slaughter, and obliged to fly to the country from whence they came; that is, the territory of Al Katif and Al Absí. As they were pursued by a body of 10,000 horse, that kept close at their heels till they reached their own frontiers, both Egypt and Syria were soon effectually cleared of them. After which, Al Moezz sent Thalem Ebn Mawláb Al Okáili, one of his generals, with a large body of troops to Damascus, to keep the seditious inhabitants of that city in awe. But, notwithstanding the force with which he was supported, the Damascenes had such an aversion to his government, that, for near a year, he found himself not a little embroiled and embarrassed with them. A considerable part of the city was reduced to ashes, during the commotions which at this time happened. The people of Mecca and Medina, however, prayed publicly in their mosques for Al Moezz Ledini'llah, and persisted in their fidelity to the Fátémite Khalíf, the present year<sup>e</sup>.

IN the mean time, the Turks, under the command of Sabektekín, marched to Wáset, <sup>The Turks where Baktiyár, or Azzo'ddawla, then resided, in order to take vengeance of him for the injuries he had offered them, during the course of his administration. Sabektekín carried with him both Al Motí and Al Tay', to draw the Moslems to his standard, in this expedition.</sup> <sup>form the siege of Wáset.</sup>

c But the former of those princes died at Dair Al Akúl, as has been already observed, and his death was immediately followed by that of Sabektekín himself; after which, the remains of both of them were conducted to Baghdád, and there interred. In the room of Sabektekín, the Turks chose Al Aftekín, one of their principal commanders, for their general, and continued their route to Wáset. Sabektekín died of a diarrhoea at Dair Al Akúl, where he had incamped, the 24th of Al Moharram, and the year of the Hejra 364, after he had been Emír Al Omrá to the Khalíf Al Tay' only two months and thirteen days. As for Al Aftekín Al Sbarábi, who succeeded him in the command of the Turkish troops, he had likewise, as well as Sabektekín, been an officer under Moezzo'ddawla Ebn Búya, and distinguished himself on several occasions; which gained him great credit with his countrymen, who, after Sabektekín's decease, elected him their chief. After his election, he immediately advanced to Wáset, sat down before the place, and carried on the siege of it with uncommon ardour, for the space of fifty days. As Azzo'ddawla's men had been repulsed in every fall, and worsted in every attack, and as provisions began now to fail him, this general found that he could not alone make head against Al Aftekín; and therefore he dispatched express after express to his cousin-german Adado'ddawla in Persia, to let him know the distress he was in, and to implore his assistance; telling him, that he would much rather submit to a relation and a friend, than to a foreigner, and one that was an enemy to their family. This made such an impression upon Adado'ddawla, that he hastened to his relief with all the forces he was master of; as will more clearly appear from our account of the principal events of the following year, amongst which these very transactions themselves have been placed by Al Makín<sup>f</sup>.

WE must not forget to remark, that the Tárikh, or history of Thábet Ebn Senán Ebn <sup>Some account of Thábet Ebn Senán and Afrihi Ebn Adi, who flourished about the time we are now upon.</sup> Thábet Ebn Korra, so celebrated over all the Moslem world, which began with the year of the Hejra 275, or, according to Abu'l Faraj, 290, concludes with the present year. This Thábet Ebn Senán was a very famous physician, and had the care of the hospital at Baghdád committed to him. His history has been represented as a most excellent performance by Abu'l Faraj; who informs us, that he mentions therein a great number of remarkable facts, not elsewhere to be found. A supplement to this noble work has been written by Helál, his nephew, not his son, as M. D'Herbelot asserts, who was likewise a very eminent physician, historian, and philosopher. Thábet Ebn Senán died, in the year of the Hejra 365, if Abu'l feda may be depended upon, or in the 363d year of the Moslem æra, if we will believe Abu'l Faraj. Afrihi Ebn Adi Ebn Hamíd Ebn Zacharíá Al Tecríti, a very noted logician, who lived a considerable part of his time at Baghdád, was one of his contemporaries. This learned man was often employed in transcribing books of literature. He wrote a very fine legible hand, and that with so much expedition, that he could finish an hundred leaves in a day and a night's time. He left behind him several versions and explications of antient authors, besides other works, that were held in great esteem. He was instructed in logic by the famous Abu Nasr Mohammed Ebn Mohammed Tarkbún Al Fárábi, of whom we have already given our readers a particular account. To which we shall now beg leave to add, that Al Fârâbi, who was looked upon by the Moslems as the prince of philosophers, and the phoenix of his age, first learned philosophy at Baghdâd of Yahya, or Yohannâ Ebn Jaballad, in which he made a much greater progress than any of the others who were instructed with him; that he much excelled his second master, Abu Basbar Matta Ebu Yûnes, in all those branches of literature he had applied himself to; that, by his logical, physical, metaphysical, and political compositions, his fame has already been, and will hereafter be, transmitted down to all succeeding ages; and that, finally, he understood the Aristotelian philosophy better than, and supplied many defects in the writings of, the famous Al Kendi, and others. Afrîbi Ebn Adi, who was a Christian of the Jacobite sect, died in the month of Ab, or August, and the year of Seleucus 1285, towards the close of the 363d year of the Hejra, and was buried at Baghdâd; being, at the time of his death, about eighty-one solar years old <sup>e</sup>.

Adado'd-dawla possesses himself of Baghdâd.

IN the year of the Hejra 364, commencing September 21, 974, Adado'd-dawla, excited thereto by the repeated solicitations of Azzo'd-dawla, marched with the Persian forces into Irâk, and advanced into the neighbourhood of Wâset. Al Aftekin, having received advice of his approach, immediately abandoned the siege, and retired with the Turkish troops to Baghdâd. Upon his arrival there, he found that city in the hands of Abu Tâglab Ebn Nasero'd-dawla; who having been sent for by Azzo'd-dawla, to assist him against the Turks, had taken post in that metropolis, seized upon the Emîr Al Omrâ's palace, and obliged all ranks and degrees of men to recognize his authority. But Al Aftekin, having brought with him the Khalîf Al Tay', summoned him in that prince's name to surrender the place; which not being immediately done, the Turks attacked it sabre in hand, and carried it with inconsiderable loss. In the mean time, Adado'd-dawla having forced Al Aftekin to raise the siege of Wâset, joined Azzo'd-dawla; and, after that junction, pursued the Turks to Baghdâd. Being arrived before the town, Adado'd-dawla invested that part of it situated on the eastern bank of the Tigris, and Azzo'd-dawla the other. The Turks finding themselves upon the point of being straitly shut up, in order to avoid the calamities attending a siege, marched out of the place, and were followed by the combined army, under the command of Adado'd-dawla and Azzo'd-dawla, who came up with them at Dair Al Akûl; upon which, a sharp and bloody engagement ensued, wherein both sides sustained an incredible loss. But at last the Turks were constrained to leave the field of battle to the victors; who thereupon became masters of the Khalîf's person, and afterwards triumphantly entered the city of Baghdâd. The battle was fought the fourteenth of the former Jomâda, and the princes of the house of Bûiya soon after possessed themselves of the capital; but the Khalîf Al Tay' did not return to his palace before the eighth of Râjeb, when Adado'd-dawla prostrated himself before him, and had the honour to kiss his hand. The Persian forces, after the end of the action, made themselves masters of the Turkish camp, and observed an exact discipline in the city of Baghdâd; but Azzo'd-dawla's troops mutinied for their pay, treated their general with great marks of disrespect, and committed many disorders. As, therefore, Azzo'd-dawla had no money to pacify them with, Adado'd-dawla advised him to resign his command, and shut himself up in his house; that he might thereby be the better enabled, with the assistance of his own troops, to bring them back to a sense of their duty. But Azzo'd-dawla had no sooner dismissed the officers of his court, declared himself incapable of government, and formally renounced before proper witnesses all pretensions to the post of Emîr Al Omrâ, than Adado'd-dawla caused him and his brothers to be seized at a splendid entertainment, to which he had invited them, on the 26th of the latter Jomâda, and immediately sent to prison, in the most perfidious manner. After which, in order to secure to himself the possession of the supreme power at Baghdâd, he thought fit to caress the Khalîf Al Tay', by pretending to an intire submission to him, by augmenting his proper revenue, and by supplying him not only with large sums of ready money for present use, but likewise with a sufficient quantity of such costly furniture for his palace, as was worthy the high and sublime character he sustained <sup>b</sup>.

But afterwards abandons that capital.

BUT, notwithstanding his pretended submission, and engaging behaviour, to the Khalîf, he did not long enjoy the power which he had so unjustly acquired. For, Marzapân, or Marzabân, Azzo'd-dawla's son, receiving advice at Basra, of which city he then was governor, of what had happened to his father at Baghdâd, immediately wrote to Rucno'd-dawla, Adado'd-dawla's father, an account of that event: which produced in him such emotions of anger and grief, that, upon the first news of it, he threw himself upon the ground in a most frantic manner; and afterwards contracted such a distemper, by an irregular abstinence and perturbation of mind, occasioned by the disagreeable news that had been imparted to him, as might have been of fatal consequence, had it not been speedily <sup>g</sup> a removed by Adado'ddawla's subsequent conduct. He also upbraided his son, in the sharpest terms, with his iniquitous behaviour, and threatened him with the effects of his resentment, if he did not restore to Azzo'ddawla the post of which he had so unjustly deprived him. Adado'ddawla, in order to pacify his father, proposed to cede to the person injured some part of his Persian territories, as an equivalent for what he had usurped in Irâk. But this proposal was so far from being relished or approved of by Rucno'ddawla, that he was upon the point of cutting to pieces the minister who delivered it to him; by whom he sent back a message to his son, importing, that if he did not instantly comply with his commands, he would come himself with an army to Baghdâd, and reinstate Azzo'ddawla in his former post. Nor did Abu'l Fatbi Ebn Al Amid, Adado'ddawla's second ambassador, meet with a b more favourable reception from him; the answer given that minister, on this occasion, being extremely rough, and such as indicated his wrath to be by no means yet appeased. Adado'ddawla, therefore, finding that his father would be obeyed, released Azzo'ddawla without delay, put him again at the head of the Khalif's councils, and then retired with his forces into Persia. However, he obliged both the Khalif Al Tay' and Azzo'ddawla to swear, that they would never oppose either his commands, or those of his father Rucno'ddawla, before his departure from Baghdâd; which, according to Abu'lfeda, happened in the month of Shawâl, the present year<sup>1</sup>.

In the mean time, Al Asteîn, after he had been driven by Adado'ddawla from Baghdâd. What hapmoved at the head of his Turks into Syria, and possessed himself of Hems. From thence he c advanced to Damascus, and was received with open arms by the inhabitants of that city. He was no sooner admitted into the town, than he enabled the Damascenes to expel from thence Zaban, or Zabban, an eunuch, and Al Mocz's governor of the place; after which, they discontinued their recognition of Al Mocz's authority in the mosques, on days of divine service. That prince dying the following year, his son and successor, Al Azîz Bi'llah, sent Jawhâr, his general, with a powerful army, into Syria; who laid siege to Damascus, and carried on his attacks with so much vigour, that the city must have fallen into his hands, if a body of the Karmatian troops had not hastened to its relief. At the approach
d of these troops, Jawhâr thought fit to raise the siege, as he was not in a condition to make head against them, and at the same time to repulse the Damascenes, in the numerous sallies which they made. The Karmatians, having been joined by the Turks and Damascenes, pursued Jawhâr, and came up with him first at Al Ramla, and afterwards at Ascalon, or Ashkelon; at the last of which places, they offered him battle. But Jawhâr, having lost the greatest part of his men by famine, declined an engagement. However, he was reduced in a short time to the last extremity, and with great difficulty prevailed upon e Al Asteîn, who commanded the combined army, to permit him, for a large sum of money, to return into Egypt. Upon his arrival at Mesr, he persuaded Al Azîz himself to undertake an expedition against Al Asteîn, then in possession of the best part of Syria. That prince, therefore, without delay, marched with a formidable army against the rebels, and came up with them at Al Ramla; where, after an obstinate dispute, he intirely defeated them, put a vast number of them to the sword, and took most of the rest prisoners. However, Al Asteîn himself found means to make his escape. But Al Azîz having offered a reward of 100,000 dinârs to any one who would deliver that general alive into his hands, Masraj Ebn Dagfal, an Arab of the tribe of Tay, his particular friend, with whom he had taken refuge, being tempted by the largeness of the reward, brought him alive to the Fâtemite Khalif; who was so far from offering him any violence, that he made him a present of a very fine tent, as well as of several sumptuous mantles, or cloaks, and much household-furniture of almost inestimable value, released all the Turkish prisoners who had fought under him as their chief, and carried him with him to Mesr, where in great affluence he at last ended his days<sup>2</sup>.

f THIS year, according to Al Kâdi Shababo'ddin Ebn Abildâm Al Hamawi, Abu'l Kasem Other transac-Ebn Al Hasan, the Emîr of Sicily, undertook an expedition against the Christians of that tions of the island, reduced Messina, Catana, and several other fortresses of considerable strength, and present year.
ravaged the country through which he moved in a dreadful manner. Not content with this, he committed terrible depredations on the coast of Calabria, and even made incursions into the interior part of that province; after which his troops returned home, with a great number of prisoners, and laden with spoil. These operations, however, are placed by Abu'lfeda amongst the transactions of the following year. About the same time, Rucno'ddawla Ebn Bâtiya, who was now far advanced in years, assigned to his son Adado'ddawla Fârs, Arjûn, and Kermân; to his son Mowayyado'ddawla Al Rûy and Esfahân; and to his son Fakro'ddawla Dainawâr and Hamadân. He also obliged them at the same time to take an oath to support one another, and to act in concert, on all emergent occasions. The Khalif Al Tay', according to Al Makin, took to wife Sabrahân, Alads'adawla Ebn Moazz's daughter, and promised her for a dower 100,000 dinars, before the close of the present year<sup>1</sup>.

The Greeks
make an irruption into
Syria.

THE same year, if we will believe Al Makin, the Greeks, under the conduct of the emperor Zimisces, made an irruption into Syria, took Hems and Baalbec, and from the latter of those cities marched to Damascus. But Al Aftikin, continues the same author, advancing against them with a considerable force, Zimisces turned off to Sidon, and obliged the inhabitants of that place to pay him a large sum of money; after which, he moved to Tripoli, and besieged that city above forty days. Here, if we will believe the historian now before us, through the influence of Basilus and Constantine, he had poison administered to him; which forced him to retire, in a sick and languishing condition, to Antioch. But the people of that place refusing to admit him into the town, he cut down all their trees, and returned home; though, before he reached Constantinople, he expired, as we learn from one of the later Greek writers. After the departure of Zimisces, Antioch surrendered to a body of troops he left behind him, to continue the siege of that city; though in a short time it returned to its former masters, as clearly appears from some of the eastern historians. We must not forget to observe, that the Turks, who fled with Al Aftikin to Damascus from Baghdad, did not amount to above 300 men; and that the Magrebian troops, left by Al Moezz in the former of those places, are called Asirians by Al Makin<sup>m</sup>.

Al Moezz
dies, and is succeeded by his son Al
Aziz.

THE next year, being the 365th of the Hejra, beginning September 10th, 975, Al Moezz Leâim'llah, the conqueror of Syria and Egypt, departed this life, either on the 11th or the 17th of the former Rabi, after he had sat upon the throne of Kairwân twenty-three years, four months, and several days, and about three years upon that of Egypt. He was born at Al Mokdia, the capital of the Khalifat of Kairwân, the 11th of Ramadân, in the year of the Hejra 319, and consequently died in the 46th year of his age. He entertained a vast opinion of the truth of astrology, and never undertook any enterprize of moment, without consulting those who pretended to have skill in that art. He has, however, been considered in the main by the Moslem writers as a learned and virtuous prince. He was in particular famed for his liberality, his love of justice, and his exemplary life, as well as for the love he bore his subjects, whom he governed with great lenity and moderation. His son Al Aziz Billah, who succeeded him, was born at Al Mokdia, either the 24th of Al Mcharram, in the year of the Hejra 342, or in the 344th year of the Moslem æra; for in this point the Arab writers do not perfectly agree, according to Al Makin. Before the conclusion of the year we are now upon, the people of Mecca offered up their prayers publicly to heaven for the health, welfare, and prosperity, of this prince<sup>n</sup>.

Abu'l Kasem
the Emir of Sicily, continues his depredations in Calabria.

THE same year, Abu'l Kasem Ebn Al Hasan, the Emir of Sicily, continued his depredations in Calabria; destroying many towns and villages there, and laying waste a considerable part of that province with fire and sword. His troops took so many head of cattle from the Calabrians, that they could not carry off all of them into Sicily; and therefore, by the Emir's order, they slaughtered most of them upon the spot, called from thence, in the days of Al Kâdi Shakabo'ddin, the shambles of oxen, or cows, before they set sail for that island. This Abu'l Kasem, as we are told by the last-mentioned author, continued annually his devastations in the aforesaid province, till the year of the Hejra 371, coincident with the latter part of the year of CHRIST 981, and the former part of 982, doing irreparable damage where-ever he moved<sup>o</sup>.

Al Aziz
proves superior to all his enemies in Egypt.

IT appears from Al Makin, that Al Aziz's affairs in Egypt were greatly imbroiled this year, notwithstanding he had made Jawbar, a person of uncommon abilities, his prime minister. Several battles, as this author clearly intimates, were fought in the neighbourhood of Mesr, or Al Fostât, and the Fâtemite Khalif himself was straitly besieged in that capital. But at last the siege was raised, and Al Aziz proved superior to all his enemies, probably by the conduct and address of Jawbar, as well as the bravery of his troops. As black was the colour most in vogue amongst the eastern Khalifs of the house of Al Abbâs, so white was most esteemed by the Fâtemite Khalifs. This had been substituted in the room of the other amongst his subjects by Al Moezz, and was the fashionable colour through the whole court of Al Aziz's reign, as it has ever since been amongst the greatest part of the Africans and Arabs, even to this very day. We must not forget to remark, that the division of the

- a large and extensive dominions of the house of Būiya, made by Rucno'ddawla amongst his three sons, in the manner above related, ought to be placed rather in this than the preceding year <sup>p</sup>.

ABU BECR MOHAMMED EBN ALI EBN ISMAEL AL CAFFAL AL SHASHI, according to Abu'lfeḍa, died the present year; though some writers suppose his death to have happened in the 366th year of the Hejra, and others in the 336th year of that æra. He was a native of Al Shāsh, a very considerable city of the Transoxana, or Mawarā'nahr, in the territory of Samarkand, near the Sībūn, or Sīr, the Jaxartes of the antients, and seated upon a river of the same name. From the place of his nativity he was denominated Al Shāshi, and was the most celebrated Fakih of the sect of Al Shāfe'i, at least in the Transoxana, of the age in which he lived. He travelled, for the sake of acquiring knowledge, into Syria, Arabia, and Irāk. His masters were Ebn Soraib, from whom he learned jurisprudence, Mokammed Ebn Jorair Al Tabari, and others no way inferior to him, by whom he was instructed in the principles of traditionary theology; in which science, or discipline, he had for his scholars Al Hakem Ebn Mandab, and several other youths, who made a very surprizing progress therein. This Abu Becr Mohammed Al Shāshi had a son named Al Kasem, who was the author of a book, intituled, Al Tacrib, i. e. the admonition, or appropinquation, viz. to God; which was become extremely scarce and difficult to be found, even in the days of Abu'lfeḍa, above 400 years ago. This book, which, according to the last-mentioned author, is not to be confounded with another bearing the same title, much more common, and written by Solaim Al Rāzi, has been cited by the authors of the books Al Nehayab, Al Wafith, and Al Basith, as well as by Al Ghazālī, who calls the writer of it Abu'l Kasem; wherein he is undoubtedly mistaken, as his name was simply Al Kasem. There was another Abu Becr Mohammed Al Shāshi, taken notice of by Abu'lfeḍa, in his account of the transactions of the year of the Hejra 507; who wrote the books Al Omdah and Al Mostāthbari, and probably several other pieces. Our Abu Becr Mohammed Al Shāshi composed a book, intituled, Adab Al Kādi, concerning the qualities requisite to form a judge, according to the principles of the Imām Al Shāfe'i; but what other pieces have been penned by him, we have not been told. The city of Al Shāsh, whose territory extends from Nūbakht to Fargāna, has been placed in Turkeṣtān by Al Berjendi, who makes it to be watered by two rivers; one of which goes under the name of the river Al Shāsh. We are informed by Ahmed Al Kāteb, and another eastern author, that it was about four stages from Khojanda, and five from Fargāna, or Andukand. It is at present called Tashkent, and was formerly a magnificent city; though it now makes no great figure, as having been several times destroyed and rebuilt. We are told, however, that it is the winter-residence of the Khān of the Kassāts, who possesses the eastern part of Turkeṣtān. The famous Timūr Bek, or Timūr Beg, according to Arabshūh, in his history of that prince, was born at Kboja Ilgar, a village in the territory of Al Shāsh; though other writers, if we will believe M. D'Herbelot, are of a different opinion <sup>q</sup>.

- THE following year, being the 366th of the Hejra, commencing August 30th, 976, in the month of Al Moharram, Rucno'ddawla Al Hasan Ebn Būiya departed this life, after he had reigned forty-four years, one month, and nine days; being above seventy years of age, at the time of his death. He was a prince of the finest endowments, beloved by all those who had been so happy as to live under his government, and revered by the whole Moslem world; insomuch that his death was considered, by those of the same religion with himself, who survived him, as a public loss. After his decease, the hatred Adado'ddawla, his eldest son, bore Azzo'ddawla, his nephew, which in his father's life-time was not permitted to discover itself, soon began to appear. Having made the necessary preparations for an invasion of Irāk, he broke into Abwāz, or Al Abwāz, with a powerful army. Here Azzodd'awla met him at the head of the Khalif's forces, attended by Al Tay' himself, and Ali Ebn Abu Thāber, his Wazir; but being overthrown with very great slaughter, he fled to Wāset. Upon which, Adado'ddawla plundered his camp, which he had abandoned, in a shameful manner, and sent a large detachment to seize upon Basra, and the circumjacent tract. This the Persians found it no difficult matter to effect, as Azzo'ddawla had left no troops in those parts to oppose them. The season being now far advanced, and Azzo'ddawla having shut himself up, with all the forces he could assemble, in Baghdād, the reduction of Basra, and its dependencies, concluded the operations of the campaign <sup>r</sup>.

Sabektekîn is made governor
of Gaznah.

THIS year, according to Abu'lfeda, the famous Sabektekîn, a Turk by nation, who had a been one of Abu Ishak Ebn Alptekîn's slaves, and was afterwards general of all Nûb Ebn Mansûr's forces in Khorasân, by his master's death, became governor of Gaznah, the capital of Zâblestân; in which he was confirmed, with great marks of distinction, by Nûb. It appears, however, from Khondemir, that he succeeded Alptekîn himself, and not his son Abu Ishak, in the government of Gaznah; that he had been originally one of Alptekîn's slaves, and never served in that capacity Abu Ishak; and that his master discovering an assemblage of fine qualities in him, made him his heir. We are likewise informed by the Persian historian, that Sabektekîn was saluted general by the forces of the province, which were intirely at his devotion, after Alptekîn's death, in the year of the Hejra 365, and not in that we are now upon, as Abu'lfeda asserts. But however this may be, he afterwards made b a surprising figure in the eastern world, carried his arms into India, constrained many of the Rajabs (I), or princes of that vast region, to embrace Mohammedism, and convert their pagan temples into mosques, and annexed Casdar and Bost in Sejistan to his dominions, as will hereafter more fully appear in the sequel of this history *.

Mansûr Ebn
Nûb Ebn
Nafr Ebn
Ahmed Al
Sammâni dies.

ABOUT the middle of Shawâl, the present year, Mansûr Ebn Nûb Ebn Nafr Ebn Ahmed Al Sammâni, the prince, or sovereign, of Khorasân and the Transoxana, according to Abu'lfeda, died at Bokhâra, and was succeeded by his son Nûb, an infant only thirteen years old; but if we will believe Ebn Shohnab, and the Emîr Tabya Ebn Abd'ollatif Al Kazwîni, the author of the Lebtârikh, both Mansûr's death and Nûb's accession happened, the preceding year. Al Kâdi Al Mondar Ebn Sa'id Al Ballutbi, the supreme judge of Andalusia, an Imâm, c Fakib, preacher, and poet, a person of great probity and merit, likewise departed this life, the present year *.

Other transactions of the present year.

ABOUT the same time, Adado'ddawla deposed Abu'l Fathi Ebn Al Amid, his father's Wazîr, ordered his nose to be cut off, and deprived him of the use of one of his eyes by a red-hot iron, when he imagined himself secure, and in no danger of a disgrace. The night before this accident happened he spent in jollity with his friends, for whom he had prepared a sumptuous entertainment, was served in gold plate and glass vessels of exquisite workmanship, had provided a variety of the most costly perfumes, and saw every thing conducted with the utmost elegance and magnificence. In fine, he indulged himself that night, in which an unusual scene of luxury appeared, in the gratification of his appetite to an immoderate d degree; not being then in the least apprehensive of meeting with such a reverse of fortune, as that which the next day happened to him. We are told by Abu'lfeda, that Abu'l Kasem Ebn Al Hasan, the Emîr of Sicily, made, this year, a descent upon Italy, and penetrated into Al Langobarda, the Lower Lombardy, or Campania, the dutchy of Benevento, and the neighbouring provinces; from whence his troops carried off a vast number of head of cattle, and slaughtered them by his command upon the spot of ground on which he had incamped. From this accident, continues the same author, the name of Manakh Al Bacri, the slaughter, or shambles, of oxen, was derived to the spot on which it happened. And this name is retained to the time when he wrote his annals, or general history, so often referred to here. This expedition, from the last-mentioned event, appears to be the very same with that taken e notice of by Al Kâdi Shahabo'ddin, as happening the foregoing year; but whether Abu'lfeda, or that writer, has fixed the time of it with greater precision, we shall not pretend to determine. Haken, or rather Al Hakem, Abn Ahmed Ebn Abu Sa'id, the Karmatian general, who was once possessed of a very considerable part of Syria, and penetrated into Egypt, from whence he was driven with prodigious loss, as has been already observed, is said to have died at Al Ramla, in some part of the year we are now upon *.

(I) The word Rajah, in the Indian language, according to Mr. Frazer, properly denotes a prince. M. D'Herbelot informs us, that it ought to be written Rai; and that it signifies, amongst the Indians, an idolatrous king, or prince, of that nation. He likewise relates, that the Persians make this term in the plural Raïan, and the European travellers Raïas and Ragias; the last of which words, according to the French pronunciation, approaches extremely near to Mr. Frazer's Rajah, if it may not be considered as exactly coinciding with it. The Indians generally prefix to this title the proper name of the person to whom it is applied, as Sewa Rajah, Sahou Rajah, to omit an infinity of instances of the same kind, that might with equal facility be produced. Hence the word Raïpour, or Rajahpour, which imports royal city, capital, or the place where one of those Rajabs resides (14).

- a THE same year, died also Al Hakem Ebn Abd'alrahmân Al Nasr, of the house of Ommiyah, the lord of Andalusia, after he had reigned, under the title of Al Montaser, or Al Montasar, fifteen years, and five months; being, at the time of his death, sixty three years and seven months old. This we learn from Abu'lfeda, with whom Roderic of Toledo in the main agrees; though the latter of these writers is inconsistent with himself, in what he relates of this prince's reign. For he first tells us, that he reigned sixteen years and two months; and immediately afterwards, almost in the same breath, is pleased to add, that he died in the sixty-fourth year of his age, and the sixteenth of his reign. Al Hakem is said to have been extremely well versed in jurisprudence, history, and several other sciences; which enabled him to make a figure amongst the learned. His son Heshâm succeeded him, under the title of Al
- b Morwayyad Bi'llah, being then only ten years of age; so that Abu Amer Mohammed Ebn Abd'al-lah Al Moasferi, his Hajeb, or chamberlain, governed the kingdom of Corduba, or Andalusia, for him. This Abu Amer was descended from the tribe of Moasfer, settled originally in Taman; for which reason, he was denominated Al Moasferi, and assumed the title, or surname, of Al Mansûr. He ruled with an absolute sway, and suffered no one to have access to the young prince; who was only the nominal Khalîf, or sovereign, of the Moslem conquests in Spain. As Abu Amer raised himself intirely by his merit, the people were extremely well pleased with his elevation; though several persons of distinction aspired at the high post he so worthily filled. He was born at Thorash, or Torres, and received his education at Corduba, where he made a very considerable progress in several branches of literature, and was a great encourager of learn-
- c ed men; who flocked to his palace from all parts, as to a most celebrated and flourishing academy. He likewise extended his favour and encouragement to all that excelled in the mechanical arts, and had rendered themselves remarkable by surpassing others in any part of useful knowledge. Whence it came to pass, that the Moslems considered his administration as a public blessing. Nor was he less famous for his bravery and military skill; having made above fifty irruptions into the territories of the neighbouring Franks, many of which were attended with good success. But the most memorable of his expeditions was that in which he gained a complete victory over Garcias, the son of Sanja, or Sancho, king of the Franks, and took that prince himself prisoner, in the latter Rabi, and the year of the Hejra 385, nearly coincident with the 995th of CHRIST. 'Tis remarkable, that the very day on which
- d the signal victory was obtained, and Garcias fell into the Moslems hands, Sa'id Ebn Al Hasan, an Andalusian poet and philologer, sent a hart, to which he had given the name of Garcias, with a rope, or cord, about its neck, as a present to Al Mansûr, together with an encomiastic, or copy of verses, in praise of that hero; three, or a tristich, of which have been preserved by Abu'lfeda; who considers this event as an effect of the immediate decree of Divine Providence itself. Having once laid waste the frontiers of Castile, he shut up a body of Franks in a strait passage, or defile, formed by the neighbouring mountains, and could easily have starved them to a surrender; but his clemency prompted him to release them, when they were upon the point of perishing with hunger. For the particulars of Al Mansûr's expeditions against the Christians, or Franks, Roderic of Toledo refers his
- e readers to the history of the Goths; wherein, he says, he has treated more largely and copiously of them. According to this writer, Al Mansûr did not take upon himself the office of Hâjeb, or chamberlain, to Al Montasar, before the year of the Hejra 367; though Abu'lfeda seems to intimate, that he was possessed of that post immediately after the young prince's accession. His glorious exploits against the Franks so endeared him to the Spanish Moslems, that they frequently offered him the crown of Corduba; which he, with great uprightness and integrity, constantly refused. He died, in the year of the Hejra 393, according to Roderic, and was succeeded in his sublime station by his son Abd'almâlec; who received an overthrow from the Franks, after he had penetrated into the kingdom of Leon, the following year, and never afterwards attempted any thing against them. However, Heshâm's
- f subjects were well enough pleased with his administration. He departed this life, in the 400th year of the Moslem æra; upon which, his brother Abd'alrahmân was constituted Hâjeb, or chamberlain, and prime minister to Heshâm. This minister intirely abandoned himself to wine and women, and forced his master Heshâm to declare him his successor; which so exasperated that prince's subjects, that they assassinated him, about four months and an half after he had taken upon himself the government of Andalusia. Notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary by Roderic of Toledo, Abu'lfeda relates, that Al Mansûr continued to preside over the Spanish Moslems, under the auspices of Heshâm, till the year of the Hejra 396 (K); but in what manner the sublime post he had so long occupied then became

Other remarkable events of the present year.

WE must not forget to observe, that Saado'ddawla Sharif Abu'l Maali, the son of the famous Saifo'ddawla, returned to Aleppo, from whence he had been driven by Curuba, one of his father's slaves, the present year. After his expulsion from Aleppo, he retired first to Mayyâfâraîn, afterwards to Hamab, and from thence to Hems; the last of which places he found himself obliged to abandon at the approach of the Greeks, who sacked, and in a great measure destroyed, that city. It was soon, however, restored to its pristine state by Marakthash, who had been likewise one of Saifo'ddawla's slaves, and had afterwards possessed himself of the castle of Borzayyab. This general came over with a body of troops to Saado'ddawla Sharif Abu'l Maali Ebn Saifo'ddawla; which proved no small accession of strength to that prince. In the mean time, Bacjûr, one of Curuba's slaves, whom he had made governor of the castle of Aleppo, seized upon his master and put him under arrest in that castle. This so incensed the people of Aleppo, that they sent to Saado'ddawla, to implore his protection, and to desire him to rescue them from the tyranny of Bacjûr, who had usurped the sovereignty of their city. The first thing Saado'ddawla did, after his arrival at Aleppo, was, to promise Bacjûr not only an unlimited pardon and amnesty, to extend to all his adherents, but likewise the prefecture of Hems, if he would acknowledge him for his prince. With this proposal he immediately closed, and introduced Saado'ddawla, with his troops, into the castle; which put the place effectually into his hands. About the same time, Babastûn, the son of Washmakîn, or Washmakir, Ebn Zayyâr departed this life; as did also Yusef Ebn Al Hasan Al Jannâbi, the Karmatian, lord, or prince, of Hajr, who was born in the year of the Hejra 280. After his death, the Karmatians changed the form of their government, and committed the direction of their state to six great officers, whom they dignified with the title of lords, or regents. For a farther account of this nation, or rather sect, we must refer our learned and curious readers to Al Nowairi, in the third volume of his history; who will, we doubt not, give them a full and ample satisfaction on this head, as well as several others, which the limits of this work will not permit us at present to touch upon *.

Adado'ddawla puts Azzo'ddawla and his Wazir to death.

IN the year of the Hejra 367, beginning Aug. 19th, 977, Adado'ddawla appeared at the head of a powerful army before the walls of Baghdâd. But before he laid siege to the town, he offered to permit Azzo'ddawla to retire to any place where should think proper to chuse, except Al Mawfel, and even to cede some part of his territories to him, provided he would immediately abandon Irâk. He also sent him a cloke, or mantle, not so much as a mark of respect, as an intimation of his being in a state of subjection to him. However, Azzo'ddawla put on this cloke, and departed out of Irâk; intending to make the best of his way towards Syria. He had no sooner left the capital, than Adado'ddawla entered it, mentioned his own name in the public prayers, which had never before been done, and ordered a drum to be beat before his palace; which was likewise an innovation. He also commanded Ebn Bakîb, or Ali Ebn Abu Thâher, as he is called by Al Makîn, Azzo'ddawla's Wâzir, to be put to death, and his body to be affixed to a gibbet, or cross, erected for that purpose; which drew a fine copy of verses, in praise of that unhappy person, from Abu'l Hasan Al Anbâri, the poet; several of which have been handed down to us both by Abu'l-feda and Al Makîn. This obliged the Khalîf Al Tay' to confer the post of Emîr Al Omra upon Adado'ddawla, to give him two imperial standards, and to put both himself and his family into his hands. In the mean time, Azzo'ddawla, after his departure from Baghdâd, went to Al Hadîtha, where he met with Hamdân Ebn Nasero'ddawla, who was in the same forlorn condition with himself; having been stript of the district his father had assigned him, and ejected from thence, by his brother Abu Taglab. These two exiled princes, having conferred together, resolved to move at the head of a body of troops they had assembled towards Al Mawfel, and force Abu Taglab to restore the places he had so unjustly taken from his brother Hamdân. But Abu Taglab, having been apprized of their hostile intentions, offered to join Azzo'ddawla with all his forces, and march with him directly to Baghdâd, in order to drive from thence Adado'ddawla, and restore him to his former post, if he would deliver up to him his brother Hamdân. With this proposal Azzo'ddawla immediately closed, and sent Hamdân to Abu Taglab in chains; upon which, that prince joined him with an army of 20,000 men. After this junction, Azzo'ddawla and Abu Taglab began their march for Baghdâd; but were met by Adado'ddawla, who brought with him the Khalîf Al Tay', in

- a the neighbourhood of Tecrit. After several movements, wherein the generals on both sides endeavoured to shew their military skill, a general action ensued, the 18th of Shawâl, at a place called Casr Al Jassi, or the castle of chalk, which ended in the defeat of Azzo'ddawla and Abu Taglab. The former of those commanders was taken prisoner in the action, and afterwards put to death by Adado'ddawla's order; but the latter made his escape to May-yâfârakîn, from whence he was driven by Abu'l Wasi, who had been sent in pursuit of him by Adado'ddawla, with a detachment of his troops, to Bedlis. Not thinking himself safe here, he fled into the Christian territories; where he was soon after attacked by a party of the Khalîf's forces, then in quest of him. But here he proved superior to his enemies, routed them, and then advanced to Hisn Ziyâd, or the castle of Ziyâd, called in the days of
- b Abu'lfeda, Khort Bart, i. e. Quarta Parthica, the fourth Parthian, i. e. legion; the fourth Parthian legion having probably, towards the decline of the Roman empire, been stationed, or quartered, there. This, if admitted, will give us sufficiently to understand, that the Romans, in certain intervals, denominated four of their legions Parthian; which perhaps has not hitherto been so clearly evinced, either from any good author, or from any genuine remains of antiquity. From Hisn Ziyâd Abu Taglab retired to Amed, where he for some time remained. After Azzo'ddawla's death, his head was cut off, and carried to Adado'ddawla; who is said to have wiped his eyes with an handkerchief, and to have shed tears at the sight of it. Azzo'ddawla was thirty-six years old, when he came to his untimely end; and had then exercised the function of Emîr Al Omrâ eleven years, and
- c some months, according to Al Makîn. He was a prince of a very robust body, sound understanding, and extremely brave; insomuch that, if we will believe the last-mentioned writer, he could take a bull by his legs, and throw him on his back upon the ground by main force, without ropes, or any kind of assistance. Nor was he afraid to encounter lions, and to hunt them. Upon Babastîn's death, Fânûs, another of Wajsmakîn's sons, ascended the throne of Jorjân and Tabrestân. The former of those princes is called Hasbûl by Al Makîn<sup>r</sup>.

- THE same year, Bardas Phocas, whom Basilus had recalled from exile, and put at the head of his forces, was overthrown, in the month of Dbu'lkaada, by Bardas Sclerus, the usurper, who had caused himself to be proclaimed emperor in Mesopotamia. Vast numbers
- d of men fell on both sides in this battle; which was fought at Amorium, as has been already observed. After the end of the action, Sclerus sent Abd'allah Al Montaser, one of his officers, to Antioch, to preside over the people of that city. But Abd'allah was, soon after his arrival there, prevailed upon, by the address of Agabius, a certain bishop, who had for some time resided at Aleppo, to desert Sclerus, and declare for the emperor. After which, Antioch submitted to that prince, and Agabius was promoted to the patriarchate of that city, as the people of it had been unanimously desired. Sclerus having received advice of what had happened at Antioch, dispatched thither one Babrâm, with a body of troops, to bring back the citizens to a sense of their duty to him. But they refusing to admit him into the town, he laid siege to it for some time, plundered the neighbouring district, and carried off with him
- e a vast many head of cattle. In the mean time, Sclerus sent an ambassador, with very valuable presents, to Adado'ddawla at Baghdâd, to request his assistance against the emperor; who thereupon promised him a body of his best troops, to enable him to make head against the imperial forces. This year, the famous Ephrêm Syrus, called by the Arabs Efrabâm Al Sorayai Ebn Zara'a, was constituted patriarch of the Jacobites at Alexandria, and remained in that see three years and six months. He was supposed to have been carried off by poison, through the wickedness of one Abu'l Sarûr, a Christian of note, who had a post in the Diwân, because he had several times reprov'd, and at last excommunicated him, for having many concubines, and not confining himself to one wife. For the perpetration of which horrid fact, he had one of his hands cut off, and soon after died, or rather, as we
- f would willingly understand Al Makîn, was put to death: for sure such punishment only could have been deemed adequate to so heinous a crime. This patriarch was of a most excellent disposition. He gave his substance to the poor, and to his own church, abolished all simoniacal exactions, and was extremely pious, regular, and devout, in the performance of all religious duties. Sewîrus, or Severus, Ebn Al Makfa', bishop of Al Asbmûnîn; was one of his contemporaries. The see of the Jacobite patriarchs at Alexandria continued vacant six months, after his death; and he was at last succeeded by Philotheus, who remained in that see twenty-four years and seven months. The new patriarch was very avaricious, an epicure, permitted simony, and had in general an exceeding bad character. He was at last, as we have been told, frightened to death by an apparition, which he saw

THE famous Mohammed Ebn Abd'alrahmân, commonly called Ebn Cariab, the Kâdi of Al Sendiyah, and other places in the neighbourhood of Baghdâd, departed this life, according to Abu'lfeda, the present year. Al Sendiyah was a town, in that writer's days, upon a canal, or branch, of the Tigris, denominated by the Arabs Nabr Isa, the river of Isa, between Al Anbâr and Baghdâd. Al Kâdi Ebn Cariab was a man of exceeding quick parts, and even the wonder of the age. He could instantly resolve all questions, and decide all juridical cases, without the least hesitation. He spoke with the utmost fluency and propriety; his style being always copious, elegant, and pure. The principal men of the age were his admirers, and took great pleasure in joking with him. They frequently proposed, <sup>b</sup> in writing, ridiculous questions to him, that drew from him immediate answers, penned without study or meditation, which excited the mirth and laughter of all that saw them. Al Mohallebi, the Wazîr, who was extremely intimate with him, procured several persons to draw up ludicrous questions, and propose imaginary cases to him. One of these, framed by Al Abbâs Ebn Al Moalla, has been preserved by Abu'lfeda, as a specimen of his wit; for a sight of which, we must beg leave to refer our learned and curious readers to that celebrated author, as it is rather too long to be inserted here <sup>3</sup>.

Adado'ddawla seizes upon the territories of the house of Hamdân.

THE next year, being the 368th of the Hejra, and commencing August 8th, 978, Abu'l Wafî, Adado'ddawla's general, took Mayyâfârah, by capitulation. Of which advice having been brought to Abu Taglab, he fled from Amed, where he then resided, to Al Rahaba, <sup>c</sup> upon the Euphrates, and from thence to Damascus, over which one Cassam presided, for Al Azîz Bi'llah, the Fâtemite Khalîf of Egypt. The country then lying open to him, and no enemy appearing to oppose him, Adado'ddawla easily made himself master of Diyâr Becr, Diyâr Modar, and all the territories of the house of Hamdân; after which, he returned in triumph to Baghdâd. In the mean time, Cassam drove Abu Taglab from Damascus by force of arms; who thereupon retired to Tabariyah, or Tiberias, with the troop that attended him. About the same time, died Al Kâdi Abu Sa'id Al Hasan Ebn Abd'allah Al Sîrâfi, a celebrated grammarian, and the author of a commentary upon the grammar of Sibuiyah. He was a polite scholar, a geometrician, a logician, and a Fakih. Abu Mohammed Marûf succeeded him as Kâdi in the eastern part of the city of Baghdâd <sup>d</sup>.

Jawhar is forced to raise the siege of Damaicus, and retire into Egypt.

THE same year, and not before, if we will believe Al Makin, Al Azîz Bi'llah sent Jawhar with an army to drive Al Asteîn Al Sbarâbi from Damascus. Jawhar, in pursuance of his orders, formed the siege of that city; but, at the end of two months, he was obliged to draw off from before the place, by the approach of a body of Karmatian troops, under the command of Al Hasan, or Al Hakem, Ebn Ahmed, that marched with the utmost expedition, in order to force him to raise the siege. Al Hasan and Al Asteîn, after the junction of their forces, pursued Jawhar, first to Tabariyah, or Tiberias, and afterwards to Al Ramla; at the last of which towns Al Asteîn permitted Jawhar to resume his march, or rather his flight, for Egypt, on condition that he passed under Al Asteîn's sword and Al Hasan's lance, that were hung over one of the gates. To this Jawhar, who was reduced to the last extremity, found himself obliged to submit; though it was intended by Al Asteîn as a mark of the highest infamy and disgrace. Jawhar no sooner arrived at Mesr, than he advised Al Azîz himself to undertake an expedition against the combined army of Turks, Karmatians, and Damascenes, under the conduct of Al Asteîn and Al Hasan Ebn Ahmed; who thereupon advanced to Al Ramla, engaged the enemy not far from that place, and overthrew them with very great slaughter. Al Asteîn himself escaped out of the battle; but he was soon after taken, and brought to Al Azîz; who carried him into Egypt, made him his Hâjeb, or chamberlain, and treated him with uncommon marks of distinction there. However, continues Al Makin, he was soon after poisoned, out of pure envy, by Al Azîz's Wazîr; who was, for his barbarity on this occasion, thrown into prison, by his master's order, and for some time there detained. But Al Azîz, not being able to keep the wheel of government in motion, to his own satisfaction, without the assistance of this minister, he was afterwards released, and restored to his former dignity. This relation, extracted from Al Makin, differs considerably, both with regard to time and several other circumstances, from the account of the same events handed down to us by Abu'lfeda; which has been inserted, from that celebrated author, above. It likewise differs, in one remarkable particular, from what has been advanced by another good writer; who asserts, that Al Hakem, or Al Hasan, Ebn Ahmed, the Karmatian general, died at Al Ramla, in the year of the Hejra 366, as has been <sup>e</sup> <sup>f</sup> a already observed. However, as an insertion of these different narratives will, as we apprehend, not a little contribute to the illustration of the Moslem history, in the point before us, we hope our readers will at least excuse what has been recommended to their perusal, from Al Makin. in this place <sup>c</sup>.

ADADO'DDAWLA having engaged to support Bardas Sclerus, who had been saluted emperor by the army in Mesopotamia, as has been remarked above, a body of troops was ordered to his assistance from Baghdád. But before these troops could reach him, he was overthrown by Bardas Phocas, the imperial general, in a great battle, fought on Sunday, the 21st of Shaabân, this year, in the plains of Pancalea, and obliged to fly, with a small body of horse, to Mayyâfârakîn. Soon after his arrival there, he was secured, by a private order b the governor of the place had received from Adado'ddawla, who afterwards disowned this, and sent him, with his son Romanus, and 300 horse, that made their escape out of the battle with him, to Baghdád. Upon his arrival at the metropolis, he was put into a house that had been fitted up for him, and was allowed moreover to divert himself in the isle of Madîda as often as he pleased; though he could be considered in no other light than that of a state-prisoner, as he was so straitly confined, that no person, without permission, could have any conversation with him. However, Adado'ddawla, in order to make his confinement fit a little more easy upon him, promised to send him to the frontiers with such an army as should soon enable him to re-establish his broken affairs. In the mean time, that prince dispatched a minister to the imperial court, with an offer to deliver up Sclerus into their c hands, if they would restore all the fortresses their troops had of late years taken from the Moslems; threatening, at the same time, that if this overture was rejected, he would assist Sclerus, both with his forces and his treasures, and even enable him to penetrate into the very heart of the empire. That court, being terrified with this menace, sent one Nicephorus to Baghdád, to conclude a treaty with Adado'ddawla, in a manner upon his own terms; of which Sclerus being informed, he insinuated to the Emîr Al Omrà, that the Greek minister intended to poison him. This made such an impression upon Adado'ddawla, that he ordered Nicephorus to be seized, and thrown into prison. All his attendants were treated in the same manner. The presents brought by the Greek ambassador, either for the Khalîf, or the Emîr Al Omrà, or both, were also secured. Al Makin assures us, that Nicephorus and his retinue were incarcerated, and remained in chains, eight full years. We must beg d leave to take notice here, that the place to which Sclerus made his escape, after the battle of Pancalea, is called by Curopolates Martyropolis, and Mayyâfârakîn by Al Makin. From whence we may infer, that Sig. Assemani merits not the approbation of the learned, when he censures M. Renaudot for intimating, that Martyropolis and Mayyâfârakîn were the same city; though it must be owned, that the latter of those two celebrated orientalists has offered a conjecture of no great weight in support of his opinion <sup>d</sup>.

AL AZIZ BI'LLAH having married a Christian lady, of the Melchite sect, made one of her brothers, named Jeremiah, patriarch of Jerusalem, and the other, who was called Arse- nius, patriarch of the Melchites at Kairo, or Al Kâbirab, and Mesr. As the Fâtemite Khalîf had a daughter by this lady, both she and her brothers had a considerable ascendent over e him; and therefore Arsenius easily obtained of him a grant of the great church of the Jacobites at Mesr, called afterwards by the Melchites the church of the patriarch. The Khalîf Al Tay' commanded Adado'ddawla's name to be mentioned, for the first time, in the public prayers, on Friday, the 26th of Shaabân, the present year; and to be repeated every third Friday afterwards, in the mosques of Baghdád. He also commanded drums to be beat before his palace, during the time of the five prayers. Neither of which compliments had ever been paid to any of his predecessors. As Adado'ddawla was the sovereign of Persia, and his army was chiefly composed of the troops of that country, the Khalîf likewise dignified him with the Persian title Shâhenshâh (K), or Shâkinshâh, the great king, or the king of kings;

(K) The word Shâh, according to the sentiments of Khoja Afîbaloddîn, is of the same import with Padishâh, a term in the Bastanian tongue, which is a dialect of the ancient Persic, and has, if we will believe that author, the four following significations. 1. It denotes any thing that is the most eminent and excellent in its kind. 2. The origin, first cause, or root, of every thing. 3. A king, prince, or lord. 4. A bridegroom, or son-in-law. With respect to the word Pad, the first part of Padishâh, it properly denotes a keeper, guardian, or protector, as we learn from some of the writers followed by M. D'Herbelot. As for the term Padishâh, it is a title at this day assumed by the greatest princes of the east, viz. the Grand Signor, the king of Persia, and the Great Mogul. The first of these has always been so jealous of this title, that he never gave it to any of the Christian potentates, but the king of France, till of late, when, according to M. D'Herbelot, he has been prevailed upon to bestow it likewise upon the king of England, by dint of presents. The emperor and the king of Spain can obtain no other title of him than that of Cral; which, in Sclavonian, signifies a king; at least kings; which was assumed by the antient Persian monarchs, even before the days of Alexander the Great. Nor was any Moslem prince ever honoured with this lofty and sublime title before Adado'ddawla, to whom it was henceforth constantly applied in the pulpits, and probably other public places, of all the cities and towns within the jurisdiction of the Khalif, or rather of his prime minister, the Emir Al Omra. It is worthy observation, that Adado'ddawla is called Chosrboes, and said to have granted 3000 Roman, or Greek, captives their liberty, for the eminent services they had done him against the rebellious Persians, i. e. the forces commanded by Azzo'ddawla and Abu Taglab, or the subjects of the house of Hamdan, who were neighbours to the Persians. For this clearly shews us what an imperfect, jejune, and indistinct account of the Moslem affairs, during the period we are now upon, has been handed down to posterity by the Greek writers, so imperfect, jejune, and indistinct, that we could scarce form any manner of idea of those affairs, without having recourse to the eastern historians! But this, we flatter ourselves, is abundantly manifest from the whole tenor of that part of our extensive work, in which we are at present engaged.

to the sword.

THE following year, being the 369th of the Hejra, beginning July 29th, 979, in the month of Al Mobarram, Abu Taglab departed from Tabariyah, or Tiberias, where we left him the preceding year, to Al Ramla. In the district of this city, Dagfal Ebn Mofraj, or, as he is named by Al Makin, Mofraj Ebn Da'kal, an Arab of the tribe of Tay, and one Fadl, who commanded a body of troops sent by Al Aziz against the forces of Abu Taglab out of Egypt, had seated themselves. The former of these captains, according to Al Makin, had possessed himself of Al Ramla, and the neighbouring tract, by force of arms; and the other, being afraid of Abu Taglab, had joined Dagfal Ebn Mofraj, with all the troops under his command. After this junction, the generals of the combined forces fell upon Abu Taglab, whose little army did not consist of above seven hundred men, routed him, and took him prisoner. As Dagfal Ebn Mofraj, into whose hands Abu Taglab fell, imagined that Fadl would demand his prisoner of him, and send him to Al Aziz at Mesr, where he might meet with as favourable a reception as Al Aftekin had, in similar circumstances, met with there before, he put him to the sword, and afterwards cut off his head. The body, or trunk, Fadl caused to be burnt; but the head he took care to have conveyed to Al Aziz, the Fatemit Khalif, in Egypt. We find it intimated by Al Makin, that Abu Taglab joined the Okailite Arabs, a tribe settled in that part of Syria which was the scene of this expedition, before the beginning of the action; whereas we are told by Abu'l feda, that his wife, who was the daughter of Saifo'ddawla, and his sister Jamila, were carried off by those Arabs, as part of the spoil, to Aleppo, where Sharif Abu'l Ma'ali Saado'ddawla Ebn Saifo'ddawla at that time reigned. His sister, Abu Taglab's wife, that prince kept with him; but Jamila he sent to Baghdad, to Adado'ddawla, her relation; who assigned her an apartment in his seraglio, amongst the rest of his ladies there.

THE same year, Adado'ddawla wrote to his brothers Fakbro'ddawla and Mowayyado'ddawla, to make their submission to him. Mowayyado'ddawla readily complied with what was required of him in this letter, which carried with it the air of a command; but Fakbro'ddawla answered his brother in the style of an equal, and a sovereign, who considered himself as intirely independent on any other prince. This so incensed Adado'ddawla, that he immediately assembled a numerous army, and marched towards Hamadan, where Fakbro'ddawla had fixed his residence; who being terrified with what had happened to Azzodo'ddawla, or Bakhtiyar, abandoned the place at his approach, and fled to Shams Al Ma'ali Kabus, the son of Washmakin, or Washmakir, the prince, or lord, of Jorjan, who treated him with the highest marks of distinction, and received him with greater cordiality than even his most sanguine hopes could have prompted him to expect. In the mean time, Adado'ddawla, finding no enemy to oppose him, seized upon Hamadan and Al Ray, with their dependencies, and all the interjacent tract. He also reduced the district of Hafniyah, the Curd, in this expedition. But, in the midst of the uninterrupted success that now least this was the case, if M. D'Herbelot may be credited, towards the close of the last century, when he published his famous Bibliothèque. The Persians say, that a great king is justly styled Padishah, because he is the guardian and protector of the people who acknowledge him for their sovereign. There is, however, another signification of the word Padishah, which is explained by the terms throne, royal pavilion, &c. though the former sense has been esteemed the most eligible by Sheikh Sadi, in a distich of his, which has been inserted in his valuable work by M. D'Herbelot (15).

- a attended his arms, he was seized with a fit of an epilepsy, which in such manner deprived him of his memory, that he could scarce remember any thing that had ever happened to him. However, he took care to conceal both these disastrous events as much as possible. Before the end of the campaign, he likewise harrassed the Hakkarite Curds, settled in the prefecture of Al Mawfel, made the chief of them to descend from the hilly tract they inhabited, in order to pay him homage in that city, and obliged them to put into his hands all their castles and places of strength. After his return home, he repaired the city of Baghdád, a great part of which had been demolished in the continual wars and disputes that had happened between the different princes, or Emírs, who had dismembered the Khalifat, rebuilt the mosques and other public edifices that had been destroyed, and supported with pensions many Imáms, learned men, and such infirm persons as generally live in the mosques; in all which things he expended vast sums of money. He also cleansed and sunk, or deepened, several rivers, that had in a manner disappeared; reducing them to their former channels, or beds. About this time, Adado'ddawla gave his daughter in marriage to Al Tay' Lillab, that his family might supply the Moslems with future Khalífs. A quarrel happened between the Moslems and Magians, inhabiting the city of Skérúz; on which occasion, the latter had their houses plundered, and were very ill used. Many of them were severely drubbed, and not a few of them cut and flathed in a terrible manner. Adado'ddawla sent an officer to inquire into the cause of this tumult, and to punish the guilty; but the Magians were so far from meeting with any redress for the injuries that had been offered them, and the losses they had sustained, that they were reprimanded for their temerity and presumption, in daring to contend with the Moslems. The name of Adado'ddawla's daughter, espoused to the Khalíf Al Tay', we have not been told; but her dower is said to have amounted to 100,000 diráms <sup>2</sup>.

- THIS year, died Omrán Ebn Shabín, the lord of Al Batíka, or the marshy district bordering upon the Tigris, in the neighbourhood of Wáset. He was born in the city of Al Famedá, which he was obliged to quit in his earlier years, on account of some enormous crimes that he had committed. As the fear of punishment had driven him from Al Famedá, so it impelled him to take refuge in the fens, or marshes, formed by the overflowings, or restagnations, of the Tigris, where he thought justice could never come at him. Here, for some time, he lived in the ditches, or dikes, amongst the reeds; feeding upon the fish he took, and aquatic birds that were continually hovering about him. In the mean time, he gradually formed a considerable body of men out of the fishermen, robbers, and other persons in the same desperate circumstances with himself, that almost daily resorted to him. This enabled him to plunder and harrass the inhabitants of the adjacent territory; so that he soon became the terror of the whole neighbourhood. Nay, as he had erected several castles, or forts, as places of refuge, on the hills, with which the fens, or marshes, above-mentioned, were intermixed, and placed garisons in them, he at last grew formidable to the Khalíf, or rather the Emír Al Omrá, himself. This determined Moezzo'ddawla, if possible, to reduce him; so that he sent several bodies of troops against him, in the year of the Hejra 338, and some of the following years, but without effect. At last, he resolved to make the utmost efforts to extirpate the whole gang of robbers that obeyed the orders of this chief, who had possessed himself of a district of very considerable extent, and projected an expedition against them, in the year of the Hejra 356; but died upon his march, as has been already observed. Nor could his son and successor Azzo'ddawla, or Bakhtiyár, either expel Omrán from the tract he had seized, or get him into his hands. In fine, after this robber had eluded all the attempts of several Khalífs, and other powerful princes, to subdue him, for the space of near forty years, he died suddenly in the month of Al Moharram, and left the principality he had erected to Al Hasan, his son. Soon after his accession, Al Hasan submitted to Adado'ddawla, who had taken post on his frontiers with a strong detachment of the Khalíf's forces, recognized Al Tay's authority, and agreed to pay an annual tribute for the province he governed. Al Hasein Ebn Zaccaríi, a celebrated philologer, who wrote several learned books, and particularly one displaying the interior excellencies and beauties of the Arabic tongue, and Thábet Ebn Ibrahim (L), a very skilful physician of Harrán, of the Sabian religion, likewise departed this life the present year <sup>3</sup>.

transactions
of the year
370.

IN the 370th year of the Hejra, which commenced July 17th, 980, nothing very remarkable seems to have happened; except we should think fit to admit, that the Khalif Al Tay' was married in it, as our readers will find suggested at least, if not directly asserted, by Al Makin. However, Al Ahmed Al Mozawwer, i. e. the gibbous, or crook-backed, falsifier, so denominated from the art in which he excelled, died in some part of it. This man was the most ingenious forger of writings, and imitator of hands, that the age, in which he lived, produced. So dextrous was he at this sort of work, that the person whose hand he counterfeited could not entertain the least doubt but the writing was his own. Adado'ddawla very well knew what use to make of so surprizing a person as this. Whenever he had a mind to set any of the neighbouring princes at variance, he caused such letters to be drawn up as were the most likely to sow jealousies and dissensions amongst them, and then ordered Al Abdab Al Mozawwer to transcribe them in different hands, resembling those of the potentates he intended thereby either to render suspicious of one another's designs, or directly to inflame; which generally produced the desired effect. About the same time, died also Abu Mansur Mohammed Ebn Ahmed, surnamed Al Azhari, a celebrated philologer, Imam, and Fakih, of the sect of Al Shafei; who first applied himself to the study of jurisprudence, from whence he received the title of Fakih, but afterwards almost solely to that of philology and the belles lettres. He composed a lexicon, consisting of above ten volumes, intituled, The book of correction, in which were corrected all the vulgar errors in the writing and pronunciation of the Arabic tongue. He likewise wrote another book, wherein he explained all the law terms, used by the Fakibs, or lawyers, of his time. He was born in the 282d year of the Hejra, and must consequently have been about 88 lunar years old at the time of his death. We must not forget to relate, that the lord, or prince, of Yaman sent Adado'ddawla some very valuable presents this year; amongst which there was an exceeding large piece of amber, that weighed fifty-six pounds of Baghdad<sup>i</sup>.

Adado'ddawla drives Kâbûs Ebn Washmakîn from Jorjân and Tabrestân.

THE next year, being the 371st of the Hejra, beginning July 7th, 981, Shams Al Mahâli Kâbûs Ebn Washmakîn resolved to enter into a war with Adado'ddawla and Mowayyado'ddawla, in order to recover the territories that had been taken from Fakbro'ddawla by his brother Adado'ddawla, two years before. Adado'ddawla having received advice of Kâbûs Ebn Washmakîn's military preparations, and hostile intentions towards him, sent his brother Mowayyado'ddawla the Khalif Al Tay''s instrument of investiture of Jorjân and Tabrestân, which countries Kâbûs Ebn Washmakîn at that time governed. He also immediately set a numerous army on foot, in conjunction with his brother Mowayyado'ddawla, marched to the frontiers of Jorjân and Tabrestân, overthrew the forces commanded by Kâbûs Ebn Washmakîn and Fakbro'ddawla, and seized upon Kâbûs's kingdom. We find it intimated by Al Makin, that Mowayyado'ddawla was the Khalif's, or rather his brother Adado'ddawla's, general in this war; but Abu'l-feda seems to insinuate, that Adado'ddawla himself was the commander in chief in this expedition. The latter of these writers likewise gives us to understand, that Adado'ddawla came to a rupture with Kâbûs Ebn Washmakîn, because he refused to deliver up his brother Fakbro'ddawla into his hands<sup>k</sup>.

Other memorable events, that happened, this year.

ABOUT the same time, Adado'ddawla ordered the Kâdi Al Mohsen Ebn Ali Al Tanukbi, one of the followers of Abu Hanîfa, to be taken up, and imprisoned, for venting his rage and fury against Al Shafei, without intermission, in the most virulent and outrageous manner. He likewise set at liberty Abu Ishak Ibrahim, a Sabian, whom he had incarcerated in the year of the Hejra 367, and kept in a state of confinement ever since, for discovering to his master Bakhtiyâr, in his letters to him, the result of Adado'ddawla's councils, and the secrets of his administration, and at the same time pointing out to him what measures it would be proper for him to pursue, in consequence of the discoveries he had made. This, says Abu'l-feda, was a very iniquitous procedure; since a servant's fidelity to his master, instead of being punished, ought to meet with the most ample reward. This year, Al Kâdi Abu Beir Mohammed Ebn Thayyab Al Ashâri, commonly known by the name of Ebn Al Bakelâni, or nates at once, and that this was the cause of the malady he laboured under. Abu Abd'allah Ebn Al Hejaj and Abu'l Abbâs both confessing, that what he had said, in relation to the food they had eaten, was exactly true, all the persons then present could not forbear wondering at the singular sagacity he discovered on this occasion. Abu'l Faraj Ebn Abu'l Hasan Ebn Senân, afterwards asking him, how he came to know, that Abu Abd'allah Ebn Al Hejaj had eaten veal, and not beef, and Abu'l Abbâs precisely eleven pomegranates? Thâbit replied, that he could give no account of this, his mind having only suggested it to him. Upon which, Abu'l Faraj Ebn Abu'l Hasan Ebn Senân, calculating his nativity, found, that the position of Jupiter and the Part of Fortune in his Horoscope, or Ascendant, indicated this extraordinary faculty to be inherent in him; or rather, which comes nearer to Abu'l Faraj's manner of expression, conferred upon him the power of divining as he had done, to the wonder and astonishment of all that heard him (16).

- a the son of the gardener, or seller of beans, was dispatched to Constantinople, with Adado'ddawla's answer to the emperor Basilus's last letter. Being admitted to an audience, he was ordered to prostrate himself before the emperor; which refusing to do, the next time he was brought into Basilus's presence, he was conducted to a gate, or entrance, through which he could not pass without incurvation, or rather without stooping to the very ground. The Kâdi smelling out the design of the imperial court in this finessè, went through the passage backwards, and then turned himself in an erect posture towards the emperor. The hospital of Al Adadi, in the western part of Baghdâd, was also opened, and well stored with all kinds of medicaments, towards the beginning of the year we are now upon. We must not forget to observe, that Abu'l Kasem Ebn A' Hasan, the Emîr of Sicily, was killed in an
- b action that happened between him and the Franks, in the month of Al Moharram, according to Al Kâdi Shahabo'ddîn Ebn Abildâm Al Hamawi, the present year; though Abu'lfeda places this event amongst the transactions of the following year. But, however that may be, this Abu'l Kasem, who governed the Moslem conquests in Sicily twelve years, five months, and several days, after his death, had the title of Al Shâhid, the confessor, or witness of the truth, conferred upon him, and was afterwards reputed a martyr, by the Moslems of that island. His son Jaber, a prince of a very vitious and dissolute life, and totally unfit for government, succeeded him; though he was not confirmed in the office of Emîr by Al Aziz, the Fâtemite Khalîf of Egypt, but on the contrary dismissed from that post, the following year. For the particulars of the wonderful conversion of Wasa Ebn Rejâ from Islamism to
- c Christianity, which happened about this time, when he is said to have been miraculously transported through the air by St. Mercury, from one of the solitudes of Al Hejâz, in the neighbourhood of Mecca, to the church of that saint at Mesr, we must refer our curious readers to M. Renaudot, who has extracted a very large and copious account of that memorable event from some of the most authentic oriental writers <sup>1</sup>.

It may not be improper to remark, that Abu Becr Ebn Ibrahim Ebn Ismael Al Jorjâni, Abu Becr Ebn Ibrahim Ebn Ismael Al Jorjâni and Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Al Marwazi die, the present year. denominated also from his grandfather Al Ismaeli, a Fakih of the sect of Al Shâfi'i, and the Imâm Mohammed Ebn Ahmed Ebn Abd'allah Al Marwazi, or Al Merûzi, another Fakih of the same sect, extremely well versed in the knowledge of traditions, and other branches of Moslem literature, who propagated with great ardour the body of the traditions of Al Bok-hârî, which he received from, or rather heard rehearsed by, his master Al Farbari, one of that celebrated doctor's scholars, departed this life before the expiration of the present year <sup>m</sup>.

THE following year, being the 372d of the Hejra, which began June 26th, 982, Al Aziz Billah, the Fâtemite Khalîf of Egypt, sent an army, under the command of Bektêkîn, Bektêkîn de-fests Mosraï in Palestine. his general, into Syria, against Mosraï Ebn Al Farrab, who had set up for himself in Palestine, and drawn together a very considerable body of troops there. However, Bektêkîn, having brought him to a general action, intirely defeated him, put most of his men to the sword, and ravaged all the country he had subdued in a most dreadful manner. After the defeat of Mosraï, he marched to Damascus, and obliged Cassam, the governor of the place, to surrender that city to him. Having appeased the commotions, that for several years had

e disturbed the repose of the inhabitants of that town, and re-established the public tranquillity there, he returned with his army to Mesr; having sent Cassam thither before, to bring to the Khalîf Al Aziz the news of the success that had attended his troops in this expedition <sup>n</sup>.

THE same year, according to Al Kâdi Shahabo'ddîn Ebn Abildâm Al Hamawi, or the following year, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, the Khalîf Al Aziz sent Jaasar Ebn Mohammed Ebn Al Hasan, one of his greatest favourites, to Sicily, in the quality of Emîr. This gave Jaasar Ebn Mohammed is appointed by Al Aziz the Emîr of Sicily. no small disgust to Jaber, who had rendered himself extremely disagreeable to the Moslems of that island, by his infamous conduct. Nor was Jaasar much less chagrined at his being obliged to leave a court, where he almost made the principal figure, in order to take possession of a post that by no means suited his inclination. However, he was torn from the f bosom of his most indulgent master, and obliged to accept of the government of Sicily, by the intrigues of Abu Calas, for so he has been called by Abu'lfeda, Al Aziz's Wazîr; who looked upon him with an envious eye. He considered him as the most formidable rival he had, in the Khalîf's affections; and therefore resolved to leave no stone unturned to remove him both from the person and councils of that prince <sup>o</sup>.

THIS year, on the 8th of Shawâl, died Adado'ddawla Ebn Rucno'ddawla Al Hasan Ebn Biliya at Baghdâd. He was worn out by reiterated attacks of the epilepsy, though not forty-eight years old at the time of his death, and at last carried off by one of those attacks. His remains were conducted to Masbhad Ali, the place where Ali Ebn Abu Taleb is sup- Adado'ddawla's death and character.

posed by the Moslems to have been inhumed, or the sepulchre of that Imâm, and there a interred. He presided over Baghdâd, Irâk, Kermân, Fârs, Ammân, Khûzistân, Al Marâsel, Diyâr Beer, Harrân, and Manbij, with the title of Emîr Al Omrâ, about five years and an half. With regard to his disposition, he was a prince of great magnanimity, unparalleled bravery, an excellent understanding, consummate prudence, uncommon gravity, vast sagacity in council, a happy dexterity in hitting upon lucky expedients on the most emergent occasions. He was extremely well versed in all the arts of government. He had also a good share of learning, at least a tolerable good taste for the literature then in vogue amongst the Arabs, and was moreover an encourager of learned men. He was prosperous in his undertakings, and had a mind capable of forming the vastest projects. To men of virtue and probity he was liberal and munificent, when they stood in need of his assistance; and had always his attention fixed upon the ultimate issue of things. But, with all these fine qualities, he was a prince of insatiable ambition, as sufficiently appeared from the whole tenor of his actions, which sometimes led him into very unjustifiable and iniquitous points of conduct. He had a taste for poetry, and wrote some tolerable good verses himself, as may be inferred from two or three specimens of such verses preserved by Abu'lfeda and Al Makîn. In one of these, however, he seemed to arrogate to himself the power of controlling the Deity, and even of reversing the divine decrees. For which he has been deservedly censured by two of the Arab historians; who have observed, that he never was either easy or happy, or even in his right mind, after that extraordinary production, which contained in it such an instance of blasphemous ostentation, appeared. But, in our opinion, his head must have been turned before this extravagant flight, which favoured so strongly of madness and impiety, could have escaped him. The advantageous character, therefore, given of this prince by several of the Moslem writers, which we have here extracted from them, must undoubtedly be understood of him before he laboured under any mental indisposition, and had his reason by some unknown accident impaired. In the most active and flourishing scenes of life, he (M) patronized those who had rendered them-

(M) When Adado'ddawla had a mind to boast of his learning, and the persons of whom he acquired it, he used to say, that he learned the astronomy of the fixed stars of Al'd'alrahmân Al Sâfi, that of the planets of Al Sharij Ebn Al A'lam, and grammar of Abu Ali, the Persian. Abu'alrahmân Ebn Omar Ebn Sabel Abu'l Hâsin Al Sâfi Al Razi was a person of an uncommon genius, an excellent astronomer, and the author of several pieces held in great repute. He died in the year of the Hijra 376; being, at the time of his death, about eighty-five lunar years of age. Ebn Al A'lam, who is said to have been descended from Ali Ebn Abu Talib, was extremely well versed in the celestial sciences, and particularly in the theory of the planets. He was much esteemed by Adado'ddawla, but not in such favour with Semsâmû'ddawla, his son; which induced him to retire from court, and undertake a pilgrimage to Mecca, in the year of the Hijra 374. He departed this life, on his return home, at a place called Al Ofaila. At this time, flourished a vast number of most skillful physicians; one of the principal of which was Al Tamimi Al Makâsi, who resided in Egypt some part of the year 370. He acquired an uncommon reputation by his consummate knowledge, his unwearied diligence and application, and his great care in the composition of medicines. He was a person of singular urbanity, affable and modest in his conversation, and never contradicted any one, but in the defence of truth. Ali Ebn Al Abbâs, a Mogian, made likewise a very considerable figure, in the circle of physicians, at Adado'ddawla's court, during the interval we are now upon. He was a Persian, and attained to a surprising skill in his profession; having been not a little assisted in his studies at first by Abu Maher, another Persian physician, who practised with good success. Ali Ebn Al Abbâs wrote a book, intitled, Al Maleki, the royal, or the royal piece, for Adado'ddawla's use. This book was held in high esteem by all the faculty in the Moslem territories, till the Kanôn, or Canon, of Ebn Sina, or Avicenna, appeared; but was then eclipsed by the superior brightness of that piece. However, the Kanôn was calculated more for theory, and the Maleki for practice; so that the subjects of these compositions, however unequal in point of merit the authors might be, were by no means incompatible. Nadbi' Al Nafs, by nation a

Greek, was another physician that attended Adado'ddawla's court. He translated several books into Arabic out of Greek, but was very unsuccessful in his practice; in so much that his patients looked upon him as the picture of ill luck, and considered him as an evil genius, always intent upon their destruction. It happened once, that Nadbi', by Adado'ddawla's order, attended one of his generals; which induced him to think, that he was upon very indifferent terms with his master, who, as he imagined, employed this unlucky doctor to send him out of the world. He therefore dispatched a friend he could confide in, to inquire of Adado'ddawla's chamberlain how his master was affected towards him, and to beg he would procure him leave of that prince, in case he had incurred his displeasure, to retire into some other part of the world; being firmly persuaded, that Adado'ddawla could command so had a physician as Nadbi' to prescribe to him, with no good design. Adado'ddawla could not forbear laughing, when his chamberlain opened the affair to him. However, he sent the sick commander a rich and sumptuous vest, and assured him he was in his favour; which made him easy, and probably contributed more to his recovery than all the doctor could do for him. Another learned man, for whom Adado'ddawla had no small regard, was Obaid'Allah Ebn Al Hasan Abu'l Kefem, frequently called Cholâm, or Golâm, Zohel, the boy of Saturn, a famous astrologer, and a native of Baghdâd. Obaid'Allah being, on a certain time, with many other learned men, at the house of Abu Salimân, a celebrated logician, and hearing many things there urged for and against the art he professed, he summed up the whole of what could be offered on that subject in the following concise manner. "The verity and falsity of astrology depend upon the celestial impressions. A scheme of the heavens is sometimes so framed, that not a tittle of truth can be extracted from it; sometimes so, that nothing of falsehood therein appears; and at other times so, that a mixture of truth and falsehood is exhibited by it."—With which decision, however dogmatical and unsupported it may seem to be, the company were very well pleased; and the logician himself gave a sanction to it, by pronouncing it the best solution of the question proposed that could be offered. Miscellaneous

- a themselves famous for their skill in any branch of literature. Hence it came to pass, that learned men flocked to his court from all parts at least of the Moslem world, and dedicated their compositions to him. Amongst these performances may be ranked the Kitâb Al Idhâi, or Dilucidation, a system of grammar; the Kitâb Al Hojjati fîl Karati, a book demonstrating which of the various readings in the controverted passages of the Korân are preferable to the others; Al Maleki, or the royal book, treating of the art of physic; and Al Taji, containing the history of the Deylamite princes; to omit several other pieces, of considerable note, that might here have been taken notice of. The author of the two first of the books above-mentioned was Abu Ali Al Hosein Al Fârî; of the third Al Ebn Al Abbâs, a Magian, commonly called Hali, or the abbot; and of the fourth, which was looked upon as extremely curious, Ebn Helâl Al Sâbi, or the Sabian, which denomination he received from the religion he professed. When Adado'ddawla was at the point of death, he is reported to have said, with a faltering tongue, "What have all my riches and prosperity availed me? My power and authority are now at an end." Which words, according to the same historians, he continued repeating till he expired. After his death, the officers of the army, and grandees of the court of Baghdâd, pitched upon his son Abu Câlijâr Al Farâ Al Marzabân for his successor, took the oath of allegiance to him, and gave him the title, or surname, of Samsâmuddawla, that is, the sabre, or scymitar, of the state. The Khalîf Al Tay' confirmed all that had been done, by the military men and noblesse, on this occasion; and made the new Emir Al Omrâ a visit, in order to condole with him for his father's death.

- c Sbarfo'ddawla Abu'l Fawâres, another of Adado'ddawla's sons, had been sent some time before by his father to take possession of the province of Kermân. This prince, having received advice of Adado'ddawla's decease, without any ceremony, seized upon Fârs, and ordered his own name to be mentioned, instead of Samsâmuddawla's, who had been already proclaimed there, and given to each of his brothers, Abu'l Hosein Ahmed and Abu Thâher Firûz Shâh, on whom he intended to confer the government of Fârs, a sumptuous cloke, or mantle, to do them honour, in all the mosques of that country. Before the arrival of these princes, Sbarfo'ddawla Abu'l Fawâres Shîrzîk had occupied the city of Shîrâz, at that time the capital of Fârs. The remains of Adado'ddawla, according to Al Makîn, were deposited first in

Al Khûzen, a Persian of noble extraction, in whom were united polite literature and a knowledge of the sciences, was another of Adado'ddawla's favourites, in whom he reposed an intire confidence, and consulted him on all emergent occasions. He was the first lord of the treasury, and lived to an extreme old age, not dying before the year of the Hejra 420. Soon after his arrival at Baghdâd, Adado'ddawla sent for Abu Fadl Jaafar Ebn Al Mûstafî Bi'llah, of whose extensive erudition he had entertained a very advantageous idea, and discoursed with him upon various topics, particularly judicial astrology, and the knowledge of future events; of which Jaafar afforded him two or three such specimens, as filled him with wonder and astonishment. Abu Fadl Jaafar according to the author (17) here referred to, departed this life in the year of the Moslem æra 377. One of the doctors most honoured with Sbarfo'ddawla's friendship was Ahmed Ebn Mohammed Al Sâghîni, who, with the utmost accuracy, made some mathematical instruments at Baghdâd; with which he observed the planetary motions, from an observatory erected for that purpose, in a corner of the imperial garden, together with Wayhi Al Gharbi, another excellent astronomer, by Sbarfo'ddawla's order. After he had finished these observations, he wrote two short pieces upon the use that might be made of them, and died in the year of the Hejra 379. As for Wayhi Ebn Wâshan Abu Sahel Al Gharbi, he made a surprizing progress in the sciences of geometry and astronomy, and observed the ingress of the sun into the signs of Cancer and Libra, in the year of Alexander, or rather of Seleucus, 1299. At both of which observations, amongst other learned men, was present Ibrahim Ebn Helâl Ebn Ibrahim Ebn Harûn Al Sâbi, or the Sabian, who was an exceeding good geometrician and astronomer, wrote several books upon geometrical and astronomical subjects, and formed a volume of the epistles, full of mathematical erudition, that he had penned. His family was originally settled at Harran; but he received his education at Baghdâd.

He wrote both in prose and verse in a very masterly manner, with great fidelity served the princes of the house of Bûiya, who sometimes caressed, and at other times discouraged him, and departed this life in 384. Lastly, Zeid Ebn Refâ'a, who lived about the time we are now upon, was a person of a most sublime genius and profound erudition. He resided for the most part at Basra, and joined himself there to a society of learned men, who formed a particular sect, and asserted that perfection was only to be attained by an union of the Greek philosophy and the Korân. This society styled themselves The sincere brothers, and dispersed a collection of epistles over that part of the east wherein they were seated, by the assistance of the booksellers, intituled, Ekbwân Al Safâ, or rather Ressail Ekbwân Al Safâ, that is, The Letters of the sincere brothers, or the sincere friends. These letters, or epistles, were fifty in number, and written upon fifty different branches of science; to which was added one, that contained an abridgement, or epitome, of all the others. As this was an anonymous piece, the authors of it were never discovered; though the aforesaid Zeid Ebn Refâ'a, who flourished in the 373d year of the Hejra, is generally supposed to have been one of them. Abu Hayyân Al Tawhîdî (18), a famous Moslem scholastick divine, made but little account of this work; as may be inferred from one of his fragments, handed down to us by Abu'l Faraj. Ebn Baja has censured these authors as innovators; who, having concealed their names, cannot, especially at this distance of time, be certainly known. Some, however, take the above-mentioned letters to have been the production of an Imâm, descended from Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, and others of one of the Motazalites. Be that as it will, these brothers seem to have struck out for themselves a new system both of philosophy and divinity; in which they have been resembled by a set of gloomy and crack-brained enthusiasts, who are very justly considered by all wise and learned men as the reproach of our own times.

Al Hasan Ebn Omrán, the prince of Al Batíha, is assassinated by his brother. THE same year, Abu'l Faraj Mohammed Ebn Omrán Ebn Shabín assassinated his brother Al Hasan Ebn Omrán Ebn Shabín, who succeeded his father Omran Ebn Shabín in the sovereignty of Al Bathibab, Al Batíha, or the marshy tract upon the Tigris above-mentioned, and took upon himself the government of that district in his room. We must not forget to remark, that Adado'ddawla, at the approach of his death, repeated several verses, composed by Abu'l Kasem Ebn Abd'allah, his Wazír, in a strain quite different from that which had been affected by him for time before, and breathing more moderate sentiments; for a sight of which our learned and curious readers must have recourse to Al Makín <sup>a</sup>.

Fakhro'd-dawla takes possession of Hamadán, Al Ray, and all the dominions of Kábús Ebn Washmakín. IN the 373d year of the Hejra, which commenced June 15th, 983, Mowayyado'ddawla Ebn Rucno'ddawla Al Hasan Ebn Búiya died in Jorján, either of a squinancy, or an inflammation in his bowels; being, at the time of his death, about forty-three years of age. Soon after this event, in the month of Ramadán, the officers of the army Mowayyado'ddawla had on foot unanimously invited Fakhro'ddawla Ebn Rucno'ddawla Al Hasan Ebn Búiya to come and take possession, not only of Hamadán and Al Ray, with their districts and dependencies, of which Adado'ddawla had before deprived him, but likewise of all the territories from whence Kábús Ebn Washmakín Ebn Zayyár had been driven by that prince. So that Fakhro'd-dawla became possessed of very extensive dominions, without the least effusion of Moslem blood. Nor was it long before the Khalíf Al Tay' sent him the instrument of the investiture of those dominions, drawn up in form, and attended with several royal mantles, or clokes, expressive of the sovereignty in which by those presents he confirmed him, from Baghdád. After his accession, he continued Abu'l Kasem Al Sáheb Ebn Ayád, Abbád, or Ebád, in the office of Wazír, to which he had been advanced by Mowayyado'ddawla, his brother. Fakhro'ddawla entered Jorján, the third of Ramadán; and was met there by Abu'l Kasem Al Sáheb, the military men, and all the principal persons that had composed his predecessor's court, who formally created him king of that country. He cultivated a good understanding, and lived in perfect friendship, with Samsámo'ddawla, the Emír Al Omrá at Baghdád, as we are informed by Abu'l Faraj <sup>r</sup>.

Samsámo'd-dawla succeeds his father Adado'ddawla, and defeats Bád Al Cordi. ABOUT the same time, the body of Adado'ddawla was carried from the imperial palace at Baghdád to Cúfa, and from thence removed to Mashhad Ali, where it was interred. That Emír was succeeded by Abu Cáljár Al Fará Al Marzapán, or Marzabán, Samsámo'ddawla, his son, as has been already observed. The Khalíf Al Tay' himself inaugurated Samsámo'd-dawla, and put the imperial robes upon him, as we learn from Al Makín. Not long after Samsámo'ddawla's elevation to the post of Emír Al Omrá, Bád Al Cordi Al Hamídi made himself master of Al Mawfel; and, having received a farther accession of strength, he meditated the reduction of Baghdád itself, and the expulsion of the Deylamites from that metropolis. Samsámo'ddawla, therefore, finding his power and authority to be struck at by Bád, assembled a powerful army, marched at the head of it against him, and intirely defeated him, in the month of Safar, the following year; after which, Al Mawfel immediately surrendered to the victor, without attempting to make any defence. In the year of the Hejra 373, Bacjúr, who some time before seized upon his master Curúba, the lord of Aleppo, and caused himself to be proclaimed sovereign of that city, but afterwards delivered the place into the hands of Abu'l Ma'áli Sharíf Saado'ddawla, upon his having been appointed prefect of Hems, where he resided till the present year, obtained of Al Azíz Bi'llah, the Fátémite Khalíf of Egypt, the government of Damascus. Bacjúr no sooner entered that city, than Bektekin, or Beŕtekin, the former governor, by Al Azíz's command, returned to Mesir. But Bacjúr, notwithstanding he had address enough to insinuate himself into the favour of the Khalíf of Egypt, proved one of the most bloody and oppressive tyrants that ever presided over the Damascenes <sup>s</sup>.

Al Modhaffer seizes upon the principality of Al Batíha. THE same year, Abu'l Faraj Mohammed Ebn Omrán Ebn Shabín, who had destroyed his brother Al Hasan, in order to secure to himself the principality of Al Batíha, was assassinated in his turn by the leading men of that district; who, on account of his notorious incapacity, as well as of his lewd and dissolute life, unanimously conspired against him. After his violent death, they substituted in his room Abu'l Ma'áli, the son of Al Hasan Ebn Omrán Ebn Shabín, an infant, and appointed Al Modhaffer Ebn Ali, the Hájeb, or chamberlain, who had been at the head of Omran Ebn Shabín's court, to take upon him the

This put a period to the domination of the family of Shabîn in those parts; which, from the first appearance of Omrân Ebn Shabîn in Al Batîka, a little before he erected that district into a principality, continued something above forty years. We must not forget to observe, that Yusef Belkîn Ebn Zcir Ebn Menedz, or Mened, Al Sanbâji (N), who had been constituted by Al Moezz Ledi-ni'llah the Emîr, or governor, of Africa, departed this life, in the month of Dbu'lhajja, the present year. His son Al Mansûr, who succeeded him, sent to the Fâtemite Khalîf, Al Aziz, as a token of his subjection and attachment to him, some exceeding rich presents; the value of which, according to Abu'lfeda, in the piece so often referred to here, amounted
- b to 1,000,000 dinârs <sup>c</sup>.

THIS year, Al Aziz Bi'llah, the Khalîf of Egypt, being informed, that Yakûb Ebn Yusef, <sup>The castle of Ibrahim is taken by a detachment of Armenian troops, and delivered up to the Greeks.</sup> his Wazîr, Al Fadl Ebn Sâleh, and his brothers, had amassed vast treasures, he ordered them all to be incarcerated in separate prisons, and the money they had hoarded up to be carried to the imperial palace. This excited a commotion in the city of Mesr, wherein the populace plundered the market-places, and committed other disorders; which were not without some difficulty appeased. However, about two months afterwards, the Khalîf commanded them all to be released, and the money that had been taken from them to be restored. He also sent the Wazîr the present, that, on account of his office, had usually been made him. This year, likewise, a detachment of Armenian troops took a fortress in the territory of Al Ray, called the castle of Ibrahim, by the assistance and contrivance of a woman of the same nation, who had been detained in a state of captivity there. This fortress the Armenians had no sooner made themselves masters of, than they put it into the hands of the Greeks; for which they were amply rewarded by the emperor Basilus, who placed a strong garison in it, supplied it with all kinds of provisions, and erected there a magazine of arms and military stores. For the particulars of the reduction of the castle of Ibrahim, which are too long to be inserted here, we must beg leave to refer our curious and learned readers to Al Makîn <sup>d</sup>.

- THE next year, being the 374th of the Hejra, commencing June 4th, 984, Abu Tharîf <sup>The principal occurrences of the year 374.</sup> Ohyân Ebn Thamal Al Khafâgi took under his protection the city of Cûfa, and was the first Emîr of that city of the house of Thamal. About the same time, according to Al Makîn, the Khalîf Al Tay' granted Fakbro'ddawla Ebn Rucno'ddawla, or Rocno'ddawla, the investiture of all the dominions he had taken possession of, the preceding year, and sent him the instrument of this investiture, with an imperial mantle, from Baghdâd. This year, died the famous Hâfedh, Abu'l Fatab Mohammed Ebn Al Hasan Al Mawfeli, and Abu Yabya Abd'al-rahim Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ismael Ebn Nobatab, denominated sometimes, from his great grandfather, Ebn Nobatab. The latter of these, who was born at Mayyâfârakîn, in the year of the Hejra 335, and died in the same city, the present year, went with the poet Al Motanabbi to Saifo'ddawla's court, was admitted into that prince's family, and attended him to Mayyâfârakîn, where he spent the latter part of his life. Ebn Nobatab was at first a most celebrated preacher at Alcppo, where his discourses made a very deep impression upon the minds of the people that heard them. He excelled in polite literature, and was the author of some moral and sacred discourses, which are reckoned the best of their kind extant amongst the Mohammedans. For this reason, he was dignified with the title of Imâm Al Adab, or the greatest doctor in eloquence and morality. In fine, he has been represented by some of the Moslem writers as a person so famous for his probity, as well as his erudition, that the prophet Mohammed himself appeared to him in a dream, and said, "All health and prosperity attend thee, O preacher of preachers, who art superior to all others in the art of persuasion! Come on, and draw up a sermon, that shall begin with the following words: There are so few traces now remaining of the memory of those persons, who were formerly so powerful and illustrious, that they seem never to have been the joy and delight of the people amongst whom they lived. They are grown as obscure, and as much buried in oblivion, as if they had never been born." To this exordium, or beginning of a discourse, Ebn Nobatab made afterwards such additions, in his waking hours, that it became a sermon of a just length, and had assigned it by its author the title of the sermon of the dream. This nocturnal conference between him and the prophet, we are told, happened not long before

(N) It appears from the words Al Sanbâji here, as well as from what has been already offered upon the same head, that the writer of the history of Kairwan must have been an African, and not a Sicilian, as we find intimated by Carusius (19). To which it may not be improper to add, that Abu'lfeda mentions Sanbâjah, or Al Sanbâjah, as a certain district, or province, of Africa, and the village of Gomara, or of the Gomarites, as situated therein (20).

his death; and it was no sooner ended, according to the same writers, than Mohammed bad a him come to him, and open his mouth; which having done, the prophet spat into it; and he thereupon fasted three whole days, without being the least pinched by hunger, or having his strength at all impaired. Nay, if we will believe these writers, from the moment the prophet disappeared to the time of his death, Ebn Nobatab's breath emitted an odour resembling that of musk and the richest perfumes. He is surnamed by some authors Al Hadbaki, from the family, or tribe, he was descended from, and Al Faraki, or rather Al Mayyâfârakîni, from the city of Mayyâfârakîn, the place where he was born. It appears from M. D'Herbelot, that there were two other writers of the same name. One of these was sometimes called Ebn Nabatab, in order to distinguish him from the person of whom we are here speaking; and the other is frequently denominated Mohammed Ebn Mohammed. b Ebn Nabatab, or, as he is named by some, Al Massib Ebn Nobatab, composed a Dîwân, intituled Sûk Al Rafik, which is to be met with in the French king's library, N° 1173; and Mohammed Ebn Mohammed left behind him an historical work, going under the title of Ibrâr Al Akbbâr, of which we can give our readers no particular account. This Mohammed is, however, said to have died in the year of the Hejra 762. As for our Ebn Nobatab's sermons, a copy of them, adorned with the title of Khotbah, is preserved in the aforesaid library, N° 635. Ebn Shobnah, Ebn Khalecân, and Abu'lfeda, agree in the main in the articles they have handed down to us, relative to the life and productions of this celebrated author *.

The Karmatians take and pillage Cûfa, but are driven from thence by the Khalif's troops.

THE following year, being the 375th of the Hejra, commencing May 24th, 985, the c Karmatians marched, under the conduct of their six leaders, or supreme magistrates, whom they had dignified with the title of lords, or regents, as has been remarked above, to Cûfa, and laid siege to that city. The inhabitants, for some time, defended themselves with sufficient bravery; but the place was at last carried by assault, and thoroughly pillaged. However, the city of Baghdâd being alarmed at the approach of these plunderers, Samsâmo'ddawla sent an army against them, which overthrew them with very great slaughter. This blow so effectually broke and dispersed them, that the Khalif's subjects in Irâk were never afterwards much terrified with them. Amongst the memorable events of this year, one has been mentioned by Ebn Al Atshir, which is too wonderful to be passed over in silence here. This author relates, that a sheep, bigger than an elephant, of an unusual form, and d a prodigious height, came out of the sea on the coast of Omân, ascended a hill in the neighbouring tract, and from thence, with an exceeding loud voice, pronounced distinctly the two following words, Cad Caroba, i. e. he has approached; and, after repeating them thrice, returned into the sea. The same thing, continues this writer, happened the two next days; and then the monster disappeared, and was never afterwards seen. Jaasar Ebn Mohammed Ebn Al Hasan, the Emîr of Sicily, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, died in the year of the Hejra 375; but, according to Al Kâdi Shababo'ddîn Ebn Abildâm Al Hamawi, that accident happened the preceding year. But however this may be, Jaasar was succeeded in the post of Emîr of Sicily by his brother Abd'allah; who presided over the Moslem part of that island till either the year of the Hejra 378, or 379 *.

Sharfo'ddawla obliges the Khalif to make him Emîr Al Omrà.

IN the year we are now upon, Sharfo'ddawla Abu'l Fawâres Shirzik, the eldest of Adado'ddawla's sons, moved with a powerful army from Al Abwâz to Wâset; which immediately surrendered to him. This prince was possessed of Esfahân, Al Ray, Shîrâz, the cities of Deylam, with their dependencies, and several other tracts. Before he invaded Irâk, he wrote to his brother Abu'l Hasan Ebn Adado'ddawla, who at this time occupied most of the cities of Fârs, to join him with all the troops he could assemble, and attend him in this expedition. But Abu'l Hasan, not being disposed to act against his brother Samsâmo'ddawla, refused to enter into this war. Upon which, Sharfo'ddawla marched against him at the head of all his forces, defeated him, took him prisoner, and threw him into prison. He then seized upon Al Abwâz, and from thence advanced to Wâset; the inhabitants of which place, being f incapable of making any defence, opened their gates at his approach. The city of Basra likewise, soon after the surrender of Wâset, submitted to him. He then sent a letter to the Khalif Al Tay', at Baghdâd; insisting upon the post of Emîr Al Omrà, and the deposition of of his brother Samsâmo'ddawla; with which the Khalif, who was not able to make head against him, found himself obliged to comply. He, therefore, immediately dispatched to him the imperial mantle, the instrument confirming him in the possession of the office he demanded, and a sum of money, which he probably wanted, in order to pay his troops. Not content with these concessions, he required the Khalif to deliver up his brother Samsâmo'ddawla into his hands. This being likewise granted him, he at first treated that prince,

- a who had been in vain advised by the noblesse of Baghdâd to retire either to Al Mawfel, or any other place where Sbarfo'ddawla could not come at him, with some respect, and promised him not only his life, but likewise the secure possession of all his effects. Notwithstanding which, he soon after ordered him to be put under arrest. He then decamped with his forces, consisting of 20,000 Deylemites and 3000 Turks, from Wâfet, and marched directly to Baghdâd; which he entered, according to Al Makin, in the month of Kamadân, and the year of the Hejra 375. But, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, that event happened in the same month of the following year. After his arrival at Baghdâd, Sbarfo'ddawla sent his brother Samsîmo'ddawla to a castle in Fârs, where he ordered him to be straitly confined. The latter of those princes, according to the best eastern historians, presided over the Khalifat of Baghdâd between three and four years<sup>y</sup>.

- b THE same year, Saado'ddawla Ebn Saifo'ddawla, the lord, or prince, of Aleppo, refused to pay the tribute which the emperor Basilus had for some years extorted from him. This so incensed the emperor, that he sent an army, under the command of Bardas Phocas, against him. Bardas, therefore, in pursuance of his orders, made an incursion into Mesopotamia, took the city of Dârâ, and carried all the inhabitants into captivity. This happened in the month of Safar. Saado'ddawla, receiving advice of this invasion, advanced with a body of troops to the convent, or monastery, of Simeon, in the territory of Antioch; which he carried by storm, after three days siege, the 12th of the latter Rabî, put most of the monks to the sword, and took a great number of Christians, who had made their escape out of the neighbouring district into this convent, prisoners; all of whom he carried with him to Aleppo. Basilus, being informed of what had happened to the monastery of Simeon, wrote to Bardas, then before Afâmiyah, or Apamia, and commanded him to raise the siege of that city. In obedience to which command, he drew off from before the place, and retired into the imperial territories. We are told by Al Makin, that the castle of Telnâs was taken by the Bulgarians, and retaken by Leo Melissenus, the imperial general, the present year<sup>z</sup>.

- c THE next year, being the 376th of the Hejra, beginning May 13th, 986, a treaty of peace was concluded between the emperor Basilus and Saado'ddawla Ebn Saifo'ddawla; the principal article of which was, that the latter of those princes should pay the former an annual tribute of 400,000 dirhems. In the mean time, Bardas Sclerus, having been set at liberty by the Emîr Al Omrà at Baghdâd, to the general dissatisfaction of the Moslems, entered Malatia, in the month of Shawâl, this year, seized upon the imperial governor, stripped him of all his horses, arms, furniture, and money, and caused himself to be proclaimed emperor there. Being afterwards joined by a body of Okailite and Namerite Arabs, and having received a reinforcement from Nabâr Al Cordi, or the Curd, the lord of Diyâr Becr, under the command of Abu Ali, his brother, he began to be again formidable to Basilus. But as a full and ample account of what happened to Sclerus, and his son Romanus, who was released with him, after their departure from Baghdâd, has been inserted in our Constantinopolitan history, we shall not here take much farther notice of either of them, nor repeat what has been already related of them in that part of the large and extensive work in which we are at present engaged<sup>a</sup>.

- d ABOUT this time, died Al Modhaffer, who had expelled Abu'l Ma'âli Ebn Al Hasan Ebn Al Modhaffer Omrân from Al Batîha, and usurped the government there. He was succeeded by Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Nasr, in conformity to his settlement of the succession before his death, his sister's son; who was confirmed in that prefecture, by an instrument, drawn up in form, and sent him for that purpose, by the Khalif. Abu'l Hasan assumed the title of Mohadzebo'ddawla, or Mohadhdhebo'ddawla, and governed his subjects with great prudence, equity, and moderation. He has been represented by Abu'lfeda as a pious and beneficent prince. About the same time, likewise died Abu Ali Al Hosein Ebn Ahmed Ebn Abd'aljaasar Al Fârsî, the author of the Kitâb Al Idhai above-mentioned, and one of the most eminent grammarians of his time. Some take him to have been a Motazalite; but this does not certainly appear. He was born at Fasa, or Fassa, a city of Fârs, but studied at Baghdâd. He resided, for some time, at Aleppo, and was well received at Saifo'ddawla's court. He was afterwards admitted into Adado'ddawla's family, and held in great esteem by that prince. Amongst his works Abu'lfeda ranks the Kitâb Al Tadzkiri, the Kitâb Al Macsuri wa'l Mamdudi, the Kitâb Al Hojjati fi'l Carati, the Kitâb Al Awamel il Miatî, and others, of which we must not take upon us at present to give our readers any particular account<sup>b</sup>.

- f IN the 377th year of the Hejra, commencing May 3d, 987, Sclerus possessed himself of a very considerable extent of territory, in the imperial provinces, bordering upon the Moslem frontiers, and caused himself to be acknowledged emperor there. This happened in the latter Jomâda, according to Al Makin. The same author relates, that the emperor Basilus, being in great want of money, was obliged to have recourse to the king of the Russians, for his assistance against the rebel Bardas Phocas; that the Russian monarch married Basilus's sister, and embraced the Christian religion, in the principles of which he was instructed, together with all his people, who followed his example, by some bishops, sent him by Basilus for that purpose; that the Russians were a large and powerful nation, that, before this period, professed no religion at all, but remained to the time when this writer compiled his history in the Christian faith; and that Basilus, being assisted by the Russian king with a powerful army, worsted Bardus Phocas, both by sea and land, drove him out of all the countries he had subdued, put him to death, the third of Al Mobarram, 379, and ordered his head to be carried to Constantinople, and exposed in that city to public view. We also learn from this author, that the Khalif Al Tay' did not formally inaugurate Sharfo'ddawla, and dignify him with the title of Shâbenshâw, or Shâbinshâb, the great king, or the king of kings, before the present year<sup>c</sup>.

THE following year, being the 378th of the Hejra, beginning April 21st, 988, Al Azîz Bîllah, the Fâtemite Khalif of Egypt, sent Monir, the eunuch, with an army, to drive Bacjûr from the prefecture of Damascus, and to succeed him in the government of that city. Bacjûr, having received advice of Monir's approach, waited for him at Dârâ, a village in the neighbourhood of Damascus, and engaged him there. But, after a vigorous action, he was routed by Monir, and obliged to fly into the city. Soon after which, a treaty was concluded between them; by virtue of which, Bacjûr was permitted to retire quietly from Damascus to Al Rakka, and Monir took immediate possession of the former of those cities. As for Bacjûr, upon his arrival at Al Rakka, he caused himself to be proclaimed sovereign there. Before the close of this year, Ebn Ayad, Ebâd, or Abbâd, surnamed Al Sâheb, or the companion, made Fakbro'ddawla Ebn Rucno'ddawla a present of a gold medal, weighing 1000 methkâls, or Arabic drachms. Abu'lfeda writes, that this medal was given to Fakbro'ddawla, in the month of Al Mobarram; and that it was adorned with some Arabic verses, intended by the donor as a compliment upon that prince. We must beg leave to observe, that Abu Hamed Mohammed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ahmed Isbak Al Naifâbûri, the author of many excellent books, departed this life, in the year we are now upon<sup>d</sup>.

Sharfo'ddawla
dies.

THE next year, being the 379th of the Hejra, which commenced April 11th, 989, Sharfo'ddawla sent Mohammed Al Sbîrâzi into Persia, to deprive of his sight his brother Samsâmo'ddawla, who was incarcerated in a castle there. In the mean time, Sharfo'ddawla himself was attacked by a dropsy; which carried him off either on the first or second day of the latter Jomâda, the present year. Soon after his decease, Mohammed Al Sbîrâzi arrived in Persia, and deprived Samsâmo'ddawla of the use of his eyes, in the prison wherein he was detained. Sharfo'ddawla died at Baghdâd, in the 29th year of his age, after he had continued in the post of Emîr Al Omrâ about two years and eight months. His remains were conducted to Cûfa, and interred at Masbhad Ali, near those of his father. His brother, Abu Nasr Babao'ddawla Ebn Adado'ddawla, called by some writers Khasbadz, or Khaskbadz, succeeded him in the office of Emîr Al Omrâ; in which he was confirmed by the Khalif Al Tay', a proper instrument having been drawn up for that purpose. As soon as the news of Sharfo'ddawla's death reached the castle where Samsâmo'ddawla, his brother Abu Thâber, and Fûlâd, or Fûâd, were confined, those princes were all released, and made the best of their way to Sbîrâz. As for Samsâmo'ddawla, he was put into the immediate possession of Persia, or Fârs, by a body of the Deylamite troops. In the mean time, Babao'ddawla having gotten Abu Ali Ebn Sharfo'ddawla, his nephew, into his hands, most barbarously put him to death. About the same time, Mohammed Ebn Ahmed Al Abbâs Al Salami, a famous Ashârian dialectical doctor, surnamed Al Nakkash, departed this life; but in what part of the world this accident happened, we have not been certainly informed. Abd'allah, the Emîr of Sicily, who was succeeded by his son Abu'l Fatub Yusef Ebn Abd'allah, an excellent governor, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, died, in the year of the Hejra 379; though, according to Al Kâdi Shababo'ddaîn Ebn Abildâm Al Hamawi, that Emîr expired, the preceding year<sup>e</sup>.

Baghdâd.

Nor long after Babao'ddawla had taken upon him the government and direction of the Khalifat of Baghdâd, a dispute arose between the Deylamite and Turkish troops in that capital. This continued five days; and, as both sides had recourse to arms, was attended with a considerable effusion of Moslem blood. Nor could Babao'ddawla, by any means he could devise, appease this commotion; so that he found himself obliged, during the aforesaid interval, to shut himself up in his palace. However, the soldiers on both sides, shewing a themselves averse to an accommodation, the Emîr Al Omrá, at the end of twelve days, joined the Turks against his countrymen, the Deylamites; which forced them to submit to such terms of pacification as he thought fit to prescribe. From this period, therefore, says Abu'lfeda, the power of the Turks grew more and more formidable every day, and that of the Deylamites, at least within the precincts of Baghdad, daily declined <sup>f</sup>.

b THE same year, a dispute likewise happened between Abu'l Abbâs Ahmed Ebn Al Emîr Abu'l Abbâs Ishaq Ebn Al Moktader, who was afterwards Khalîf, under the title, or surname, of Al Kâder Ebn Al Moktader Bi'llah, and his sister, about the division of the patrimony their father had left them. The lady, on this occasion, accused her brother to the Khalîf, then just recovered from a fit of sickness, of a design to depose him, and substitute himself in his room. This, she said, he had intended to attempt, in hopes of being favoured in the execution of his scheme, by the illness that he had, for some time, laboured under; which so exasperated the Khalîf, that he sent a party of his guards to apprehend Abu'l Abbâs, and bring him immediately before him. But Abu'l Abbâs having had timely notice given him of what was in agitation against him, he fled to Mohadkhebo'ddawla, the prince of Al Batbihah, or Al Batiba, as we find this tract denominated by Abu'l Faraj; who received him with uncommon marks of respect, and afforded him a secure retreat in a part of the world that was almost inaccessible. Here we shall take the liberty to leave him, happy in the protection of his hospitable and generous benefactor, till we meet with him again at the time of his elevation to the Moslem throne <sup>g</sup>.

c THIS year, Abu Thâher Ibrahim and Abd'allah Al Hosein, the brothers of Abu Taglab, who had been expelled the territory of Al Mawfel by Adado'dawla Ebn Rucno'ddawla Ebn Bûiya, as has been already observed, possessed themselves of that city, and all the district belonging to it. They had served in the armies of Adado'dawla, Sharfo'ddawla, and Bahao'ddawla, with great honour and reputation; insomuch that the last of those Emîrs permitted them to return to Al Mawfel, and recovered a country which had been governed by their father and brother, and erected into a principality by one of their family. Upon their arrival there, the governor of the place, for one of the princes of the house of Bûiya, pretended to oppose them; but the inhabitants being all in their interest, he was soon obliged to retire, and abandon to them the town, together with the whole extensive tract appertaining to it. In the month of Rajeb, Sclerus submitted to the emperor Basilus, who received him with uncommon civility, entertained him at his table, and declared him great steward of his household; having been introduced to that prince by his brother Constantine, according to Al Makin. About the same time, Basilus banished Agabius, the patriarch, from Antioch, and confined him in a monastery at Constantinople; having found amongst Bardas Phocas's papers a letter from him to that rebel, in which he animated him against his sovereign, and pressed him to persist in his rebellion, till he had carried his point. He remained in state of exile seven years; during which term, simony was practised and other irregularities happened in his see. We are told likewise by the above-mentioned author, that an earthquake threw down the third part of the church of Santa Sophia at Constantinople, and demolished a great part of the houses and public buildings of Nicomedia, by the falling down of which, many of the inhabitants were destroyed, in the year of the Hejra 379. The Bulgarians also, continues the same writer, penetrated into the imperial provinces, and made excursions as far as Seleucia; laying waste the country through which they moved with fire and sword. On Saturday, the 27th of Dhu'lhajja, the preceding year, there was a most terrible storm in Egypt, attended with thunder and lightning, and such darkness as had never been known. It did not cease till towards midnight, nor did the darkness abate till the morning began to appear; when the hemisphere exhibited a phænomenon resembling a pillar of fire, which communicated an unusual red colour both to the heavens and the earth. The atmosphere was likewise loaded with a sort of dust which hindered respiration, and proved extremely noxious to all kinds of animals, till the fourth hour of the day, when the sun discovered himself, disguised by an unnatural colour. With this colour he rose every morning till Thursday, the second of Al Mobar-ram, 379. A comet also appeared, in the western part of the hemisphere, on Sunday, the 20th of the latter Rabi, and was seen by the people of Egypt above twenty nights together, the present year <sup>h</sup>.

f IN the 380th year of the Hejra, which began March 31st, 990, Bâd the prince of Diyâr Bocr, advanced with a body of Curds to Al Mawfel, in order to drive from thence Abu Thâher Ibrahim and Abu Abd'allah Al Hosein, who had made themselves masters of that city, the preceding year. This brought on a general action between those princes and Bâd; wherein wherein the latter, attempting to leap from the back of one horse to that of another, fell a to the ground and was killed by a soldier that knew him; having been abandoned by his own men, who were so pushed by the enemy, that they could not remount him. Abu Thâber and Abu Abd'allah, having, by this happy event, gained a complete victory, ordered Bâd's head to be cut off, and his body to be affixed to a sort of gibbet, over-against the royal palace, in Al Mawfel. But this giving great offence to the people of that city, who looked upon Bâd as one that had distinguished himself in the wars he had waged with the enemies of Islamism; it was taken down, and interred, in a decent manner. After Bâd's defeat, Abu Ali Ebn Merwân, his sister's son, repaired to the castle of Caifa, where Bad's wife and family then resided, with all possible expedition, was admitted into the place, and gave them a particular account of the disaster that had happened at Al Mawfel. He b soon after prevailed upon his uncle's widow to marry him; and, by that step, occupied, in a short time, not only the castle of Caifa, but likewise all the other fortresses in Diyâr Becr that had belonged to Bâd. Strengthened by this accession of power, he carried on the war, begun by his uncle, with good success, against Abu Thâber Ibrahim and Abu Abd'allah Al Hosein, the princes of Al Mawfel, and wrested from them several places of considerable note. He then went to Meji, put himself under the protection of Al Azîz, and was made by that Khalîf the governor of Aleppo, and its dependencies. From this time, he resided alternately in Syria, or Shâm, and Diyâr Becr, till the people of Amed, with Sheikh Abd'al Barri, at their head, conspired against him; when, having received advice of their intended revolt, he repaired to that city, and was assassinated in one of the gates, as he c was going out of it, by Ebn Dimnah, or Ebn Damna, an inhabitant of the place. This enabled Sheikh Abd'al Barri to cause himself to be acknowledged sovereign, or prince of Amed; he having long aspired at the supreme dignity, and been supported by a pretty powerful faction, there. However, it was not long before he was likewise dispatched by Ebn Damna, who had married his daughter, at an entertainment which the assassin had prepared for him. In the mean time, Momabedo'ddawla Ebn Merwân, who, after his brother Abu Ali's death, had seized upon Mayyâfâra, and several other towns, over which Abu Ali had formerly presided, governed his subjects with great lenity and moderation, and maintained himself on the throne he had ascended till the year of the Hejra 402, when he was cut off by Sharwab, one of the officers of his guards. Abu Nasr Ahmed Ebn Merwân, Abu d Ali's only surviving brother, after that tragical event, was taken out of the prison, where he had been by his brothers confined, on account of a portentous dream, and found means to possess himself of Arzan-Al-Rûm, or Erzerum, and gradually to secure almost the whole province of Diyâr Becr; though Sharwab had seized upon the greatest part of Momabedo'ddawla's substance, and several districts that had recognized the authority of that prince. The dream here mentioned has been related by Abu'lfeda, in the following terms. Abu Ali thought, in his sleep, that he carried the sun in his bosom; and that this was afterwards snatched from him by Abu Nasr; which so terrified him, that he immediately commanded his brother to be sent to prison, and detained him there during the remainder of his reign. Nor did Momabedo'ddawla afterwards release him, being equally terrified with Abu Ali by c the aforesaid dream; which Abu'lfeda takes to have been verified by Abu Nasr's ascension of the throne, in the year of the Hejra 402. As for old Merwân himself, the father of these princes, who was blind, he is said to have finished his days at his son Abu Ali's tomb, in a religious manner. Abu Nasr, according to Abu'lfeda, ruled the Moslems of Diyâr Becr, with singular felicity, fifty-one years. After the overthrow Bâd, the Curd, had received, Abu'l Dzowad Mohammed Ebn Al Mosayyeb, the Emîr of the Okailite Arabs, descended from Jaafar, the first prince and founder of that dynasty, marched with an army to Al Mawfel, vanquished Abu Thâber Ibrahim in battle, and put him, together with all his family, as well as many of his officers, and a vast number of his soldiers, to the sword. This gave the finishing stroke to the domination of the house of Hamdân at Al Mawfel, and substituted in his room that of the Okailite Arabs there <sup>1</sup>.

Ebn Calas's death and character. THE same year, Yakûb Ebn Yusef Ebn Calas (O), or Cales, Al Azîz's Wazîr, departed this life, in the month of Dhu'l-hajja, at Mejr. He was originally a Jew, but embraced Islamism, (O) This Yakûb Ebn Yusef Ebn Calas is called Abu Yacoub Ebn Kalas by M. Renaudot, who tells us, that he was brought over to Islamism by the Khalîf Al Moezz himself, and therefore greatly esteemed by him. He also relates, that Severus, the bishop of Aphmûnin, who was extremely well versed in the Arabic language, being appointed to dispute with one Mofes, an intimate friend of Ebn Calas, before the Khalîf Al Moezz, upon the subject of religion, could not forbear telling that prince, when he appeared before him, that it was beneath his dignity to hear religion either attacked or defended by Jews; who had been represented by Ijaiah, one a Islamism, in the days of Câfûr. He has been represented as a man of a happy genius, and thoroughly versed in all the arts of government, by Al Makîn. After the death of Câfûr, who employed him on several occasions, he went to Mobdia, and was the person who invited Al Moezz to undertake the conquest of Egypt. The first post all Al Moezz conferred upon Yakûb, after his reduction of Egypt, was that of principal collector, or rather receiver-general, of the tribute; in which he remained till that prince advanced him to the office of Wazîr. Al Azîz himself visited him, in his last illness, a little before his death; and said the usual prayers over him, at the time of his interment. Nor was he unworthy, as the same author remarks, of the high regard shewn him, and the sorrow expressed for the loss of him, by that prince<sup>k</sup>.

b BEFORE we conclude our account of the transactions of the present year, it may not be improper to observe, that Samsâmo'ddawla was released from his confinement by his brother Bahao'ddawla, in some part of it, notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary by Abu'lfeda, according to Al Makîn. The latter of these authors likewise relates, that Bahao'ddawla gave Samsâmo'ddawla and Abu Thâber Ebn Adado'ddawla, his other brother, Shirâz and Arjûn, together with the districts appertaining to them. To which he adds, that the latter of these princes died soon after, and that Samsâmo'ddawla was only a nominal king; his prime minister Fûlâd taking upon him the sole management and direction of all public affairs<sup>l</sup>.

c THE following year, being the 381st of the Hejra, which commenced March 20th, 991, the Khalîf Al Tay' was deposed by Bahao'ddawla, the Emîr Al Omrâ, in the following manner. That minister, gaping after the riches of this Khalîf, sent an officer to him, to desire leave to make him a visit in the imperial palace. The Khalîf, suspecting no ill design, set apart a solemn festival, in order to do him the greater honour, for his reception. When the day appointed came, Bahao'ddawla mounted his horse, and went to the palace, where he was received by the Khalîf, sitting upon his throne. As soon as the Emîr Al Omrâ entered the Khalîf's apartment, or rather the great saloon, where ambassadors had their audience of him, he prostrated himself before him, and afterwards sat down in a seat that had been prepared for him; upon which a great number of people rushed indiscriminately into the room. Things being thus in a sort of confusion, one of the Deylamite soldiers that attended Bahao'ddawla on this occasion, approached the Khalîf, seemingly with an intention to kiss his hand; but having taken hold of this, he dragged him from his throne with all his might. The poor prince, being thus treated, cried out to God to assist him, and to punish the injury that had been offered him; no one in the mean time, discovering the least disposition to interpose in his favour. Having now lost all his authority, and none of his subjects retaining any veneration for his person, he was carried to Bahao'ddawla's palace, where he was forced to abdicate the Khalifat, in a formal manner, before the Kâdi of Baghdâd, and other proper witnesses, that had met there for that purpose. After his abdication, Abu'l Abbâs Ahmed Ebn Al Emîr Isbak Ebn Al Moktader was pitched upon, under the title of Al Kâder Bi'llah, the 19th of Shaabân, to succeed him. It appears from Al Makîn, that a party of the Deylamite troops wrapped the Khalîf up first in the tapestry of his apartment, then hurried him with the utmost precipitation and violence to the place above-mentioned, and lastly plundered his palace. This Khalîf sat upon the throne of Baghdâd seventeen years, eight months, and a few days, if Abu'lfeda may be depended up; or seventeen years, nine months, and six days, if we chuse to follow Al Makîn. He survived his abdication about twelve years, and died in the year of the Hejra 393; being about seventy-six lunar years of age, at the time of his death. The funeral service over him was performed by his successor Al Kâder. With regard to his person, he had a red face, and was of a fair complexion. As to his disposition, he is said to have been liberal, and a prince of great honour. But, as he had little or no authority, through the whole course of his reign, perhaps his true character was not known. The first day of his Khalifat was Thursday, and the last Saturday, according to Al Makîn. We are told, that the famous Sharîf Al Râdi, was in the imperial palace, when the Khalîf was treated there by the Deylamites in such an ignominious manner; but that, fearing to be murdered, he from thence made his escape; after which, he composed a tristich of Ara-

one of their own prophets, as inferior in point of knowledge to even brutes themselves. To which this author adds, that Severus having proved this, to the satisfac-

*bi*c verses, on the melancholy occasion, that Abu'lfeda has handed down to us. Al Makin was, at the time of his election, with Mobadhdbebo'ddawla in Al Batiba, whither he had retired for safety, in the year of the Hejra 379. He made his public entry into Raghdad, where he was inaugurated in form, and received the oath of allegiance from the grantees of that city, the twelfth of Ramadan. The next day, he was prayed for, according to custom, in the mosques of that metropolis. After the deposition, or abdication and incarceration of Al Tay, Bakao'ddawla became master of all his treasures, and of all the rich furniture carried out of his palace by his insolent Deylamites above-mentioned, as we find clearly enough intimated by Abu'l Faraj<sup>m</sup>.

Bacjur is defeated by Saado'ddawla, who dispossesses him of Al Ramla. THE same year, Bacjur, who had erected a sort of principality at Al Ramla, as has been remarked above, undertook an expedition against Saado'ddawla Ebn Saifo'ddawla, the prince of Aleppo, with a body of troops he had assembled for that purpose. But Saado'ddawla, after a sharp engagement, intirely defeated him, put a great number of his men to the sword, and took him himself prisoner. Bacjur, having thus fallen into his enemies hands, was brought to Saado'ddawla in chains, who immediately ordered him to be put to death; which, as Abu'lfeda says, was a just reward for the perfidy he had been guilty of to Saifo'ddawla, his master and benefactor, Saado'ddawla's father. After the victory he had obtained, Saado'ddawla advanced to Al Ramla at the head of his troops, and made the necessary dispositions for the siege of that city. But Bacjur's family, finding he was resolved to carry the town, offered to surrender it to him, provided he would permit them to pass in safety to some other place, with all the money and effects Bacjur had required. To this he readily complied, and signed such a capitulation as they desired. But his troops were no sooner in possession of the town, than, in contempt of public faith, he violated this treaty, seized the persons of Bacjur's children, and stripped them of every thing valuable that they had brought out with them. However, the flagrant injustice and iniquity he committed on this occasion did not remain long unpunished. For upon his arrival at Aleppo, he was seized with a palsy, that deprived him of the use of his right side. The physician, who was sent for, after he had asked him some questions, according to custom, relative to his disorder, bid him stretch out his hand. Upon which, with some difficulty, he pointed his left hand towards him. But the doctor telling him it was his right hand he meant, he returned for answer, "The violation of the treaty I signed with my right hand has deprived me of the use of that part;" or, as it is more elegantly and concisely expressed in the Arabic, "My right hand has not left me my right hand:" which amounted to a plain implication, that he was sensible of the heinousness of his crime, and considered this stroke of the palsy as a punishment inflicted upon him for it. As the whole nervous system was destroyed by this shock, he lived but three days after the attack. However, during that interval he settled his affairs, and committed the care of his family, particularly his son Abu'l Fadayel, then a child, who succeeded him, to Lulu' Al Kbaraji, one of his manumitted slaves, on whom he had conferred many singular favours. For, that Lulu' was constituted the sole governor of Abu'l Fadayel, till he came of age, and the sole regent of the principality of Aleppo, till that young prince was capable of taking the government upon him, by Saado'ddawla, a little before he expired, is not only evident from Abu'lfeda and Al Makin, but even from the very passage (P), which Dr. Pocock has made to speak a contrary sense, of Abu'l Faraj<sup>n</sup>.

The Khalif of Egypt's forces besiege Aleppo, but are forced to raise the siege of that important place at the approach of the Greeks. AL AZIZ BI'LLAH, the Fatemite Khalif of Egypt, having received advice of Saado'ddawla's death, sent a formidable army to reduce Aleppo, and annex that place, with its dependencies, to his other dominions in Syria. Lulu', finding himself pressed by the Egyptians, who carried on the siege with the utmost vigour, desired the Greek emperor to assist him; who thereupon ordered a body of his forces to advance to his relief. Manjibekin, who commanded the Khalif of Egypt's troops, being informed of their approach, immediately raised the siege of Aleppo, and moved at the head of his forces, to give them battle. The two armies soon

- a came in sight of each other, and a general action thereupon ensued. After a sharp and obstinate engagement, the Greeks were overthrown with very great slaughter; a vast number of their men having been killed upon the spot. The Egyptians having thus obtained a complete victory, Manjûbekîn returned to the siege of Aleppo; which, for some time, he pushed on with uncommon ardour, and not without a prospect of success. But finding that the place would probably defend itself much longer than he at first imagined, and that provisions began to fail, he dispatched a courier to Mesr, to let the Khalîf know the state of his affairs in Syria, and to desire his permission to retire from before Aleppo, which he did not then find himself in a condition to reduce. Nor did he think fit to wait for the Khalîf's answer; but, in a short time after the courier's departure, raised the siege. As soon as Al Azîz had read
- b his general's letter he fell into a great rage; and was much more incensed, when, by the arrival of a fresh courier, he understood, that Manjûbekîn had abandoned the siege. He, therefore, sent him a very threatening letter, with orders to attack the place again, and not to leave it till he had obliged it to surrender. Manjûbekîn, therefore, sat down again before Aleppo, and continued the siege of that important fortress thirteen months; during which time, Lîlî defended it with incredible bravery, and killed the besiegers a vast number of men. The Egyptians being at last apprized, that a very numerous army of Greeks, moving to the succour of the town, were within a few marches of their camp, they raised the siege, and fled with the utmost precipitation. Upon which, Lîlî and Abu'l Fadayel, his master, or rather pupil, came out of the city to meet their deliverers; whom
- c they loaded with all the good and valuable things that Aleppo produced, treated with the highest marks of distinction and esteem, and conducted into the town with all the demonstrations of joy that could be expected on so happy and auspicious an occasion °.

- THE Greeks having thus forced the Egyptians to abandon the siege of Aleppo, they afterwards marched to Hems, took and plundered that city, put many of the inhabitants to the sword, and carried most of the rest away with them into captivity. Shaizar, to which they next advanced, met with the same fate. From thence they moved to Tripoli, which they besieged above forty days; but without effect. After which, they retired into the imperial territories with a very considerable quantity of spoil. As for Manjûbekîn, he made the best of his way to Damascus, and set up for himself there; of which Al Azîz being informed, he
- d led an army against him, in order to bring him back to a sense of his duty. But being taken sick on his march at Belbais, he found himself obliged to halt. Here he nominated his son Al Hakem to succeed him, and committed the care of him to one Arjûn, a minister of great abilities and integrity, in whom he could intirely confide; his illness increasing to such a degree, that his life was for some time despaired of by the physicians that attended him. However, he recovered, and lived afterwards several years. On the 17th of Al Muharram, so dreadful an earthquake happened at Damascus, that a thousand houses were thrown down in that city, by the violence of some of its shocks. By the fall of which houses, a great number of people were destroyed. One of the villages in the neighbourhood of Baalbec was intirely demolished. Nor did all the agitations of the earth, consequential to these concussions, cease before Friday, the 14th of Safar, as we learn from Al Makîn. During this public calamity, the people in many places were so frightened, that they quitted their habitations, and fled from the cities into the open fields. We must not forget to observe, that the famous Jawhar Al Kayed, who conquered Egypt for the Fâtemite Khalîf Al Moezz, and was afterwards deprived of all the riches and honours he had so justly acquired, departed this life, the present year °.

S E C T. XLVI.

- F THE new Khalîf, Abu'l Abbâs Ahmed Ebn Al Emîr Ishak Ebn Al Moktader Ebn Al Mo'taded, was created and proclaimed Emîr Al Mûmenîn, or emperor of the faithful, under the title of Al Kâder Bî'llah, the 19th of Shaabân, according to Al Makîn. However, he was not inaugurated in form, before the 11th or 12th of Ramadân, if we will believe Abu'l feda and Abu'l Faraj. At the time of his elevation to the Moslem throne, he was with Mohaddhebo'ddawla, the prince of Al Batîka, or Al Bathibak, who had taken him under his protection, in the year of the Hejra 379, as has been already observed. He married Sekîna, Bahao'ddawla's daughter, and assigned her a dower of 100,000 dinârs. When the courier arrived with the news of his being elected Khalîf, he found him relating a dream he had had the preceding night, which clearly portended his future greatness. With regard to the tract, tract, or territory, denominated by the Arabs Al Batîba, or Al Bathîbah, it was a marshy a district, according to Abu'lfeda, in the neighbourhood of the fens formed by the re stagnation of the Tigris, and called the marshes, or effusions, of Wâset, as being only about seven parasangs below that city. M. D'Herbelot, however, notwithstanding the authority of Abu'lfeda, gives us to understand, that these lakes were formed by the stagnant waters of the Euphrates, as well as those of the Tigris; and that Al Batîba, of whose princes we have already given our readers some account, extended from Wâset to Basra <sup>1</sup>.

The Greeks
make an irruption into Armenia.

THE next year, being the 382d of the Hejra, beginning March 9th, 992, the Greeks, under the conduct of Basilus, made an irruption into Armenia, and laid siege to the cities of Khalât, or Akblât, Malâzkerd, Malâzjerd, or Malâzgerda, and Arjîs, or Arjîsb; which threw Abu Ali Al Hasan Ebn Merwân, the Moslem governor of that province, into such a b panic, that he concluded a truce, or cessation of arms, with the emperor, for ten years, upon the best terms he could procure. This we learn from Abu'l Faraj; though it does not appear from any of the Greek writers, that the emperor Basilus himself either undertook, or headed his troops, in such an expedition <sup>1</sup>.

An insurrection
at Baghdâd.

THE same year, there was an insurrection at Baghdâd; the people of that metropolis, as well as the troops in garison there, being greatly incensed against Babao'ddawla, the Emîr Al Omrâ, for suffering himself to be intirely governed by Ebn Al Moallam, a person of but an indifferent character. Babao'ddawla, therefore, finding that he could not stem the torrent of sedition, which ran so strongly against him, without sacrificing his favourite, immediately delivered up Ebn Al Moallam into the hands of the soldiery, who instantly put him c to death; by which means, the tumult, that had for some time disturbed the public repose, was easily appeased <sup>2</sup>.

The territories of Nûh Ebn
Mansûr Al Samâni are invaded by Bagra Khân.

THE following year, being the 383d of the Hejra, commencing Feb. 26, 993, Bagra Khân, as he is called by Abu'lfeda, who was possessed of Kâshgar, Balâfâgûn, and all the vast tract extending to the confines of China, invaded the territories of Nûh Ebn Mansûr Al Sammâni, the lord, or sovereign, of Khorasân and Mawarâ'lnahr. Bagra, who was excited to this expedition by Abu Ali and Faëkh, two rebel brothers, who joined him with a considerable body of troops, overthrew the Sammânian forces, took Samarkand and Bokhâra, the latter of which cities was then the metropolis of Mawarâ'lnahr, and drove Nûh over the Oxus. That prince retiring to Amol Al Sbat, or Amol upon the river, that is, Amol upon the d Jibûn, or the Oxus, soon assembled his shattered forces there, and dispatched from thence his orders to Abu Ali Ebn Simjûr to advance with the troops he commanded in Khorasân; hoping, by the assistance of such a reinforcement, to oblige Bagra Khân to abandon the conquests he had made. But Ebn Simjûr was so far from obeying those orders, that he persisted in his attachment to Bagra Khân; who nevertheless soon delivered Nûh from all future apprehensions of so formidable a competitor. For that prince, falling sick at Bokhâra, was advised by his physicians to return to Turkestan; which he attempted to do, but died upon the road. Abu'lfeda represents Bagra Khân as a pious and religious prince; and tells us, that, in all his edicts and public instruments, he stiled himself the servant of the apostle of God. After his death, Nûh repossessed himself of Samarkand, Bokhâra, and e all the other places, in his territories, that had been reduced by Bagra Khân; though he was not yet able to extinguish the rebellion, headed by Ebn Simjûr and Faëkh. It may not be improper here to remark, that Bagra Khân is denominated by Teixeira Bokra Khân, and Kara Khân by M. D'Herbelot. The latter of these writers places the commencement of the troubles that occasioned the invasion here mentioned, in the year of the Hejra 371. Notwithstanding which, as the authority of Abu'lfeda, who lived nearer the time of it than the Persian historian followed by M. D'Herbelot, is express and decisive in the point before us, we doubt not but our learned readers will readily assign this irruption a place amongst the transactions of the year we are now upon. Bagra was succeeded in the sovereignty of his vast dominions, named by Abu'lfeda the kingdom of the Turks, and by Mirkbond Turkestan, f by Ilek Khân <sup>3</sup>.

Ebn Simjûr
and Faëkh, in the province of Herât.

IN the year of the Hejra 384, which began Feb. 15th, 994, the rebel brothers, Abu Ali Ebn Simjûr and Faëkh, persisting in their revolt, and having raised numerous forces to support themselves therein, Nûh found himself obliged to apply to Sabektekin, the lord, or prince, of Gaznûn, then returned in triumph from India, one of his most famous generals, for assistance. In order to induce him to advance with the greater expedition to his relief, he appointed him governor of Khorasân, in the room of Ebn Simjûr, and committed the

- a administration of that province intirely to him. Upon which, Sabektekin, with his son Mahmūd, moved at the head of all his forces from Gazna, Gaznab, or Gaznūn, into Khorasān; and afterwards joined the Sammānian army, commanded by Nāb, at Bekbāra. This junction being thus effected, the combined army marched directly against the rebels, who waited for them in the province of Herāt, where they found them incamped. After several movements, a fierce conflict ensued, which ended in the defeat of Ebn Simjūr and Fākkh, whose camp was forced, and a great part of their men put to the sword. This victory, which was complete, and gained chiefly by the conduct of Sabektekin, and the bravery of his troops, re-established Nāb's affairs; who thereupon appointed Mahmūd Ebn Sabektekin to preside over the province of Khorasān, and then returned to Bekbāra. He also made Mahmūd, at his father Sabektekin's request, commander in chief of all his forces; after which, Mahmūd went to Naisabūr, or Nisābūr, and Sabektekin to Gaznūn. Ebn Simjūr and Fākkh, who had fled to Nisābūr after the late defeat, having received advice, that Mahmūd Ebn Sabektekin was advancing towards them, abandoned the city in which they had taken refuge at his approach. However, they soon found means to assemble another body of troops, with which they obliged Mahmūd to retire. But, being reinforced by his father Sabektekin, he gave them another overthrow; upon which, Ebn Simjūr thought fit to submit to Nāb, and Fākkh fled to Ilek Khān. The city of Gazna, Gaznab, or Gaznūn, for it went by all those names, was an emporium and fortrefs of Zāblestān, not far from the confines of India, as sufficiently appears from the eastern geographers. The writers followed by M.
- b D'Herbelot make it to have formerly been the capital of that province. Mr. Hanway, therefore, was undoubtedly mistaken, when he placed this city in Khorasān; as running counter in this point not only to the authority of Golius, Abu'lfeda, Nasir Al Tāfi, and Ulugh Beik, but likewise to himself. For, in the map prefixed to the third volume of his book, he has assigned it a situation in Kandahar, upon the borders of Cābūl, or Cāblestān, at no great distance from the confines of Zāblestān, called Sablestān by this author, and not in Khorasān. But, indeed, he has himself acknowledged this mistake, in the explanation of foreign words, subjoined to the last part of his curious work *.

- THE same year, died Obeid'allah Ebn Mohammed Ebn Nafe', a person of uncommon sanctity and austerity of life; as did likewise Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Isā, a grammarian of considerable note, who wrote a large commentary upon the Korān, and was born in the year of the Hejra 296. Mohammed Ebn Al Abbās Ebn Ahmed Al Cazzaz, a writer greatly famed for his accuracy and erudition, and Abu Isbak Ibrahim Ebn Helāl, a Sabian notary, likewise departed this life, before the close of the present year. The latter of these was about ninety-one years old, at the time of his death. He had been secretary of state first to Moezzo'ddawla, and afterwards to Bakhtiyār, his son and successor, at Baghdād. During Bakhtiyār's administration, he wrote, in that Emir's name, several stinging letters to Adado'ddawla; which were afterwards remembered, and resented to such a degree, that when Adado'ddawla had made himself master of Baghdād, he caused him to be imprisoned. Nor was he content with detaining him in prison a considerable time. He ordered him, after he was released, to write the history of Deylem; imposing this as a sort of task, or rather inflicting it as a kind of punishment, upon him. Which history, under the title of Al Taji, was extant in Abu'lfeda's days. Nor did this conciliate Adado'ddawla's affection to him, though he had taken the liberty dedicate his performance to that prince. So far from it, that, after the piece was finished, Adado'ddawla was more incensed than ever against him, banished him to a great distance from court, and forbid any of his subjects to keep a correspondence with him. Whilst Ebn Helāl was compiling the aforesaid history, it happened, that one of his friends came to see him; who, finding him at work, asked him what he was upon? To which he replied, a little imprudently, "I am collecting and tacking together lies and trifles." Which answer, being carried to Adado'ddawla, so provoked him, that he immediately drove Ebn Helāl out of his presence, and would never be reconciled to him. Moezzo'ddawla could not, by any means, prevail upon him to embrace Islamism; though, according to Abu'lfeda, he could say all the Korān by heart. When Al Sharif Al Rādi was censured, for celebrating Ebn Helāl's praises, in some elegant Arabic verses, after his death, he excused himself, by saying, that he did not consider him as an unbeliever, but as a sublime genius, and a man of most profound erudition. We have already given our readers a short account of this author's mathematical works, as well as a sketch of his character, extracted from Abu'l Faraj *.

Ebn Simjûr is obliged to submit to Nûh.

THE next year, being the 385th of the Hejra, which commenced Feb. 5th, 995, Abu Ali Ebn Simjûr, according to Abu'lfeda, returned into Khorasân, and obliged Mahmûd Ebn Sabektekîn, afterwards denominated Mahmûd Gazni, to abandon that province. But Mahmûd, having been joined by his father Sabektekîn, with a large body of troops, went in quest of the rebels, and came up with them at Tûs. Here he engaged Ebn Simjûr with such bravery, that he put him to flight, killed a great part of his men upon the spot, and dispersed the rest in such a manner that they could never afterwards be rallied. This blow intirely ruined Ebn Simjûr's affairs; so that he found himself constrained to submit to Nûh. After which, having been pardoned by that prince, he immediately repaired to Bokhârâ; where, with several of his accomplices, he no sooner arrived, than they were all, though in open violation of public faith, put under an arrest by Nûh, and detained in prison, by his order. Nor did Ebn Simjûr ever recover his liberty, till he was released by death. With regard to the city of Tûs, in Khorasân, we must beg leave to observe, that, in former times, it was the metropolis of Khorasân, but was afterwards considered as dependent on Nisâbur, from which it was distant about twelve parasangs; that it has been placed in lat. 37°, and long. 92', by the eastern astronomers and geographers; that it is divided, in reality, into two cities, the larger of which is called Tâberân, and the lesser Nûkân; and that, each of these being subdivided into two others, it seems to be composed of four cities, or towns. But, for a farther description of this place, our curious readers may have recourse to some of the authors referred to here *.

Faëkh is made governor of Samarkand.

THE same year, Faëkh, called Faïk by M. D'Herbelot, meditated an irruption, in conjunction with Ilek Khân, into either Khorasân or Mawarâ'lnahr; of which Nûh receiving advice, he ordered Sabektekîn to attend him, and Mahmûd to join him with all the forces he could assemble, between Kash and Nakhsab, in the neighbourhood of Samarkand. But this treaty was at last concluded between Faëkh and Nûh; whereby the former was constituted by the latter governor of Samarkand, and all its dependencies; by which the troubles, that had so long subsisted between them, were intirely appeased, the present year. For a full account of the cities of Kash and Nakhsab, or Nesef, as it is called by Nassir Al Tûsi and Ulugh Beik, we must beg leave to refer our learned and curious readers to Abu'lfeda, Al Berjendi, and the other oriental geographers †.

(Q) The eastern writers followed by M. D'Herbelot make this Wazîr, whom they call Abu'l Kafem Ismael Cafi Ebn Ebâd, to have been one of the most wise and prudent statesmen that ever served any of the Moslem princes. Nay, he has always passed in Persia, on account of the transcendently excellent qualities he possessed, for the best and most accomplished, and, in fine, the greatest minister that ever lived. This is the character that Mirkbond, Hamdallah, Khondemir, Abmed Ebn Mohammed Abd'aljaafar Al Kazwîni, and the other Persian historians, unanimously give him; and with them Ebn Shohnah, who bestows the highest elogies upon him, for his singular sagacity, wisdom, greatness of soul, probity, and erudition, extremely well agrees. The author of the Nighiaristan, Abmed Ebn Mohammed Abd'aljaafar Al Kazwîni, has preserved a quatrain, or stanza of four verses, made in his life-time, and intended as an epitaph for him; which import, that he always kept clear of corruption; that, through the whole course of his ministry, he countenanced people of merit, and gloried in being the friend and protector of all good men; and that his name will be one of the greatest ornaments of the history of illustrious persons, though continued to the remotest periods of time (23).

Some of the aforesaid writers affirm, that Fakhro'ddawla himself honoured Abu'l Kafem Ebn Ebâd with the title of Al Sâheb, or the companion, because he had frequent conferences with him, and committed the government of his dominions intirely to him; but Ebn Shohnah agrees with Abu'lfeda, in the cause he has assigned for that appellation. The books in this Wazîr's library are said to have been so numerous, that he employed 400 camels in carrying them from one place to another. He composed some learned pieces, that were much esteemed; one particularly upon the art of poetry, intitled, Ecnââ fî'l Orûdh; which may be added to those mentioned by Abu'lfeda, in his Chronicon, that we have taken notice of here.

The people of Persia entertained so high a veneration for this Wazîr, after his death, that when his corpse was taken out of his house, in order to be interred, the grandees of the court prostrated themselves before his coffin, and kept it, for some time, suspended in the great mosque at Al Ray, till at last it was carried to that of Esfabân, where he had chosen to be inhumed (24).

According to Ebn Shohnah, he was born in the year of the Hejra 336, and died in the 383d year of that æra. But we chuse to follow Abu'lfeda, both in relation to the year of Ebn Ebâd's birth and that of his death, as carrying with him a greater air of probability in both those particulars. Some authors relate, that he was born at Al Ray, some at Esfabân, others at Esfakbr, and, lastly, others at Tâlakân. Those who make Tâlakân the place of his nativity, mean Tâlakân in the district of Kazwîn, and not the city of the same name either in Khorasân or Tokhârestân. But which of these authors is the most to be depended upon, in the point before us, we shall not at present take upon us to decide (25).

- a was a person of a most amiable disposition, consummate abilities, great munificence, immense erudition, and at the same time thoroughly versed in all the arts of government; for which reason, he has been stiled by Abu'lfeda the phoenix of his age. He was the first Wazîr who bore the title, or appellation, of Al Sâbeb, or the companion, and had a larger library than any of the Moslems that ever lived before him. Being in a private station, he contracted an intimacy with Ebn Al Amîd, and from thence was called Sâbeb Ebn Al Amîd, the companion of Ebn Al Amîd; which title, after his elevation to the sublime post he so worthily filled, was contracted, and he retained only the former part of it, Al Sâbeb. He was first Wazîr to Mowayyado'ddawla Ebn Rucno'ddawla, and, after his death, to Fakbro'ddawla, his brother, who always had him in great esteem. During his last illness, the latter of those princes
- b visited him in person, and desired to receive from his mouth some advice, for the better regulation of his future conduct. Upon which, this wise minister addressed himself to his master in the following terms: "You see, Sir, that, thanks be to God, I have introduced good order in every part of your dominions; all your subjects have had justice rendered them, and your finances are upon the most excellent foot. If, therefore, you would have the glory of my administration, take care to act uniformly upon the plan that I have laid down; since, if, by any deviation from it, after my death, your affairs should be embarrassed, and disorders should slip into the state, the people would not fail to ascribe all the happiness they enjoyed, during my ministry, to me; and consequently you would not by them be believed to have contributed any thing to it." These words
- c made a deep impression, for the present, upon Fakro'ddawla's mind; but notwithstanding this, his favourites and domestics, soon after the Wazîr's decease, governed with an absolute sway, and in so bad a manner, that the face of affairs was intired changed. Instead of lenity and justice, nothing was to be seen but violence and oppression; and the finances, that had been so well regulated before, were in a short time most shamefully dissipated. Such an infamous administration as this could not fail of exciting great murmurings amongst Fakbro'ddawla's subjects; who now, in conformity to his prediction, regretted the Wazîr, and praised his prudence more and more every day. This excellent minister so celebrated in history for his transcendent merit, is said by Abu'lfeda to have written the following books, which bore a very good character in the Moslem world; Al Mohith, a philological piece, concerning the genius and foundation of the Arabic tongue; Al Casti, a treatise upon the art and method of writing letters, particularly those sent in the name of a prince to any other potentate or great man; Al Kitâb Al Imâmî, i. e. the book treating of the office of Imâm, which expatiates upon the virtues of Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, as well as those of Abu Becr, Omar, and Othmân, who preceded him in the Khalifat, and proves all these to have been true and lawful Imâms. A fourth piece, which contains a brief exposition of the office and duty of a Wazîr. He also penned several elegant poetical compositions, of which at present we can give our readers no particular account. Abu'l Kasem was born at Esfakbr in the province of Fârs, according to some of the authors followed by Abu'lfeda, in the month of Dhu'lkaada, and the year of the Hejra 326. His father Ayâd, Ebûd, or Abbâd, was Rucno'ddawla's Wazîr, and died, if the Leyden MS. of Abu'lfeda's
- d Chronicon may be credited, in the year of the Moslem æra 334, or 335. We must not forget to remark, that a specimen of Abu'l Kasem's poetical productions has been preserved by Al Makîn<sup>2</sup>.

THE same year, Al Imâm Al Darcathani, whose name was Abu'l Hosein Ali Ebn Omar Ebn Ahmed, a celebrated Hâfedh, Imâm, and Fakih, according to the principles of Al Shâfeî, likewise died at Baghdâd. He derived his surname, Al Darcathani, from Dar Al Cathani, a very large street in that metropolis. He had a prodigious memory, and could say by heart a vast number of antient poems, and, amongst the rest, those composed by Al Sayyed Al Hamyari; who being a friend to Ali's descendants, had contracted an invincible aversion to the Sunnites. As Al Darcathani, therefore, admired his poetical compositions, he was suspected of being a secret favourer of the Shiites. He went from Baghdâd to Mesr, where he was countenanced, and had much money given him, by Abu'l Fadl Jaasar, Câsîn's Wazîr. He excelled in various branches of literature, but most in interpreting the Korân. It appears from Abu'lfeda, that he was born in the month of Dhu'lkaada, and the year of the Hejra 306<sup>1</sup>.

ABU MOHAMMED YUSEF EBN AL HASAN EBN ABD'ALLAH EBN AL MARZABAN AL SIRAFI, a famous grammarian, also departed this life, the present year. His father, Al Hasan, wrote a commentary upon the grammar of Sibuyab, in which he discovered a vast fund of erudition. He likewise composed a book, intituled, Al Kitâb Al Ica, the book of sufficiency, to which the finishing hand was put by his son, of whom we are now speaking. This Abu Mohammed Yusef published a commentary upon Al Abiyat, or the verses of the poets, cited by the above-mentioned Sibuyah; and another upon the book, intitled, Islab Al Mantbaki, or the method of improving the understanding and speech, or an emendation of logic. Sîrâf, where Abu Mohammed Yusef was born, and from whence he deduced the surname of Al Sîrâfi, was a city and emporium of Persia, seated upon the Persian gulf, or bay of Basra. It was formerly, though situated in a barren soil, and sultry unwholesome air, one of the most opulent and splendid cities of Persia; abounding then with merchants, enjoying a very flourishing trade, and all its inhabitants being a sea-faring people. But, for a farther account of this place, we must beg leave to refer our learned and curious readers to the authors cited here <sup>b</sup>.

Al Aziz
Billah's death
and character.

THE following year, being the 386th of the Hejra, beginning Jan. 25th, 996, Al Aziz Billah, the Fâtemite Khalif of Egypt, died in the bath at Belbais, or Belbis. At the time of his death, which happened in the month of Ramadân, he was meditating an expedition against the Greeks; being then forty-two years, eight months, and fourteen days, old, according to Al Makin. We are told, however, by Abu'lfeda, that he was carried off by a complication of distempers, of which the cholic was chief, in the forty-second year of his age. He succeeded his father, Al Moezz Ledinillab, in the 365th year of the Moslem era, as has been already observed, and was then about twenty-one years old; having been born at Mohdia, or Al Mohdia, in the year of the Hejra 344. His secretary of state was a Christian, named Isa, and his treasurer in Syria a Jew, called Manasseh. The Christians and the Jews, being supported and protected by these men, says Abu'lfeda, insulted the Moslems; which, according to the same author, induced the people of Mesr to make of paper a figure in the shape of a woman, and to place it in the road, through which Al Aziz was to pass, with a libel in one of its hands, to the following effect: "We conjure you by him, who has enabled Isa to render the Christians insolent and powerful, and Manasseh the Jews, and who by you has humbled the Moslems," i. e. God, "to tell us when an end shall be put to the afflictions that we endure." Which libel, continues the Arab historian, notwithstanding the asperity of expression visible in it, the Khalif was so far from taking amiss, that he immediately dismissed Isa, who had the greatest ascendant over him, and stripped him of all the wealth he had acquired. This prince has been represented by the Moslem writers as a person of a most excellent disposition, a prudent ruler, and a great lover of his people; whom he governed with uncommon justice, lenity, and moderation, twenty-one years, six months, and seventeen days, according to Al Makin. Abu'lfeda, however, relates that he reigned only twenty-one years, five months, and fifteen days. Be that as it will, his goodness and clemency to his subjects were scarce to be paralleled; of which we have been supplied with the following most remarkable instance by Abu'l Faraj. A certain satirical poet having once written a scurrilous libel in verse upon the Wazir, and the secretary of state, in which the Khalif himself came in for a share of the abuse; the Wazir carried his complaints to Al Aziz, and demanded to have the author of those verses punished. But the Khalif having read them, made him this answer, "As I bear with you part of the injury offered, so I desire that you would take part with me of the merit of the pardon I shall grant him for the same." He was succeeded by his son, Abu Ali Al Mansûr, then only eleven years old, having been born at Al Kabirah, in the former Rabi, and the year 375; who was proclaimed Khalif on Tuesday, the 28th of Ramadân, the present year. But, during Al Mansûr's minority, Al Aziz, before his death, appointed Arjûn, one of his white eunuchs, in whose capacity and fidelity to his son he could absolutely confide, to take the government of all his extensive dominions upon him <sup>c</sup>.

Other eminent persons die,
before the close of the present

THIS year, likewise died Abu'l Dawd Ebn Al Mosayyeb, prince of the Okailite Arabs, and Emîr of Al Mawfel, who was succeeded by his brother, Al Mokalled; as did also Al Mansûr, or Mansûr, Ebn Yusef Belkin Ebn Zeir Al Sanbâji, Emîr of Libya, a generous, valiant, and magnanimous prince, whose son Badis presided over the people he had governed, after his death. In the latter Jemâda, Abu Tâleb Mohammed Ebn Ali Ebn Athbiyah, who was born in Fârs, and lived a considerable part of his time at Mecca, departed this life, at Baghdâd. He was the author of an excellent book, which bore the title of the nourishment of hearts. Whilst he wrote this piece, he is reported to have had no other sustenance than the roots of the papyrus, a flaggy shrub, of whose leaves a sort of paper was made, growing in the marshes and standing waters of the Nile. He devoted himself intirely to the service of God. However, whilst he was preaching one of his sermons at Baghdâd, he was

- a so far transported by the fervour of his discourse, that he came out with some blasphemous effusions, in the highest degree shocking to pious ears; upon which, he was immediately silenced, and not suffered to preach afterwards in any of the mosques of that city. He was probably one of the Sûffis, who pretended to a superior degree of sanctity, were puffed up with spiritual pride, depreciated every branch of literature then in vogue amongst the Arabs, and absolutely excluded reason from all concern with matters of religion. In which they are imitated by some ignorant and opinionated enthusiasts of the present age, who nearly resemble them in all the above-mentioned particulars; and, by similar practices, as well as their absurd tenets, expose our most holy faith to the contempt of unbelievers, and thereby contribute more to the growth and propagation of infidelity than perhaps any other set of
- b men in the Christian world <sup>d</sup>.

WE are informed by Al Kâdi Shababo'ddîn Ebn Abildâm Al Hamawî, that, soon after Al What happened in Sicily; this year. Azîz's death, the Sicilian Moslems were governed by two persons, who were members of the same family; viz. Al Hasan Ebn Ammâr, the Fâtemite Kbalîf's Wazîr, and Yusef Ebn Abd'allah, who had acted amongst those Moslems several years in the capacity of Emîr. The same author likewise relates, that the latter of these great men lost the use of his left side, by a stroke of the palsy, the present year; and that, upon this unexpected event, Yusef Ebn Abd'allah appointed his son, Jaasar, to occupy the sublime post he had filled. To which he adds, that Jaasar was confirmed in the possession of that post by the Kbalîf of Egypt, who dignified him with a new title, on this occasion; and that he continued therein till the c year of the Hejra 409, when he was deposed, and his brother Abmed appointed to preside over the Sicilian Moslems in his room <sup>e</sup>.

IN the 387th year of the Hejra, which commenced Jan. 14th, 997, Badis Ebn Mansûr The beginning of the dynasty of the Hamedites in Africa. Ebn Yusef Ebn Zeir Al Sanbâjî, the Emîr of Libya, sent his uncle, Hammad, Hamed, or, as the present African Arabs pronounce it, Hamet, the son of Yusef Ebn Zeir Al Sanbâjî, to preside over the city of Asbir, the Assurus, or Assuras, probably of the antients, with the district appertaining to it. Hamed, or Hamet, who took possession of the prefecture assigned him, either in the month of Safar, or that of the former Rabî, having amassed vast treasures, and greatly extended his frontiers, by the addition of several of the neighbouring districts, afterwards set up for himself, and renounced his allegiance to Badis Ebn Mansûr, his nephew.

- d This defection occasioned an intestine war in that part of Africa, of which our readers will meet with an account in the sequel of this history. As Hamed's power and grandeur commenced, when he entered upon the government of Asbir, the beginning of the dynasty of the Hammadites, or Hamedites, in the provinces of Bajâyah, or Bûjiab, of which we shall speak hereafter, is placed by Abu'lfeda in the present year. Dr. Shaw relates, that the modern name of Asbir, or Assurus, is Kisser; and that, at this time, only the ruins of it are to be seen. He likewise observes, that these ruins are three leagues to the S. W. of Iouseph, or Iûsef, a town which probably derived its name from Yusef Belkin Ebn Zier Al Sanbâjî himself; who, as well as his son Hamed, made a very considerable figure in this part of Africa. It may not be improper to remark, that Badis Ebn Mansûr, though he arrogated to himself the sovereignty of the African provinces he governed, was considered only
- e as a viceroy, or at most as a tributary and dependent prince, by Abu Ali Mansûr, the Fâtemite Kbalîf of Egypt; who assumed the title of Al Hâkem Beamrî'llah, after he had ascended the Egyptian throne <sup>f</sup>.

IT appears from Al Makîn, that Fânûs Ebn Washmakîn, or Wasmakîn, this year, possessed Kâbûs Ebn himself of the provinces of Jorjân and Tabrestân; but by what means he became master of Washmakîn such extensive territories, we have not been told by that author. This Fânûs, who is called Kâbûs in the Leyden MS. of Abu'lfeda's Chronicon, as we learn from M. Reiske, was expelled possessed himself of Jorjân and Tabrestân. from the countries he at this time recovered, in the year of the Hejra 371. As the Fa and stân.

- f the Kîf, or the F and K, are represented by one character, rendered capable of exhibiting two different powers by its different diacritical points; and as the same thing may be affirmed of the Ba and the Nûn, or B and N, to omit other elements in that alphabet to which these letters belong; it is no wonder Washmakîn's son should be named Kâbûs in the Leyden MS. above-mentioned, and Fânûs in Erpenius's MS. of Al Makîn. However, as the latter of these manuscripts has been extremely corrupted, especially in the proper names; and as the reading in the former of them is supported by Dr. Pocock's manuscripts of Abu'l Faraj; our learned and intelligent readers will be inclined to believe, that Kâbûs was really the name of the prince we have been speaking of here <sup>g</sup>.

Fakhro'd-
dawla dies,
and is succeeded by his son.

IN the month of Shawâl, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, or the 10th of Shaabân, according to Al Makîn, Fakhro'ddawla Ebn Rucno'ddawla Ebn Bûiya departed this life, at the castle of Tabarak; and, immediately after his death, the grandees of Al Ray, and the territory belonging to it, elected his son, Abu Tâleb Rostam Majdo'ddawla Ebn Fakhro'ddawla Ebn Rucno'ddawla Ebn Bûiya, then only four years old, to succeed him. But the provinces of Jorjân and Tabrestân, which Fakhro'ddawla likewise governed, were seized by Kâbûs Ebn Washmakîn, who had formerly presided over them, as has been already observed. The Khalîf, Al Kâder Bîllah, confirmed the election of the noblesse of Al Ray, sent Rostam an imperial robe from Baghdâd, and gave him the title, or surname, of Majdo'ddawla, which he ever afterwards retained. The young prince being incapable of taking upon himself the government of his dominions, on account of his tender age, his mother Seyda placed herself at the head of the administration, at the desire of the grandees, and with the approbation of the Khalîf of Baghdâd <sup>a</sup>.

Sabektekin
likewise dies,
year;

THIS year, died also the famous Sabektekin, of whom we have already had occasion to speak. During the latter part of his life, he resided at Balkh; but having long laboured under a chronical distemper, of which he could not be cured, he thought fit, in order to try whether a change of air would not relieve him, to undertake a journey to Gazna. But as he was very weak when he left Balkh, he died upon the road, in the month of Shaabân, and was carried to Gazna, where his remains were interred. He was a prince of great probity and justice, and governed his subjects with uncommon prudence, equity, and moderation, almost twenty years. A little before his death, he nominated his younger son, Ismael Ebn Sabektekin, to succeed him. Ismael was scarce settled on the throne, when he received a letter from Mahmûd, his elder brother; who therein acquainted him, that as his father could have no other reason for excluding him from the succession, which by right of primogeniture apparently belonged to him, than because he was at a great distance from him when his end approached, so he insisted upon his ceding to him the territories that had been ravished from him, and the government of which he (Ismael) had so unjustly usurped. But Ismael taking no notice of this letter, Mahmûd, who was then at Nisâbûr, raised a powerful army, and advanced into the neighbourhood of Gazna, in order to dethrone his brother; who, being terrified at his approach, and overthrown in a general action by him, found himself obliged to retire into the castle of Gazna, and at last to submit to the victor upon such terms as he was pleased to prescribe. In fine, about seven months after Sabektekin's death, if Abu'lfeda may be credited, Mahmûd mounted his father's throne; though he treated Ismael with uncommon marks of distinction and esteem. Notwithstanding which, according to that historian, Mahmûd confined his brother to a private station; though the contrary notion, it must be owned, seems to have been espoused by Abu'l Faraj <sup>b</sup>.

as does also Nûh Al Man-
sûr Al Sam-mâni, at Bokhâra;

THE same year, in the month of Rajeb, Nûh Ebn Mansûr Al Sammâni, the lord, or Emîr, of Khorasân and Marwarâ'lnabr, and the seventh prince of the Sammânian dynasty, departed this life, at Bokhâra. His title, as we are informed by Abu'lfeda, was Al Emîr Al Râdi, that is, the accepted, agreeable, or well-beloved prince. His son, Abu'l Hâreth Mansûr Ebn Nûh, took upon himself the government of Khorasân and Marwarâ'lnabr, after his decease <sup>c</sup>.

and Abu'l
jâni.

THIS year, likewise died Abu'l Wafa Mohammed Ebn Mohammed Al Mohandes, or the geometer, Al Bûzjâni, who was born in the month of Ramadân, and of the year of the Hejra 328. He was one of the best geometers of the age in which he lived, and received the surname of Al Bûzjâni from Bûzjân, the place of his nativity, a town of Khorasân, situated between Nisâbûr and Herât. M. D'Herbelot calls him Mohammed Ebn Yakya, and makes him to have been a native of Nisâbûr. He also relates, that this Mohammed, whom he styles a famous mathematician, lived in the year of the Hejra 348, composed an Almagest, probably in imitation of the excellent piece of Ptolemy that bears this title, and translated into Arabic, as well as wrote a commentary upon, Diophantus <sup>d</sup>.

AL HOSEIN EBN IBRAHIM EBN AL HOSEIN, descended from Solimân Ebn Zulac Al Mîsri, or Mesri, a person extremely well versed in history, paid also the common debt to nature, in the year we are now upon. He wrote a book, intituled, Kethbat Mesri, concerning the nomes of Egypt, and the streets of the city of Mesri; as likewise another, upon the Kâdis of Egypt, and several others, of which we have not time at present to give our readers even a general and concise account <sup>e</sup>.

- a ABU AHMED AL HASAN EBN ABD'ALLAH EBN SA'ID AL ASCARI, a man of vast erudition, who published many excellent pieces upon the genius and foundation of the Arabic tongue, its peculiar phrases and manner of expression, as well as the proverbs in vogue amongst the Arabs, likewise departed this life, the present year. He was denominated Al Ascari from Ascar Macrûm, a city of Khûzestân, in the territory of Abwâz, about sixteen parasangs from Tuster, the capital of the province, where he was born, in the year of the Hejra 293. He was the author of the Kitâb Al Mant'hakî, or a system of logic; the Kitâb Al Zawajeri; the Kitâb Al Mokhtalafî wa'l Mutalafî, i. e. a treatise upon conjuncts and disparates, or those things which will and will not cohere; and the Kitâb Al Hocmî wa'l Amtshali, or a collection of wise sayings and proverbs; besides others, which we cannot at this time so much as touch upon. He received his education from the famous Abu Becr Ebn Doreid, who was held in universal esteem<sup>a</sup>.

- b BEFORE the close of this year, Mûmîn Ebn Mohammed, the lord, or sovereign, of Khowârazm, also died, according to Abu'l Faraj. This Mûmîn was the first prince, or king, of Khowârazm, mentioned in the Moslem history as independent of the Khalîf; though probably some one of the Khalîf's governors of that province had, before his time, set up there for himself. The country seems to have been lost to the Khalîf, at least for a considerable number of years, before Mûmîn expired; his son Ali, if we will believe the aforesaid author, succeeding him, by a sort of hereditary right, and the crown being then consequently settled in his family. We must not forget to remind our readers, that Khowârazm was reduced to the obedience of the Khalîf Yezîd Ebn Mcâwiyah, by a body of Arab troops, under the command of Selim Ebn Ziyâd, the governor of Khorasân, as early as the 61st year of the Moslem æra, according to Al Makîn<sup>c</sup>.

- d THE next year, being the 388th of the Hejra, beginning Jan. 3d, 998, Samsâmô'ddawla Abu Câlijâr Ebn Adado'ddawla was killed at Abwâz, in an action that happened between him and Abu'l Kasem, the son of Azzo'ddawla, who had been put to death by Adado'ddawla, Samsâmô'ddawla's father; of which tragical event the following particulars have been handed down to us by Al Makîn. After Samsâmô'ddawla was released out of prison, several of the fortresses of Deylam were put into his hands; and Abu Nasr, one of Fîrûz's relations, and Abu'l Kasem, Azzo'ddawla's son, who had been imprisoned with him, having found means to corrupt the jailor with a sum of money, had likewise their liberty given them. They were no sooner released, than they began to raise forces, and, in a short time, assembled a very considerable number of troops. What became of Abu Nasr, we have not been told by our author; but, according to him, Abu'l Kasem marched to Arjân, a city in the province of Fârs, then subject to Samsâmô'ddawla, which that prince's governor of the place delivered up to him. Samsâmô'ddawla having received advice of what had happened, was struck with terror, and retired with great precipitation to Shîrâz, in order to take refuge in the citadel there; but the governor refusing to admit him, he found himself obliged to retreat with 300 men to Abwâz, where Abu'l Kasem Ebn Azzo'ddawla soon came up with him. They had not long been in sight of each other, before an action ensued; which ended in the defeat of Samsâmô'ddawla, who was himself killed upon the spot. His head being afterwards cut off, and brought to Abu'l Kasem, that prince, upon seeing it, said, "This is a doctrine which your father has taught me;" meaning, that as Adado'ddawla had put to death his father Azzo'ddawla, so he had now served that Emîr's son, Samsâmô'ddawla, in the same manner. With regard to this affair, Abu'l feda has only in general told us, that Samsâmô'ddawla was destroyed by the Deylemites, after he had ruled Persia nine years and eight days; being, at the time of his death, thirty-five years, and seven months, old. This writer likewise observes, from Al Kâdi Shababo'ddîn Ebn Abildâm, or Abu'l Dam, Al Hamawî, so often cited here, that Samsâmô'ddawla was deprived of his sight, by his brother Sbarfo'ddawla's order, before he left the place of his confinement; and consequently before the people of Deylam and Fârs thought fit to recognize his authority. The Persian historians, followed by M. D'Herbelot, relate this event in a different manner; but as we are now writing the history of the Arabs, our readers will expect that we should adhere to the Arab writers in this particular. However, we shall hereafter insert the other relation in a place to which it will more properly belong<sup>e</sup>.

f THIS year, died Mohammed Ebn Al Hossein Ebn Al Modbaffer Al Hatemi, a person who had a very extensive knowledge in history, and who was extremely well versed in every branch of polite literature. He derived the surname of Al Hatemi from Hatem, one of his ancestors, who had made a very considerable figure. He wrote a piece, intitled, Al Resalet Al Hatemiyah, in which he pretends to have detected the plagiarism of the famous Al Mota-

Yusef, the Emir of Sicily, is rendered incapable of government by a paralytic
disorder;

BEFORE we conclude our detail of the principal transactions of the present year, it may not be improper to observe, that, before the close of it, Yusef Ebn Abd'allah, the Emir of Sicily, had a stroke of the palsy, according to Abu'lfeda, which deprived him of the use of his left side. This event has, however, been placed by Al Kâdi Shababo'ddîn Ebn Abildam Al Hamawi in the year of the Hejra 386, as we have already remarked. The former of these writers also relates, that Al Hâkem, the Fâtemite Khalif of Egypt, soon after his accession, made Al Hasan Ebn Annâr, one of Yusef's relations, his Wazîr; whence it came to pass, that two persons of the same family bore the principal sway at that time in the Fâtemite empire, Al Hasan Ebn Annâr at the Khalif's court, and Yusef Ebn Abd'allah in Sicily. b
If this last article was extracted from Shababo'ddîn Ebn Abildam Al Hamawi, as from one of the preceding paragraphs there is perhaps sufficient reason to believe, the passage we have inserted above from that author has not been rightly translated by Debelius; who makes him therein to assert, that both Al Hasan, Al Hâkem's Wazîr, and Al Emir Yusef, his relation, governed the Sicilian Moslems, in particular, at least during part of the year of the Hejra 386; whereas, upon the foregoing supposition, he must have affirmed, that Al Hasan, the Wazîr, and Yusef, the Emir, of Sicily, had the sole management and direction of all public affairs in the Khalifat of Egypt, soon after Al Azîz's death, which happened in that year. However, we submit what is here advanced, as well as all other points of a dubious nature, to the judgment of our learned and intelligent readers <sup>c</sup>.

and is succeeded by his son
Jaafar Ebn
Yusef Ebn
Abd'allah.

YUSEF EBN ABD'ALLAH, finding himself incapable of acting at the head of the administration in Sicily, appointed his son, Jaafar, to preside over the Moslems of that island; and, by his great influence at the Egyptian court, obtained of the Fâtemite Khalif an instrument, drawn up in form, for that purpose, confirming him in the possession of the sublime post in which he had already been placed. This we learn from Abu'lfeda, in the piece so often referred to here; though Al Kâdi Shababo'ddîn has ranked this event amongst the principal transactions of the year 386. Nor was Al Hâkem, the Khalif of Egypt, satisfied with barely sending Jaafar, at his father's request, the aforesaid instrument to Sicily: he likewise dignified him, in order to procure him the greater respect from the people he was to govern, with the title, or surname, of Tajo'ddawla, or the crown of the court. But this Emir afterwards discovered himself, by his enormous cruelty and most iniquitous administration, to be by no means worthy of the high honour that had been done him; the Sicilian Moslems having deposed him, for his oppressive and tyrannical conduct, and substituted Ahmed, another of Yusef's sons, in his room, either in the 409th or 410th year of the Moslem æra, as will hereafter more clearly appear <sup>d</sup>.

The 389th
year of the Hejra proves fatal to the Sammânian
dynasty settled in Khorasân and Mawarâ-
râ'nahr.

THE following year, being the 389th of the Hejra, commencing Dec. 23d, 998, proved fatal to the Sammânian dynasty, settled in Khorasân and Mawarâ'nahr. For the commanders of the forces there, together with Bekturun and Fayek, or Baktuzun and Faëkb, conspired against Abu'l Hâreth Mansûr Ebn Nûb, the sovereign of those countries, drove him from the throne, and, by Baktuzun's order, with a red-hot iron put out his eyes, after he had reigned, according to the Persian Chronicon, cited above, one year and seven months. Abu'lfeda observes, that Baktuzun, whom he calls Bekturun, was guilty of the blackest perfidy and ingratitude on this occasion; as he had been loaded with favours by, and owed his advancement to, the princes of the Sammânian family. After the conspirators had, in so cruel a manner, deprived Mansûr Ebn Nûb of his regal authority, they appointed Abû'alimâlec Ebn Nûb, his brother, to succeed him. Mirkbond, or rather Teixeira, in the place referred to here, gives Mansûr Ebn Nûb the name, or rather prænomen, of Abu'lbares; which is nothing but a corruption of Abu'l Hâreth, as he is denominated in the Leyden MS. of Abu'lfeda's Chronicon, according to M. Reiske, Mabmûd Ebn Sabektckin, or, as he is more frequently called, Mabmûd Gazni, having received advice of what had happened to Abu'l Hâreth Mansûr Ebn Nûb, first expostulated with Baktuzun and Faëkb, the principal of the conspirators, for their cruelty and ingratitude to that prince, by way of letter, and afterwards marched with an army against them. Those traitors, being informed of his approach, drew out all their forces, and gave him battle; but, after a sharp and bloody engagement, they were overthrown with very great slaughter, and obliged to fly to the extremity of Khorasân. This victory put Mabmûd in possession of all that province; so that Baktuzun and Faëkb found themselves obliged intirely to abandon Khorasân, and retire with the utmost precipitation to Bokhâra. Here, however, for some time they remained; and, as they carried Abû'alimâlec with them, they began to raise forces in that prince's name. But, before they could assemble <sup>e</sup>

a a sufficient body of troops, in order to dispute a second time with Mahmūd the possession of Khorasān, Faëkb died at Bokhāra; which proved a great mortification to the rebels, and even intirely frustrated their designs. We must not forget to remark, that Mahmūd is styled Al Sābeb Al Hind, the prince of India, and has the title, or surname, of Tamīno'ddawla, or the right hand of the court, given him by Mirkhond, Al Makīn, Abu'lfeda, and Abu'l Faraj<sup>1</sup>.

In the mean time, Ilek Khān, taking advantage of these troubles, advanced at the head of a powerful army to Bokhāra, under the pretext of assisting Abd'almālek, then residing in that city. Baktuzun, and the other commanders, who had taken the young king under their protection, giving credit to his words, went to meet him, when he was at a small distance from the town; but, in open violation of his promise, the Khān ordered them all to be seized, and put under arrest. After which, he entered Bokhāra, the 10th of Dbu'lkaada, the present year, secured the persons both of Abd'almālek Ebn Nūh, and his predecessor, Abu'l Hāreth Mansūr Ebn Nūh, and sent them to prison, where they remained to the time of their death. Thus ended the dynasty of the Sammānians, whose territories, according to Ebn Shohnah, comprehended Khorasān, Bokhāra, and a considerable part of Persia. The princes that composed this dynasty have been represented both by that author and Abu'lfeda as good men, and lovers of justice. Some of the eastern writers relate, that Abd'almālek, in a fright, hid himself, with an intent to make his escape; but that Ilek Khān having taken Bokhāra, he was found, and by that prince sent to Uškand, or Dizghend, a city of Turkestan, probably the same with Urkaud, or Awrcand, which has been placed in Mawarā'n-nabr by Nassir Al Tūfi and Ulugh Beik, where he died in confinement. Both Abu'lfeda and Ebn Shohnah make the Sammānian dynasty to have commenced in the year of the Hejra 261. It appears from some of the oriental historians, followed by M. D'Herbelot, that Ilek Khān had solemnly engaged to act with all his forces against Mahmūd Gazni, at this time in possession of Khorasān; but that, instead of marching into that country, he took the route of Bokhāra, and treated Abd'almālek Ebn Nūh Al Sammāni, as well as Abu'l Hāreth Mansūr, his unfortunate brother, in the manner related here<sup>2</sup>.

In the 390th year of the Hejra, which began Dec. 13th, 999, Abu Ibrahim Montaser, or The principal Montaser, Ebn Nūh, who had been confined, with Abd'almālek Ebn Nūh Abu'l Hāreth Mansūr transactions of Ebn Nūh, and Abu Yakūb Ebn Nūh, his brothers, two uncles, and others of the royal family, the year 390. by Ilek Khān, escaped out of prison, by the assistance of a female slave, and made the best of his way to Khowārazm. Here, crouds resorting to him, he soon raised a numerous army; which he sent, under the command of Arslān Balu, to Bokhāra. This brought on a general action between his forces and those of Ilek Khān, which ended in the defeat of the latter. Ilek Khān's general, Jaafar Takīn, was taken prisoner in this action; but what afterwards became of him we have not been told. After this victory, Arslān Balu routed another of Ilek's armies, commanded by Takīn Khān, the governor of Samarkand; upon which, Abu Ibrahim Montaser returned to Bokhāra. But Ilek Khān marching with a most formidable army against him, both he and Arslān Balu passed the Jibūn, and fled to Nisābūr, where they remained till the commencement of the following year. We must not forget to remark, that Abu'l Hosein Ahmed Ebn Fares Ebn Zacarīā Al Rāzī, an Arab philologer of good repute, who resided for the most part at Hamadān, and wrote a vast number of books, most of which were not a little esteemed in the Moslem world, died before the close of the year we are now upon. The principal of his works is the Arabic dictionary, intituled, Kitāb Al Mojmel fi'l Logati; though another of his pieces, that bears the title of Al Masayel Al Fikhiyato, containing an hundred questions drawn from the most celebrated masters of jurisprudence, was highly esteemed by Al Badi Al Hamadāni, one of his scholars. Some authors, however, place his death in the year of the Hejra 375<sup>3</sup>.

THE 391st year of the Hejra, commencing Dec. 1st, 1000, was rendered remarkable by the deaths of several great men. Abu'l Fadāyel Ebn Saifo'ddawla Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Hamdān, Several great men die, in the year of the Hejra 391. the prince of Aleppo, died about the middle of Safar. He was poisoned, as some have imagined, by a girl that had frequent access to him; but others will have it, that Lūlū, his prime minister, who governed the territory of Aleppo with an absolute sway, was the author of his death. Abu'l Fadāyel reigned nine years and some months; leaving behind him two sons, Abu'l Hasan Ali and Abu'l Ma'ālī Sharif, who succeeded him in the sovereignty of Aleppo. But they were both soon expelled from thence by Lūlū Al Kharāji; who had placed himself and his son, Mansūr, at the head of the administration. The two young princes, after their expulsion from Aleppo, fled into Egypt; but what fate they met with in that country, or in what part of it they resided, we have not been told. About the same time, Abu Naṣr Ebn Azzo'ddawla was assassinated by one of his domestics, in the province of Kermān, after he had been engaged with Bahao'ddawla, the Sāheb, or lord, of Irāk, in a long and bloody war. The assassin had no sooner dispatched him, than he cut off his head, and brought it to Mowaffek, Bahao'ddawla's general; upon which, all the territories that had been possessed by Abu Naṣr fell into the victor's hands. Hosaino'ddawla Al Mokalled Ebn Al Mosayyeb, the second of the Okailite Emirs of Al Mawṣel, was likewise murdered, this year, at Al Anbār, by some of his Turkish slaves. His son, Karwāsh, mounted the throne of Al Mawṣel, after his father's violent death; but we have not been favoured with many remarkable particulars relating to him by the eastern writers. Abu Abd'allah Al Hosein Ebn Al Hejāj, a poet celebrated for his inimitable drollery, also departed this life, at Al Nil, a town seated upon the Euphrates, between Baghdād and Cūfa, before the close of the present year. Al Nil, according to Abu'lfeda, was built by the famous Al Hejāj; who gave it the name it afterwards retained, because he formed there a river out of the Euphrates, adorned with towns and villages on both its banks, in the same manner as the Nile. Al Hosein Ebn Al Hejāj, notwithstanding he sometimes affected to act the part of a buffoon, was trusted, if we will believe the last-mentioned author, with a public office at Baghdād*.

makes an irruption into Mawarā'l-
nahr.

EITHER this or the following year, Abu Ibrahim Montefer, called Ibrahim by M. D'Herbelot, the only surviving prince of the Sammānian family that was in a condition to take the field, seems to have made an irruption with a powerful army into Mawarā'nahr. This expedition he was enabled to undertake, by the assistance of the Turkmāns; who, with a considerable body, reinforced his troops. However, he was met by Ilek Khān, at the head of all his forces; who incamped at a small distance from him. The Turkmāns, finding the enemy not in the least apprehensive of such a visit, fell upon Ilek's camp, by favour of the night, forced it, put a great number of his men to the sword, and obliged the rest to betake themselves to a precipitate flight. After which, they returned to their hords, with the better part of the booty they had acquired. Abu Ibrahim, perceiving himself deserted by the flower of his troops, passed the Jihān, which was then frozen, upon the ice. The Turkmāns had no sooner joined their hords, than they began to repent that they had not brought away with them all the plunder that had fallen into their hands. They, therefore, in consequence of a resolution that had been taken, advanced to the Jihān, in order to pursue Abu Ibrahim, who had carried off the remainder of the spoil; but finding the river thawed, they were incapable of executing their design. About this time, according to some writers, Mahmūd Gazni, after he had concluded a treaty of peace with him, married the daughter of Ilek Khān†.

Mahmūd
Gazni penetrates into Indostān.

THE next year, being the 392d of the Hejra, beginning November 20, 1001, Mahmūd Gazni (R), after he had secured the repose of his own dominions, penetrated into Indostān, called by the Arabs Hind, took Gebal one of the most powerful kings of that vast region, twice prisoner, and as often released him. This repeated misfortune, according to the custom of the country, rendered him incapable of government. He was therefore obliged, in conformity to the usual practice in all similar cases, to put the crown upon the head of his son, and to throw himself into the flames, where he immediately expired. After which, Mahmūd returned to Gazni, with all the valuable spoil, and the immense riches, he had acquired in this successful expedition‡.

Montefer
gains some advantages over his enemies,
year.

IT appears probable from Mirkhond, as we find him translated by Teixeira, that Abu Ibrahim Montefer gained some advantages over his enemies, and particularly over the forces of Ilek Khān, the present year. However, it may not be improper to observe, that neither the year of these transactions, nor that of the others in which Montefer was concerned, ranked by us amongst those that happened in the 391st year of the Moslem æra, can with precision be ascertained§.

Other events
that happened,
this year.

THIS year, a bloody war was likewise carried on between Karwāsh Ebn Al Mokalled Ebn Al Mosayyeb, the Okailite Emir of Al Mawṣel, and Bahao'ddawla, the lord of Irāk; in which

(R) M. D'Herbelot informs us, from some of the oriental writers, that Mahmūd Gazni found immense treasures in India, after he had conquered that most extensive tract, planted there the Mohammedan faith, and made himself master of Khorvārazm. He also relates, from the same authors, that Ilek Khān, king of the oriental Turks, and of all the country beyond the Jihān, attacked Soltān Mahmūd, in the year of the Hejra 392: but that he was defeated by the Soltān near the city of Balkh, in Khorāsān, and obliged to repass the Jihān, which was the natural boundary betwixt their respective states (26).

a the former of those princes at first proved victorious, but was afterwards defeated in his turn. About the same time, Mohammed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Jaafar, a Fakib of the sect of Al Shâfeî, generally going under the appellation of Ebn Al Dakkak, or the son of the miller, departed this life. He was the author of the book, intituled, Al Oful, and written upon the foundations and principal heads of the Mohammedan faith <sup>b</sup>.

THE following year, being the 393d of the Hejra, commencing Nov. 10th, 1002, Mah- Mahmûd marched with an army into Sejstân, in order to reduce to reason Khalaf Ebn Ahmed, <sup>Gazni reduces to reason Kha-</sup> the governor of that province; who had set up for himself, and fortified the castle of That, <sup>laf Ebn Ah-</sup> as though he had an intention to defend it against any power that might attempt to disturb him therein. But being informed of Mahmûd's approach, he was so terrified, that he went <sup>med, the go-</sup> out to meet him, delivered the keys of the fortress into his hands, and acknowledged him <sup>vernor of Se-</sup> for his Soltân. This title, which, according to some of the writers followed by M. D'Her-

b belot, had never before been applied to any Moslem prince, so pleased Mahmûd, that he ever afterwards retained it, and did not only forgive Khalaf his defection, but likewise re-established him in his government. Notwithstanding which, making an ill use of his master's clemency, he rebelled a second time, and sent for assistance to Ilek Khân. This so irritated the Soltân, that he moved at the head of a large body of troops, with the utmost celerity, against him, surprized him, and sent him prisoner to a castle in Jorjân; where, as some authors relate, he remained in confinement to the time of his death. It appears from Abu'l-feda, that this Khalaf acquired great reputation by the learning he was master of, and published a voluminous commentary upon the Korân <sup>c</sup>.

c MIRKHOND, or rather Teixeira, his translator, seems to intimate, that, about this time, Montefer first defeated Abu Jaafar, a highwayman, who had possessed himself of Merû in <sup>takes Bokhâra;</sup> Khorasân, and afterwards Abu Nasr, the governor of that province; but that, notwithstanding these victories, he found himself obliged to repass the Jibûn, with his followers. After this, a brisk action happened between him and the governor of Bokhâra, wherein he lost the greatest part of his men; though, with the rest, he attacked that city by night, and took it. The author, however, now in view, has not with any certainty determined whether these events are to be placed in this or the following year <sup>d</sup>.

d IN the 393d year of the Hejra, Abu Amer Mohammed, who had governed Andalusia, under Abu Amer the title, or surname, of Al Mansûr, twenty-seven years, departed this life. He was prime Mohammed, minister to Al Mowayyad, or Al Mowayyed, of the house of Ommiyah, who had assumed the <sup>the prime mi-</sup> title of Khalif, and presided over the Moslems of Spain. That monarch was, however, only <sup>nister of the</sup> a nominal prince; all the power being in reality exercised by Al Mansûr, who ruled with <sup>Khalif of An-</sup> an unlimited sway. Abu Amer was succeeded by his son, Abu Merwân Abd'almâlec, who occupied the post of prime minister, took the title of Al Modhaffêr, i. e. the conqueror, or the victorious, and followed his father's example, in making irruptions into the Christian territories, as well as in every other point of his conduct. He remained in his illustrious employment about seven years, and died in the 400th year of the Moslem æra. After him, came Abd'alrahmân Ebn Al Mansûr, his brother, who was placed at the head of the admini- stration, under the title of Al Nasr, i. e. the avenger, helper, or defender. As he was incapa- ble of government, and addicted to all kinds of debauchery, he did not hold the reins of the Moslem empire in Spain much above four months. Whilst he sat at the helm, Moham- med Ebn Heshâm, who styled himself Al Mohdi, or the director, one of the Khalif's relations, deposed Al Mowayyad, put Abd'alrahmân to death, and then ordered his body to be affixed to a gibbet, which he had caused to be erected for that purpose. This is the account of Abd'alrahmân Ebn Al Mansûr's tragical exit, handed down to us by Abu'l-feda; tho' Roderic of Toledo seems to intimate, that he was destroyed by the people of Corduba, who had suffered so much from the wickedness and iniquity of his administration, as has been already observed. We must not forget to remark, that several large gangs of robbers, grown formidable by their numbers, committed great disorders, this year, in the city of Baghdâd <sup>e</sup>.

f AL HAKEM, the Fatemite Khalif of Egypt and Syria, appointed Abu Mohammed Al Afwad, or the black, to preside over the people of Damascus, before the close of the present <sup>Other events that happened, this year.</sup> year. Abu Mohammed, soon after his arrival at that capital, began to harass and oppress the Sonnites there in such a manner as gave great offence to many of the Damascenes. A Magre- bian soldier, in particular, of that sect he ordered to be publicly whipt; the crier proclaiming at the same time, that this would henceforth be the reward of those who paid any regard to the memory of Abu Becr and Omar. After which, the Magrebian was banished the city. Othmân Ebn Yabya, a grammarian of Al Mawfel, who wrote several pieces of good repute, Al Kâdi Ali Ebn Abd'alaziz Al Jorjâni, an Imâm that excelled in various branches

This sublimity of Al Salami's poetical compositions has been taken notice of by Abu'lfeda, who has preserved a specimen of them, in the piece so often referred to here <sup>f</sup>.

Ilek Khán,

ed by him.

In the 394th year of the Hejra, beginning October 30th, 1003, Ilek Khán, having received advice, that Monteser had taken the city of Bokhára, began his march for the district belonging to it; but was met by Monteser in the territory of Samarkand, and overthrown with very great slaughter. As the latter of these princes was not a little animated by the success he had met with, some time before, having defeated Abu Jaasar, then upon his march from Merú, and Abu Nafr, two Moslem commanders, who pretended to oppose him; he behaved with unusual bravery on this occasion, forced Ilek Khán's camp, and possessed himself of all his baggage and military chest. But one of Monteser's generals afterwards going over to the enemy with 4000 men, and Ilek Khán being reinforced with a strong body of troops; the face of affairs received a sudden and total alteration in that part of the world. For Monteser, being thus abandoned by one of his principal officers, and deserted by his auxiliaries, was not able to make head against Ilek Khán; and therefore betook himself to a precipitate flight. What became of him afterwards, we shall see in our relation of the transactions of the following year <sup>g</sup>.

Ebn Wafel
seizes upon Al Batíba.

MOHADHDHEBO'DDAWLA, the king, or prince, of Al Batíba, sent an army, under the command of Ebn Wafel, a general on whom he had heaped his favours, and whom he had raised from the lowest state to the post of commander in chief of all his forces, to attack Síráf and Basra, in the year we are now upon. Having reduced both those cities, and enriched himself with the spoils and immense wealth found therein, Ebn Wafel set up for himself, drove his master out of Al Batíba, and obliged him to fly for refuge to Baghdád. But the reception he met with there was such as manifested the blackest ingratitude in Al Káder that any man could be guilty of. For, notwithstanding that poor prince had treated this ungrateful wretch in the most hospitable and generous manner, nay, had in a great measure put his treasures and kingdom itself into his hands, when he was threatened with immediate death by Al Tay', and forced to seek for an asylum in Al Batíba; Al Káder, at this time, expelled him the city of Baghdád, and drove him, as it were, into the very jaws of destruction. A more flagrant instance of ingratitude than this is perhaps not to be met with in history <sup>h</sup>!

THE same year, Bahao'ddawla conferred upon Al Sharíf Abu Ahmed Al Múfawi, the father of Al Sharíf Al Rádi, the office of Nakib, or chief of Ali's descendants, and followers, in Irák; as also the post of supreme Kádi and Imám, with the title of Dbí'l Manakeb, or a man of most illustrious virtues, in that province. Ebn Shaidan, Bahao'ddawla's principal secretary, having drawn up the proper instruments to be signed by the Khalíf, in order to his being confirmed in the aforesaid employments by the authority of that prince, brought them to the palace. When he appeared with them there, Al Káder signed all those instruments, excepting that only which was to constitute him supreme Kádi and Imám. But to this he refused setting his hand; not thinking it proper that a Shiite should be invested with so great a degree of authority, as such an important post must necessarily give him <sup>i</sup>.

Abu Ibrahim

múd's officers.

THE following year, being the 395th of the Hejra, commencing October 18th, 1004, Abu Ibrahim Monteser, finding it impracticable to pass the Jibún, retired, with a few of his adherents, to Bokhára. Upon his arrival there, the governor promised to assist him; but being closely pursued by Ilek Khán's general, to whom most of his men had gone over in disgust, he abandoned that city, and fled into Khorasán. He had not been long in that province, when Ebn Bek, one of Makmúd Gazni's commanders there, sent an officer, called Maruyh, in quest of him; who took him out of a poor house, or cottage, where he lay concealed, which he forced in the night, and put him to death. This cruelty so incensed Mahmúd Gazni, though an enemy, that he ordered Maruyh to be executed for it. In consequence of which, according to Mirkbond, he expired in exquisite torture, under the executioner's hands. After the death of Monteser, we hear no more of the Sammánian family in the east; that poor prince, who, after he had been hunted from province to province for six years, met with the above-mentioned fate, being the last of the Sammánian dynasty, (which some authors make to end in Núb Ebn Mansúr, who died in the year of the Hejra 387) mentioned by the oriental writers. Upon the ruins of this dynasty was erected that of Gazni; the foundations of which had been laid by Sabektekin, Mahmúd Yamíno'ddawla's a father. Of the Gazni monarchy, which sprung up after Nâb Ebn Mansûr's decease, our readers will meet with a full and ample account in a future part of this work, to which it will more properly belong<sup>k</sup>.

THIS year, Abu'l Abbâs Ebn Wâsil being gone to Basra, the people of Al Batîbâ Mohadh-dhebo'ddawla renounced their allegiance to him; upon which, Babao'ddawla sent Amîd Al Joyûshi, his is reinstated in the govern-ment of Al governor of Irâk, with an army, to support them in their revolt. Al Joyûshi, having driven Ebn Wâsil's lieutenant out of the territory of Al Batîbâ, in pursuance of the orders he had received, reinstated Mohadbedkbo'ddawla, who had formerly reigned there, in the govern-ment of that country. That prince, upon his arrival amongst them, was received by his subjects with the loudest acclamations, and with all other possible demonstrations of joy.

b He agreed to pay Babao'ddawla an annual tribute of 50,000 dinârs, for the important service he had done him on this occasion<sup>l</sup>.

THE same year, Yamîno'ddawla Mahmûd Ebn Sabektekîn, commonly called Mahmûd Gazni, Mahmûd Gazni reduces the city of Bahadiyah; reduced the city of Bahadiyah, a fortress situated not far from the confines of the kingdom of Moltân, or Miltân. This city was extremely well fortified; and had walls of a prodigious height. The province, or kingdom, of Moltân was properly a part of that vast region called by the Arabs Sind, or Sindia; which was bounded on the north by the province of Kermân, or rather that of Macrân, and the deserts of Sejîstân, and on all other sides by Hind, or India. According to some writers, it was also contiguous to Zâblestân, or Sâblestân, comprehended part of India, and was adorned with a capital of the same name<sup>m</sup>.

c THE next year, being the 396th of the Hejra, beginning OZ. 8th, 1005, Mahmûd Gazni and invades India. entered India on the side of Hebatb and Moltân; which he easily made himself master of, and then advanced at the head of his forces against Bida, or Bidarw, an Indian prince, who had shut himself up in a strong fortress called Câlîjâr, where he hoped to defend himself. However, Mahmûd besieged him there, and at last forced him to submit to such terms of peace as he was pleased to prescribe. The principal of these was, that Bidarw should become tributary to him. In the mean time, Ilek Khân, taking advantage of Soltân Mahmûd's absence, on the Indian expedition, sent Sipashî Takîn and Jaasar Takîn, two of his generals, with two armies, to attack at the same time two different parts of the province of Khorasân. Of which Arslân Jazeb, who commanded for Soltân Mahmûd in Herât, having received advice; he immediately dispatched a courier to his master in India, to inform him that his dominions were upon the point of being invaded by the forces of Ilek Khân. Upon the arrival of this news, Mahmûd began immediately to move towards his own frontiers, and at last, by forced marches, came up with the Turkish generals, who had broke into Khorasân. But, his name being grown terrible by the extensive conquests he had made, they retired at his approach, and, after a feeble resistance, were obliged to abandon the province. Ilek Khân, finding his forces thus shamefully chased by Mahmûd, and forced to repass the Jibûn with ignominy and disgrace, applied to Kader Khân, of Ketau Kotan, or Katay, for succour; the effect of which application will be seen amongst the principal events of the following year<sup>n</sup>.

c THE Nakib, or chief of Ali's descendants, in Irâk, received from Babao'ddawla the title Other events of the present year. of Al Râdi, or Al Sharîf Al Râdi, and his brother that of Al Sharîf Al Mortadi, the present year. They were the sons of Al Sharîf Abu Ahmed, mentioned above. About the same time, Mohammed Ebn Ishak Ebn Mohammed Ebn Yabya Ebn Mandab, denominated sometimes Ebn Mandab, or Ebn Mandab Al Esfabâni, who distinguished himself by his excellent writings, likewise departed this life; but whether he finished his days at Esfabân, where he was born, or some other place in the East, we have not been told<sup>o</sup>.

f IN the 397th year of the Hejra, which commenced Sept. 27th, 1006, Kader Khân joined Mahmûd Ilek Khân with a body of 50,000 horse, collected in Ketau Kotan, Turkestân, and Mawu-râ'nabr. Gazni overthrows Ilek Khân. After this junction, the combined army passed the Jibûn, and presented itself before the city of Balkb. Soltân Mahmûd, finding himself upon the point of being attacked by so formidable an army, had recourse to God, the arbiter of events; to whom he prayed most fervently for his assistance against so great a number of infidels as then appeared in the field. Having thus recommended himself to the divine protection, he mounted his white elephant, and drew up his troops in order of battle. After which, he charged the Turks with great bravery; but, being borne down by numbers, his forces were obliged to give ground. Finding himself then in the most imminent danger, and animated in a manner by despair, Mahmûd rushed into the thickest of the enemy, and, cutting his way through them, came up to Ilek Khân; whom his elephant unhorsed, and tossed up in the air, with his trunk. Not content with this, the angry beast trod under foot the greatest part of the Turks who were fighting round him; which intirely changed the fortune of the day, and wrested the victory out of the enemy's hands. For the Soltân's men resumed their courage at this, returned with fresh vigour to the charge, and made so great a slaughter of the Turks, that only a small number of them, who threw themselves headlong into the Jibûn, and swam over that river, escaped. This bloody battle was fought on a spot of ground, about four parasangs from the city of Balkh, in the year of the Hejra 397. Some authors, however, make it to have happened about ten years later; though we are inclined to follow Mirkhond, who places it in the year we are now upon. The same year, Mahmûd returned into India, and chastised one of the Indian Rajahs for renouncing Islamism; which he had before embraced, in order to oblige him <sup>a</sup>.

Bahao'ddawla <sup>puts Ebn Wafel to death.</sup> THIS year, Bahao'ddawla sent a body of troops to drive Abu'l Abbâs Ebn Wafel, who had been expelled from Al Batîba, in the 395th year of the Moslem æra, from Basra; which they effected with very little loss, and took Ebn Wafel himself prisoner. Bahao'ddawla, having gotten the rebel into his hands, ordered him to be executed at Wâset. After which, his head was cut off, and carried to Bahao'ddawla, who then resided at Abwâz. By whose order, it was fixed upon the point of a spear, and exposed to public view in every street of the city <sup>b</sup>.

A rebellion in Egypt. ABOUT the same time, a person descended from Heshâm Ebn Abd'almâlec, one of the Khalîfs of the house of Ommiyah, took up arms against Al Hâkem, the Fâtemite Khalîf, in Egypt. As this man at first carried water about in bottles, as a common porter, he had the nickname of Abu Racwah, or the father of the bottle, given him. He set up for a reformer, preached to the people, whom he exhorted to forsake their sins, and live pious lives, in the streets, highways, and other publick places, and by his pretended sanctity gained a great number of followers. He first possessed himself of Barka; and afterwards, having overthrown one of the Khalîf's generals that engaged him, reduced to his obedience all the country of Al Sa'id, or the Upper Egypt. By which acquisition of territory, as well as of power, he became so formidable that Al Hâkem found it necessary to employ the forces of the whole Fâtemite empire against him. Having, therefore, raised a powerful army in Egypt, and sent orders to his troops in Syria to advance into the neighbourhood of Mesr; he at last attacked the rebels with so much bravery, that, after a very obstinate and bloody dispute, they were forced to betake themselves to flight. Most of them were cut to pieces in the action, and the rest so dispersed, that not the faintest traces of this rebellion were afterwards to be seen. As for Abu Racwah himself, whose true name was Al Walid, and who had assumed the title of Al Nâyer Beamri'llah, he was taken prisoner, after he had disturbed the publick repose several months, and brought before Al Hâkem; who commanded him to be put to death in his presence. His head was then cut off, and exposed to publick view in all the streets of Mesr; after which, it was, together with the body, affixed to a gibbet, erected for that purpose. We must not forget to remind our readers, that, according to Abu'lfeda, the tract denominated Al Sa'id, or the Upper Egypt, extends from the city of Mesr, or Al Fostât, to Afwân, a place of great antiquity, though at present a poor incon siderable town, upon the borders of Ethiopia <sup>c</sup>.

Soltân Mahmûd penetrates again into India. THE following year, being the 398th year of the Hejra, beginning Sept. 17th, 1007, Yamîno'ddawla Mahmûd Ebn Sabektekîn penetrated again into India, where his arms were attended with extraordinary success. Ilek Khân likewise, after the loss he sustained in the battle fought, last year, near the city of Balkh, retired into Mawarâ'lnabr, where he arrived towards the beginning of the present year. About the same time, Sayda, or Seida, the mother of Majdo'ddawla Ebn Fakbro'ddawla, who governed the territory of Esfakân, and some other neighbouring districts, for her son, placed Abu Jaasar Sbeheriyar, commonly known by the surname, or appellation, of Ebn Cacuyeh, i. e. the uncle's son, at the head of the administration there. Abu Jaasar amassed immense riches, in the sublime post to which he had been advanced. Abu'lfeda gives us to understand, that the word Cacuyeh denotes uncle in the Persic tongue <sup>d</sup>.

Several learned men die, this year. THE same year, died Abd'akwâbed Ebn Nasr, commonly called Al Babaga, a poet of considerable note, Abu'l Fadl Ahmed Ebn Al Hosein, generally denominated Al Badi Al Hamadâni, the admirable citizen of Hamadân, the author of the Al Macamat, and Abu Nasr Ismael Ebn Hamdân, who for the most part went under the name or surname of Al Jawarek. The last of these was a perfect master of the Arabic language, and the author of the lexicon, <sup>e</sup> a intitled, Al Sabîh, the pure, the sincere, as containing in it all the genuine roots, and every uncorrupted word, belonging to the Arabic tongue. It also sometimes bore the title of Sabîh Al Jawarek, which it deduced from the name of the learned man by whom it was composed. Al Jawarek was born at Fârâb, a city of Turkestan, situated, according to Abu'lfeda, on the river Al Shâsh, in the neighbourhood of Balâsâgûn, of which we have already given our readers a full and ample account. This city was likewise named Otrâr. The district, or territory, appertaining to it stretched out itself beyond the Sibûn, the Jaxartes of the antients. Al Jawarek died at Nisâbûr, and is said to have written a more beautiful hand than any other person of the age wherein he lived <sup>c</sup>.

mal Al Khafagi, who had formerly been appointed by Al Hâkem, the Fâtemite Khalîf of Syria and Egypt, the governor of Rababa, was killed. The prefecture of Rababa, after Al Khafagi's dismissal, was conferred upon Sâleb Ebn Mardâs Al Kelâbi, dignified by Abu'lfeda with the title of prince of Aleppo; though he did not attain to the sovereignty of that city, before the year of the Hejra 414. In the month of Dhu'l-hajja, died Lîlû Al Kharâji, who had been intrusted by Saado'ddawla with the government of Aleppo, during the minority of his son; and Mansûr Abunafr, Lîlû's son, who assumed the title, or surname, of Mortadî'o'ddawla, presided over the people of that city, after his father's death. Ali Ebn Abd'alrahmân Ebn Ahmed Ebn Yûnes, or Yûnas, Al Mesri, the author of the Zij Al Hâkemi-yah, or the Hâkemian tables, as they were intitled by Ebn Yûnes himself, likewise departed c this life, the present year. Those tables, however, which are said by Abu'lfeda to make up four whole volumes, sometimes bore the title of Al Zij Ebn Yûnes, the tables of Ebn Yûnes. Some writers relate, that they were constructed by Al Aziz's order, before Al Hâkem's accession to the crown; but what degree of credit is due to those writers, in this point, we shall not at present take upon us to decide <sup>d</sup>.

THE next year, being the 400th of the Hejra, beginning August 25th, 1009, a surpriz- A revolution

ing revolution happened in Andalusia; of which Abu'lfeda, whose authority in this point is of great weight, has handed down to us the following particulars. Mohammed Ebn Heshâm Ebn Abd'aljabbar Ebn Al Nafr, of the house of Ommiyah, depending upon the favour of the people of Corduba, seized upon the person of the Khalîf Al Mowayyad, and immediately d ordered him to be confined, in the latter Jomâda, the preceding year. After which, he caused himself to be proclaimed Khalîf, under the title of Al Mohdi, or the director, and obliged the people of Corduba to take an oath of fidelity to him. But the usurped authority he acquired on this occasion was of very short continuance. For, Solimân Ebn Al Hâkem Ebn Solimân Ebn Al Nafr, having vanquished him in battle, ravished the Khalîfat from him, in the beginning of the month of Shawâl, the present year. However, Al Mohdi, returning with an army to Corduba, expelled from thence his competitor, the 15th of the same month. But, the officers of the army, being displeased with his conduct, soon after deposed him, took Al Mowayyad out of prison, and replaced him upon the Andalusian throne. Al Mowayyad was no sooner reinstated in the government of his dominions, than he come manded Al Mohdi to be brought before him, and put to death in his presence. After which, he made Wadkeb, one of Abu Amer's slaves, his prime minister; though he afterwards, being disgusted at his administration, caused him likewise to be cut off. From this time, the Khalîfat of Andalusia was rent by civil dissensions; the different factions there harassing one another, in the most terrible manner. In the mean time, Solimân, who had lately been driven from Corduba, found means to conciliate the affections of the African Moslems to him, crossed the sea with a powerful army, and returned to that city; which, after having sustained a siege, was carried by assault, and Al Mowayyad dispossessed of the citadel, in the month of Shawâl, and the year of the Hejra 403. The fifteenth of the same month, Solimân compelled the citizens of Corduba to take again the oath of allegiance to f him. He also assumed the title, or surname, of Al Mosta'in Bi'llah; which he retained, as long as he sat upon the Andalusian throne. As Al Mowayyad was never afterwards either seen or heard of, no one could tell from that time what became of him. It is remarkable that the Hâjeb, or chamberlain, at least during the period we are now upon, was the prime minister, or Wazîr, to the Moslem princes of the house of Ommiyah in Spain <sup>g</sup>.

It may not be improper here to observe, that the account of this revolution preserved by Roderic of Toledo differs from the foregoing relation, extracted from Abu'lfeda, in several particulars. According to that author, Mohammed Ebn Heshâm, or Al Mohdi, with twelve of his accomplices, rebelled against the Khalîf Heshâm, or Al Mowayyad, and seized upon the city of Corduba, after the violent death of Abd'alrahmân, who had succeeded his brother Abd'almâlec in the office of Hâjeb, the present year. Being master of the Khalîf's person, he caused him to be privately confined in a house belonging to one of his friends, killed a Christian extremely like him, and gave out that he was dead. The grandees and principal courtiers, being then desired to view the corps, really took it to be that of Heshâm; and it was soon after interred, with great funeral pomp. Mohammed, now thinking himself secure, began to oppress his subjects, and to insult their wives in such a manner as absolutely alienated their affections from him. This excited one Heshâm, with several others, to enter into a conspiracy against him. In pursuance, therefore, of the plan that had been formed, the conspirators destroyed many of Mohammed's friends, burnt some of the gates of Corduba, and made an attempt to dethrone the tyrant. However, Al Mohdi rendered abortive their design, killed several of them, and took a great number prisoners. Having thus extinguished the rebellion, he ordered Heshâm to be executed, together with many others, who had been the most active in the late revolt. This, however, did not hinder some of the African Moslems then in Spain from casting their eyes upon Solimân, the Khalîf Heshâm's nephew, whom they pitched upon for their prince; though Maruban, or Merwân's, his cousin-german, had likewise a considerable party amongst them. Solimân, being informed that Merwân's friends had made him a present of a horse and a sword, in token of their attachment to him, and promised to proclaim him Khalîf, if he could find an opportunity of taking off his relation Solimân; he ordered several of the ringleaders to be beheaded, loaded Merwân with irons, and with a large sum of money procured the assistance of count Sancho of Castile. In the mean time, Al Mohdi, having received advice of the treaty concluded between Sancho and Solimân, raised an army in the neighbourhood of Medina Celi, which he ordered to advance to Corduba; but, being overthrown by the confederates, with the loss of 36000 men, and forced to abandon to the victors part of his capital, he found himself obliged to bring the Khalîf Heshâm, or Al Mowayyad, who was thought to have been dead, out of the place where he had been concealed. This he did, that he might prevail upon the people, when he saw his own affairs in a desperate situation, to submit to their natural prince, rather than to Solimân. But, every one being now struck with terror, no regard was paid to his solicitations; so that he was constrained to fly to Toledo, with Mohammed Al Toleiteli, one of his most intimate friends, and Solimân possessed himself of Corduba, where he reigned about seven months. However, distrusting the fidelity of the citizens, he kept the Christian forces for some time in Andalusia, and formed a camp of his troops at a small distance from the city. Al Mohdi, on the other hand, soon after his flight to Toledo, by the activity of Al Amri, his Hâjeb, assembled a very numerous body of troops, which was reinforced by Armengandus and Veremudus, or Veremundus, two Christian officers of note, who were extremely serviceable to him. Solimân, having been apprized of the preparations that were making to attack him, endeavoured to engage the people of Corduba to support him; but, they, being at the bottom disaffected to him, excused themselves upon frivolous pretexts from taking the field. As he had, therefore, dismissed the Christian forces, commanded by count Sancho of Castile, he had only the Barbarians, or African Moslems, to depend upon. Notwithstanding which, he advanced to a place, called by Roderic Accauatal Bacar, about ten leagues from Corduba; where his competitor, Al Mohdi, at the head of his army, likewise soon appeared. A battle hereupon immediately ensued, in which the African Moslems fell upon the enemy with such bravery that they forced them to give ground, and put several thousands of them to the sword; but Al Mohdi rallying his men, they resumed their courage, charged the Barbarians with fresh vigour, and, chiefly by the valour of the Christian troops, gained a complete victory. As for Solimân himself, he fled first to Azafra, and afterwards to Citana; upon which, the people of Corduba entered the former of those places, massacred all the inhabitants they met with, as well as the Africans that fell in their way, thoroughly plundered the town, and carried off with them the golden lamps out of the great mosque, together with many other valuable effects, that the Africans, or Barbarians, had deposited there. This decisive action placed the crown once more upon Al Mohdi's head; though that prince, or rather usurper, was in a very short time driven again from the throne. For, not being able to protect his subjects against the violences of the Barbarians, who continued still in Andalusia, and committed dreadful devastations there, and the people of Corduba having conceived an invincible aversion to his government; some Arabs and eunuchs conspired against him, and, under the direction of Al Amri, his Hâjeb, and Hambar, one of the principal eunuchs, seized upon him in his palace. After which, Heshâm, or Al Mowayyad, re-ascended the throne; who, having commanded Al Mohdi to be brought before him, and upbraided him with his traitorous and villainous conduct, ordered his head to be struck off, and his body to be thrown from the walls into one of the streets of the city. The head was afterwards carried upon the top of a lance through the metropolis, and the body, though strangely mangled, at the request a of several persons, buried, in a corner of the mosque. Solimán, however, who still had the crown in view, found means to get the head into his hands; which he sent to Obeid'allab, Al Mobdi's son, then at Toledo, where he was held in vast esteem. Heshám, not being able to repress the insolence of the Barbarians, who still ravaged the country without controul, and kept the city of Corduba itself, where all kinds of provisions began to fail, in a manner blocked up, there were great murmurings in that capital; insomuch that several of the citizens formed a design to restore Solimán to the throne. But, in order to prevent this scheme from taking effect, and to hinder any assistance from coming to Solimán from that quarter, Heshám concluded an offensive and defensive treaty with count Sancho of Castile; who managed this point with uncommon dexterity and address, and procured of Heshám, as a reward for the assistance he was to afford him, the cession of six fortresses, which had formerly been taken from the Christians by Al Mansúr. After the conclusion of this treaty, the citizens of Toledo, with Obeid'allab Ebn Mohammed Al Mobdi at their head, revolted against the Khalif. But Heshám possessed himself of the city, beheaded Obeid'allab, and extinguished the rebellion, without any considerable effusion of Moslem blood. This good success did not hinder Al Amri, the Hájeb, from entering into some intrigues with Solimán, in order to elevate him to the Khalifat of Andalusia; but several of the letters he had received from Solimán having been intercepted, Heshám instantly commanded his head to be cut off, and exposed to publick view in every part of the city, to deter others from such treasonable practices for the future. Notwithstanding which, as Solimán's adherents, the African Moslems, continued their ravages in the country about Corduba, Seville, and Calatráva, laying it waste with fire and sword, insomuch that a very extensive tract was almost intirely depopulated; the people entertained thoughts of deposing Heshám, and calling Solimán, whom they considered as the only person capable of protecting them, to the crown. That prince, therefore, having fixed Al Mondar, the governor of Saragossa, and other officers of rank, in his interest, and been joined by a vast number of Moslems, who flocked to him from all parts, advanced with a formidable army to the gates of Corduba, and summoned the city to surrender. But, finding the garison and inhabitants resolved to defend it to the last extremity, he laid siege to the place in form, and carried on his attacks with the utmost vigour; the besieged opposing him with equal bravery, and making several successful sallies. However, one of the gates being at last betrayed into Solimán's hands, he entered the town without opposition, burnt many of the houses and public buildings, destroyed an infinite number of the citizens, and gave the place up to his troops to be plundered for three whole days. This so terrified the people, who survived the carnage, that they immediately submitted to him. As for Heshám, he was led out of the city, and permitted to retire into Africa, where he probably ended his days. This last revolution must have happened, according to Roderic, either in, or after, the year of the Hejra 404; though Abu'lfeda, whose authority in this point is perhaps more to be depended upon, has placed it amongst the memorable events of the preceding year *.

e SOLTAN MAHMUD pushed his conquests in India, and defeated Bal Ebn Andbal, who was esteemed one of the richest and most powerful kings of Indostán, the present year. He also made himself master of the fortress of Bebesim, and found therein immense treasures, which had been amassed by Bal, in gold, silver, and precious stones. The same year, the king of kings, or emperor of Indostán, sent to demand peace of the Soltán; which he granted him, on condition that he should send him fifty elephants, with a proper number of Indian querries to manage and take care of them, and pay him a very large annual tribute. The peace between these two potentates being ratified, the commerce of their subjects was re-established, and the caravans, or Karwáns, took their usual routes. Ilek Khán having been informed, some time after his arrival in Mawgrá'nabr, that his brother Togan, or Dogán, Khán, who had been with him in the battle fought near Balkh, had made an apology to Mahmúd for his former conduct; he led an army against him, in order to punish his supposed disaffection to him. But, by the intervention of Mahmúd himself, a rupture was prevented, and a good understanding between the two brothers perfectly restored †.

f BEFORE the expiration of the year we are now upon, Abu Mohammed Ebn Sablan surrounded the place where, according to the Sbiites, Ali suffered martyrdom with a wall. About the same time, Abu'l Abbás Al Nami, a poet, Abu'l Fatab Ali Ebn Mohammed Al Bafí, a poet, author, and notary, of good repute, and Al Sherif Abu Ahmed Ebn Músa, father of Al Sherif Al Rádi, departed this life. The last of these had for some time lost his sight, and was near an hundred years old, at the day of his death; having been born, in the year of the Hejra 304 ‡.

marches against his brother Togân Khân.

THE following year, being the 401st of the Moslem æra, commencing August 15th, 1010, a Ilek Khân, notwithstanding the late pacification, upon some fresh disgust, marched, with an army from Samarkand, against his brother, Togân Khân. Having advanced to Urcand, a city of Mawarâ'nahr, he was obliged to halt; a deep snow, which at that time fell, having rendered the roads impassable, so that he could neither proceed farther, nor return to the place from whence he came. The name of this city in the Leyden MS. of Abu'l-feda's chro-nicon is Uzcund, or rather Uzcand, according to M. Reiske; but this must be a mistake, occasioned by the affinity, or rather identity, of character visible in the forms of Za and Ra, or Z and R, in the Arabic alphabet; the former being distinguished from the latter only by the diacritical point. Urcand, or Awrcand, has 102° 50' long. and 44° N. lat. assigned it by Nafsîr Al Tûsî and Ulugh Beik. Some writers take Urcand and Urkenj, or b Corkânj, called by the Arabs Al Forjâniyah, in Khowârazm, to be the same city. But this can by no means be allowed, as the latter of those places is situated upon the western bank of the Jibûn; which does not at all accord with the position of Urcand, seated, according to the oriental geographers, beyond the Jibûn, upon the eastern bank of that river<sup>a</sup>.

Bahao'ddawla obliges Kar-wâsh to pray
for Al Kâder.

THE same year, Karwâsh Ebn Al Mokalled Ebn Al Mofayyab, the Emîr of the Okailite
Arabs, issued an edict, injoyning his subjects at Al Marwâsîl, Al Anbâr, Al Madâyen, Al Cûfa, and the other cities under his jurisdiction, to pray in their respective mosques for Al Hâkem Beamrî'llah, the Khalîf of Egypt. The beginning of the prayer injoyned on this occasion was conceived in the following terms; "Praise be given to God, by whose divine light
" the thick darkness of tyranny and injustice is dispelled, by whose greatness the founda- c
" tions of an idol (or idolatry) are overturned, and by whose power the sun moves from " east to west, &c." But this edict did not long remain in force. For, Bahao'ddawla, who was then at Arjân, ordered Amîd Al Joyûshi, his general, to march directly with all the forces he could assemble against the Emîr of Al Marwâsîl; which so terrified Karwâsh, that he asked pardon for his crime, rescinded the edict that gave so much offence, and commanded his subjects to pray for the Khalîf Al Kâder Bi'llah, in all their mosques, as they had done before<sup>b</sup>.

A war between the Dobaisite and Mazjadite
Arabs.

THIS year, Abu'l Ganayem Mohammed Ebn Mazjad, being amongst the Dobaisite Arabs, to whom he was related, in Khûzestân, happened to kill one of the principal men of that tribe;
upon which, he found himself obliged to fly to Abu'l Hasan Ebn Mazjad, the Emîr of the d Mazjadite Arabs, his brother. This brought on a war between the two tribes, which proved fatal to the two brothers that occasioned it. For, the Mazjadite Arabs having met with a defeat, Abu'l Ganayem fell upon the field of battle, and Abu'l Hasan betook himself to a precipitate flight<sup>c</sup>.

Amîd Al
Joyûshi Bahao'ddawla's
general, dies.

AMID AL JOYUSHI ABU ALI EBN ISTAD, or ISTATH, HORMUZ, who had been constituted by Bahao'ddawla the Emîr of Irâk, died before the close of the present year. He extirpated the gang of robbers, and quelled all the seditious spirits, that had for some time infested, and disturbed the repose of, the city of Baghdâd. After his death, Bahao'ddawla appointed Abu Gâleb Fakhr Al Molk to command in that capital, and throughout the whole district appertaining to it<sup>d</sup>.

Soltân Mahmûd extends his conquests.

SOLTAN MAHMUD attacked Mohammed Ebn Suri (S), prince, or king, of the country of e
Gaur, or, according to Teixeira, Guzarate, and took him prisoner, before the close of the present year. The Soltân found upon this prince some poison, which he kept concealed in a ring, and with which he delivered himself from his captivity, by putting an end to his days. Soon after this expedition, Mahmûd penetrated into Gurjestân, or Georgia, chased the Shâr, or king, of that country from thence, and made himself master of all his dominions.
Some authors relate, that Altun Tash, one of Mahmûd's generals, defeated Shâb Shâr, the king of Gurjestân, and sent him prisoner to the Soltân; who gave him his liberty, and re-established him in his kingdom, on condition that he should always remain a good and faithful vassal. But, continue those authors, having afterwards revolted against the Soltân, f been again defeated, and taken prisoner a second time; he was, by Mahmûd's order, whipped like a common slave that had made his escape, and confined in a certain castle to the day of his death. It has been observed by Kbondemir, that he was the last of the kings

(S) Mirkbond, as translated and abridged by Teixeira, tells us, that Mohammed Ebn Suri was general of the Banians; and that his son, being taken prisoner by Mahmûd, destroyed himself by some poison, which he carried about with him in one of his bracelets for that purpose (26).

a of Gurjestân who assumed the title of Shâr; and that this was applied to all the princes of a dynasty there, in the same manner as Cæsar was to the Roman emperors, and Czar to the sovereigns of Muscovy, or Russia. Perhaps both Shâr and Czar were deduced from the word Cæsar, as being titles of much the same import, and only corruptions of it<sup>c</sup>.

In the year of the Hejra 402, beginning August 4th, 1011, the Khalif Al Kâder Bi'llah Al Kâder published a sort of manifesto, or declaration, against the Khalifs of Egypt, wherein they were asserted to be guilty of manifest falsehood and imposture, when they pretended to deduce their origin from Ali and Fâtema, the daughter of Mohammed; and, in consequence of that pretension, assumed the honourable appellation of Fâtimites. This declaration was subscribed by many of Ali's genuine descendants, by many Kâdis, and by a considerable number of other learned men; one of whom was Abd'allah Ebn Al Nooman, a celebrated Fakih of the Shiites, held amongst them in great esteem. The purport of it was to the following effect. "These are the sentiments and assertions of the persons whose names are hereunto subscribed, and who are worthy of credit in every particular. They affirm, that Al Moezz, the son of Ismael, the son of Abd'alrahmân, the son of Sa'id, deduced his origin from Disân Ebn Sa'id, the common father of the Disânites, and the author of the sect going under that name. They likewise assert, that Mansûr, who now pretends to reign in Egypt, under the title of Al Hâkem, is an upstart, sprung up on a sudden, out of meannels and obscurity, like a mushroom, in that country, upon whose head may all God's plagues and curses fall! and that, as he is the grandson of the aforesaid Al Moezz, he is also descended from Abd'alrahmân, the son of Sa'id, to whom may God never permit any prosperous event to happen, and from the same ancestors, who were the scum of mankind, the scandal of human nature, the pests and nuisances of society, the worst of filth, impostors, utterly unworthy of the noble family from whence they pretend to be derived. And may God damn to all eternity the aforesaid reprobates and rebels, and may they moreover be for ever pursued by the curses and imprecations of all lovers of piety and truth! The aforesaid worthy persons farther affirm, that the lineage of these usurpers has no manner of affinity with, nor bears any relation to, the family of Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, to whom may God be always propitious! and that their ostentation, by which they arrogate to themselves the splendor of that most illustrious house, is mere vanity, a downright falsehood and lie. They also pronounce this son of the earth (Al Hâkem,) who lately sprung up in Egypt, and boasts so much of himself, and all the members of his mean, sordid, and beggarly family, infidels, villains, Sadducees, and atheists, who have renounced Islamism, which they formerly professed, allow marriages within the prohibited degrees, permit the use of wine, treat the prophets and holy men in a contumelious manner, and attribute divinity to themselves." To which our author adds, that he did not give his readers the declaration itself at large, lest they should esteem him too tedious and prolix<sup>d</sup>.

It may not be improper here to remark, that this most bitter and virulent manifesto seems to have been occasioned by Karwâsh Ebn Al Mokalled's conduct, when he ordered his subjects to pray in their mosques for Al Hâkem, the preceding year. Both Al Kader and Bahao'ddawla reproved him for the edict he then issued, which enjoined this, in pretty severe terms; though after the rescission of that edict, when his penitence fully appeared, Al Kâder sent him some rich presents, that were valued at 30,000 dinârs, according to Al Makîn<sup>e</sup>.

AMONGST the principal transactions of this year Abu'lfeda seems to rank the commencement of Sâleh Ebn Mardâs's power, as he gives us a short and concise history of the dynasty at Aleppo of the princes descended from him under the year of the Hejra 402; but whether this be done with sufficient judgment and propriety, we shall not take upon us absolutely to determine. However, as this author has offered no reason for his disposition of such a series of facts under the year we are now upon; and as the beginning of the aforesaid dynasty has been placed, seemingly with more propriety either in the year of the Hejra 414, or 415, when Sâleh Ebn Mardâs made himself master of Aleppo, even according to Abu'lfeda himself, by Al Makîn; our readers will not be displeased, if we supersede any farther account of that race of princes here, especially as this will more properly make its appearance hereafter in a future part of this work<sup>f</sup>.

THE next year, being the 403d of the Hejra, commencing July 23d, 1012, Kâbûs Ebn Wushmakîn, surnamed Shams Al Ma'âli, the king of Forjân and Mazanderân, was cut off by his subjects, in a manner scarce to be paralleled in history. This prince, though adorned with many and great virtues, and in the main a good governor, was rather too strict in a his discipline, and too severe in his punishments, seldom pardoning even the slightest faults; which rendered him extremely disagreeable to the people about him. The officers of the army, in particular, having felt the effects of his severity more than others, had an utter aversion to him. They, therefore, sent for Manújabar, his son, then in Jorján, and told him, that they would place him upon the throne, if he would consent with them to the deposition of his father; but that if he refused this, they must look out elsewhere for another Soltán. Being, therefore, in a manner compelled to comply with their demands, they proclaimed and acknowledged him Soltán of Jorján and Mazanderán, and took the oath of allegiance to him. After which, he went to the city of Baslán, whither his father had been sent by the rebels under a strong escorte, prostrated himself before him, and, b having promised in the strongest terms perpetual obedience to him, offered to march against the rebels that had deposed him, in order to bring them to condign punishment if he thought proper to lay his commands upon him, and to make the utmost efforts to constrain his disaffected subjects once more to recognize his authority. But Kábús, satisfied with his son's duty, wisely answered him: "I have fixed here the term of my public

" actions, and of my public life; and I now voluntarily resign all my power and autho" rity into your hands." He was then confined in the castle of Gefasenk, where he spent the remainder of his days in solitude, the service of God, and pious meditations. Being conducted to the place of his confinement by a party of the rebels, he asked one of them, c
" What could induce them to depose him?" To which he answered, "Your extreme
" severity obliged us to take that resolution." Kábús instantly replied, "That is a false
" pretext, for I have been reduced to the melancholy condition I at present am in by
" my aversion to the effusion of human blood, and by sparing the lives of five or six
" of you in particular." His enemies, apprehending that some time or other he might take vengeance of them for their disobedience, hired certain persons, according to Ebn Siná, to poison him in prison. But, if we will believe Abu'lfeda and Abu'l Faraj, who both agree in this particular, the conspirators, after they had in vain attempted to prevail upon Manújabar to concur with them, went to the castle of Gefasenk, which they entered by force, plundered his apartment, and stript him of all the cloaths he had, that were proper for the season, it being then the midst of winter; so that he miserably perished with cold. d
Kábús was in his time a prince of the highest reputation, and possessed an assemblage of the finest qualities. He had a noble and elevated mind, was wise and eloquent, understood astronomy, had made a considerable progress in other sciences, was perfectly well versed in all the arts of government, and had the character of an excellent poet. He wrote a most beautiful hand, left several elegant letters and copies of verses behind him, and was well acquainted with every branch of polite literature. He greatly cared for the celebrated Ebn Siná, or, as we corruptly name him, Avicenna, and made him many valuable presents. Such marks of distinction that incomparable physician and philosopher merited, by curing his nephew of a most violent amorous passion, that had like to have proved fatal to him. Kábús mounted the throne, after the death of his elder brother Tausbín, or Tausbén, who succeeded his father Washmakîr, or Washmakîn, either in the year of the Hejra 366, or 367. e
He recovered his territories, of which he had been deprived, after Fakbro'ddawla's decease, and departed from the city of Nisábûr, the place of his retreat, in order to take possession of them, in the year 388. After which, he annexed to his dominions the provinces of Ghilân and Tabrestân, and for some time made a very considerable figure. Al Birûni, a celebrated author, dedicated to him an historical work, intituled Atkar Al Bekiab, which was much esteemed. Some of the eastern writers pretend, that Washmakîn, Kábús's father, was descended from Raash, an antient governor of Ghilân, who presided over the people of that province, when Kay Kbofrû, the second prince of the Kayanian dynasty, sat upon the Persian throne. f

dies;

THE same year, Ilck Khân, the king of Turkestan, as he is stiled by some of the oriental writers, likewise departed this life. If we will believe Abu'lfeda, he was an upright and a religious prince, had a thirst after knowledge, and was an encourager of learned men. He died at home, in peace; and notwithstanding the unfavourable sentiments he had formerly entertained of his fidelity to him, was succeeded in the sovereignty of his dominions by his brother, Togân Khân *.

- a carried off by a fit of the epilepsy, a distemper that proved fatal to Adado'dawla, his father, in the 372d year of the Hejra, as has been already observed. He ended his days at Arjân, a city of Fârs, where he had resided during the latter part of his life, before he had completed the forty-third year of his age. He presided over the people of Irâk about twenty-four years, and was succeeded in the government, or rather sovereignty, of that province by Soltânoddawla Abu Shajâ', his son. The Khalîf Al Kâder confirmed Abu Shajâ' in the sublime post he had taken possession of, by an instrument drawn up in form for that purpose, and sent him from Baghdâd. Babao'ddawla desired in his last moments to be buried near the sepulchres of Ali and his son Al Hossein, in order to demonstrate by this disposition his attachment to the sect of those Imâms. He left several children behind him,
- b besides Abu Shajâ', his eldest son. That young prince, soon after his accession, transferred the seat of his empire to Shîrâz, and fixed his residence there<sup>1</sup>.

BEFORE the close of the year we are now upon, Al Kâdi Mohammed Ebn Al Teyyeb Ebn Mohammed Ebn Jaasar Al Bakelani, commonly called Abu Becr Ebn Al Bakelani, a zealous follower of Abu'l Hasan Al Ajbâri, likewise departed this life. He lived at Baghdâd, was a strenuous assertor of the tenets of his sect, and composed several treatises upon dialectical and theological subjects. He derived the surname Ebn Al Bakelani from the business his father, who was a seller of herbs, and particularly of beans, followed; the word Bakela denoting a bean, in the Arabic tongue. The derivative from thence ought, according to the analogy usually observed in the formation of such words, to have been Bakelai; as, therefore, in Bakelani there is a superfluous servile Nûn, that gentile term a little recedes from the turn and genius of many others deduced from primitives of a similar kind. However, the method of derivation here observed may be supported by the derivative Sanaani, not Sanâi, from Sanaa, and other parallel instances that might with equal facility be produced<sup>m</sup>.

- BEFORE we conclude our account of the principal transactions of this year, it may not be improper to remind our readers, that Solimân Ebn Al Hâkem Ebn Solimân Ebn Abd'al-rahmân Al Nasr, of whom we have spoken above, re-ascended the throne of Corduba, according to Abu'lfeda (T), before it expired. To which this author adds, that Heshâm Al Mowayyad, the former Khalîf, then disappeared, and no person could ever discover to what place he made his escape. He also relates, that Solimân assumed the title of Al Mosta'in, Bi'llah, or He who gets God for his helper; and that an impostor afterwards pretended to personate Al Mowayyad at Corduba. What finally happened to this Solimân, who was the eleventh Khalîf of the house of Ommiyah in Spain, our readers will learn hereafter, when we come to the most memorable events of the year 407<sup>n</sup>.

- YAMINO'DDAWLA Mahmûd Ebn Sabektckin was still victorious in Indostân, nothing there being able to stand before him. In the year of the Hejra 404, which commenced July 13th 1013, he made another irruption into that country, ravaged it in a dreadful manner, defeated all the Indian troops sent to oppose him, and then returned in triumph to Gazna, loaded with spoil. This year, the Khaffajite Arabs likewise pillaged, and committed many disorders in, Al Sawâd Al Cûfa; but a detachment of the Khalîf's troops soon came up with them, put many of them to the sword, and intirely dispersed the rest. Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Sa'id Al Estakbri, a famous Môtazalite doctor, also died, in some part of it; being, at the time of his death, above eighty lunar years of age<sup>o</sup>.

(T) Roderic of Toledo does not agree with Abu'lfeda in this particular; as placing the event here mentioned either in the year of the Hejra 401. or after that year. But, as Roderic is frequently very inaccurate and indistinct, particularly in his chronology; and as not only Abu'lfeda, but the other Arab writers, may rationally be supposed to be more clear and exact in what they have related of the Moslem affairs; we have not scrupled to prefer Abu'lfeda's authority to that of the Spanish historian, in the point before us. Nor are we apprehensive of being censured for this, by our learned and intelligent readers; especially, as the very learned Signor Assemani (27) has done the same, in several passages of the piece referred to here.

the Greek emperor. In the mean time, Fatab, having received advice of Mansûr's defeat, set up for himself at Aleppo; and, in order to secure the possession of that city, put himself under the protection of Al Hâkem, the Khalîf of Egypt, to whom he agreed to pay an annual tribute. This revolt Fatab had been meditating for some time; but could not find a proper opportunity of carrying his design into execution, before the present year. Al Hâkem, not caring to trust the government of Aleppo with a person who had been guilty of infidelity to his former master there, conferred upon him the lieutenancy of Tyre and Sidon, and sent another person to succeed him in his former post. This we learn from Abu'l-feda, though the matter has been differently related by Al Makîn. For, according to the latter of these writers, Fatab was not only confirmed by Al Hâkem in his government of Aleppo, but had likewise the tribute of Tyre, Sidon, and Berytus granted him by that prince. To which he adds, that Al Hâkem dignified him with the title, or surname, of Mobâreco'ddawla; and that he continued to preside over the people of Aleppo, till the year of the Hejra 407. It ought to be remarked, that Al Hâkem had, before Fatab's defection, constituted Abu Nasr Mansûr Ebn Lâilû the Sahab, or prince, of Aleppo; though he was an usurper, and had expelled the family of Hamdân, in a very iniquitous manner, from that place <sup>p</sup>.

A war between the Mazjadite and Dobaisite Arabs.

THE same year, a very bloody war was carried on between Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Mazjad Al Asadi, the chief, or Emîr, of the Mazjadite Arabs, and Modar, Al Hasan, Naban, and Tarad, who commanded the Dobaisite Arabs; in which Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Mazjad received an overthrow, by the conduct and bravery of Modar, and fled into the district, or territory, of Al Nil. The Mazjadite Arabs lost on this occasion all their horses, tents, and military chest, as well as the booty which before the action they had acquired <sup>q</sup>.

Al Hâfedh Mohammed Ebn Noaim dies.

THIS year, died Al Hâfedh Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Mohammed Ebn Hamdûyah Ebn Noaim, a member of that family of the tribe of Dhobba, or rather Dhobyan, denominated Tahman. He generally went under the appellation of Ebn Al Hakem Al Naisâbûri, or the son of the judge of Naisâbûr, his father having been the Kâdi, or judge, of that city. He was looked upon as the most celebrated doctor of the traditionists of the age in which he lived. He wrote several books upon theological subjects, that excelled all other productions of the same kind, which made their appearance in his days. The principal of these treatises were Al Sahibat, or discourses upon genuine traditions, Al Kitâb Al Amali, or the book of dictates, and his treatise upon the virtues and excellency of Al Shâfeî. Nor is it to be wondered at, that he should have shined so much amongst the people of his sect, as he had attended the lectures of near 2000 doctors, all of whom amongst them were held in high esteem <sup>r</sup>.

The Kâdi, or judge, of Deinawar is murdered.

ABOUT the same time, some of the lower class of people at Deinawar, or Dainawar, murdered Abu'l Kasem Ebn Yusef Ebn Ahmed, the Kâdi, or judge, of that place commonly called Ebn Cajji, and a zealous adherer to the sect of Al Shâfeî. He had, however, several peculiarities in his notions. He published many books, acquired much knowledge, and was for a considerable time at the top of his profession. The villains, that assassinated him, were excited to the perpetration of that horrid fact by fear; they being apprehensive of meeting with from him the punishment due to their enormous crimes <sup>s</sup>.

YAMINO'DDAWLA MAHMUD EBN SABEKTEKIN undertook another expedition likewise into India, and reduced the kingdom of Marwin, which had a capital of the same name, in the year we are now upon. Here he was informed, that an Indian idolatrous prince occupied a province, which produced a race of elephants, called Moslem, or faithful, elephants. This excited him to attempt the conquest of that province; which having effected, he brought off with him from thence a vast quantity of spoil, and a great number of those elephants. They were termed Moslem, or faithful, elephants, because they sometimes performed a sort of genuflexion and prostration, not unlike those of the Moslems, or Mohammedans; which induced many of the latter to believe, that they were religious animals. Pliny and other authors relate, that the elephant is capable of religion, and worships the rising sun; but this is advanced without any manner of foundation, and ought to be considered as a fable <sup>t</sup>.

Hammad revolts against Badis in Africa.

BADIS EBN MANSUR EBN YUSEF EBN ZEIR AL SANHAJI, the Emîr of Libya, having conferred the government of Asbîr, or Asbûr, perhaps the Assurus of Ptolemy, upon his uncle, Hammad, or Hamet, Ebn Yusef Ebn Zeir Al Sanhâji, in the year of the Hejra 387, as has been already observed; this Hammad, who founded the dynasty of the Hammadites, in the province of Bajayah, Bujiab, or Boojeiab, as it is called by Dr. Shaw, having enlarged

- a his territories, amassed vast treasures, and set a numerous army on foot, shook off the yoke of Badis, the present year. This occasioned an intestine war in that part of Africa, of which we shall hereafter give our readers a particular account. In the mean time, it may not be amiss to remark, that the memory of this Hammad; or, as he is called by the present inhabitants of Boojeiab, Seedy Hamet Ben Yusef, is still preserved by a river of the same name; as is likewise that of his father, Yusef Ebn Zeir Al Sanbâji, by the ruins of a town going under the appellation of Yooseph, or Yusef, which may be seen at this very day <sup>a</sup>.

- THE next year, being the 406th of the Hejra, commencing June 22d, 1015, in the beginning of the former Jomâda, a bloody battle was fought between Hammad and Badis, <sup>Hammad is overthrown by Badis, who soon after dies.</sup>
 b his nephew; wherein the former was routed, and forced to fly to the castle of Majilah. From this place he made excursions as far as the city of Dzacamah, and carried off with him all the provisions he could meet with there. This enabled him to sustain a siege, which was carried on with great vigour by Badis; who had pursued him to Majilah, and closely besieged him in that town. However, he was delivered from all future apprehensions of Badis, by that prince's death; which happened in the night preceding the last day of Dhu'lkaada, the present year. As soon as Al Hakem, the Khalif of Egypt, was apprized of this event, he sent Badis's son, Al Moezz, the robes of state, and the instrument confirming him in his father's post; though he was not then above eight years old. Al Hâkem also dignified him with the title, or surname, of Sbarfo'ddawla; assuring him at the same time, that he might depend upon his favour and protection. Notwithstanding which, Hammad continued still to assert his independency, and to maintain himself in the possession of the territories he had acquired. Al Moezz introduced the doctrine of Mâlec Ebn Ans amongst his subjects, then for the most part Hanefites; which was afterwards chiefly followed in Barbary, and other parts of Africa <sup>w</sup>.

THIS year, Soltân Mahmûd penetrated again into India; but this irruption had like to have proved fatal to him. For, crossing an immense solitude, or desert, with his army, he found one part of it covered with water, occasioned by a stagnation of the neighbouring ocean. Here he lost many of his men, who perished in that water, without being able to keep pace with the rest. However, he at last got clear of that dreadful morass, and arrived safe with the remainder of his forces in Khorasân <sup>x</sup>.

- d THE same year, Soltânô'ddawla Ebn Bahao'ddawla deprived Fakhr Al Molk, his governor of Irâk, then about fifty-three years of age, of his post, and soon after put him to death. He had presided over the people of that province five years, four months, and several days. He met with his fate at Abwâz, where he had a palace fitted up in the richest manner, and adorned with many things of exceeding great value. He also left behind him, in ready money, 1,000,000 dinârs. But this palace was thoroughly plundered, immediately after his execution, and stripped of every thing valuable in it. Soltânô'ddawla substituted Abu Mohammed Al Hasan Ebn Saklana to preside over the people of Irâk, in his room <sup>y</sup>.

- ABU MOHAMMED, the Shâr, or Shâb Shâr, of Gurjestân, who in the days of Nûb Ebn Mansûr Al Sammâni, had resigned his kingdom to Abu Nasr, his son, in order to live a retired and private life, died, according to Mirkbond, the present year. When Abu Ali rebelled against Nûb, he seized upon Abu Nasr's territories; upon which, that prince took on in Sabektekin's service, who reinstated him in the government of his dominions. However, some time after, Soltân Mahmûd, Sabektekin's son, placed Abu Mohammed, Abu Nasr's father, who was one of his most faithful servants, again upon the throne of Gurjestân. But that prince refusing, under frivolous pretexts, to attend Mahmûd in one of his Indian expeditions, he, after his return home, sent Altun Tash and Arslân Balu, two of his generals, against both him and his son, Abu Nasr, who then reigned in conjunction with him. Abu Mohammed, having recourse to Mahmûd's clemency, was received again into favour; but Abu Nasr, retiring into one of his fortresses, in defiance of the Soltân, was soon afterwards
 f obliged to surrender it to him, and, by means of the rack, to discover the immense treasures he had concealed. Abu Mohammed had then, according to this writer, lands assigned him near the city of Gazna, in lieu of what he was deprived of in Gurjestân; but, as for Abu Nasr, he was first whipped, or scourged, in a cruel manner, and then thrown into prison. Here, if we will believe some of the authors followed by M. D'Herbelot, after Mahmûd had taken possession of the vast sums of money he had amassed, he miserably ended his days <sup>z</sup>.

ABOUT the same time, Al Sharîf Al Râdi Mohammed Ebn Al Hosein Ebn Mûsa, descended in a right line from Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, departed this life. He was the author of a Dîwân, <sup>as also Al Sharîf Al Râdi,</sup>

or collection of poetical pieces, greatly esteemed by all people of the politest taste amongst the Arabs. He gave very great proofs of a most surprizing genius, one of which has been preserved by Abu'lfeda, in the piece so often referred to here. and Al Imâm Ahmed Al Esfarayeni. AL IMAM ABU HAMED AHMED EBN MOHAMMED EBN AHMED AL ESFARAYENI, an Imâm of the sect of Al Shâfe'i, died likewise, in the year we are now upon. His fame was so great, when he came to Baghdâd, in the year of the Hejra 363, that he had for his hearers frequently about three hundred doctors at once, all dignified with the title of Fakib. He had also seven hundred scholars, all of whom professed the doctrine and principles of Al Shâfe'i; in the knowledge of which this Imâm so much excelled, that many considered him as superior even to Al Shâfe'i himself; and others agreed, that if Al Shâfe'i had been then living, he would have had a very particular regard for him. He filled, says Abu'lfeda, the world with the young persons who received their education from him, and wrote a considerable number of books; one of which, intituled, Talimat Al Cabra, he composed solely for the use of his sect. He deduced the surname, or gentile name, Al Esfarayeni from Esfarayen, Esfarayin, or Esfarayn, a city of Khorasân, in the district of Naisâbûr, on the road that leads to Jorjân. Nassir Al Tusi places this city in 36°. 55' N. lat. and 91°. 5' long. but it has been intirely omitted in the geographical table of Ulugb Beik. It has produced several grand personages, and many writers of considerable note. Al Imâm Abu Hamed Ahmed Al Esfarayeni was born in the 344th year of the Hejra, and taught jurisprudence, with prodigious success, from the year 363 to 370, at Baghdâd. An infinite number of people attended his funeral, which was extremely magnificent. He was first interred in his own house, and afterwards carried from thence to one of the gates of Baghdâd, called Darb Al Harb, or the gate of war; though when his remains were deposited in the second sepulchre assigned them, we have not been told by any of the authors referred to here <sup>b</sup>.

What happened in the Moslem part of Spain, the following year. IN the 407th year of the Hejra, which began June 10th, 1016, Solimân Ebn Al Hâkem Ebn Solimân Ebn Abd'alrahmân Al Nafr, the eleventh Khalif of the house of Ommiyah in Spain, was killed by Ali Ebn Hamed, Hamûd, or Hamûda, as he is called by Ebn Shobnah, at Corduba. Solimân having assigned lands and habitations to the six clans, or Al Kabyleah, of Africans, that had in reality placed him upon the Andalusian throne; many of the Spanish Moslems, and particularly several powerful eunuchs, who were secretly friends to Heshâm, were disgusted thereat, and took an occasion from thence to inflame the minds of the people against him. One of these, named by Roderic of Toledo Hayran, who had formerly fled from Corduba, when Solimân possessed himself of that city, and was grievously wounded by the Africans that attended him, soon began to grow formidable, assembled a large body of troops, and made himself master of several towns. Hayran was in a short time joined with a strong reinforcement by one Ali Ebn Hamûda, a Moslem commander, who had been appointed by Heshâm the governor of Ceuta; and, if Roderic in the place referred to be intelligible, seems then to have presided over the people of Almeria. For, according to that writer, one Affa had rebelled against him there, and occupied that city. Hayran and Ali Ebn Hamûda retook Almeria, after a siege of twenty days, threw Affa and his family into the sea, and in consequence of this success quickly expelled the Africans from that part of the Moslem conquests in Spain. Things being in this favourable situation, Hayran caused Ali Ebn Hamûda to be proclaimed Khalif at Malaga; after which, Hayran, Ali, and others, drew such a number of forces out of Granada, Murcia, &c. that they formed of them a powerful army, and ranged their troops in order of battle in the plains of Corduba. Solimân, having received advice of their approach, led all his forces out of the city against them, in order to decide this dispute by the sword as soon as possible. A general action hereupon ensued, wherein Solimân had the misfortune to be overthrown, with very great slaughter, and to lose his capital. Ali then commanded him, together with his father and brother, to be brought before him; and, after having reproached him with his traitorous conduct, slew them all with his own hand. Ebn Shobnah writes, that the new Khalif ordered Solimân and all his family to be put to death, under the pretext of taking vengeance of him for the murder of Al Mowayyad; but that he did not long enjoy the fruits of his cruelty and ambition, as he sat not upon the throne two whole years. He assumed the title, or surname, of Al Motawakkel Al'allah; and was descended, as he gave out, in a right line from Al Hasan, the eldest son of Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb. Ebn Shobnah places his elevation to the Khalifat of Andalusia in the year of the Hejra 408, and Abu'lfeda, whom we chuse to follow in this particular, in that we are now upon. Al Motawakkel Al'allah <sup>c</sup> <sup>d</sup> <sup>e</sup> <sup>f</sup> <sup>g</sup> a was intirely stripped of his estates by a relation, named Abd'alrahmán, and soon after assassinated by one of his slaves. He is denominated by the Spanish historians Ali Ebn Hamid, and occasioned an interruption in the succession of the house of Ommiyah in the Moslem part of Spain <sup>c</sup>.

THE same year Mámún Ebn Mámún, who had married Soltán Mahmúd's daughter, and Other occur- had been made by that prince the governor of Khowárazm, revolted against his father-in-rences of the law, at the instigation of Begal Takín, and some other malecontents, and set up for himself year 407 in that province. But Mahmúd soon brought him back to a sense of his duty, and deprived him of his post, which he conferred upon his favourite general, Altun Tash. This we learn from the eastern writers followed by M. D'Herbelot. But Mámún Ebn Mámún succeeded, by a sort of hereditary right, to the kingdom of Khowárazm, and was cut off, this year, by Mahmúd, after he had possessed himself of that country, if we will believe Abu'l Faraj. About this time, a Bulgarian nobleman, who had murdered Al Katomers, Samuel's prime minister, and seized upon the kingdom of Bulgaria, wrote to the emperor Basilus, and offered to make his submission to him, according to Al Makín. This nobleman must undoubtedly have been John Bladistlabus, or Bladistlaus, nearly related to Gabriel, king of the Bulgarians, and Samuel's son, whom he assassinated, and then mounted the throne. This usurper, according to Curopolates, after he had caused himself to be acknowledged king of the Bulgarians, sent ambassadors to Basilus, and proposed to submit to any terms, and to own himself, and behave on all occasions, as a subject and vassal of the empire. This year Al Hákem, the Khalif of Syria and Egypt, sent Kayed Abu Shaja' Azizo'd-dawla to Aleppo, in the month of Ramadán, to take upon himself the government of that city. He had not been long there, before he renounced his allegiance to the Fátémite Khalif, asserted his own independency, and obliged the people of Aleppo to take an oath of fidelity to him <sup>d</sup>.

WE must not forget to observe, that a different account of the affairs of Khowárazm, as A different account of the they stood at this time, has been given us by Mirkhond, the Persian historian. He relates, that Mámún Khowárazm Sháh, dying about the year we are now upon, his son Abu Ali succeeded him; who, by marrying one of Soltán Mahmúd's sisters, secured the repose of his subjects, during the short time he lived. His brother Mámún Ebn Mámún ascended the throne, after his decease. But he having been poisoned by Neala, or Neal Takín, almost immediately after his accession, according to the common opinion, his son was saluted king, or Sháh, of Khowárazm. Mahmúd, being resolved to revenge Mámún Ebn Mámún's death, marched with a powerful army into that country. He had not long entered it, before he was surprized by Neala Takín, and attacked with such vigour, that at first victory seemed but little disposed to declare in his favour. However, he at last defeated Neala Takín; who was seized by the person to whom he applied for a boat, in order to cross a neighbouring river, and brought bound to the conqueror. Mahmúd, being greatly offended at his insolence to him, commanded him to be hanged, and conferred the government of Khowárazm upon Altun Tash. After which, having settled every thing there to his satisfaction, he made the necessary preparations for another Indian expedition <sup>e</sup>.

THE following year, being the 408th of the Hejra, commencing May 30th 1017, Hammad Ebn Yusuf Ebn Zeir Al Sanháji, persisting in his rebellion, Al Moezz Ebn Badis, the Emir of Libya, or rather Mauritania, and Africa Propria, sent an army to reduce him. Hammad meeting the Emir at Thabenah, a fierce conflict ensued; in which Hammad was overthrown with great slaughter, and forced to betake himself to a precipitate flight. However, a treaty was soon after concluded between him and the Emir; whereby the tract denominated the prefecture of Ebn Ali, Ashir and Tábart, with their respective districts and dependences, beyond that tract, being all the territories he then possessed, were ceded to him. His son Al Kayed was likewise permitted to preside over Al Masilah, Thabnah, Marsa Al Dajaji, Zawawab, Macrah, Dzacamah, and other places; by which, though the Emir proved victorious in the late action at Thabenah, it should seem that his affairs at this time were not in a very flourishing situation. What happened in this part of the world, from the period we are now upon, our readers will meet with accounts of hereafter, in those parts of the work to which they will more properly belong <sup>f</sup>.

the head of a formidable army to Skîrâz; which Abu'l Fawares, not being able to make a head against him, abandoned, at his approach. Nay he pursued him into Kermân, and drove him out of that province. Abu'l Fawares, therefore, found himself obliged to fly into Khorasân, to implore the assistance and protection of Soltân Mahmûd Tamîno'ddawla; who, in compliance with his request, sent Abu Sa'id Tabi, one of his generals, with a numerous body of troops, to make an irruption into Irâk. Abu Sa'id, who was attended by Abu'l Fawares in this expedition, reduced the province of Kermân, penetrated into Fârs, and took the city of Skîrâz. The news of this invasion being brought to Soltânno'ddawla, who was then at Baghdâd, he assembled all the troops he could draw together, and moved again towards Skîrâz; of which Abu'l Fawares being informed, he fled from thence a second time, with the utmost precipitation, to Hamadân, a city of Al Jebâl, in the Persian Irâk, where Shams-o'ddawla Ebn Fakhr-o'ddawla at that time reigned. Not thinking himself safe there, he retired for his farther safety to a place called Fakey, or Fakkey, the residence, according to Mîrkhond, of one Mazzobo'ddawla; who treated him, notwithstanding the unfortunate circumstances he was in, with uncommon marks of distinction and esteem. An accommodation being soon after brought about between Abu'l Fawares and Soltânno'ddawla, by the intervention of Jalâlo'ddawla, their brother, then at Basra, the first of these princes was re-instated in the government of Kermân, by the mutual consent of all parties, in the year of the Hejra 409<sup>8</sup>.

The oriental Turks advance towards Bâlâfâgûn.

It appears from Abu'l Faraj, as well as from the Persian authors followed by M. D'Herbelot, that, in the 408th year of the Moslem æra, a vast body of Tartars and Moguls, comprized under the name of Turks, issuing from the borders of China, ravaged the country from the oriental ocean to the confines of the proper Turkestân; though when they were within eight days journey of Bâlâfâgûn, then the capital of that region, they found themselves obliged to halt. Here they were apprized, that Togân, or Dagân, Khân, at that time the king of Turkestân, was marching towards them with a numerous army, in order to cut off their retreat. This not only prevented their progress any farther westward, but obliged them to think immediately of returning home. We may form some sort of notion of the immense multitude of these eastern Turks, from the prodigious number of tents they pitched; which amounted to above 300,000, according to Abu'l Faraj. But notwithstanding this, they did not think fit to wait for Togân Khân; who pursued them for three months together, at last came up with them, when they thought themselves secure, by reason of the vast extent of tract they had traversed, and fell upon them with such fury that he put above 200,000 of them to the sword. We are likewise told, that he carried off with him into Turkestân an infinite quantity of baggage, together with the beasts belonging to it, and many vessels of gold and silver, as well as porcelain, such as in his country had never before been seen. This last particular seems to evince, that a body of Chinese themselves were intermixed with those roving eastern Tartars, or oriental Turks, who had been so rash as to undertake such a romantic expedition<sup>h</sup>.

What passed in
the Khalifat
of Spain, this

THE new Khalîf of Andalusia having violated the engagements he had entered into with Hayran and others, who had been so instrumental in his elevation, they thought themselves at liberty to conspire against him, and, if possible, to drive him from the throne. Hayran, therefore, wrote to Al Mondar Ebn Yabya, the governor of Saragossa, to join him with a body of troops, that he might thereby be enabled to dethrone the tyrant. Having united their forces, they marched to Corduba, and routed a large party of Ali's men, that sallied out of the town; but a dissension arising soon after between Al Mondar and Hayran, they reaped no manner of advantage from this successful action, which otherwise they might have done. This induced Hayran to think of placing the crown upon the head of one Abd'alrahmân, of the house of Ommiyah, who bore, according to Roderic, or rather the authors, he followed, a very good character. Ali, being informed of his design, pursued him from place to place, and at last defeated him. However, according to Ebn Shobnah, Abd'alrahmân found means to attain to the Khalifat; and Ali, if we will believe Roderic, was assassinated by some of his eunuchs in a bath. The assassins immediately fled from Corduba, and made their escape. As for Abd'alrahmân, he assumed the surname of Mortadi, or Mortada, as well as the title of Khalîf; his authority having been recognized not only by Hayran and Al Mondar Ebn Yabya, but likewise by the kingdoms of Murcia and Valencia, together with part of the people of Catalonia and Aragon. But the minds of Hayran and Al Mondar being afterwards alienated from him, on account of his ungrateful and insolent conduct, they took up arms against him, and were joined by the governor of Granada, in their revolt. Abd'alrahmân, being informed of their defection, pursued them to Granada, and formed the siege of that city. But the garrison, being animated by a misunder-

a standing that prevailed between the officers of Abd'alrahmán's troops, made a sally upon the besiegers, intirely defeated them, and killed Abd'alrahmán upon the spot. This unexpected event gave great pleasure to Al Kasem Ebn Hamûda, who succeeded his brother Ali at Corduba; especially when he understood, that Hayran, Al Mondar Ebn Yahya, and the governor of Granada, had submitted to him, and sent him all the valuable spoil that had fallen into his hands. Al Kasem, who had fixed his residence at Seville, now reigned without any competitor in Spain. Soon after his accession, he ordered two boys to be put to death, who had been privy to the murder of his brother. Roderic places the assassination of Ali Ebn Hamûda in the 408th year of the Hejra: but as, even according to this very author, Al Kasem swayed the sceptre three years, four months, and twenty-six days; as b both Roderic and the Arab writers agree, that Tabya succeeded Al Kasem in the 412th year of that æra; and as Ebn Shobnah asserts, that Ali Ebn Hamûda sat upon the throne of Corduba near two years; we cannot well suppose Ali's death to have happened before the year of the Hejra 409, or 410. Nay, if we place with Ebn Shobnah, Ali Ebn Hamûda's elevation to the Khalifat of Andalusia in 408, the latter must have been the year of that tragical event; though we are more inclined to pitch upon the former, as we cannot help preferring Abu'lfeda's authority to that of Ebn Shobnah in the point before us<sup>1</sup>.

As Kayed Abu Skajâ Azizo'ddawla's revolt against the Khalif of Egypt at Aleppo was not immediately extinguished, he undoubtedly continued in his defection the present year; though this has not been expressly affirmed either by Abu'lfeda, Ebn Shobnah, or Al Makin.
c The last of those authors writes, that the person who had by violence seized upon the Bulgarian throne (named John Bladisthlabus, or Bladistlaus, by Curopolates) was assassinated by the soldiers, about the year that we are now upon. The noblesse of Bulgaria, looking upon themselves as in a state of anarchy after this unexpected event, wrote to the emperor Basilus, and offered to make their submission to him. That prince, therefore, in the month of Shawâl, this year, took possession of the kingdom of Bulgaria, and had all the strong holds of that kingdom put into his hands; so that henceforth the Greeks and Bulgarians became one people, according to Al Makin, and the rivetted antipathy that had subsisted so many years between them intirely ceased<sup>2</sup>.

THE same year, an impostor, whose name was Mohammed Ebn Isnael, and his surname d Al Darari, appeared in Egypt. He assumed the prophetic character, and taught the people to believe, that Al Hâkem was God, who created the universe; and that it was their duty to worship and adore him. Nor did Al Hâkem himself discountenance such blasphemous notions, but on the contrary approved of and encouraged them. Nay, he loaded this e impious impostor with all manner of favours. Notwithstanding which, being detested by his subjects, a Turk assassinated him even in the Khalif's chariot. This occasioned great commotions in Al Kâkirah, which continued three days. During this interval, the populace plundered Al Darari's house, and pulled to pieces several of his followers. As the gates were shut, whilst the tumult lasted, the assassin could not make his escape; but was taken, thrown into prison, and at last executed for the crime he had been guilty of. Soon after f this commotion was appeased, one of Al Darari's disciples, named Hamza Ebn Ahmed, and surnamed Al Hâdi, encouraged probably by the execution of the aforesaid Turk, who lived at a place called Mesjedbeir, in the neighbourhood of Al Kâkirah, began likewise to act the prophet, and to propagate Al Darari's impious opinions. And in order to do this the more effectually, he planted teachers at Mesr, as also throughout the district of that city, and in several parts of Syria. These were to instruct the converts they made in the most abandoned principles of their infamous sect. They permitted their followers to marry within the prohibited degrees, to omit fasting, prayer, giving of alms, the pilgrimage to Mecca, and in fine all religious practices and pious exercises whatsoever. This new religion, or rather species of irreligion, being so well calculated to please and sooth the irregular appetites and vicious dispositions of most of the Moslems, many of them readily embraced it, and amongst these even Al Hâkem himself. He asked Al Hâdi many questions concerning the number, manners, and qualities of his adherents; and, notwithstanding the shocking tenets he maintained, greatly cared for him. He likewise abstained from the discharge of all the duties of his function, viz. public prayer and preaching in the mosque on Fridays, and the observance of the fast of Ramadân, as well as of the two Beirâms, or principal annual feasts. He also abolished for several years the pilgrimage to Mecca, and performed one himself to Al Thalabiya in its room. Nor did he send the annual present of a rich piece of damask to the Caaba, as his predecessors had usually done. These things gave great offence to all the sober Moslems in his dominions, who began to imagine that Islamism would in a short time cease to be the established religion there. Our historian adds, that the sect of the Dararites, or Dararians, grew very numerous at Tyre, Sidon, Berytus, or Bayreut, and the neighbouring districts. M. D'Herbelot, from some oriental writers, asserts, that Al Darari came out of Persia into Egypt; and that his successor, Al Hâdi, introduced an unlimited licentiousness and debauchery amongst the Egyptian Moslems. He moreover observes, that these profligate sectaries occupied a considerable part of mount Lebanon, and the maritime coasts of Syria<sup>1</sup>.

THE next year, being the 409th of the Hejra, beginning May 19th, 1018, Soltân Mahmûd undertook to subjugate the northern part of India, and carried the war into the country of Kisraje, about three months journey distant from Gazna. All which immense tract he absolutely conquered, and brought home with him from thence riches that were almost inestimable, together with such a number of slaves, that he exposed them to sale for only six dirhems a piece; and yet, at this low price, he could not dispose, without great difficulty, of all of them. It seems also to appear from Mirkbond, that he overthrew Gulkand, a pagan Rajah, in this expedition, and put 50,000 of his men to the sword. That Rajah had a beautiful wife, of whom he was extremely fond; but, fearing that she would fall into the enemy's hands, he first dispatched her, and then himself. As both Teixeira and D'Herbelot have been extremely short and concise in their abridgment of Mirkbond's relation of Mahmûd's achievements in this remote region, the present year, we cannot oblige our readers here with more particulars relative to them. After the conclusion of the military operations, Mahmûd returned to Gazna, loaded with the treasure, as well as covered with the laurels, he had acquired, this glorious campaign<sup>m</sup>.

Jaafar Ebn Yusef, the Emîr of Sicily, is deposed, and succeeded by Ahmed Ebn Yusef, his younger brother.

THE same year, according to Al Kâdi Shakhabo'ddîn Ebn Abildâm Al Hamawî, or, if we chuse to follow Abu'lfeda, the following year, the Sicilian Moslems besieged in his palace Tajo'ddawla Jaafar Ebn Yusef, their Emîr. But his father Yusef, who had formerly presided over them, before a stroke of the palsy had rendered him incapable of discharging the duties of his office, appearing, and promising to set over them Ahmed Al Akbali, his younger son, they presently dispersed, acknowledged Ahmed for their Emîr, and returned in peace, to their respective habitations. Ahmed, soon after his accession, had the title of Tayab'ddawla, that is, the strength, or support, of the court, likewise given him by the Khalif of Egypt. He continued to act in the capacity, or quality of Emîr, 'till the year of the Hejra 427<sup>n</sup>.

IN the 410th year of the Hejra, which commenced May 8th, 1019, one of Soltânô'ddawla's generals held an illicit correspondence with Asem Ebn Bakao'ddawla, who was possessed of part of the province of Diyâr Becr; which, being discovered, occasioned a war between those princes. Which of them proved superior in this war we have not been expressly told; though several actions, according to Mirkbond, happened in it. However, Moshrefo'ddawla, Soltânô'ddawla's brother, who seems to have been Asem's ally, by the treaty of peace concluded between the contending parties, before the close of the year in which the rupture commenced, was confirmed in the government of the Arabian Irâk. What was assigned Asem, by this treaty, that author, or rather Teixeira, his translator, has not said; but, as for Soltânô'ddawla, he was acknowledged, by virtue of it, the absolute sovereign of Abwâz and Fârs, two provinces over which he had presided before<sup>o</sup>.

THE following year, being the 411th of the Hejra, beginning April 27th, 1020, Al Hâkem, the Khalif of Syria and Egypt, having reproved his sister, Settalmâlic, Settalmâlîca, or Settalmolc, the daughter of Al Azîz Bi'llab, in very reproachful and menacing terms; she prevailed upon Ebn Dawâs, attended by two of his servants, to assassinate him, together with two horsemen and a boy that waited upon him. The scene of this dire transaction was mount Al Mokattem, according to Al Makîn. It happened near the sepulchre of Al Fokâ'i, or, as other MSS. have it, Al Kofâ'i, towards the eastern part of Holwân, says Abu'l Faraj. In order to excite Ebn Dawâs to the perpetration of so horrid a fact, she promised to place him at the head of the administration, and gave the two assassins he employed 1000 dinârs. The body of the murdered Khalif which the villains brought to her, she buried in her own house, and for some time kept his death concealed. But at last, when the people began to be in a great ferment about him, she convoked the grandees and principal courtiers, and discovered it to them. After which, she caused Ebn Dawâs and his two domestics, who had imbrued their hands in the blood of their sovereign, and all other persons in any manner privy to the affair, to be put to death; or rather, as we find it intimated by Al Makîn, she slew them with her own hand. Al Hâkem's violent exit happened in the month of Shawâl, soon after he had completed the twenty-fifth a year of his reign ; being then about thirty-seven years old. With regard to his disposition, the Arab writers have said little in favour of him. They have represented him as fickle and inconstant in all his actions, as impetuous, cruel, capricious, and void of all religion. He was, however, on some occasions, munificent, according to Abu'l Faraj. As he knew his subjects had sufficient reason to dislike him, he frequently walked in the night-time disguised, to know their sentiments of his conduct. He also employed certain old women, as spies and informers, to enter people's houses, observe what passed therein, and communicate to him the result of their observations. He was very severe upon the female part of his subjects, and destroyed several of them: Nay, he would not permit any of them to come out of their houses, or even to go up to the top of them. Nor would he suffer them to wear any shoes, imagining that this would effectually hinder them from making excursions into the streets, or any other public places ; but issued an edict forbidding such a practice. The Egyptians, therefore, during his reign, groaned under the severest pressures of tyranny that could be conceived. This excited several of them to write anonymous letters to him ; wherein they made bitter complaints of his oppressive conduct, and added to these complaints the most dreadful imprecations. Some went farther still, and placed in the highway a statue resembling a woman, with a girdle and shoes on, holding a sealed-up libel, or paper, in her hand. Soon after which, Al Hâkem himself, coming to the spot where the image had been erected, read the paper held out to him ; the contents whereof gave him such offence, that he commanded the city of Mesr to be reduced to ashes, and all the people therein to be put to the sword. The latter of these orders, however, he found not so easy to be executed, the citizens defending themselves with uncommon bravery, and repulsing those sent to massacre them with the utmost vigour. But, notwithstanding this, he found means to set the city on fire in several places, and plunder many of its inhabitants, during the time of the conflagration ; though he pretended to be ignorant both of the author and the cause of those public calamities, and even to be greatly concerned for them. When the flames had raged three days, the principal citizens assembled in the great cathedral church, which probably had been converted into a mosque, with copies of the Korân in their hands, imploring the divine assistance with many tears and lamentations, and sent a petition to Al Hâkem, subscribed by them all, and conceived in the following terms : “ We are all your servants, and Mesr is your city : and our wives and children are in it. We are not conscious to ourselves of any crime, that merits so heavy a punishment. If it is your will that we should abandon the place, we are ready to do it. But if this disaster has happened without your knowledge or permission, give us leave to drive the instruments of it immediately out of the city.” Al Hâkem returned for answer, “ That he had neither permitted nor commanded any incendiaries to burn the city.” Notwithstanding which, he dispatched private orders to the infamous actors of this tragedy to continue and even extend the flames, and massacre all the people that should fall in their way. A fourth part of the city being now consumed, and the citizens thoroughly pillaged, they came to a resolution to retire to Al Kâbirah. This so intimidated Al Hâkem, that he revoked the orders he had lately given ; which saved the remainder of the houses, that had escaped the fury of the conflagration, and repressed the insolence of the incendiaries, who had committed many disorders. For, they had not only pillaged and massacred a vast number of the Christians, Jews, and Moslems, without regard to either age or sex, that inhabited Mesr, but they had likewise ravished several married women, and forced their husbands afterwards to redeem them with large sums of money. Other women had also laid violent hands on themselves, in order to avoid being violated by these most infamous and shocking barbarians. In the mean time, the Dararians, and a considerable part of the mob, were so infatuated, that, when they saw Al Hâkem, who rode upon an ass about the streets, whilst this scene of villainy remained, they cried out, “ O our God, who art the author of life and death!” which cannot but imprint in our minds a very lively idea of the madness and impiety of the most corrupt and abandoned state, at which the Egyptian rabble, or mob, were now arrived <sup>p</sup>.

THAT this monster of cruelty and folly should persecute both the Christians and the Jews, Some farther in the manner related by various authors, seems not at all surprising, after the preceding particulars relating to him. delineation of his character ; though he appears to have been prompted to this rather by his innate cruelty, than any zeal for his religion. For, notwithstanding he sufficiently favoured the professors of Islamism until the 400th year of the Hejra, yet he then began to alter his conduct ; and was afterwards seized with such an irreligious frenzy, that he seemed to have a total disregard for all religions. Nor can we well account upon any other principle for his atrocious attempt to burn Mesr, and massacre all the inhabitants of that city. He a demolished the church of the resurrection at Jerusalem, at the instigation of the Jews, and above 30000 others, in Syria and Egypt, between the 403d and 405th years of the Hejra, as we learn from Al Makrizi, a Mohammedan writer. All the rich furniture, sacred vessels, ornaments, revenues, and possessions, belonging to them, he either confiscated himself, or suffered his Mohammedan subjects to seize upon, and carry off. He likewise obliged all Christian and Jewish strangers either to wear such a habit as should distinguish them from all other people, or to embrace Islamism, or lastly to quit his dominions. By these and other hardships, he so harrassed and distressed both Christians and Jews, that many of them became Mohammedans. However, not long before his death, he permitted the Christians to b rebuild their churches, and restored to them those that had not been thrown down. After which, they were allowed the free exercise of their religion, and had all their former privileges confirmed to them, in their utmost extent. This induced many, who had been Mohammedan converts, to return to the Christian faith; nor did the Khalif entertain the worse opinion of them for it. All sorts of necessaries and provisions, that had been usually sold in the market-place, he commanded the men to carry about the streets, and to supply the women with them at home. This silencing a clamour that had been raised against his edict, relative to the women's confinement; if any one of them afterwards presumed to come out of her house, in contempt of that edict, he punished her with death. Settalmalc, Settalmole, or Settalmolca, Al Hâkem's sister, caused Abul Hasan Ali, his son, to be saluted c Khalif of Syria and Egypt. This happened on the last day of Shawâl, about eighteen days after the assassination of his father. The young prince was born at Al Kâbirah, on Wednesday, the 14th of Ramadân, in the year of the Hejra 395, as we learn from Al Makin. He received the surname of Al Thâber Leezâz-dinillab, immediately after his accession. His aunt Settalmolca took upon her the government of Syria and Egypt, and survived her brother Al Hâkem about four years. At this time, there were no less than 16000 Dararians, who acknowledged Al Hâkem for their divinity, in Egypt, according to Al Makin <sup>1</sup>.

Mosbrefo'd-
dawla defects Soltâno'ddawla's forces.

NOTWITHSTANDING it had been formerly agreed, that Soltâno'ddawla should remain possessed of Abwâz and Fârs, and Mosbrefo'ddawla Ebn Babao'ddawla, his brother, should continue in the government of the Arabian Irâk; Soltâno'ddawla sent Ebn Sâleb, with a d powerful army, to drive Mosbrefo'ddawla out of his province. The latter of these princes met his brother's forces in the field, with an army much inferior in number; but as it consisted intirely of veterans, he easily routed Ebn Sâleb, and forced him to shut himself up in a fortress of considerable strength. Here he straitly besieged him, and at last obliged him to surrender at discretion; so that both he and his garison were made prisoners of war. This victory, which was gained in the year of the Hejra 411, so elevated Mosbrefo'ddawla, that he assumed the title of Shâhinsbâh, or Shâhensbâh, that is, king of kings. The success that had attended his arms secured to him the possession of his territories, though it did not immediately produce a peace <sup>1</sup>.

THE next year, being the 412th of the Hejra, commencing April 16th, 1021, Mosbrefo'ddawla put out Ebn Sâleb's eyes; but the motive to this cruelty we have not been told. He also entered into an alliance with Jalâlo'ddawla, one of his brothers, and joined him with all his forces. This measure was pursued by both of them, as necessary for their mutual support. It seems to have paved the way to the accommodation effected between Mosbrefo'ddawla and Soltâno'ddawla, the following year <sup>2</sup>.

Al Kasem Ebn
Hamûda loses,
and recovers,
the Khalifat
of Spain.

AL KASEM EBN HAMUDA, the Khalif of Andalusia, having been deposed by the people of Corduba, Tabya, one of his nephews, by the unanimous suffrages of the Moslems there, in 412, ascended the throne. He was courteous and munificent, and for a short time greatly pleased all his subjects. But, taking it into his head to go to Malaga, he gave Al Kasem, who was then at Seville, an opportunity of posting away with the utmost celerity to Corduba, and recovering the crown. By which it appears, that nothing could be more imbroiled than was the state of the Moslems, the present year, in Spain <sup>3</sup>.

Al Kasem Ebn
deposed.

IN the 413th year of the Hejra, which began April 6th, 1022, Al Kasem Ebn Hamûda, who had taken the surname of Al Kayem, not being able to repress the insolence of the Barbarians, or African Moslems, who supported him, and committed great ravages and disorders both in the city and territory of Corduba, was deposed by the citizens of that capital; who assembled in a body, and expelled from thence both him and the Africans adhering to him, many of whom were put to the sword. Being expelled Corduba, he went to Seville, where his sons then resided, and commanded the people there to fit up 1500 of the best houses in the city, for the reception of the African troops that attended him. This so incensed the inhabitants, that they shut their gates against him, sent his sons with g

In the mean time, after the expulsion of Al Kasem, the people of Corduba had set over them Abd'abrahman, cousin-german to Mohammed, one of their former princes, of the house of Quraysh, who sat not long upon the throne. For, though he had pardoned many of the principal citizens, who a little before his accession had consented to the election of Soliman Al Mortada, and afterwards delivered him up into his hands, he violated his promise, and sent them all to prison. The people of Corduba, being justly exasperated at this perfidious conduct, broke
- b open the prison doors, released the prisoners, killed Abd'abrahman, whom they found hid in a bath, and buried him in a house belonging to one of the suburbs of the city. He reigned only one month, and seventeen days; and was cut off, according to Roderic, in the year we are now upon "

- THE same year, Kayed Abu Shajâ' (U), who had assumed the surname, or title, of Abu Shajâ' Azîzo'ddawla, was assassinated in the citadel of Aleppo, by Bîrâz, an Indian slave. He was <sup>is assassinated at Aleppo.</sup> sent by Al Hâkem to Aleppo, as his governor of that city, in the year of the Hejra 407, as has been already observed. He arrived at Aleppo, in the month of Ramadân; and soon after, probably the following year, set up for himself in that city. He was no sooner dead, than Abu'l Manajem Bedr, who had been servant to Al Manjûbekîn, the Turk, one of Al
- c Azîz's Mamlîks, or purchased slaves, seized upon the sovereignty of Aleppo, and ruled there, as did his predecessor, independently on the Khalîf of Egypt. Azîzo'ddawla had reposed great confidence in him, and appointed him to command in the citadel; which enabled him, upon that usurper's exit, to make himself master of the city. After he had obliged the citizens to recognize his authority, as Sâkeb, or prince, of Aleppo, he took the surname of Wâli'ddawla, and made the proper dispositions for his defence. However, having received advice, that Al Thâher, the Khalîf of Egypt, had sent a numerous army against him, under the command of Safio'ddawla Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Jaasar Ebn Balâb Al Catâmi, and finding himself not in a condition to make head against the Khalîf's forces, he came to a resolution to surrender the place to that general. He, therefore, delivered
- d up the keys both of the castle and the city to Al Catâmi, as soon as he presented himself before the town. Upon which, Al Catâmi, in obedience to the Khalîf's order, made Sa'âda, surnamed Yamîno'ddawla, the commandant of the citadel, and took upon himself the government of the town. We must not forget to observe, that a treaty of peace was concluded between Mosbrefo'ddawla and Soltâno'ddawla, Bahao'ddawla's sons, who had been at variance between two and three years, before the close of the present year "

- THE following year, being the 414th of the Hejra, beginning March 26th, 1023, Mohammed, who succeeded Abd'abrahman in the Khalîfat of Andalusia, was destroyed by his own servants, who thirsted after the pearls, jewels, and immense riches, he was supposed to have amassed, after he had reigned one year, and four months. He visited the
- e frontiers of his kingdom, and was attended by a considerable retinue, formed of people who believed that he carried all his treasures along with him; which, as Roderic seems to intimate, occasioned his being poisoned, before he had finished his intended progress. The inhabitants of Corduba, having received advice of his death, placed Yahya Ebn Ali upon the throne; who, after he had presided over them three months, and twenty days, went to Malaga, where he formerly used to reside. This gave the Sâkeb, or Emîr, of Granada an opportunity of sending two persons of his family to Corduba; of which the people of that city being apprized, upon their arrival, they admitted them into the town, killed 1000 of the Africans then quartered amongst them, and obliged all Yahya's relations to fly to him at Malaga, where they were kindly received. Soon after this new revolution, Ismael Ebn
- f Habeth assassinated Yahya, and sent his head to Heshâm, who had fixed his residence at Seville. Idris, the governor of Ceuta, having been informed of the commotions and civil dissensions in Spain, crossed the sea, and came to Malaga, where he was joined by the Emîr of Granada, and others, who acknowledged him for their sovereign. Being at the head ferred to, was originally Shîn. Nor do we remember ever to have met with the proper name Abusaja (written corruptly for Abusaja') in any other eastern author. To which we may add, that Soltâno'ddawla himself has the agnomen of Abu Shajâ' given him both by Abu'lfeza and Abu'l Faraj (28).

of a large body of troops, he advanced first to Seville, and afterwards to Almeria, and a forced the inhabitants of both those cities to make their submission to him. In the mean time, the two persons sent to Corduba by the Emîr of Granada, after their admission into the town, became jealous and afraid of each other; so that both of them soon disappeared, and were never afterwards seen. The citizens of Corduba, therefore, pitched upon one Heshâm for their Khalîf; who, according to Roderic, reigned at Corduba two years, and four days, and in Frontaria, perhaps the modern Fronteira, two years, seven months, and eight days. His Hâjeb, or chamberlain, who was his prime minister, and governed with an absolute sway, excited the hatred of all the Moslems over whom he presided, by his wicked and oppressive administration. As his tyranny knew no bounds, he at last fell a sacrifice to the fury of those who had been the objects of it, and his master Heshâm was deposed. But this, b from a farther account of his infamous conduct, and the final consequences of it, will hereafter more fully appear *.

Sâleh Ebn
Mardâs takes Aleppo.

THE same year, Al Thâber, the Khalîf of Egypt, deprived Safio'ddawla Al Catâmi of the government of Aleppo, and appointed Abu Mohammed Al Hasan Ebn Mohammed Ebn Tha'bân Al Catâmi, surnamed Sanado'ddawla, to succeed him in that post. This we learn from Al Makîn. But Abu'lfeda relates, that Sanado'ddawla, whom he calls Ebn Tha'bân, was sent by the Khalîf of Egypt to govern the town; and that Mawsfîf, an eunuch, was constituted by that prince the commandant of the castle. Be that, however, as it will, both those authors agree, that Sâleh Mardâs, the Emîr of the Kelabite Arabs, of whom we have spoken above, marched with a powerful army to Aleppo, the present year. They likewise add, that, the c Egyptian yoke being grown intolerable, the inhabitants of that city opened their gates to Sâleh, and admitted his troops into the town; which obliged Sanado'ddawla Al Catâmi to retire into the castle, where Mawsfîf commanded a pretty numerous garison. The Egyptian troops, however, after having sustained a siege, were forced to surrender the place, by capitulation, to Abu'l Mansûr Solimân Ebn Tawf, Sâleh's secretary, for want of provisions. As soon as Sâleh had possessed himself of the city of Aleppo, he made this Abu'l Mansûr Solimân Ebn Tawf the governor of it, left with him a body of troops to lay siege to the castle, and marched with the rest of his army to reduce Baalbec; which, after some resistance, he took by storm, and put a great number of people therein to the sword. Sâleh having d dispatched an express to his master with the news of the surrender of the citadel, Sâleh returned to Aleppo, put a garison in the castle, and cut off Mawsfîf's head. He has been represented as a just and equitable prince by Al Makîn; who likewise informs us, that, after the above-mentioned conquests had been made, he assumed the title, or surname, of Safado'ddawla, and ruled the people of Aleppo about six years. By the reduction of the castle there, and the city of Baalbec, his territories extended from the latter of those places to Ana, and the frontiers of Irâk (W) *.

ALAO'DDAWLA ABU JAAFAR EBN CACAWIYA also occupied Hamadân, a city of the Belâd Al Jebâl, supposed by Goliûs to be the ancient Ecbatana, and erected it into a sort of principality, the present year. About the same time, died Ali Ebn Helâl, commonly called Ali Ebn Bowâb, who brought the beautiful character now used by the Arabs to great per- e fection, and whose name is yet famous amongst them, on that account. About this time, the Christians, likewise, in consequence of the edict that Al Hâkem had issued in favour of them, were suffered to repair their old churches, and build new ones, throughout the whole Khalîfat of Egypt, even at Haidab, a port upon the Red Sea, and at Jodda, a maritime town of Hejâz, at a small distance from Mecca, where they never were permitted to set their foot before *.

the year 415.

THE next year, being the 415th of the Hejra, beginning March 15th, 1024, Abu Shajâ' Soltâno'ddawla, of the house of Bûiyâ, departed this life, in the month of Shawâl, at Shîrâz. He succeeded Bakao'ddawla, his father, in the post of Emîr Al Omrâ, as well as in the f sovereignty of Persia and Irâk, and reigned about twelve years. We have already given our readers the account of the wars carried on between him and his brothers handed down to us by Mirkbond; to which we shall now beg leave to add that preserved by Khondemîr,

(W) In Erpenius's MS. copy of Al Makîn, this local name is Irka; whereas that it ought to have been Irâk, will admit of no dispute. For, we meet with no place, at least in the neighbourhood of Ana, denominated Irka; and that town is seated upon the Euphrates, at a small distance from Hella (29), a city (30) of the Babylonian or Arabian Irâk. This emendation, therefore, of the text of Al Makîn, we doubt not, will be readily admitted by all our learned and intelligent readers.

a another celebrated Persian historian. After Soltāno'ddawla, according to this author, had mounted the throne of Persia, in order to content his brothers, he sent Abu Thāber Jalālo'ddawla, one of them, to command on his part at Basra, and in all the Babylonian or Arabian Irāk, and on Mosbrefo'ddawla, the other, he conferred the government of the province of Kermān. But the latter of these soon after withdrawing his allegiance from Soltāno'ddawla, that prince was obliged to reduce him to reason by force of arms. The rupture, that happened between the two brothers, on this occasion, was terminated by a treaty of peace, concluded, in the year of the Hejra 409. The principal articles of which were, that Mosbrefo'ddawla should retain in full sovereignty part of Kermān, and pay his brother homage for the other territories he held of him. This peace, however advantageous to Mosbrefo'ddawla it might be, continued only two years; another rupture commencing between him and Soltāno'ddawla, in the year 411. This war was soon followed by a peace, the chief conditions of which were, that Mosbrefo'ddawla should be declared Soltāno'ddawla's lieutenant of the Arabian Irāk, that he should neither directly nor indirectly concern himself in the affairs of Persia and Abwāz, and that neither of the two Soltāns should ever employ as Wazīr Ebn Sabelan, who had set them at variance, and fomented the differences between them. But this new treaty being soon after violated by Soltāno'ddawla, who, upon his arrival at Tuster, or Tostar, the capital of Khūzistān, advanced Ebn Sabelan to the office of Wazīr; Mosbrefo'ddawla was so irritated at this perfidy, that he immediately took up arms, made himself master of the Arabian Irāk, and obliged his brother to cede to him all his dominions, except the provinces of Kermān and Fārs. Some of the copies of the Lebtārīkh make Soltāno'ddawla to have died, in the year of the Hejra 416; and others, in the 414th year of that æra. But the author of this chronicon is greatly imbroiled, and particularly in the dynasty of the princes of the house of Būiya; which may, perhaps, have arisen from the diversity of lections in different copies. According to the Arab writers, Abu Cālījār, Soltāno'ddawla's son, ascended the throne of Kermān and Fārs, after his father's decease. Mirkbond writes, that Soltāno'ddawla's son, then at Abwāz, whom he calls Abu'l Ganjar, having received advice of his father's death, immediately made the proper dispositions for repairing to Shīrāz; an escorte having been sent him by Abu Mokarram, one of Soltāno'ddawla's generals, to conduct him to that city. In the mean time, continues he, the Turks, or Turkmāns, settled at Shīrāz, declared for Abu'l Fawāres, one of Soltāno'ddawla's brothers, in Kermān; who arrived at Shīrāz, before Abu'l Ganjar had left Abwāz, and caused Abu Mokarram to be put under arrest. However, being informed, that Abu'l Kasem, Abu Mokaream's son, was marching with a large body of troops towards Shīrāz, and followed by Abu'l Ganjar himself at the head of a powerful army, he thought fit to abandon that city; which thereupon fell into the hands of Abu'l Ganjar, who was proclaimed Soltān of Kermān and Fārs. But a new revolution in a short time happening, that prince found himself obliged to cede those provinces by treaty to Abu'l Fawāres, who assigned him in lieu thereof the sovereignty of Abwāz. Abu'l Ganjar's friends, being by no means pleased with a treaty so dishonourable to him, excited him to assert his right to the territories he had been constrained to relinquish to his uncle. He, therefore, raised an army in the district of Abwāz, which was soon reinforced by his adherents, who flocked to him out of Fārs, defeated Abu'l Fawāres, and possessed himself a second time of Shīrāz. His competitor's orders were nevertheless obeyed in Kermān, 'till the day of his death. This is the relation of the troubles immediately consequential to Soltāno'ddawla's decease extracted from Mirkbond. Other authors affirm, that Soltāno'ddawla was not succeeded by his son, but by Abu Thāber Jalālo'ddawla, his brother. From whence it appears, that, both with regard to the principal transactions of Soltāno'ddawla's reign and the person who succeeded him, the eastern writers are far from being perfectly agreed. It may not, however, be improper to remark, that the prince denominated Mosbrefo'ddawla and Abu'l Fawāres, by Mirkbond, is called Ali Sharfo'ddawla by Al Makīn, and Abu Ali Mosbrefo'ddawla and Sharfo'ddawla Ebn Bahao'ddawla by Abu'l Faraj; and that the Abu'l Ganjar of the first is the Abu Cālānjār and the Abu Cālījār of the two latter of those historians. Which observations will help a little to disimbroil, if not intirely to reconcile, those authors, in some parts of their histories relative to the period we are now upon. Soltāno'ddawla is said to have died, when he was about thirty-two lunar years old. Set Al Malc, or Settabmolc, Al Hākem's sister, who had placed herself at the head of the administration in Egypt, likewise departed this life, before the close of the present year<sup>a</sup>.

In the 416th year of the Hejra, which commenced March 4th, 1025, Ali Sharfo'ddawla, The principal Abu'l Fawāres, Mosbrefo'ddawla, or Abu Ali Mosbrefo'ddawla, for he went by all those names, <sup>events of the</sup> died at Baghdād. khond, five years, and twenty-five days; and had not completed the 24th year of his age, at the time of his decease. He was no sooner dead, than the nobles and grandees of the court sent to Abu Thâher Jalâlo'ddawla, his brother, then at Basra, to come, and take the government upon him. But his arrival at Baghdâd having been by some accident retarded, another person was vested with the authority of Emîr Al Omrâ by the Khalîf. This so exasperated Jalâlo'ddawla, that he advanced at the head of a formidable army to the gates of Baghdâd. The Khalîf Al Kâder Bi'llah endeavouring in vain to appease him, a battle was fought in the neighbourhood of that city. This terminated in the intire defeat of Jalâlo'ddawla; who lost all his baggage, had a great number of his men killed upon the spot, and fled with the utmost precipitation to Basra. However, he met with better success, as we shall presently see, the following year. About the same time, Soltân Mahmûd undertook another expedition into India, penetrated into the southern parts of that vast region, and entered the kingdom of Sûmenat, or Sowmenat; which, after many victories gained over the natives, he made himself master of. Some historians say, that Sûmenat was the name of an idol, which the inhabitants of this country adored; and that this name was communicated to the whole tract, wherein that idol was worshipped. But Ferido'ddîn Atbur was of another opinion, when he affirmed, that Mahmûd's troops found in the country of Sûmenat an idol named Lât, or Al Lât. Mirkhond reports, that in the temple of this idol there were fifty-six pillars of massy gold, all covered with rubies and other precious stones. The idol itself was made of one intire stone, and had fifty cubits in length; but did not seem to be above three cubits high, the other forty-seven being buried in the earth. This idol Mahmûd broke to pieces with his own hands, and caused above 50,000 of its idolatrous votaries in a short time to be sacrificed. He also took out of the temple and the royal treasury of the king, whose territories he had conquered, above 5,000,000 pounds sterling, exclusive of the booty carried off by his troops, the quantity of which was likewise immense. The idol Lât, or Al Lât, was worshipped by the antient Arabs, as well as the Indians now subdued by Mahmûd, particularly the tribe of Thakîf who dwelt at Tayef. Nasîro'ddawla Ebn Merwân, the Sâbeb, or lord, of Diyâr Becr, took possession, this year, of the city of Al Rohâ, or Edeffa; which the inhabitants, justly displeased with the foolish and iniquitous conduct of Atîrâ, one of the Nomeirite, or Nomerite Arabs, who before presided over them, delivered up into his hands. As soon as the people offered to make their submission to him, Nasîro'ddawla sent Zenc or Zeng, the governor of Amed, to Al Rohâ; who, upon his arrival there, cut off Atîrâ's head, and caused his master to be proclaimed sovereign of the place. For the better understanding of that part of the Moslem history we are now upon, it will be requisite to observe, that the Sâbeb of Diyâr Becr mentioned here, is denominated by Abu'l-feda Abu Nafr Ahmed Ebn Merwân, and Nasîro'ddawla Ebn Merwân by Abu'l Faraj.

What happened, in the year 417.

THE 417th year of the Hejra, which began Feb. 21st, 1026, seems not to have been rendered very remarkable by any great number of memorable events. However, a numerous army of Turks, in some part of it, according to Mirkhond, laid siege to the city of Baghdâd; and took it, after a feeble defence. They were no sooner masters of this capital, than they plundered and set fire to it; by which means the people were reduced to extreme poverty, and the best part of the city was consumed. After which, not thinking themselves secure in the possession of their new conquest, on account of the incursions of the Arabs and Curds, they put themselves under the protection of Jalâlo'ddawla, then at Basra; who, having received advice of this unexpected revolution, immediately repaired to Baghdâd. Upon his arrival there, he went to the Khalîf's palace, was received by that prince with the utmost affability and condescension, and permitted to kiss his foot. After which, he had the sublime post of Emîr Al Omrâ conferred upon him, and continued at the head of the administration, or rather exercised sovereign power, at Baghdâd, 'till the day of his death. Hence, therefore, it appears, if we chuse to pay any regard to the authority of Mirkhond, that Jalâlo'ddawla was not vested with the supreme authority in the capital of the Moslem empire, though the contrary is plainly intimated both by Al Makîn and Abu'l Faraj, before the present year.

The chief transactions of the year 418.

THE following year, being the 418th of the Hejra, commencing Feb. 10th, 1027, Jalâlo'ddawla firmly secured to himself the charge of Emîr Al Omrâ at Baghdâd, and satisfied the demands of the soldiers in such a manner that he kept them within the bounds of their duty. About this time, as it should seem from Mirkhond, Soltân Mahmûd undertook another expedition into Industân, overthrew Gipal and Tandebal, two very powerful Rajabs, with exceeding great slaughter, and acquired an immense quantity of spoil. But for the parti-

a culars of this expedition, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to that historian. After Mahmūd had reduced India, or at least the most considerable part of that vast region, to his obedience, he established in one of the conquered provinces a tributary prince, or Rajah, of the house of Dabshelim, a most antient and puissant king of the Indies, cotemporary with Husheng, the third Persian king of the race of Pisbdād; of which our readers may expect a more distinct account, extracted from the oriental writers, in a future part of this work. The affairs of the Moslems in Spain remained still in the utmost disorder and confusion. Either towards the close of this or the beginning of the next year, Heshām, the king, or Khalīf, of Corduba, was deposed, and his Hājeb, or chamberlain, who acted as his Wazīr, murdered by the people of that city. This minister, who was of mean extraction, and discovered the lowness of his birth on all occasions, had, by his infamous and iniquitous conduct, excited the inhabitants of that capital to a revolt. He squandered away the citizens money and most valuable effects upon the Africans, or Barbarians, that supported him, quarrelled with all the grandees of the court, punished the innocent, and was guilty of the most criminal excesses, through the whole course of his administration. The people therefore, fleeced and oppressed in so flagrant a manner, laid violent hands upon him, and drove his master from the throne. Heshām, however, after his expulsion, was permitted to retire to a castle, or fortress, in the mountainous part of the district of Corduba, and his family to remain in the town. But, repenting afterwards of their lenity to him, the Moslems he formerly governed attacked the fortress in which he had shut himself up, seized upon his person, and put him under arrest. He had not been long in a state of confinement, before he found an opportunity of flying by night to Solimān, the Emīr of Saragossa; who assigned him a castle, named by Roderic Alzubela, for the place of his residence, where, according to that author, he continued 'till the day of his death. The deposition of Heshām gave the finishing stroke to the Moslem kingdom of Corduba, or Khalīfat of Andalusia, and to the domination of the house of Ommiyah in Spain; the governors, or Emīrs, setting up for themselves, after that event, in most of the principal cities there. The inhabitants of Corduba nevertheless still coined money with Heshām's name impressed upon it, as he had not been yet succeeded by any other prince. Nor was there, if we will believe Roderic, any regular government firmly settled amongst them, before the arrival of the Al Moradeta, or Molathemiyah, called Al Moravides by the Spanish writers, of whom we shall speak more fully hereafter; which introduced a new dynasty of Moslem princes into Andalusia, and the other neighbouring provinces of Spain<sup>a</sup>.

IN the 419th year of the Hejra, which began Jan. 30th, 1028, the Turkish troops muti- The Turkish nied for their pay, plundered the palace of Abu Ali, Jalālo'ddawla's Wazīr, and committed troops mutiny palace, amounted to the value of many thousand dinārs, they grew still more insolent upon this success; and even at last seized upon the person of Jalālo'ddawla himself, when he attempted to bring them back to a sense of their duty. Nor would they permit him to stir out of the house in which they had confined him, before the Khalīf had promised to e satisfy their demands; which he afterwards did, having parted with all the ready money he had by him, and sold all the valuable furniture of his palace, in order to raise the sum he had engaged to pay<sup>c</sup>.

ABOUT this time, Abu Cālījār having received advice that Soltān Mahmūd's troops were in Other memo-motion, and had begun their march for Al Ray, he wrote to Jalālo'ddawla, his uncle, and rable events proposed to him a defensive alliance for the safety of their respective dominions. But so of the year far was Jalālo'ddawla from entertaining any thoughts of this kind, that he in an hostile 419.
manner entered Abwāz, pillaged it, and carried off with him a considerable sum of money, which he found in Abu Cālījār's treasury there. The Turks and the Deylamites coming to an open rupture at Basra, Al Mālec Azīz Ebn Abu Mansūr, Jalālo'ddawla's grandson, favoured f the Turks at this juncture; which greatly disgusted the Deylamites, and protracted the troubles there. This gave Abu Cālījār, who after Jalālo'ddawla's departure had moved at the head of a powerful army into the district of Abwāz, an opportunity of making himself master of Basra. From thence he advanced to Wāset, and took it; upon which, all Jalā-lo'ddawla's wealth, together with his family and relations, fell into his hands. As for Jalā-lo'ddawla himself, he was obliged to continue in a state of inaction; his troops refusing to follow him, for want of their pay. As he had not by him a sum of money sufficient to enable him to satisfy their demands, on this emergency, he attempted to borrow one of the richest inhabitants of Baghdād; which drew upon him the general dislike of the people of that metropolis, Hammad, or Hamet, Ebn Yusef Belkīn Ebn Zeir Al Sanbāji, who founded the kingdom or dynasty of the Hammadites, in the African province of Bajayah, according to Abu'lfeda, died, and was succeeded by his son, Al Kayed, the present year. About the time we are now upon, Soltân Mahmûd began to break; his health being apparently, to the great concern of all about him, in a very declining condition. However, he sent one of his generals, with a formidable army, to reduce Al Ray, Esfahân, and the whole Persian Irâk; the success of whose arms will, in a short time, more fully appear<sup>f</sup>.

The principal transactions of Soltân Mahmûd, after his return from the last Indian expedition to Gazna, according to Mir-khond, the year 420. THE following year, being the 420th of the Hejra, which commenced Jan. 20th, 1029, khond, erected there a stately mosque, as an instance of his gratitude to God for the many victories he had obtained. Soon after, he made himself master of Majdo'ddawla Ebn Fakhr'oddawla's kingdom. This he did, by one of his generals, who penetrated into Al Jebâl, then possessed by that prince, and seized upon Esfahân and Al Ray, the two principal cities of that province. As Majdo'ddawla Abu Tâleb Rostam Ebn Fakhr'oddawla was a very pusillanimous and indolent prince, he made not the least attempt to oppose the Soltân's forces, but submitted, without striking a stroke; imagining that by such conduct he should so ingratiate himself with Mahmûd, that his territories would not be taken from him. But, in this, he found himself greatly mistaken. For, as soon as Mahmûd was informed, that both he and his son were taken prisoners, he immediately repaired to the city of Al Ray, where Majdo'ddawla and his family then resided, and first examined his treasury. Here he found 1,000,000 dinârs in ready money, and jewels that amounted to the value of 500,000 more. He likewise met with a vast quantity of gold and silver plate, and many other very valuable effects. Afterwards he ordered Majdo'ddawla to be brought before him, and asked him, "Whether he had read the chronicle of the kings?" To which he replied, "He had." Mahmûd then demanded of him, "Whether he could play at chess?" He answered, "He could." "Did you ever then, continued Mahmûd, read in the book, that "two kings reigned in one kingdom? Or did you ever see at chess two kings upon the "same checker?" Majdo'ddawla answering in the negative, he rebuked him for entertaining so weak and simple a notion as that of being re-instated in the government of his dominions. He then sent him, together with his son and Wazîr, under an escorte, to Gazna. He also ordered the noble library found at Ray, or Al Ray, to be transported to his residence in Khorasân; and, soon after, went thither himself. In the mean time, he left his son Mas'ûd at Al Ray, to preside over the people he had subjugated, this campaign<sup>g</sup>.

Another account of this expedition. THE circumstances attending this expedition of Soltân Mahmûd's troops into the Persian Irâk, and the reduction of that large province, having been differently related by other eastern writers, our curious readers will not be displeased to find inserted here the following abstract of that relation. In the 420th year of the Hejra, Soltân Mahmûd (X) undertook the conquest of the Persian Irâk, where Abu Tâleb Rostam Majdo'ddawla Ebn Fakhr'oddawla, the last prince of this country of the house of Bûiya, at that time, reigned. When this prince's father died, Seyda, Scida, or Seydat, his mother, was appointed regent of the kingdom; which she governed with great prudence and moderation, during the minority of her son. As soon as Majdo'ddawla came to be of age, he deprived his mother of the government, and conferred it upon Abu Ali Ebn Sînâ, or Avicenna, his Wâzîr. Seyda, by this event, becoming imbroiled with her son, fled to the castle of Tabarek, in Laristân, or the kingdom of Lar, which extends itself along the eastern coast of the Persian Gulf; where she met with a very favourable reception from Padarîn, surnamed Hafnûliya, who commanded there. Being assisted by that commandant with a strong body of troops, she advanced into the neighbourhood of Al Ray, overthrew Majdo'ddawla, who offered her battle, took him prisoner, made herself mistress of Al Ray, his capital, and remounted the throne. In this sublime situation she continued to give her subjects marks of her justice and wisdom, after she had most clearly demonstrated her courage and constancy in adversity. She granted audiences to her own ministers, behind a curtain made of transparent stuff; but to the ambassadors of great princes, with her face uncovered. She

(X) We are told by Mirkhond, that Manûjabar Ebn Kâbûs Ebn Wâshmakîn joined Mahmûd's forces at Mazanderân, in order to facilitate the reduction of the Persian Irâk; but that afterwards, believing Mahmûd might prove too powerful a neighbour by the acquisition of so large a province, he withdrew privately from the camp, and returned into his own dominions. However, as he apprehended he might by such a step have incurred the Soltân's displeasure; he endeavoured to obviate the ill effects of that prince's resentment, by sending him many presents of great value, a vast quantity of provisions for the use of his troops, and 400,000 dinârs in ready money. The same author seems a little inconsistent with himself, when he positively affirms this expedition to have been undertaken in the year of the Hejra 420, and yet a little after seems to place the conquest of the Persian Irâk in the preceding year (30).

(30) Mirkhond apud Teixeira. p. 266, 267, 283, 284.

a soon forgave her son, put the crown again upon his head, and only assisted at his councils. As long as she lived, his reign was prosperous and happy; but immediately after her death, which happened in the year we are now upon, Soltân Mahmûd, who was a very powerful neighbour, attacked the Persian Irâk on the side of Mazenderân, and approached the city of Al Ray, with an intention to besiege it. Before he entered the province he gave his generals orders to get Soltân Majdo'ddawla alive, if possible, into their hands. They found it an easy matter enough to execute their master's orders. For, Majdo'ddawla, through simplicity, came and surrendered himself a prisoner to them. Of which Mahmûd being informed, he caused him to be brought into his presence, and then asked him, "Whether he had ever read the Shâb-Nameh, i. e. the history of the kings of Persia, composed by b " Ferdîst, or the Târîkh of Abu Jaafar Al Tabari?" To which Majdo'ddawla replied, "He had." The other then demanded of him, "Whether he understood the game of chess?" To this question he likewise answered in the affirmative. "Did you ever," said Mahmûd, read in either of those books, or observe in that game, that two kings could be together in the same place with an equality of power?" No," returned Majdo'ddawla. "How came you then, subjoined Mahmûd, to be so imprudent as to put your- self into my hands, and by that means to make me master both of your person and c " dominion?" This dialogue was soon followed by an order from Mahmûd to conduct Majdo'ddawla a prisoner, under an escorte, to Gazna; where he in a short time ended his days, after his life had been one continued scene of debauchery, and he had almost completed the thirty-third year of his reign. It was no sooner known, that Majdo'ddawla had met with so hard a fate, than the cities of Esfabân, Kazwîn, and others, as well as Al Ray, submitted to the victor. In consequence of which, his authority was recognized throughout the Persian Irâk, where the house of Bûiya had ruled, with an absolute sway, so many years. The people of this province, however, grew weary of their new sovereign, and discovered an inclination to revolt, almost the very moment after they had so unanimously submitted to him. But Mahmûd treated with such severity those who refused to bear the yoke he had so lately imposed upon them, that he put to death at once four thousand of the principal inhabitants of Esfabân, and a very considerable number of those of Kazwîn, who had broke out into an open rebellion against him. By which means having appeased all com- d " motions in this part of his dominions, and settled his son Mas'ûd in the government of the Persian Irâk, he returned into Khorasân; and departed from thence, after he had made some stay in that province, to Gazna. As for Mas'ûd, he fixed his residence at Al Ray, the capital of the territories over which he was left to preside, as has been already observed<sup>a</sup>.

THE same year, Soltân Mahmûd Yamîno'ddawla overthrew a large body of Gaz, or Gazan, The Gazan Turks, commanded by Arslân Ebn Seljûk, and drove them out of Khorasân, where they had Turks are de- committed dreadful ravages and depredations. This we learn from Abu'l Faraj; who like- feated by Mah- wise informs us, that a great number of them were taken prisoners on this occasion, and mûd. that as many of them as occupied 2000 tents retired to Esfabân. In the mean time, Togrol Bek, Dawd, and their brother Bîgû, all of them sons of Micâyyel, Mikhâyyel, or Mikaël, c " Ebn Seljûk Ebn Yakâk, remained with a considerable force of the same nation in Mawarâ'l-nabr. A corps also of these Gazan Turks, or Turkmâns, that had escaped out of Khorasân, penetrated into Adherbijân, advanced to Marâga, entered that city, and laid the temple in ashes there. At the same time, they put a vast number of the inhabitants to the sword; amongst whom were many of the Hadhbâniyan, or Harâyyan, Curds. They likewise afterwards, according to the same authors, made themselves masters of Al Ray and Hamadân, and even seized upon Al Mawfel; though he seems to intimate, that the inhabitants of the last of these cities very strenuously opposed them, if they did not oblige them to abandon that place. The Gazan Turks, if we will believe some of the eastern writers followed by M. D'Herbelot, acknowledged for their great ancestor Gaz, the tenth son of Japheth, whom f " they also name Tzbesmgaz and Tamgaz, and are the lowest and most contemptible of all the Turkmâns. Since, therefore, these Turks obeyed the orders of Arslân Ebn Seljûk, or Alp Arslân, as he is called by Ebn Shobnah, it seems from thence to appear, that both Arslân and his father Seljûk belonged originally to this tribe, and consequently that they were not of such noble extraction as some authors pretend. The father of Seljûk is denominated Takâk by Abu'l Faraj, Dakâk by Al Makîn, and by Ebn Shobnah Dokûk, or Dokmâk; which in Turkish signifies a hammer, and is at present pronounced Tokmâk. M. D'Herbelot informs us, that Gaz had two sons, Bolgâr and Barthas, or Parthas; and that Parthas's descendants ravaged the extensive province of Khorasân, and were driven from thence by Mahmûd Gazna, in the year of the Hejra 426. But this last observation must undoubtedly be a g " mistake; as Mahmûd departed this life at Gazni, about five years before. The irruption, therefore, of Alp Arslân, hinted at by M. D'Herbelot (Y), into Khorasân, has been rightly placed in the year we are now upon by Abu'l Faraj <sup>i</sup>.

Sâleh Ebn
Mardâs is killed this
year.

THIS year proved fatal to Sâleh Ebn Mardâs, the Sâheb, or lord, of Aleppo, according to Abu'lfeda and Al Makîn. The Khalîf of Egypt sent an army, under the command of Bûsakîn Al Darîrî, to besiege Aleppo; which came up with Sâleh Asado'ddawla's forces in the district of Tiberias, near the Jordan, defeated him there, and put Sâleh, together with his youngest son, to the sword. This battle was fought in the former Jomâda, as we learn from Al Makîn. In order to make head against Bûsakîn, Sâleh had joined Al Hasan, the Emîr of the Arabs of the tribe of Tay, who had possessed himself of Al Ramla, and waited for the Egyptians upon the banks of the Jordan, with a full intention to give them battle. After the end of the action, Bûsakîn, or Anûstekîn, as Abu'lfeda calls him, sent the heads of Sâleh Ebn Mardâs and his sons to Al Thâber, the Khalîf of Egypt, then at Mesr. But Nasr Abu Câmel Shablo'ddawla and Bamâl Abu Alwân Moezzo'ddawla, his two other sons, made their escape to Aleppo, and conjunctly took the government of that city upon them. This is the account handed down to us by Al Makîn. But, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, Abu Câmel only survived his father, and assumed the sovereignty of Aleppo, after that prince's violent death <sup>k</sup>.

Mahmûd
Gazni dies.

THE next year, being the 421st of the Hejra, beginning Jan. 9th, 1030, Soltân Mahmûd Yamîno'ddawla Ebn Sabektekin, that great conqueror, died at Gazna, after he had reigned thirty-one years. He is said to have been about sixty-one years old at the time of his decease. Some authors, however, affirm him then to have been in the sixty-third year of his age. He was a prince endued with heroic virtues, and extremely zealous for the propagation of his religion; which he extended over a very considerable part of the Indies, exterminated an infinite number of idolaters, and demolished most of the Pagods (Z), or pagan temples, there. It has been remarked, that Mahmûd had only one vice, and that was too eager a desire of amassing treasures, of which he has been represented as guilty by several historians. It is true, no prince had ever a better opportunity of gratifying this passion; as he met with such riches in the Indies as could not elsewhere be found, and such as seemed sufficient to satisfy even the most insatiable avidity of gold and silver that it was possible for a man to have. He had for his Wazîr Ahmed Ebn Al Hasan, surnamed Al Meimendi, from the city of Meimend, one of the dependencies of Gazna, where he was born; but, being displeased with his conduct, the Soltân at last dismissed him, and substituted the Emîr Jenk Menkal in his room. As Al Meimendi had an uncommon regard for learned men, he took under his protection Al Hasan Ebn Sbarsfshah, surnamed Ferdûsi, the famous Persian poet, who, at Mahmûd's command, wrote the annals of the Persian kings in verse, Abu Riban, and others, that made a shining figure in the republic of letters; all of whom frequented Mahmûd's court, whilst Al Meimendi remained at the head of the administration. The Soltân's mother was daughter to the prince of Zâblestân, or Zâbelestân, whence it came to pass, that he sometimes went under the denomination of Al Zâbeli, or the Zâbelian, and particularly in a tetraſtich, or quatrain, of verses, made upon him by the poet Ferdûsi. He was the first proper monarch of the family of Gazni, his father Sabektekin having rather been a governor or viceroy than an absolute prince. With regard to his person, we find little more remarked of it by the eastern writers, than that he had a very ugly face. This, as he was viewing himself one day in a glass, gave him so much uneasiness, that he could not forbear repeating four verses to the following effect. "I have caused the glass of my
" mirror to be repolished; and having had it presented to my eyes, I find so many defects
" in my own person, that I can easily overlook those of others." The moral of which quatrain is plainly this, the knowledge of ourselves employs us enough upon our own imperfections, and disposes us readily to excuse those of other men. His first Wazîr having once observed an unusual melancholy in his countenance, took the liberty to ask him the reason of it. Mahmûd replied, "I have always heard it said, that the face of a prince ought to

(Y) M. D'Herbelot has been misled in this particular by Erpenius's MS. of Al Makîn, wherein Soltân Mahmûd is said to have returned from India, and to have found upon his return that the Gaz Turks, or Turkmâns, had made an irruption into his dominions, in the year of the Hejra 426. But that either two or three words have been omitted in this MS. and perhaps others of the same piece, through the carelessness and inattention of transcribers, we shall demonstrate hereafter, when we give a brief and concise relation of the principal events of that year (31).

(Z) We are informed by M. D'Herbelot, that the word PAGOD comes from the Persic FORGHODA, or POKHODA, which signifies either a temple of idols, or the idol itself adored therein as a god. But how far this etymon may be agreeable to truth, we must leave to the determination of our learned and curious readers (32).

- a "rejoice the sight of his subjects: I am surprized that mine, which is so deformed, does not offend the eyes of my people." The Wazîr immediately returned, "The excellency of a man does not consist in a good aspect, or a handsome mien. Virtue and the amiable qualities of the mind are the true sources of beauty, according to the sentiments of philosophers. Not one in a thousand of your subjects ever sees your visage, but your manners and your virtues are beheld by them all. It is by these that you must gain their hearts, and become the object of their affection." Nerkeffi, the celebrated poet, very well says, "When our manners are not more deformed than your face, there will be no reason for any complaints." Mahmûd profited so well by the advice of this wise Wazîr, that he became a pattern to all other princes, by his probity, his prudence, and his valour<sup>1</sup>.
- b THE following article, extracted from the Nighiaristân, affords us so singular an instance of this great monarch's inflexible attachment to sentiments of justice, that it would be unpardonable in us to omit an insertion of it here. A Turk, in Mahmûd's service, entered a poor man's house at midnight by force, and so tormented him, that he was obliged to quit his habitation, to abandon his wife and children, and to repair directly to the palace, in order to carry his complaints to the Soltân. Mahmûd was up, when the poor man came, and heard him so favourably, that he had reason enough to be filled with consolation. In fine, he said to him, "If this Turk should ever trouble you again, let me know it without delay." The Turk failed not to return three days after; of which the Soltân being apprized, he instantly, with a few attendants, went to the poor man's house, ordered the light to be put out, and immediately cut the insolent Turk to pieces. After this execution, he commanded a flambeau to be lighted, and then looked upon the face of the criminal he had dispatched; which was no sooner done, than he prostrated himself, returned God thanks, and asked for something to eat. The man, who lived in extreme poverty, had nothing to give him but some barley-bread, and a little wine that was turned. The Soltân, however, contented himself with his refection, and seemed well enough pleased with what had been set before him. When he was upon the point of returning to the palace, the poor man, who had had such signal justice done him, threw himself down at his feet, and most humbly begged that he would be so good as to inform him why he ordered the light to be put out at his first entering into his house, why he prostrated himself after the death of the Turk, and lastly how he could take up with so bad a repast? The Soltân answered him very courteously in the following terms. "After you had brought your complaint to me, I always suspected that no one could be hardy enough to commit such unparalleled insolence, but one of my own sons; and therefore, as I was resolved to punish it with the utmost severity, and would not be diverted from my resolution by a sight of the offender, I ordered the light to be put out. But finding afterwards that it was not one of my sons, I praised God in the manner you saw. And lastly, with regard to the repast, it is no wonder I should be satisfied with it; since the outrage upon you, which the Turk had been guilty of, so chagrined me, that it deprived me both of my appetite and repose for the last three days<sup>m</sup>.
- c NOT long before his death, Soltân Mahmûd appointed his eldest son Mohammed to succeed him in the sovereignty of all his vast dominions, except that of the Persian Irâk, which he had given to his youngest son Mas'ûd. After this, he asked Mas'ûd upon what terms he intended to live with his brother Mohammed after his death? "Upon the same, replied Mas'ûd, that you did with your brother Ismael." This answer touched Mahmûd to the quick. For after Ismael had formerly fallen into his hands, and he had pardoned him, he demanded of that prince how he would have treated him, if God had given him the victory? "I would, said Ismael, have shut you up in prison, and kept you there confined 'till the day of your death." This impertinent answer so irritated Mahmûd, that he sent him to one of his castles in Forjân, and ordered the governor to detain him there as long as he lived. He nevertheless supplied him plentifully with provisions, and all the other necessaries of life. By the answer Mas'ûd gave him, Mahmûd plainly perceived, that his two sons would not continue long in peace; and therefore he endeavoured to oblige Mas'ûd to take an oath never to molest his brother. But this he could not do, before Mohammed had sworn, that all their father's immense treasures should be divided between them, after his decease<sup>n</sup>.
- f THE distemper that carried this great prince off, according to some of the oriental historians, was a slow or hectic fever, occasioned by an ulcer in his lungs. Two days before his death, according to Mirkhond, he commanded every thing that was most valuable in his treasures to be brought before him; and at the sight of it, if we will believe that author, he could not refrain from shedding of tears. As he assigned no reason for this expression a of sorrow, the motive to it is not certainly known. But, because he ordered every thing to be put up again in its proper place, he seems to have been shocked at the thoughts of leaving treasures of such inestimable value, which he had amassed with so much anxiety and fatigue. In the 400th year of the Hejra, one single fortress, seated in the midst of a deep and extensive lake, and therefore deemed impregnable, where the Indians had deposited all the wealth of the Pagods, or idol temples, of the whole neighbouring tract, supplied him with no less than 7,000,000 dinârs, a large number of ingots of gold, and a vast quantity of pearls and precious stones. He also, as we are assured by Mirkbond, not long after laid siege to Baghdâd, and forced the Khalif Al Kâder, then incapable of making any tolerable defence, not only to surrender the city to him, but likewise to pay him the sum of 5,000,000 b dirhems. Besides all the other branches of his prodigious revenues, Manîjahar Ebn Kâbûs likewise remitted him annually, by way of tribute, for a considerable term, 50,000 dinârs. But of the state of his finances we may probably hereafter give a more particular account. In consequence of the dispositions with regard to the succession that in his life time had been made, his eldest son Mohammed succeeded him; but his brother Mas'ûd drove him from the throne, and put out his eyes the following year °.

la expels his brother from Aleppo.

BEFORE we conclude our relation of the principal events that happened in the year we are now upon, it may not be improper to remark, that Nasr Abu Câmel Shablo'ddawla expelled Ramâl Abu Alwân Moazzô'dawla, his brother, from Aleppo, and took the govern- c ment of that city solely upon himself, in some part of it, according to Al Makin. About the same time, Abu Câlijâr, who after Abû'l Fawâris's death had been called to the govern- ment of Kermân by the nobles of that province, advanced at the head of a considerable army towards Baghdâd, in order to drive Jalâlo'ddawla from that capital, and occupy the post of Emîr Al Omrà there. But his arms were not attended in this expedition with the desired success, as will soon more fully appear °.

Al Kâder's

THE Khalif Al Kâder Bîllah departed this life, in the 422d year of the Hejra, which com- menced Dec. 29th, 1030, at Baghdâd. He expired in the month of Dhu'l-hajja, after he had sat forty-one years, three months, and twenty-three days, upon the Moslem throne. He was eighty-six lunar years, and ten months, old, at the time of his decease. With regard d to his disposition, he is said to have been just, sincere, religious, devout, and extremely addicted to the giving of alms. But he was only a nominal prince; the whole authority of the Khalifat being then vested in the house of Bûiya. Notwithstanding which, as he was mild, munificent, and lived a very austere life, frequently visiting in the habit of a plebeian the tombs of the Moslem saints, both the Turks and Deylamites were touched with reverence of his person; and, out of regard to his sanctity and amiable disposition, treated him with the most profound respect. In the 393d year of the Hejra, when Al Kâder reigned at Baghdâd, Abuna Zaccariâ, or Zakbariâs, was constituted patriarch of the Jacobites at Alex- andria, and continued in that see twenty-eight years; during seven of which, he remained in a state of persecution, according to Al Makin. It appears, however, from some good e authors, that the church over which he presided, for the first seven years of his patriarchate, enjoyed a profound calm; though afterwards a storm arose, occasioned chiefly by the insatiable avarice of the Egyptian bishops, who, without any regard either to the fear of God, or the sacred canons, ordained the most scandalous wretches for money, and rejected those, when this was not produced, that were the most proper candidates for holy orders. Hence it came to pass, that the laity were soon immersed in ignorance and vice; so that they neither had the word of God preached to them, nor expressed any concern for the salvation of their souls. Some writers affirm, that the above-mentioned persecution raged nine years. The patriarch himself, during this interval, was treated with great barbarity. Nay, by Al Hâkem's order, he was thrown into a den of lions, together with Saw- fana, the Nubian; but those fierce and ravenous animals, though extremely hungry, would f touch neither of them, if we will believe Al Makin. He was buried at Al Kâbirab, in the church of Bani Al Wail; but was afterwards carried to the monastery of St. George, called by the Moslems Dair Al Habash (A), or Habesh, the convent of the Ethiopians. Which name

(A) Hence it plainly appears, that Erpenius ought to have translated the words Wadufn Ji Al Habash, in the passage of Al Makin, here referred to, ac sepultus fuit in monasterio Abyssinorum, and he was buried in the monastery of the Abyssinians, or Ethiopians, and not ac sepultus fuit in Æthiopia, and he was buried in Ethiopia; which contains in it an assertion that is repugnant to the faith of history, and even manifestly absurd. This observation, which is supported by some of the best oriental authors, will enable us to emend several other passages, not so intelligible without it, in Al Makin (33).

As Zacarîâ, or Zakkarîâs, had, in his life time, desired to be buried amongst the Christians of Al Kâbirab, or Mesr, whose faith and constancy, during the heat of the persecution, he vastly admired; his corpse was transferred from Al Kâbirab to the burying-place of the Jacobites belonging to that convent, and there interred. He was succeeded by Samutius, who sat in the patriarchal see twenty-five years. He has been represented as a great lover of money, and guilty of simony, by Al Makin; who likewise relates, that the see remained vacant one year, and five months, after his death. But, for the full and ample account of both these patriarchs, as well as a genuine description of their characters, we must beg leave
- b to refer our curious readers to Renaudot. The first day of Al Kâder's reign, wherein Al Darari sounded his impious sect (B), was Friday, and the last Monday. We must not forget to observe, that this prince declared Abu Jaafar Abd'allah, his son, with the approbation of the Emir Al Omrà, his successor, according to Abu'l Faraj, the preceding year<sup>1</sup>.

That poet, notwithstanding the great favours that had been conferred upon him by the Soltân, left his court, upon some discontent, in disgust, and retired to Baghdâd, where he put himself under the protection of the Khalif. Mahmûd, having been apprized of this, wrote a letter to that prince, and insisted
- c upon Ferdûsi's being sent back to Gazna; threatening, in case of refusal, to make an irruption into the territory of Baghdâd. Al Kâder, who was a person of great wisdom and moderation, returned no other answer to his insolent letter than the following words, in the beginning of the 105th Sûra, or chapter, of the Korân. "Hast thou not seen how thy

This Sûra is intitled THE ELEPHANT, and speaks of the miraculous defeat of the forces of Abraba, the king of Ethiopia, who entered Arabia with a powerful army, and a vast number of elephants, in order to destroy the city and temple of Mecca. The Khalif, therefore, thought, that nothing could be more à propos than this passage; as Mahmûd, who was king of the Indies, had a prodigious number of elephants in his army; and as he was only to be overcome by GOD, who had overthrown with stones, darted upon them from heaven by flocks of birds, the numerous troops of Abraba, the Ethiopian.

(B) M. Renaudot affirms, that the true name of this sect, which attributed divinity to Al Hekem, was Durazians, Druzians, or Druzians, and not Dararians, as we find them stiled in Erpenius's MS. of Al Makin. Hence he seems to infer, that this sect is the same with that of the Druses, seated in the hilly tract extending from Sidon to the Casravan mountains, called Druzi, Druzi, and Duruzi, by the Arab writers. But, as he offers nothing in support of this notion, and seems to depend only upon the affinity between the forms of Ra and Za in the Arabic alphabet, and the bare supposition of Erpenius's copy of Al Makin's being faulty in this particular, we are not very strongly inclined to come into his opinion. Besides, however wicked and absurd the religious tenets of the Druses may appear to be, if any credit is to be given to the best and latest authors who have favoured the world with an account of them, they bear not the least resemblance to the distinguishing principle, or characteristic, of the Dararians, who deified Al Hekem, the Fatimite Khalif of Egypt. Farther, if the Druses, who at present maintain a kind of sovereignty all over the Casravan mountains, be the Druses, or Druzians, of Herodotus, who supplied the Persian kings with recruits for their armies, as there is all the reason in the world to believe, they must have been a much more ancient people than M. Renaudot's supposition, or rather conjecture, will allow them to be. As we intend hereafter to present our readers with as good a history of the Druses as can be collected out of the authentic writers who have treated of, or rather touched upon, them, we shall take no farther notice of them here. It may, however, not be improper to remark, that the Rev. Dr. Shaw brought with him two manuscripts out of the Levant, which are said to contain the liturgy, or public service, of the Druses, and are deposited in the Bodleian library at Oxford (34).

A little before his accession, Abu <sup>is saluted</sup> Calîfar Ebn Sultân'âdawla, who had meditated the reduction of Baghdâd, penetrated into Irak; but was defeated by Jalâl'âdawla Ebn Babao'ddawla, whom the new Khalif afterwards confirmed in the post of Emir Al Omrà, and forced to fly with the utmost precipitation to
- MOD. HIST. VOL. I. 7 Z Abbas.

Abu'iz. When Al Kayem put on Jalalo'ddawla the imperial robe, he gave him the title of a Shahenshah, or Shahinshah, and ordered his name to be mentioned in the public prayers, as his father before had done. About the same time, the Greeks took Al Rikâ, or Edeffa, which then belonged to Abu Nasr Ahmed Ebn Merwân, called Nasro'ddawla Ebn Merwân by Abu'l Faraj; and Soltân Mas'ûd Ebn Mahmûd Ebn Sabektekîn, the sovereign of the Persian Irâk, extinguished a rebellion that broke out in the city of Esfahân. Those who had been the most active in the revolt he punished, left a strong garrison in the place, and then moved at the head of a body of troops towards the frontiers of Khorasân; intending, as he gave out, only to pay Soltân Miskammed, his brother, a friendly visit. Mohammed, having received advice of Mas'ûd's march, refused to make him any proposals for an accommodation, as some of his courtiers would have persuaded him to do, and detached Yusef Ebn b Sabektekîn, his uncle, to observe Mas'ûd's motions. In the mean time, that prince pursued his march with great celerity, advanced to Tangerabat, where Mohammed was then keeping the fast of Ramadân, and formed the siege of that place. As for Yusef Ebn Sabektekîn, who had been sent by Soltân Mohammed to reconnoitre the enemy, and Emir Ali, another of his generals, they both went over to Mas'ûd, and even at last found means to deliver up Mohammed into his hands. However, they met with the reward due to their perfidy and treason; the former of them having been thrown into a dungeon, loaded with irons, and the latter hanged, by Mas'ûd's order. Mohammed had his eyes put out, and was conducted as a prisoner to Gazna, which Mas'ûd possessed himself of without opposition, and obliged the noblesse, the courtiers, and the inhabitants of that capital, to take the oath of allegiance c to him. Having now assumed the sovereignty of all his father's vast dominions, he conferred upon Abu Salem Al Hamadîni the government of the Persian Irâk, and constituted Alâo'ddawla Abu Ja'far Ebn Cîcarwiyah, who had founded a kind of principality at Hamadân, in the year of the Hijra 414, according to Abu'l Faraj, the commandant of Esfahân. Ahmed
Ebn Al Hasan he advanced to the post of Wazîr, and commanded Abu Salem Al Hamadîni and Alâo'ddawla Abu Ja'far Ebn Cîcarwiyah to act in concert on all occasions. The last of these was of the house of Bâiyâ, and nearly related to Majlo'ddawla, of whom we have spoken above. He had been deprived of his territories by Malumid Gazni, but was restored to them by Soltân Mas'ûd. The latter of those princes, if we will believe Abu'l Faraj, reduced to his obedience the province of Kermân, before the close of the present year d.

The principal
 events of the
 year 423.

In the 423d year of the Hijra, which began Dec. 18th, 1031, Ali Takîn, according to Mirkhond, rebelled against Soltân Mas'ûd, and made himself master of the cities of Bok- hira and Samarhand. Mas'ûd, receiving advice of this rebellion, sent a powerful army, under the command of Altûn Tash, the governor of Khorârazm, to attack the rebels, before they became too formidable to his subjects. Altûn Tash, in pursuance of his orders, advanced with all possible expedition to Samarhand, where Ali Takîn at the head of his troops waited for him. The two armies had no sooner faced each other, than a general action ensued. As Altûn Tash was drawn into an ambuscade, his men gave way in the beginning of the engagement; but he presently rallied them, led them on again to the charge, and at last entirely defeated the rebels. However, as he was mortally wounded in the e action, he granted Ali Takîn such terms as he thought it his interest to accept, and died, to the great regret of Soltân Mas'ûd, the next day. After his death, that prince conferred upon his son, Harûn Ebn Altûn Tash, the government of Khorârazm, and consequently the command of all the forces kept on foot in that vast province f.

THE following year, being the 424th of the Hijra, commencing Dec. 7th, 1032, Ahmed
Ebn Al Hasan, surnamed Al Meimendi, Soltân Mas'ûd's Wazîr, who had been deprived by his father Mahmûd of the high dignity of presiding over his councils, departed this life.
 The person who succeeded him, in his sublime post, is named by Mirkhond Abu Nasr Ahmed, and Ahmed Ebn Ab'elfamed by M. D'Herbelot. He had been, if we will believe the former of those writers, Wazîr to Altûn Tash in Khorârazm, where he at this time was. It f seems to appear from the author of the Lebtârîk and Khondemîr, who have been followed by M. D'Herbelot, that Altûn Tash, the governor of Khorârazm, was not killed, whatever may have been advanced to the contrary by Mirkhond, before the present year. That great captain, according to those historians, having made an irruption into the country beyond the Jihân, was slain by an arrow, that pierced one of his eyes, when he was upon the point of engaging the enemy; upon which both armies thought fit to retire, without coming to a battle. Altûn Tash, continue they, died, the next day, of the wound he had received, and his son Harûn took upon him the government of the province of Khorârazm, in his room g.

a THE same year, the Seljuks, or Seljukian Turks, who had already made a great noise <sup>Th. Seljuks</sup> in Persia, passed the Amu, or Jihân, took up their quarters in Khawârazm, near the cities <sup>make an irrup-</sup> of Neja, or rather Nesef, and Abiwerd. Here they settled themselves, and in a short <sup>tion into Kho-</sup> time began to make incursions into, and pillage the neighbouring provinces. Several of the cities in India, reduced by Soltân Mahmûd, rebelled against Mas'ûd, as did also Al Ray and other places in the Persian Irâk, before the end of this year *.

THE next year, being the 425th of the Hejra, beginning Nov. 26th, 1033, a bloody <sup>The most me-</sup> war broke out between Nâro'ddawla Debais and his brother Abu Karâm Thâbet, which was <sup>morable transf-</sup> soon followed by a peace. Al Basârîrî, Thâbet's ally, having received advice of the conclu- <sup>action of the</sup> sion of this treaty, returned to Baghdâd. These three commanders were Emîrs of the Arabs, <sup>year 425.</sup>

b going under the denomination of Bani Asad and Bani Khafâjab. The same year, Romanus, the Græc emperor, departed this life, according to Abu'l Ferej *.

IN the 426th year of the Hejra, which commenced Nov. 16th, 1034, Soltân Mas'ûd, <sup>Mas'ûd car-</sup> having proposed not only to recover, but even to extend, his father's conquests in India, <sup>ries his arms</sup> carried his arms into that country, where they were attended with the usual success. This <sup>into India;</sup> project was, however, carried into execution at this juncture, contrary to the sentiments of <sup>which gives</sup> the wisest part of his ministers, who advised him to drive the Seljuks out of his dominions, <sup>the Seljuks an</sup> before he undertook the Indian expedition. But he refusing to listen to such salutary advice, <sup>opportunity of</sup> Mohammed and Dawûd, the grandsons of Seljuk, known afterwards by the names of Togrol, <sup>conquering a</sup> Bek and Jasfer Bek, began to make inroads through Khorasân, and, before Mas'ûd, <sup>great part of</sup> returned out of India, in the year 428, had conquered a great part of that province, <sup>Khorasân, and</sup> together with the Persian Irâk, and driven both Alâo'ddawla Abu Jasfer Ebn Cîcawiyab and Abu Salem Al Hamadânî from their governments. According to Erpenius's MS. of Al Makîn, a letter was received, this year, from Soltân Mahmûd in India; where he gave an account of his having killed 50000 infidels, taken 70000 prisoners, and acquired a booty amounting to above 1000000 dinârs. But, as Soltân Mahmûd died, in the year of the Hejra 421, this must be a mistake. In the room, therefore, of Al Soltân Yamîno'ddawla Mahmûd Ebn Sabektêkin, we ought to substitute Al Soltân Mas'ûd Ebn Yamîno'ddawla Mahmûd Ebn Sabektêkin; which, as it renders the passage consistent with what has been delivered on this head by the other eastern historians, was undoubtedly the original read-

c ing. The Seljuks, that made an irruption into Mas'ûd's territories, this campaign, are called Al Gaz, or Al Ghez, by Al Makîn; which, in conjunction with what we have formerly observed from Abu'l Faraj, seems to imply, that Seljuk himself was of meaner extraction than some writers have thought fit to allow. Be that as it will, the author of the Nigharijân treats the Seljukians with great contempt; and seems to intimate that the Gaz Turks, or Turkmâns, from whom they were descended, had always been looked upon as a low and despicable tribe. It appears both from Mirkhond and Al Makîn, that Mas'ûd reduced to his obedience Ferjân and Tabrejsân, which had been subdued by his father Mahmûd, and therefore probably revolted against him some time before, the present year *.

e THE Sicilian Muslims, according to Al Kâdi Shakhaboddîn Ebn Abildam Al Hamawî, being displeased with Ahmed Ebn Tufef Al Akbali Tayedo'ddawla's administration, sent a depu- <sup>The transac-</sup> tation to the Khalîf of Egypt, to complain of his oppressive and tyrannical conduct, in the <sup>tions in</sup> year we are now upon. That prince, continues this author, excited thereto by their just <sup>Sicily, during</sup> complaints, sent an army into Sicily, to oblige the Emîr to redress all their grievances, and rule them for the future in a more equitable manner. Al Akbali, being besieged by the Khalîf's forces in the castle of Al Kbalza at Palermo, for some time defended himself with sufficient bravery; but being at last killed, those troops imagined themselves to have executed their master's orders. The Sicilians, however, who enabled them to carry their point, soon after attacked the Africans, put above 800 of them to the sword, and forced <sup>the year 426.</sup> the rest to abandon the island with the utmost precipitation. They then proceeded to the election of a new Emîr, and unanimously pitched upon Al Hasan Samfîno'ddawla, the brother of the last Emîr, to preside over the Muslim conquests in Sicily, during whose government, those territories were so harrassed by civil dissensions, that a way was thereby paved in a short time to the reduction of the whole island by the Franks. This we learn from Abu Mohammed Abd'alazîz Ebn Sheddîd Tammî Al Sanhâjî, the author of the Akblâr Kairwân, or the history of Kairwân; though, if Abu'lfeaa, who cites him, may be depended upon, he seems to have placed the events here mentioned in the following year. It appears from some of the Christian writers, that the emperor Michael Pappalagon sent an ambassador to this Emîr to make proposals for an accommodation to him, and that a treaty of peace was concluded between these princes to their mutual satisfaction; which, as the Emir in all points conformed himself to the will of the emperor, so exasperated the Sicilian Moslems, especially the lower class of people, that they came to a resolution to depose him. His brother Abu Caab, taking advantage of the ferment occasioned by this disposition, endeavoured to seize upon the post of Emir. But being overthrown in a general action, to which Samsamo'ddawla had brought him, he applied to the Khalif of Egypt for assistance; which having obtained, he reduced his brother to such straits, that he found himself obliged to quit the island, and fly to Constantinople, in order to implore the protection of the emperor. That prince, who imagined himself to have now a fine prospect of recovering Sicily, treated him with the highest marks of distinction, and promised to support him in all his pretensions, against both his African and Sicilian enemies, to the utmost of his power <sup>a</sup>.

The principal events of the year 427.

THE 427th year of the Hejra, which began Nov. 5th, 1035, produced several memorable events; which we shall here beg leave just to touch upon. The Seljuks continued their progress in the reduction of the provinces of Khorasän and the Persian Irak, whilst Soltän Mas'üd was employed in the Indian war. The emperor Michael not being expeditious enough in supplying Al Hasän Samsamo'ddawla with a body of troops to reinstate him in the government of the Moslem part of Sicily, Leo Opus, the prefect of Italy, with a view of driving the infidels out of that island, attended him thither with all the forces he could in a short time assemble; and, being joined by Al Hasän's adherents, overthrew Abu Caab with very great slaughter. This obliged that Emir to fly into Egypt, and solicit succours of the Fatimite Khalif; who, being apprehensive that the civil dissensions in Sicily might prove fatal to the Moslem interest there, by his interposition, brought about a reconciliation between the two contending brothers. This obliged Leo to abandon the island, and retire to the continent of Italy. Soon after which, the emperor sent a large fleet, under the conduct of Stephen, his admiral, with a strong body of land forces on board, commanded by George Maniaces, to the coast of Italy, in order to invade Sicily. Maniaces, who had rendered himself famous by the victories he had gained over the infidels in the neighbourhood of the Euphrates, and was one of the greatest captains of the age, being joined by Ducianus, Leo's successor, resolved, notwithstanding what had lately happened, to make a descent in that island. Having, therefore, been reinforced by the Lombard and Norman troops then in the service of the princes of Campania, and a select corps under the command of Michael the patrician, surnamed Sphronylus, he set sail for Sicily, and arrived there about the time we are now upon. At first he met with an uninterrupted course of success in this expedition, took Messina and Syracuse, chiefly by the bravery of the Norman troops, and gave the infidels a most signal defeat in which they lost so many men, that the water of the Renata, near the banks of which river the battle was fought, was dyed red with the blood of the slain. But the Normans and Lombards, who were the flower of the Christian forces, having been afterwards disgusted by Maniaces, things took an unexpected turn. However, this victory put no less than thirteen places of strength into the conqueror's hands, and would have been followed by the surrender of all the other towns, had not the divisions in the Christian army hindered the production of so salutary an effect. This year, in the month of Shaabän, died at Al Kabirah Al Thäher, the Säkeb, or lord, of Syria and Egypt, and the fourth of the Fatimite Khalifs, after he had reigned fifteen years, and several months. He was succeeded by Abu Tamim Ma'bed, his son, who assumed the title, or surname, of Al Asfarer Billah, and sat on the Fatimite throne about sixty years. He was born at Al Kabirah, the 24th of Dhu'l-kajja, in the year of the Hejra 420, and consequently was not seven years old, at the time of his father's death, according to Al Makin. Some authors, however, make him to have been near nine years old, when that event happened. Be that as it will, he has been represented as a prince who had a taste for poetry, who governed his subjects with uncommon prudence and moderation, and who was enabled by his sagacity and address to detect many conspiracies that had been formed against him <sup>a</sup>.

The chief transactions of the year 428.

THE following year, being the 428th of the Hejra, commencing Oct. 25th, 1036, Soltän Mas'üd returned from his Indian expedition to Gazna, but found the Seljuks grown so powerful by the acquisition of Khorasän and the Persian Irak, that he had reason to repent his not having listened to the advice given him by the wisest of his ministers, before he

About the same time the Norman and Lombard troops in Sicily having been refused their share of the spoil, which fell into the hands of the Christians, after the late victory gained over the infidels near the banks of the Remata, by Maniaces, the imperial general, they deputed Aldoinus, a Lombard officer, to carry their complaints to that general. But no regard being paid to these complaints, they desired leave to retire; which being granted them, they returned to the continent of Italy, seized upon Melfi, or Amalfi, and several of the neighbouring provinces. Not content with this, they ravaged the country they had occupied in a dreadful manner; which Maniaces having received advice, he crossed the straits
- b of Reggio with a select body of his forces, to chastise the deserters, as he called these injured troops, and make them pay dear for their temerity and presumption. But, contrary to his expectation, he met with a defeat; which obliged him to leave them in possession of all the territory they had conquered, and make the best of his way to Sicily, to prevent the Moslems, who had received a reinforcement from Africa, from over-running that whole island. We must not forget to remark, that great confusion at this time reigned amongst the Moslems, who still were agitated by civil dissensions, in Spain. Mirkhond writes, that Abu'l Ganjar, or Abu Câlîjâr, reduced to his obedience the large province of Tabrestân, which had so lately been subdued by Soltân Mas'ûd, the present year <sup>b</sup>.

This most celebrated physician and Avicenna, dies, in the year of the Hejra 428. philosopher was born in the city of Bokbâra, or rather the village of Afsbana, at a small distance from that place, in the year of the Hejra 370; though his father, according to his own relation, was a native of Balkh. By that time he was ten years old, he had learned the Korân by heart, made a great progress in the belles lettres, and studied Euclid and Ptolemy's Almagest. After he had completed his tenth year, his father sent him to a gardener, or seller of herbs, to learn arithmetic, according to the Indian method of computing; the Indian figures, or arithmetical characters, beginning at this time to be in vogue amongst the Arabs. He was afterwards instructed in the rudiments of logic at Bokbâra,
- d by Abu Abd'allah Al Nâbeli, whom his father took into his house for that purpose. He then applied himself to the study of physic, and soon attained to a surprizing skill in it; insomuch that he had read many physical writers, and performed a vast number of cures, when he was but sixteen years of age. The next year and half he spent intirely in reading. When any abstruse and intricate point, that puzzled him, occurred, he went directly to the mosque, and never ceased offering up his prayers to God there, 'till this was cleared up to him. He both read and wrote much in the night time, with a lamp before him, and when his spirits began to flag, he drank a glass of wine; which greatly revived him. Many problems that had posed him in his waking hours, were solved to him in his dreams. When he had in a manner finished his studies in physic, logic, natural philosophy, and
- e mathematics, he proceeded to metaphysics and theology. In the former of which sciences he pursued, with great attention, one of the best authors then extant; but found him absolutely unintelligible, before some light was thrown upon him by an excellent piece of the famous Abu Nasr Al Firâbi, whose writings he vastly admired. In fine, this prodigy of learning had made himself master of every branch of useful literature, every noble science, cultivated in that age, when he entered upon his nineteenth year. His father then dying, he travelled into Jorjân and Dabestân; in the latter of which provinces, he had a severe fit of sickness. After his recovery, he returned to Jorjân, and composed there, according to Abu Obeidah Al Jûzjâni, the first book of his Al Kânûn, his abridgment of the Almagest, and other pieces held in good esteem. From thence he went to Kazwîn, and afterwards to
- f Hamadân; where Codbanawiya, or Corbanawiya, the Sâheb, or prince, of that city, advanced him to the dignity of Wazîr. But the soldiery, being afraid of him, at last plundered his palace, dragged him to prison, and endeavoured to prevail upon Shamsô'ddawla to put him to death. He was, however, afterwards reinstated in the office of Wazîr; though he declined accepting of that sublime post, when it was offered to him by Shamsô'ddawla's son. He then shut himself up in the house of one Abu Gâleb, an apothecary, where he finished the system of metaphysics and natural philosophy contained in the Kitâb Al Shefâ, except the two books treating of vegetables and animals. After this, he wrote privately to Shamsô'ddawla, and desired he might be permitted to live with him; which being discovered, he was conducted, as a prisoner, to the castle of Berdawân, under an escorte. Here he remained, in a state of confinement, about four months, after the expiration of which term, he was brought back to Hamadân; from whence he found means to escape to Esfa-

hân, in the habit of a Sîfi. Here he met with a reception from Alâo'ddawla worthy of a his superior merit, and put the last hand to several of his learned works. He had naturally an excellent constitution; but impaired it by wine and venery, to which he was extremely addicted. Having a most acute fit of the cholic, in order to accelerate the cure of it, he had eight clysters injected into his bowels in one day; which occasioned an exulceration of the intestines, from whence proceeded an excoriation, that was followed by an epilepsy. This, which is pretty frequently an attendant of the cholic, so weakened him, that for some time he could not rise; though at last, by the application of medicines, which he ordered for himself, he was able to walk. However, he was never afterwards thoroughly well. Not long after this attack, he accompanied Alâo'ddawla to Hamadân; but was seized upon the road with the same distemper, and continued very ill till he arrived at that city. There he languished several days, during which he took no physic, finding his strength not sufficient to struggle with the disease, and then expired. Both Ebn Sînâ and Al Fârâbi, his master, having been accused by Al Ghazâlî of falling into impiety; as they paid a higher regard to the sentiments of the philosophers, than to the principles and decisions of the Korân. Nevertheless, if we will believe Ebn Shohnah, many of the Moslem doctors maintained, that Ebn Sînâ was sensible of his error, and returned into the right way, a little before his death. The author of the Nighbâristân relates, that Soltân Mahmûd Gazni, having been informed, that the court of Mâmûn, king of Khowârazm, was adorned with a large number of learned men, who had distinguished themselves by their knowledge in the sciences, amongst whom was Ebn Sînâ, had the curiosity to desire to see them. He, therefore, dispatched several couriers to Mâmûn, to beg that he would give them leave to come to his residence in Khorasân. Most of these doctors, by Mâmûn's permission, resolved to wait upon Soltân Mahmûd; but Ebn Sînâ constantly refused to accompany them. However, being obliged to leave the court of Khowârazm, instead of taking the route of Khorasân, he made the best of his way to Jorjân; which so exasperated Soltân Mahmûd, that he sent portraits of him into all parts, in order to have him known and put under arrest; but without effect. For, he escaped to Jorjân, where he performed many wonderful cures. He had not been long there, before Kâbus, king of the country, having heard of his fame, ordered him to attend a nephew of his, who was afflicted with a malady which none of the court physicians could make any thing of. Ebn Sînâ had no sooner felt his pulse and examined his urine, than he judged his disorder to proceed from love, and to be the effect of a violent passion for some lady which he had concealed from the king, his uncle. In order to be satisfied in this point, he desired to see the keeper of the palace; and begged, that, whilst he was studying the pulse of his patient, he would name to him all the rooms and apartments of that fine house. The keeper readily complied with this request, and amongst others named one particular apartment, the mention of which occasioned an extraordinary emotion of the disorder. This being perceived by Ebn Sînâ, he asked the names of the persons who lodged there; and, when that of one of them, who was a lady, came to be mentioned, observed the pulse he was feeling to beat so violently, that he entertained not the least doubt, but the love of that amiable object had reduced his patient to the extremity in which he found him. He then publicly declared, that there was no other cure for him, than the possession of the person he so tenderly loved. Kâbus, having been informed of this discovery, had the curiosity to see his nephew's physician; and, as he had by him one of the portraits dispersed by Mahmûd over all the neighbouring provinces, he presently knew him to be the celebrated Ebn Sînâ. He then greatly caressed him, made him many valuable presents, and by no means obliged him to go to Soltân Mahmûd's court. The same writer has likewise told us, that the learned men of the city of Shîràz, in the province of Fârs, having read Ebn Sînâ's logical and metaphysical work, intitled, Kitâb Al Mantihaki, with the utmost attention, drew up a list of the objections they had to offer to the doctrine therein maintained and sent it by Abu'l Kasem Al Kermâni to Esfahân, where Ebn Sînâ chose then to reside. Al Kermâni having spent the best part of the night in conversation with Ebn Sînâ, upon his arrival at Esfahân, retired; and Ebn Sînâ, instead of going to bed, went into his study, and set about an answer to those objections with so much application, that he finished it, and put it into the hands of Al Kermâni, very early the next morning, who immediately posted away with it to Shîràz. The doctors there were so charmed with this answer, and so surprized at Ebn Sînâ's wonderful diligence, and unparalleled quickness of parts, that their former high idea of his transcendent merit was thereby greatly heightened, and they now adored him even much more than they had ever done before. This answer is not to be found in the compilation of Ebn Sînâ's works printed at Rome; nor is the treatise of logic in that collection any thing more than an abridgment of a larger work, which he had composed. He is said to have written his own life; though this has been done in a much more ample and copious manner by Abu Obeidab Al Jûzjâni, whom we have already had occasion to cite.

He

- a He observes, that Ebn Sînâ was first physician, and afterwards Wazîr to Majdô'ddawla, a Soltân of the house of Bûiyya; but that he was dispossessed of his office, on account of his attachment to wine and women. He was very unfortunate, according to this author, in the latter part his life; having been frequently obliged to change the place of his abode, for the safety of his person. He laboured under a complication of distempers, and particularly the cholic, as we have before remarked; which induced a certain poet, who made his epitaph, to say, that neither his books wisdom, or philosophy, could teach him morality, nor his treatises in physic the art of preserving his own health. One of his learned cotemporaries was Abu'l Rikân Mohammed Ebn Ahmed Al Bîrûni, an excellent astronomer and mathematician, who was extremely well versed in most kinds of literature, b cultivated both by the Indians and the Greeks. He lived many years in India, conversed much with the philosophers there, learned the sciences in the highest esteem among them, and taught them the method of philosophizing amongst the Greeks. He wrote many pieces, full of profound erudition; though he shone most in astronomy, according to Abu'l Faraj. The principal of Ebn Sînâ's works was his Al Kânûn, which has been abridged and explained by Sa'id Ebn Hebetallah, by Râzi, and by another Arab author. His tutor, or instructor, in the art of physic was Abu Sabl, a Christian, famous for a treatise, or system, he published, intituled, Me'yab-Kitâb, that is an hundred books. He was extremely well versed in logic, as well as physic, and every other branch of antient literature. He was held in the highest veneration amongst the people of Khorasân; and died, when c he was about forty years of age. To what has been said, in relation to Ebn Sînâ, we shall only add, that he had also a taste for poetry, and wrote a poem, during his confinement in the castle of Berdawân; a distich of which, as well as some short memoirs of his life, said to be penned by himself, has been preserved by Abu'l Faraj <sup>c</sup>.

- In the 429th year of the Hejra, beginning Oâ. 14th, 1037, Soltân Mas'ûd marched at the head of a powerful army against the Seljuks, who had possessed themselves of so considerable a part of his dominions. Mikâyyel, Mikbâyyel, or Mikaïl, Ebn Seljûk, the prince, or leader, of these Turks, dying a little before the year we are now upon, they put themselves under the command of his son, Abu Tâleb Mohammed, surnamed Togrol Beg, or Togrûl Bek, the Tangrolipax, or rather Tangrolipex, of the Greek writers. This prince receiving advice of Mas'ûd's approach, led his troops against the Soltân, in order to give him battle; and, at last coming d up with him, attacked him with so much bravery that he intirely defeated him, and pursued him to Tûs. He then laid siege to that place, and took it. Tûs being the first city that fell into the hands of the Seljuks, Togrol Bek assembled all his forces there, and fortified it. After this, he advanced to Nisâbûr, about twelve parasangs from Tûs, a place, according to Hamdalla, of great antiquity, and one of the principal cities of Khorasân; which, as no enemy appeared to oppose him, he easily made himself master of. This blow obliged Soltân Mas'ûd, who has the prænomen of Abu Sa'id given him by Al Makîn, to retire to Gazna, and abandon the most considerable part of Khorasân to the Seljukian Turks; who thereupon proclaimed Togrol Bek sovereign of the tract he had conquered, at Nisâbûr. However, he seems not to have been inaugurated in form, at least this must be allowed, if we pay e any regard to the authority of Al Makîn, before the following year <sup>d</sup>.

- AFTER Togrol Bek's authority had been recognized at Nisâbûr, according to some of the eastern writers, followed by M. D'Herbelot, he sent his brother, Jaafar Bek, to subdue the city and districts of Herât, or Heri, the Aria of the antients, situated in a salubrious part of Khorasân, to the S. W. of Balkh; which being soon effected, Togrol Bek placed one of his uncles over the new conquests, in order to govern them. In the meantime, he advanced himself with another body of troops to Merû; which he made himself master of, and established there his royal seat. This was followed by some regulations, which suppressed all the disorders that had for a long time reigned in Khorasân. We must not forget to remark, that Togrol Beg is called Rucno'ddin, or Rocno'ddin, Abu Tâleb f Togrol Bek Mohammed Ebn Mikâyyel Ebn Seljûk by Abu'l Faraj. The districts, or prefectures, of Herât, as we are informed by Abu'lfeda, were the towns of Carûkh, or Crokh, Mâlin, Kharjerd, and Bûshbekh, with their dependencies; all which were reduced to the obedience of Togrol Beg, or Bek, by his brother, Jaafar Bek, this campaign <sup>e</sup>.

THE same year, Soltân Mas'ûd Ebn Mahmûd Ebn Sabektekin assembled all his forces to drive the Seljuks out of his dominions; but the two brothers, Togrol Bek and Jaafar <sup>and overthrew</sup> Mas'ûd.

Bek, having also collected their troops, after an exceeding bloody battle, gained so complete a victory, that Mas'ûd found he had no farther business in Köras. It may not be improper to remark, that Jaasar Bek is called Jakar Bek Dawd by Al Makin; and that Jakar is only a corruption of Jaasar, arising from the identity of character of the Fa and the Kif, the different powers of the element representing them being absolutely determined by the different diacritical points <sup>f</sup>.

pened now in Sicily.

ABOUT the time that we are now upon, the Sicilian Moslems, having been reinforced by a body of fresh troops from Africa, took the field with an army of 10000 men. Maniaces, the imperial general, no wise terrified by their great numbers, drew up his forces in order of battle, and made the necessary dispositions for an engagement. Omar, an African Emîr, who commanded the Moslems, had ordered caltrops to be thrown upon the spot between the two camps, in order to annoy the enemy's horse. But Maniaces, by covering the horses' hoofs with iron plates, rendered abortive his design. The Christian and Moslem armies had not long been in sight of each other before a general action ensued, in which the latter, notwithstanding their vast superiority in point of numbers, were overthrown with incredible slaughter; the field of battle, and all the ground near the scene of action, being strewed with their dead bodies. In fine, this victory seemed to Maniaces so complete, that he looked upon himself as master of Sicily, and now so sure of destroying all the Moslems then in the island, that he had most earnestly desired Stephen, the imperial admiral, not to suffer any of them to escape in their ships. But, soon after, to his unspeakable grief, he received certain advice, that Omar the African general was safe on board one of his own ships, and the Moslem fleet stationed in a place where none of the Christian ships could come at them. This so incensed Maniaces, that he expostulated with Stephen in very sharp terms; which that admiral took extremely ill, and accused Maniaces to the emperor, to whom he was nearly related, of a design to arrogate to himself the sovereignty of the whole island he was at that time endeavouring to wrest out of the hands of the infidels. This accusation produced the desired effect; the emperor commanding Maniaces to be deprived of his post, put under arrest, and sent with an escorte to Constantinople, as a criminal. Stephen himself was appointed to succeed him, though he was neither famous for his bravery nor conduct. After him came one Basilius, an eunuch, intirely void of all military skill, but indolent, cowardly, proud, and covetous, to the last degree. At length Michael, the governor of Apulia, was sent to act at the head of the imperial forces in Sicily against the infidels; under whose inauspicious conduct, all Maniaces's conquests were lost, except Messina, which bravely defended itself against the combined army of the Sicilian Christians, the Sicilian Moslems, and the Africans, as from our subsequent relation of the state of affairs in this part of the world will more fully appear <sup>g</sup>.

Mas'ûd is defeated again
by the Seljûks.

THE next year, being the 430th of the Hejra, commencing Oct. 3d, 1038, Soltân Mas'ûd, who, after his late defeat, had retired to Gazna, set out from thence for Ferjân with a body of troops that attended him. On his march, he was informed, that a highwayman, who had committed many outrages in that neighbourhood, had taken post in a castle, at a small distance from him, with an hundred men. Mas'ûd, finding the fortress capable of sustaining a siege, promised them a pardon, and the secure possession of all their properties and effects, if they would surrender it to him. To this proposal the gang and their leader readily listened; but Mas'ûd, having gotten them into his hands, ordered them all to be hanged, alleging that no faith was to be kept with such enormous and abandoned malefactors. He had not pursued his march much farther, before he was met by deputies from several towns, sent to him to complain of the tyranny of Nûr Takîn, the governor of Balkh. Mas'ûd, being irritated at his oppressive and iniquitous administration, moved towards him, though in a hard frost; but, when advanced about half way, turned back against Dawd Seljûk, or rather Dawd Al Seljûki, a Turkish commander, then on his route to Balkh, with considerable forces, to assist Nûr Takîn. Of which the latter of these generals being apprized, he led all the troops he could assemble against the Soltân, fell on his rear, and took most of his baggage. But, notwithstanding this, Mas'ûd continued his march 'till he came up with Dawd Al Seljûki, whom he charged with great vigour, though with very indifferent success. For, being overthrown by him, he fled to Gazna; where he put to death many of the Turks, who served under him, because they had misbehaved in the battle. After this, he set on foot another army, and gave the command of it to Mawdûd, his son; whom he ordered to advance on the side of Balkh, not only to chastise Nûr Takîn, but likewise to defend that frontier, which seemed to be threatened with a visit from the Turks. Mawdûd was attended by Abu Nasr Ahmed, Mas'ûd's Wazîr, in this expedition. <sup>g</sup>

- a The Soltân having formed a plan of operations for Mawdûd, and settled every thing to his intire satisfaction at Gazna, released Mohammed, his brother, whom he had deprived of his sight, out of prison, and took him, as well as his whole family, with him into India, where he proposed to extend the conquests that had been formerly made. But; the following winter, he found himself obliged to quit that vast region, and turn off towards the city of Balkh, in order to defend himself against the Seljuks, who grew stronger and stronger every day in the neighbourhood of that place. Being arrived upon the banks of the Sind, called Pang Ab by the Persians, or the Indus, he passed that river, with his favourites, and left his equipage and treasures, together with Mohammed, his brother, under the direction of Mûs Takîn, or, as he is denominated by M. D'Herbelot, Tusef Ebn Pûs
- b Takîn, one of his generals, on the other side. Mûs Takîn, looking upon this as a favourable opportunity of aggrandizing himself, seized upon those treasures, and divided the better part of them amongst the troops attached to his interest. The revolvers, having committed this insolence, proclaimed Mohammed for their Soltân; upon which, Mas'ûd betook himself to flight, to avoid falling into their hands. But he was so closely pursued, that he found it impossible to escape. Being, therefore, made a prisoner, he was conducted to Mohammed; who, at his own request, confined him, together with the principal officers that could not be prevailed upon to desert him, in the fortress of Kobra Kebir. Thither he was sent under a strong escorte, and supplied with what necessaries he wanted. His brother, however, when this unfortunate prince took his leave of him, and desired some money
- c of him, could not be induced to give him more than 500 dirhems; though the person who brought him from Mohammed that trifling sum, commiserating his unhappy condition, made him a present, according to Mirkbond, of 1500 dinârs <sup>a</sup>.

- THE commencing of the Seljukian dynasty is placed by Al Makîn in the year we are now upon. He makes Togrol Bek to have been the first Soltân of this dynasty; though his grandfather, Seljuk Ebn Dekâk, was the founder of it. Dekâk, Seljuk's father, according to this author, being a person of great wisdom and valour, was consulted by the king of the Turks on all emergent occasions, and carried with him in the wars he waged against the Turkish tribes that were independent on him. He was the first of the family who embraced Mohammedism. Seljuk being of age, when his father died, the king assigned him the command of all his forces; but afterwards apprehending himself to be in danger from his crafty disposition, he resolved to kill him. This being suspected by Seljuk, he fled to Harûn Sababo'ddawla, or rather, according to the text of Al Makîn, Shahabo'ddawla, king of Al Jâbia, and desired assistance of him, to conquer the country of the infidel Turks. Harûn, in compliance with his request, furnished him with a numerous army, to enable him to execute his design. But, coming to a general action with those infidels, he was slain by one of them, when he was 107 years old. Ebn Shohnab relates, that Seljuk, whose father's name was Dekâk, was chief of one of the principal families of Turkestan; that, being followed by a vast number of friends and relations, the king of the Turks grew jealous of him, and obliged him to depart his dominions; that upon this he settled; and embraced Islamism, at Joud, one of the dependencies of the city of Bokhâra, in Mawarânu'n-nahr; and from thence he continually made incursions upon the infidel Turks, during the whole course of his life. He also agrees with Al Makîn, in relation to the number of years Seljuk lived. Kbondemîr informs us, that Seljuk was the son of Dekâk, chief officer of Bigû, prince of those Turkish tribes which inhabited the plains of Khozâr, or Kipchâk, to the north of the Caspian sea; that Dekâk was so renowned, among his countrymen, for his extraordinary wisdom and valour, that they gave him the surname of Tazialig, which signifies a strong bow, and hard to manage; that after Dekâk's death, Bigû took care to educate Seljuk in a proper manner, surnamed him Bâssâshi, that is, chief, or captain, and heaped favours upon him; that Seljuk, being afterwards apprized of Bigû's intention to punish him for his insolence, in presuming to enter the secret apartment of the palace, in order to see Bigû's women and children there, retired from court, passed the Sihûn with all his adherents, moved towards Samarkand, and routed in several engagements Belîl Khân, governor of that city, who pretended to oppose him; and that the advantages gained by him on this occasion, particularly one he obtained by means of an ambuscade, laid the foundation of his future greatness, and enabled him to present himself before Bokhâra, where he was very well received. We find scarce any thing in Mirkbond, as translated, or rather abridged, by Teixeira, relating to this prince. Of his sons Mikâyyel, or Mikaël, made the principal figure, and resided, for some time, in Mawarânu'n-nahr, where great numbers of Turks resorted to him, and pitched upon him from their general, according to Al Makîn. When Soltân Alimûd Ebn Sabuktêkin crossed the Jihûn, with an army to assist Warar Khân, king of Mawarânu'n-nahr, Mikaël went to salute that conqueror; who, admiring his courage, and the submission his family paid to him, intreated him to remain about his person, and at his return to accept the government of Khorasân, in order to defend it against all foreign a invaders. On Mikaël's declining the Soltân's offer, Mahmûd, enraged, sent him in chains to prison, and after his return to his dominions, still kept him confined. Notwithstanding which, his troops and family followed the Soltân, and by his appointment, settled in the plains of Khorasân. However, Mahmûd afterwards repented of this false step, and was afraid it would prove fatal to his family. Nor did he, as it should seem, conceal his apprehensions from his sons; as Mas'ûd, one of them, attacked Mikaël Ebn Seljûk, defeated him, and took a considerable number of his men prisoners. The Seljûks nevertheless twice overthrew Soltân Mas'ûd, about the time that we are now upon, if any credit in this point is to be given to Al Makîn. It has been already observed, that Togrol Bek was inaugurated, according to that writer, the present year <sup>i</sup>.

The principal occurrences in Sicily, this year.

THIS year, if we will believe Al Kâdi Shababo'ddin Ebn Abildam Al Hamawi, the Moslem affairs in Sicily were in the utmost confusion; some factious person or other setting up for himself, in most of the principal cities, fortresses, and towns, of the Mohammedan part of that island. Amongst these, one Abd'allah possessed himself of Trapani, and other neighbouring places. Ali Ebn Kema seized upon Castro Giovanni, or Enna Gurgenti, or Agrigentum, and other towns not very remote from them. Ebn Al Thamâm claimed to himself Catana and Syracuse, to which he annexed several districts, that formed a pretty considerable state. This was occasioned by the Sicilian Christians, who, being displeased with the Greek governor's administration, took up arms, and joined the Moslems, who, notwithstanding the overthrow lately mention, found means to receive a reinforcement from Africa, and enabled them to recover all the conquests of Maniaces, except Messina, or Messana, which was defended by Catacalus Combustus, posted therein with a body of Armenian troops. The Moslems, notwithstanding the intestine war, which had so lately raged amongst them, being grown superior to the Christians, laid siege to this city; which they pushed on with great vigour, during the space of four months, but without effect. For, the Armenians, and the other troops in garrison with them, destroyed abundance of their men, and at last forced them to abandon the siege. The immediate cause of which was a vigorous sally made by Catacalus, with 500 foot, and 300 horse; in which that brave commander penetrated to the Moslem camp, surprized the besiegers, then celebrating one of their festivals, killed Abu'l Afar, their general, and put a vast number of them to the sword. This so disheartened them, that they betook themselves to a shameful flight; upon which their tents, treasure, baggage, provisions, and military stores, fell into the hands of the besieged, who immediately took possession of their camp. After this unexpected blow, either by the civil dissensions that reigned amongst them, with regard to the election of a new Emîr, or the ambition of many of their seditious leaders, all of whom aspired at the supreme dignity, the Sicilian Moslems were split into a variety of factions; several of those leaders assuming to themselves the sovereignty of the most powerful and opulent cities, as has been just related here. The Greeks, therefore, at this juncture, had they pursued their victory, might easily have driven the Moslems out of Sicily. But Michael Paphlagon, or the Paphlagonian, dying, according to some writers, followed by Carusius, the very same year in which Abu'l Afar was killed, and being succeeded by Michael Caiaphates, in whose short reign, the Constantinopolitan court was hindered from undertaking any expedition, by the universal disaffection which then prevailed, and terminated in the deposition of that prince; the Moslems not only retook Messina, but soon after reduced the whole island to the obedience of either the Fâtemite Khalîf, or the Sicilian Emîr. However, before many years were elapsed, the Normans, under the conduct of the famous Roger Guiscard, styled by the European historians Roger I. king, or rather count, of Sicily, finally expelled them from thence, to the inexpressible regret of the whole Mohammedan world <sup>k</sup>.

Al Haithem dies.

EITHER this or the following year, Abu Ali Ebn Al Haithem, a celebrated geometrician of Basra, died at Al Kâbirah, according to Abu'l Faraj. This profound mathematician pretended to have formed a scheme to render Egypt fruitful, in whatever state the Nile might be; of which Al Hâkem, the Fâtemite Khalîf, being informed, he sent for him to Al Kâbirah, and treated him with great marks of distinction there. Ebn Al Haithem, in order to try whether his scheme was practicable, traversed the whole land of Egypt, and came to a place called Al Janadel, beyond Afwân, near the cataracts of the Nile, and on the borders of Ethiopia. But, finding he could not carry his design into execution, he took upon him to personate a fool, to avoid the effects of Al Hâkem's resentment; which he very much dreaded, as that Khalîf had furnished him with every thing which he judged

- a necessary for the execution of his project. After Al Hâkem's death; he laid aside the part he had acted, and spent the remainder of his days in the service of Almighty God, and works of learning. He is said to have composed several pieces upon geometrical subjects, and to have transcribed three books, in a very beautiful hand, and most correct manner, every year; for each of which copies, as soon as he began writing it, a purchaser was always ready, who engaged to pay him for it, without making any words, 150 Egyptian dinârs. Two of his cotemporaries were Abu Ali Isa Ebn Zara'a, a Christian of the Jacobite sect, one of the principal logicians of Baghdâd, and Mansûr Ebn Mokshbar, called likewise Abu'l Fetab, or Abu'l Fatab, by religion a Christian, an Egyptian physician of exceeding great note. Abu Ali Isa Ebn Zara'a translated several authors out of Syriac into Arabic, and died, in the year of the Hejra 398. Mansûr Ebn Mokshbar was held in high esteem by Al Aziz, the Khalîf of Egypt, whom he served in the capacity of physician, as appears from one of that prince's letters to him, couched in the most friendly terms, which has been handed down to us by Abu'l Faraj. He attended also Al Hâkem, Al Aziz's son, in the same quality; though neither he nor any other of the court physicians could cure a tumour in Al Hâkem's foot. This notwithstanding all their efforts to carry it off, grew every day worse and worse; till it was at last removed by a Jewish surgeon, who had lived in great obscurity before. For the surprizing cure he had performed, the Khalîf made him one of his physicians, gave him the surname of Al Hakîr Al Nâfe', that is, the useful poor man, sent him a sumptuous robe, and made him a present of 1000 dinârs<sup>1</sup>.
- b It appears from Abu'l Faraj, that Soltân Mas'ûd moved at the head of his forces from Soltân Mas'ûd Gazna to Balkh, and expelled the Seljuks from Khorasân, the present year; though this, it must be owned, seems to run counter to what has been advanced on that head by Al Makin. For, it can scarce be doubted, but the expedition mentioned by the former of those authors, in the passage here referred to, must be the same with that which has a place assigned it by the latter of them amongst the principal events of the following year. We must not forget to observe, that Sabt Ebn Wathâb Al Nomeiri, the Sâheb, or lord, of Harrân, commanded all his subjects to omit the name of Al Mostanser Bi'llah, the Khalîf of Egypt, and pronounce that of Al Kayem Beamri'llah, the Khalîf of Baghdâd, in all the mosques to which they repaired, to perform their devotions, before the close of the year we are now upon<sup>m</sup>.

d In the 431st year of the Hejra, which began Sept. 22d, 1039, Soltân Mas'ûd, having raised a considerable army, marched against Togrol Bek, and put him to flight; killing a great number of his men, and taking some of them prisoners, with their arms. This we learn from Al Makin; so that, if his authority in the point before us is to be depended upon, notwithstanding what may seem to be intimated to the contrary by Mirkhond, Mas'ûd could not have been deposed the preceding year<sup>n</sup>.

e THE next year, being the 432d of the Hejra, which commenced Sept. 11th, 1040, Togrol Bek returned to Nisâbûr, from whence he had been driven the foregoing year, and Soltân Mas'ûd fled at his approach to Gazna; upon which, the Seljuks possessed themselves of the whole province of Khorasân. Togrol Bek, having now no enemy to oppose him, seems to have treated the inhabitants of that province in a cruel manner, as an incredible number of people were slain on this occasion, according to Al Makin<sup>o</sup>.

f ABOUT the same time, Abu Sentakin, an eunuch of the city of Balkh, engaged some of the servants of the court to secure by violence Soltân Mas'ûd, and replace upon the throne Mohammed, his brother, as we learn from Abu'l Faraj. After this revolution, Mohammed ordered Mas'ûd to be brought before him, and upon that prince's appearing in his presence, said, "Chuse what place you please for your residence, that I may send you and your family thither." Having, therefore, pitched upon the castle of Kobra, he was conducted to that fortress, together with his wife and children, under an escorte. This was no sooner done, than Abmed, Mohammed's son, desired his father to lend him the royal, or imperial, signet, in order to seal up with it some treasures, that he had amassed; but having obtained it, he sent his servants with it to the castle of Kobra, where Mas'ûd was confined. Upon their arrival there, they immediately produced this, and told the governor they had a particular message to deliver to Mas'ûd; when being admitted into his apartment, in obedience to Abmed's command, they assassinated that unfortunate prince. This barbarity reaching the ears of Mawdûd, Mas'ûd's son, who was then in Khorasân; he immediately marched with a powerful army to Gazna, overthrew in a great battle his uncle Mohammed, and took him prisoner, together with Abmed, his son, and Abu Sentakin, the eunuch of Balkh, who had been the principal person concerned in the deposition of his father. Having now got Mohammed and his whole family into his hands, as well as the murderers of Mas'ūd, he commanded them all to be executed, and without farther opposition ascended his father's throne. This account we have extracted from Abu'l Faraj; but Mirkbond relates the affair in a different manner. He informs us, that Mohammed, not long after his second accession, perceiving that the loss of his sight, of which he had been deprived by Mas'ūd, rendered him incapable of business, resigned the government to Ahmed, his son; who, at the instigation of two wicked persons, acted by a vindictive spirit, went to Kobra Kebir, the castle in which Mas'ūd was confined, and murdered him, the present year. His son, Mawdūd, then at Balkh, having received advice of what had happened to his father, at the head of a well-disciplined army advanced to Gazna, brought Mohammed, lately returned from India, to a general action, routed him, and took him prisoner. Ahmed, his son, and the two persons who had excited him to destroy Mas'ūd, not having been able to make their escape, were, together with Mohammed, sacrificed to the manes of Mas'ūd by the victor. He, however, spared one of Mohammed's sons, who had expressed some regard and compassion for Mas'ūd, when in a state of confinement; and erected a magnificent structure on the spot, where the late victory had been obtained. Mas'ūd has been represented as a brave (C) and generous prince, perfectly well skilled in the military art, and as one who governed his subjects with great prudence and moderation, by Mirkbond and Al Makin; the latter of which authors styles him king of Khorasān, India and Matwarā'lnabr, and says he was succeeded by Mohammed, his brother. He likewise writes, that Mawdūd, the son of Sa'id, Mas'ūd's nephew, having been apprized of his uncle's violent death, led an army against Mohammed, the new king, overthrew him, and mounted the throne; as also that the murder of Mas'ūd, as well as the above-mentioned occurrences immediately consequential to that event, is to be ranked amongst the transactions of the following year <sup>p</sup>.

What happened in Jorjān, Tabrestān, and Syria.

THE 433d year of the Hejra, beginning Aug. 31st, 1041, proved extremely fortunate to Togrol Bek, Soltān of the Seljuks; who before the close of it, made himself master of Jorjān and Tabrestān, and even penetrated into the Persian Irāk. A little before this happened, according to the author of the Lebtārīkh, Mas'ūd was overthrown by the Seljuks, in a great battle fought in the plains of Zandekou; soon after which, the Khalīf Al Kāyem, sent the patent, or instrument, of investiture, from Baghdād, to the two brothers, Togrol Bek and Jaafar Bek. The same year, Moezzo'ddawla, or rather, as Abu'lfeda calls him, Abu Okwān Thamal Moezzo'ddawla, took upon himself the government of Aleppo; the inhabitants, after the death of Anūshtekīn, Anūsh Takīn, Al Darīri, or Al Dezberi, as he is named by different authors, delivering up that city to him. This Anūshtekīn, having been sent by Al Mostanser Bi'llah, the Khalīf of Egypt, with a formidable army, to reduce Aleppo, which then obeyed the orders of Abu Camel Nafr Shablo'ddawla, Sāleh Ebn Mardās's son; he overthrew that prince with very great slaughter, in the month of Shaabān, and the year of the Hejra 429. This battle, which was fought near the banks of the Asus, between Hamah, or Hamath, Casartāb, and Shaizar, decided the fate of Syria; the victory gained on this occasion being so complete, that, if Abu'lfeda may be credited, not only the city of Aleppo, but the whole province of Syria likewise submitted to the Fātemite Khalīf. As for Abu Camel Nafr Shablo'ddawla himself, he was killed in the action, after he had presided over the people of Aleppo eight years, and several months according to Al Makin. After which, if we will believe that author, Moezzo'ddawla Ebn Sāleh Ebn Mardās, who had before been expelled Aleppo by Shablo'ddawla, his brother, in the year of the Hejra 421, repossessed himself of that capital. Mokled Ebn Shablo'ddawla, his nephew, he appointed to command in the castle, and then retired towards the Euphrates, in order to implore the assistance of the Arab tribes seated in the neighbourhood of that river against Anūshtekīn. But, before he returned, that general had seized upon Aleppo; which he entered triumphantly in the month of Ramadān. This Anūshtekīn, or rather Anūsh Takīn, denominated Būsekīn Al Darīri by Al Makin, was originally a Turk, brought as a Mamlūk, or purchased slave, by some merchants into Syria; where he was bought by one Darīr, a Deylamite, a person of great sway in that country, who gave him to the Khalīf of Egypt. That prince, finding him a man of vast courage and an uncommon capacity, placed him in an

(C) According to the author of the Lebtārīkh and Khondemir, Mas'ūd was so liberal and munificent a prince, that he won the hearts, and conciliated to himself the affections, of all the men of learning and genius of the age in which he lived. Some authors relate, that a honourable station, and at last raised him to the dignity of commander-in-chief of all his forces. He ruled the inhabitants of the city and district of Aleppo, if not those of all the other parts of Syria, as Abu'lfeda seems to intimate, to the time of his death, that is, to the 25th day of the former Jomâda, the present year. He acquired much wealth, and a vast reputation, by his victory over Shablo'ddawla's troops. He was no sooner dead, than the people of Aleppo called Moezzo'ddawla Ebn Sâleb Mardâs to the throne. He was at Al Ramla, when the citizens did him the honour to acknowledge him for their Sâheb, or prince. But he posted away with all possible celerity to Aleppo, as soon as he had received the news of that happy and auspicious event <sup>a</sup>.

Tūfēs Ebn Pūs Takīn and others went with Ahmed Ebn Mohammed to the castle where Mas'ūd was confined, when he caused that prince to be murdered there, in the year of the Hejra 433 (35).

b THE same year, Abu'l Kasem, who had set up for himself at Seville in Andalusia, departed <sup>The transactions in Spain.</sup> this life. He was first Al Kâdi, or judge, and afterwards presided several years over the people of that city in quality of Emîr. About the time that this usurper took upon himself the government of Seville, one Yabwar Ebn Mohammed assumed the sovereignty of Corduba; and was, after his death, succeeded by Mohammed, his son. It may not be improper to remark, that the inhabitants of Corduba, being in a state of anarchy, imprest the name of Heshâm, their last king, upon the current coin, and to all publick instruments affixed his seal, during the interval between their recognition of his successor's authority and the deposition of that prince <sup>c</sup>.

c IN the 434th year of the Hejra, commencing Aug. 20th, 1042, Ibrahim Neâl Al Seljûki <sup>The principal
events of the year 434.</sup> made an irruption into the Persian Irâk, and possessed himself of Hamadân. He was followed by Togrol Bek, who took Al Ray in that province. After this, the latter of those generals, upon a partition of the Seljûkian territories, had for his share all the provinces he and his brother had subdued, except Khorasân; which, by the mutual consent of both parties, was assigned Jaafar Bek. Mirkbond writes, that both Persia and India, after Mas'ûd's death, were agitated by fresh commotions; and that Mayudûd, Mawdûd's brother, projected an invasion of his dominions, but died upon his march. In the mean time, Mawdûd, by that prince's death, became possessed both of the Indian conquests and the kingdom of Mawarâ'lnabr. We must not forget to observe, that this Soltân is named Maodud, by Mirkbond, or rather Teixeira, in his Spanish abridgment of that author, and Mawdûd both by Abu'l Faraj and Al Makîn <sup>d</sup>.

d THE following year, being the 335th of the Hejra, which began Aug. 10th, 1043, a <sup>The Gaz Turks, or Turkmâns;

ruption into
Mesopotamia.</sup> body of 1650 Gaz horse, under the conduct of Kûkîas, Abu Ali Ebn Al Dabkân, Al Hâji Israhel, and Abu Mansûr, advanced into the districts of Amed and Mayyâfârakîn, then possessed by Al Emîr Abu Nasr Ebn Merwân. From thence they moved to Nasîbîn; which they, for some time, besieged. But that city not being disposed to surrender soon, after they had cut down all the trees in the neighbourhood of it, they marched to Al Mawfel. Karwâs Ebn Al Mektader, the Sâheb, or prince, of the place, not finding himself in a condition to oppose them, bought his peace of them with a sum of money. Notwithstanding which, having destroyed the other cities of Diyâr Becr and Al Jazîra, they returned to Al Mawfel, took and pillaged it, put some of the inhabitants to the sword, and made others <sup>e</sup> of them prisoners. The Arabs, being apprized of what had happened, assembled on all sides, besieged them, and at last forced them to abandon the city. They afterwards defeated them in several engagements, killed a great number of them, and obliged the rest to fly to Mayyâfârakîn; from whence, with all the spoil they could carry off, they retired into Adherbijân. The Gaz employed in this irruption seem to have been a detachment sent by Togrol Bek, who had fixed his seat at Hamadân, out of the Persian Irâk, to ravage the Arab territories above-mentioned; but we are not told what became of them, after their arrival in Adherbijân; whither they were driven by the Khalîf of Baghdâd's troops out of Mesopotamia <sup>f</sup>.

f THE same year, Jalâlo'ddawla Ebn Babao'ddawla, of the house of Bûiya, departed this <sup>Jalâlo'ddawla dies.</sup> life, at Baghdâd. He remained in the post of Emîr Al Omrâ, according to Mirkbond, seventeen years (D), and was succeeded by Abu Câlîjâr, Abu Câlânjâr, or Abu'l Ganjâr, Ebn Soltânno'ddawla, his nephew. This we find asserted both by Mirkbond and Abu'l Faraj. But Al Azîz Abu Mansûr, his son, was mentioned in the mosques as his successor, after his decease, (D) Khondemir and Mirkbond agree, in the point here mentioned; but the authors of the Lebtârikh and Nighi- aristân make him to have reigned at Baghdâd, or been Emîr Al Omrâ there, twenty-five years (36).

if we can depend upon Al Makin. Soon after Al Kâsem's elevation to the Khalifat, the soldiers mutinied at Baghdâd, and plundered the palace of Jalâlo'ddawla's Wazîr. They also sent for Abu Câlîjâr, and nominated him Emîr Al Omrà, or, in the stile of Mirkbond, proclaimed him king of Baghdâd. Abu Câlîjâr, being advised not to concern himself in the broils which disturbed the repose of that city, declined accepting the offer they had made him; upon which, the Turkish troops, who were then mutineers, submitted to Jalâlo'ddawla, and the public tranquillity was re-established. But they soon committed fresh violences, and even set fire to the capital in several places. In the 427th year of the Hejra, they openly revolted against Jalâlo'ddawla, and attempted to expel him the city; which they would have effected, had he not opposed them with wisdom and resolution. The next year, they mutinied again; which occasioned the commission of many disorders. But their general being killed, and a peace concluded between Abu Câlîjâr and Jalâlo'ddawla, they soon returned to a sense of their duty. The 430th year of the Moslem æra was rendered memorable at Baghdâd by a snow that fell there, and in the adjacent territory, three spans deep; which was followed by a very severe frost, the Dijlat, or Tigris, having been frozen over, for the space of twelve days. The 431st year of the same æra proved not so favourable to the turbulent and restless Turkish soldiery; they having been brought more under subjection by Jalâlo'ddawla, before the close of that year. When that Emîr Al Omrà died, Al Azîz Abu Mansûr, his son, was at Wâset, where there was then a pretty considerable ferment. His friends dispatched to him immediately a courier, and pressed him to hasten to Baghdâd, in order to fill the post which was become vacant by his father's death. But being detained at Wâset, by the commotions there, which were not yet appeased; Abu Câlîjâr was sent for, and took the government upon him; the present exigency of affairs not permitting the people of Baghdâd to continue any longer without a person at the helm. To what has been said of Jalâlo'ddawla here we shall beg leave to add, that he is sometimes stiled by the eastern writers the Sâheb, or prince, and at other times the king, of Baghdâd. It is remarkable, that no other successor to Abu Thâber Fîrâz Jalâlo'ddawla but Al Azîz Abu Mansûr, his son, whom he has dignified with the title of king, has been mentioned by Al Makin <sup>u</sup>.

Other occurrences of this year.

AFTER the sudden death of Mayudûd, which has already been taken notice of, Soltân Mawdûd's authority was recognized both in the Indian conquests and Mawarâlnahr; notwithstanding which, the Seljukian Turks settled in the latter of those countries and Khorasân refused to acknowledge him for their prince. He, therefore, marched against them with a powerful army, in the year we are now upon; but was met and overthrown by Alp Arslân, the son of Jaasar Bek. On the other side, great numbers of Turks, who broke out of Turkestan into the territories of Gomaser and Kandahâr, to plunder, were routed by Mawdûd's garisons. About the same time, the Indian Rajahs, who had been vassals to Mawdûd, revolted against him, united their forces, and with the combined army laid siege to Lâhor, or Lahâwar, a royal city in the province of Penjab. But this confederacy how formidable soever it might at first appear, was soon dissolved; the members of which it was formed, almost immediately after the commencement of the military operations, falling at variance amongst themselves. They even at last came to an open rupture, some declaring for, and others against, Mawdûd, though the former of these finally prevailed. For, joining a body of troops sent by that prince to the relief of the place, they fell upon the others with such bravery that they obliged them to submit to the Soltân, and lay down their arms. The city of Lahâwar has been placed in 31°. 50'. N. lat. and long. 109°. 20'. by Nassîr Al Tûsî and Ulugh Beik <sup>w</sup>.

Abu'l Faraj Al Irâkî dies.

THIS year, died Abu'l Faraj Abd'allah Ebn Al Teyyeb Al Irâkî, a famous physician and philosopher, who spent most of his time in reading and explaining the works of the antients, particularly those of Galen and Aristotle, which at this time were held amongst the Arabs in much esteem. He has been accused of prolixity by a little Jewish critic, who perhaps did not sufficiently understand him. But Al Kâdi Al Acram Jamâlo'ddîn Al Koftî has given a very advantageous character of him; informing us, that he brought to light several things which had been lost, and happily explained some passages of the authors he undertook to comment upon, which before were utterly unintelligible. Many of his scholars made a very considerable figure in the learned world. One of the principal of these was Al Mokhtâr Ebn Al Hasan Ebn Abdûn, commonly called Ebn Botlân. Ebn Al Teyyeb, according to Ebn Botlân, applied himself so closely, and with so much attention, to the exposition of metaphysical subjects, in which he was engaged about twenty years, that he thereby impaired his health, and at last contracted a distemper, which put a period to his days. Ebn Botlân,

- a who received his education from Ebn Al Teyyeb, was a Christian of Baghdâd of an exceeding homely, or rather a deformed, countenance; but excelled in antient literature, especially physic. He first visited Al Mawfel and Diyâr Becr, and afterwards Aleppo; where he remained some time, and from thence departed into Egypt. Here he soon met with Ebn Redwân, an Egyptian physician and philosopher of no great note. As there was a rivalry, or competition, between these two doctors, both of them contending most fiercely for victory in their disputations, and the Egyptians sided with Ebn Redwân, their countryman; Ebn Botlân retired to Antioch, shut himself up in a monastery, and put on the habit of a religious there. But of these two physicians our readers will hereafter meet with a farther account. With regard to Ebn Al Teyyeb, we shall beg leave to add, that he was copious in
- b his explications, in order to express himself with perspicuity, and render more intelligible, even to the meanest capacities, the points he undertook to explain<sup>x</sup>.

THE next year, being the 436th of the Hejra, which commenced July 30th, 1044, all the troubles in India, occasioned by the late revolt of the Indian Rajahs, according to Mirk-India are ap- bond, seem to have been appeased. That author relates, that soon after the junction of Soltân Mawdûd's forces with those of his Indian allies, which happened towards the close of the last campaign, the rebellious Rajahs were reduced to the obedience of that prince. This plainly appears to fix the final extinction of the Indian rebellion against Mawdûd in some part of the year we are now upon<sup>y</sup>.

- c IN the year of the Hejra 437, which began July 19th, 1045, the Seljuks continued strengthening themselves in Khorasân and the Persian Irâk; inſomuch that Abu Câlîjâr Ebn Soltânô'ddawla, the Emîr Al Omrâ at Baghdâd found himself obliged not long after to enter into an alliance with Togrol Bek. We hear not, however, of any incursions, that they made into the neighbouring provinces, the present year<sup>z</sup>.

- THE following year, being the 438th of the Hejra, commencing July 8th, 1046, has not been rendered remarkable by any memorable events, handed down to us by the historians. As the Gaznevîds and the Seljuks, who were now contending for dominion, paid little or no regard in civil affairs to the Khalîf of Baghdâd; so Al Kayed, the son of Hammad, Hamed, or Hamet, who had founded the kingdom of the Hammadites in the province of Bajayah, or Bujiyah, reigned this very year, independently on the Khalîf of Egypt, in Africa<sup>a</sup>.

- THE 439th year of the Hejra, which commenced June 28th, 1047, produced a peace between Abu Câlîjâr Ebn Soltânô'ddawla, the Emîr Al Omrâ, and Togrol Bek. In order to strengthen the alliance entered into by these two princes, Abu Câlîjâr, or Abu'l Gânjâr, as Teixeira calls him, married his son to Dawd Al Seljûki's daughter, the present year. This Dawd, or David, was brother to Togrol Bek, and the new married lady of course his niece. It appears from Al Makrizi, that Christodulus, the sixty-sixth Alexandrian Jacobite patriarch, was elected to preside in spiritual matters over the people of his sect, in the year we are now upon<sup>b</sup>.

- THE next year, being the 440th of the Hejra, beginning June 16th, 1048, Abu Câlîjâr, and of the the Emîr Al Omrâ, departed this life. He was the son of Soltânô'ddawla, of the house of Bîliya, and had reigned in Irâk between four and five years. He died, according to Abu'l Faraj, at Baghdâd; but, if we will believe Mirkbond, in the province of Kermân. The latter of these authors also informs us, that he left behind him five sons, Abu Mansûr Fûlâd Sotûn, Khoſrû Firûz, Abu Thâber, Abu Sa'id, and Kay Khoſrû. Khoſrû Firûz, the second of these, being at Shîrâz, in the province of Fârs, at the time of his father's demise, succeeded him, and assumed the title, or surname, of Al Mâlec Al Rabîm, or the merciful king. From Shîrâz he repaired directly to Baghdâd, possessed himself of that capital, and took his lodging in the imperial palace there. Soon after which, Al Kayem, the Khalîf of Baghdâd, adorned him with the collar and bracelets, and vested him with the supreme authority.
- f Notwithstanding which, Abu Mansûr Fûlâd Sotûn, the eldest of Abu Câlîjâr's sons, made the proper dispositions for driving him out of all the territories he had seized, and took the field with a considerable force. The Emîr Al Omrâ, or king of Baghdâd, likewise assembled a body of troops; the command of which he gave to his brother Abu Sa'id, and ordered him to march against Fûlâd Sotûn with all possible expedition. He also followed him with another body of troops, joined him, and, after this junction, came up with Fûlâd Sotûn at Eſtakbr, a city of Fârs. But, being deserted by the greatest part of his army, which consisted chiefly of Turks, he retired to Abwâz in Khûzestân, and from thence to Wâſet; where the war continued with various success, till the year of the Hejra 447. We must not forget to remark, that Al Málec Al Rabím's brothers; Abu Thâber and Abu Sa'id, notwithstanding the late desertion of his troops, persevered in their fidelity to him <sup>a</sup>.

What happened, in the year 441. THE following year, being the 441st of the Hejra, commencing June 5th, 1049, Soltân Mawdûd Gazni, stiled Sâheb Al Hind, or lord of India, by Al Makîn, being resolved to recover Khorasân, if possible, out of the hands of the Seljúks, began his march against them with a powerful army; but was carried off by a violent fit of the cholic, before he could come up with them. With regard to his successor, the eastern writers seem not to be so perfectly well agreed. His son, named Mas'ûd, or Mas'ûd II. an infant, after his death, according to Khondemir, mounted the throne; whereas Abd'alraşhîd Ebn Mahmûd, his uncle, succeeded him, if we will believe Abu'l Faraj and Al Makîn. But, if Mirkhond may be credited, Ali Ebn Mas'ûd, his brother, as soon as his death came to be known, was saluted Soltân by the military men. However, these seeming inconsistencies may perhaps, by a little attention to Khondemir's account of this matter, be tolerably well reconciled. That author relates, that the Turks, who ruled at the Gaznevid court with an absolute sway, refusing to be commanded by a child, placed Ali Ebn Mas'ûd, Mawdûd's brother, upon the throne; and that he was, in a short time, deposed by Abd'alraşhîd Ebn Mahmûd, or rather Mohammed, Mawdûd's uncle, who found means to make his escape out of prison, where he had been confined a great part of his days. And, in conformity to this relation, we are told by Mirkhond, that Abd'alraşhîd, having been released out of prison, was proclaimed Soltân, or king, upon Mawdûd's death, by that prince's Wazîr; and that Ali Ebn Mas'ûd, finding things in a desperate situation, abandoned the government, and laid aside all thoughts of asserting his right to the crown. Al Basâsiri, or Málec Al Basâsiri, called Pisfasi by Cedrenus, a Turk, who had formerly been one of Bahao'ddawla's slaves, advanced with a body of troops to Al Anbâr, a city of Irâk, in the territory of Baghdâd, and possessed himself of that place, before the close of the present year <sup>d</sup>.

The most memorable occurrences of the year 442. IN the 442d year of the Hejra, which began May 26th, 1050, Togrol Bek, Soltân of the Seljúks, reduced to his obedience the city of Esfabân, together with the district appertaining to it, according to Abu'l Faraj. The same year, died Karwâs, or Karwâsh, the Sâheb, or lord, of Al Marwâs; who has been represented as a prince of great bravery, and power, by Al Makîn <sup>e</sup>.

No remarkable events happened, the following year. THE 443d year of the Hejra, which commenced May 15th, 1051, has not been distinguished by any remarkable events; at least, scarce any thing of that kind, as happening in it, has been handed down to us by the Moslem historians. The war, however, was carried on, according to Mirkhond, between Abu Mansûr Fûlâd Sotûn and Al Málec Al Rabím, Abu Câlîjâr Ebn Soltânô'ddawla's sons, in Irâk, through the whole course of it; but with what success, we have not been told by that author. Abd'alraşhîd likewise, who had been placed upon the Gaznevid throne, discovered, about this time, marks of a capacity by no means equal to the character he had been pitched upon to sustain <sup>f</sup>.

Ebn Botlân dies. THE next year, being the 444th of the Hejra, beginning May 3d, 1052, Ebn Botlân, a Christian physician of Baghdâd, of whom we have already given our readers some account, died in a monastery at Antioch; whither he retired, after the contumelious treatment he met with from Ebn Redwân had obliged him to abandon Egypt. To what has been said of this physician above, we shall beg leave to add, that the principal of his works, according to Abu'l Faraj, were the treatise upon the regimen that is proper to be observed for the preservation of health, the discourse upon the privileges and rewards claimed by physicians as their due, and his epistle upon the purchasing of slaves. After his retreat from Egypt, he wrote a very severe letter to Ebn Redwân; wherein he exposed his ignorance in physic, as well as every other branch of antient literature, which he pretended to understand. He likewise took the liberty therein to exhibit to his view, in the clearest light, all the vices he was guilty of. This piece, which was penned with uncommon acrimony of sentiment, and asperity of expression, he divided into seven sections; for an account of the heads of which, we must refer our learned and curious readers to Abu'l Faraj <sup>e</sup>.

The principal occurrences of the year 445; THE following year, being the 445th of the Hejra, commencing April 23d, 1053, Abd'alraşhîd, the Gaznevid Soltân, was deposed and murdered by Togrol, one of his principal officers, who had been brought up at the court of Soltân Mawdûd. This Togrol was so great a favourite, that Abd'alraşhîd had not only conferred upon him the government of the province of Sejstân, but permitted him likewise to act in a manner as sovereign there. Togrol made a very improper return to his master and benefactor for so singular a favour. He even pushed his ingratitude so far as to form a design to dethrone him. In order to carry

- a this into execution, he attacked Abd'alraṣṣīd in his capital; who, being surprized by such an unexpected attack, retired into the castle, and took all his family with him. Here Togrol, after he had made himself master of the city, besieged him, soon carried the citadel by assault, and massacred both the Soltān and all who were related to him, except Ferokhzād and Anca, the son and daughter of Mas'ūd. The former of these found means to make his escape, and the latter he took to wife. He also seized upon the crown, and assumed the title of Soltān. But his perfidy and ingratitude rendered him so odious to his new subjects, that they branded him with the appellation of Kafernāmet, that is, the ingrate, or the ungrateful. This disposition of the people, and the news of the strange revolution that had happened, having been communicated to Kharkbir, the governor of the Indian provinces
- b dependent on the crown of Gazna, he wrote in very strong terms to the grandees of that city, and particularly to the princess Anca, exhorting them to fall upon the tyrant; which had such an effect, that he was soon after assassinated in his palace, and even upon his very throne. Kharkbir then caused Ferokhzād Ebn Mas'ūd, with the consent of all the principal lords of Gazna, to be proclaimed Soltān. This is the account of the revolution now before us preserved by the author of the Lebtārikh and Khondemīr, from which that handed down to us by Mirkhond differs in several particulars. The last of these authors relates, that Togrol, one of Abd'alraṣṣīd's commanders, observing his master's capacity to be none of the best, entertained hopes of securing to himself the vast and extensive territories of the house of Gazna. Excited by these hopes, he meditated the Soltān's destruction; and, in order to effect this,
- c pursued him from other parts of his dominions to the city of Gazna, took it, and drove the poor prince, with his family, into the castle. This he laid siege to several days, and at last, by the treachery of the governor, whom he corrupted with money, was admitted into it, when the reduction of it by any other means would have been impracticable. Abd'alraṣṣīd himself, with many of his friends and relations, the traitor immediately put to death; married his sister, and obliged Abd'alraṣṣīd's subjects to acknowledge him for their king. He had not been vested with the supreme authority many days, before ten of the noblesse approached him, sitting on his throne, to receive the compliments of the grandees, under the pretext of paying in form their submission to him; but they no sooner reached him, than they drew their scymitars, and dispatched him. Not long after this, Kharkbir, a Gazna
- d nevid general, arrived from India, took Ferokhzād, Mas'ūd's son, out of prison, and placed him upon the throne. The war still continued between Abu Calījār's sons, according to Mirkhond, in the neighbourhood of Wāset; though which of the contending parties proved superior, this year, he has not been pleased to inform us. A war likewise must have been waged by Abu Olwān Thamāl Moezzo'ddawla, the Sāheb of Aleppo, with the Khalif of Egypt, if Abu'lfeḍā in this point may be depended upon, the present year. For, the latter of those princes sent an army to reduce Aleppo, in the 440th year of the Moslem æra, and after that another; both of which were defeated by Moezzo'ddawla's forces, though hostilities continued between those two powers till the year of the Hejra 449. The result of this war we shall relate, when we come to the transactions of that year <sup>b</sup>.
- e In the 446th year of the Hejra, which began April 12th, 1054, Togrol Bek made an <sup>and of the</sup> irruption with a body of his troops into Adherbijān, and possessed himself of that province. <sup>year 446.</sup> Al Kāyed, the king of the Hammadites, in the African province of Bajayab, or Bujiyab, departed this life, after he had reigned about twenty-seven years, and was succeeded by Al Mohsen, his son, a very rash and abandoned prince, in the month of Rajeb, the present year. Al Mohsen, by his infatuated conduct, discovering himself to be totally unfit to hold the reins of government, and treating his uncle with uncommon cruelty; Belkīn Ebn Moham-med, one of his relations, rebelled against him, routed his forces, slew him, and was proclaimed king in his room, when he had sat about eight months upon the throne. The troubles occasioned by Basāsīrī's defection at this time, greatly disturbed the repose of the
- f city of Baghdād <sup>1</sup>.
- THE 447th year of the Hejra, which commenced April 2d, 1055, proved very favourable to the Sejjāks, under the conduct of Togrol Bek. The distractions, occasioned by the insolence of the Turkish militia, still continuing at Baghdād; that place was, at this time, thereby rendered little better than a scene of riot and confusion. Abu'l Hāreth Roṣlān Al Madhaffar, a Turk, commonly called Al Basāsīrī, having had a quarrel with Reis Al Ruṣṣā, Al Kāyem Beamrī'llah's Wazīr, found himself obliged to quit the city of Baghdād, and to put himself under the protection of Al Moṣṭanser, the Khalif of Egypt. That prince supplying him both with money and troops, he soon became very formidable in the Arabian Irak, possessed himself of that province, and ravaged it even to the very gates of Baghdâd.<sup>a</sup> Finding no enemy to oppose him, he now looked upon himself as Emîr Al Omrâ, and ordered his own name to be mentioned in all the mosques within his jurisdiction. Nor did he leave any thing more to Al Malec Al Rabîm, who, after the example of his predecessors, had deprived the Khalîf of all power and authority, than the naked title of king of Baghdâd. Nay, the Khalîf himself was informed, that this rebel intended to advance at the head of his troops to the capital, and seize upon the imperial palace. Upon which, he immediately wrote to Togrol Bek, then in the district of Al Ray, who, according to some of the eastern writers, had lately made himself master of Khorasân, Forjân, the city and territory of Balkh, and the whole extensive province of Khowârazm, as well as the Persian Irak, and intreated him to come to his assistance. Al Basâsîri, of whom we are now speaking, was<sup>b</sup> originally Babao'ddawla's slave, but at last rose to be one of the principal commanders of the Soltâns of the house of Bûiya. He grew a terror, by the reduction of Irak, to the Arab Emîrs (A), and all the other neighbouring princes. The conquest of that province probably occasioned his being styled the ruler of Babylon by Cedrenus. When the Khalîf wrote to Togrol Bek, this tyrant, or usurper, was at Wâset. Soon after which, some of his soldiers deserted, and returned to Baghdâd; where they first plundered his palace, and then laid it in ashes. The surname of Al Motaffer, applied to this general by Erpenius's MS. copy of Al Makîn, was written Al Modbaffer by that author; the diacritical point, distinguishing the Dha, or Tba, from the Ta, having either been erased or omitted in this copy. The words Al Modbaffer denote the same thing as Al Mansûr, that is to say, the victorious;<sup>c</sup> and have been assumed as a surname by several great personages, who have made a very considerable figure in the Moslem history, as we learn both from Abu'l Faraj, and M. D'Hierabelot<sup>k</sup>.

Who arrives
there, in the month of Ramadân.

As soon as the Khalîf's letter reached him, Togrol Bek assembled all his forces, made the proper dispositions for a march, and arrived at Baghdâd, in the month of Ramadân. He brought with him a numerous army of Turks, and eighteen elephants. When he entered Baghdâd, Al Basâsîri was at Al Rababa, upon the Euphrates, from whence he wrote to Al Mostanser Bi'llah, the Khalîf of Egypt, and begged he would take him under his protection. He also ordered prayers to be put up in his name, at Al Rababa, as a token of his attachment to him. Upon his arrival at Baghdâd, Togrol Bek immediately waited upon the Kha-<sup>d</sup>
lîf, and paid him all the honours due to his high dignity. However, the Turks having soon after committed several outrages there, the people rose upon them, and pelted them with stones; which so incensed Togrol Bek, that he commanded his troops to pillage the city. The tumult, excited against the Turks, being afterwards appeased, the Soltân of the Seljûks went to the Khalîf, and told him, that if Al Malec Al Rabîm, the generalissimo of armies, had not been concerned in the late sedition, he might safely come to him; upon which, Al Malec Al Rabîm appearing before him, he seized upon his person, sent him to prison, and ordered himself to be prayed for in the public pulpits instead of him. Thus ended the dynasty of the Bûiyans, which had continued 127 years; and that of the Seljûks began in the same city, where Togrol Bek took up his lodging, in the imperial castle.<sup>e</sup> Nothing can be more perplexed and confused than the history of the Seljûks, during this period, as we find it penned by the Greek writers; for which reason, as it throws no manner of light upon the Moslem affairs, we have not thought fit to extract any thing from them, upon that head, here. Togrol Bek confined Al Malec Al Rabîm, according to Khen- demir, in a castle of Irak, where he ended his days, and made his public entry into Baghdâd, the 25th of Ramadân, the present year. It may not be improper to remark, that Togrol Bek, a little before his expedition to Baghdâd, at the instigation of Abu Mansûr Fîlâd Soltân, Al Malec Al Rabîm's eldest brother, reduced the city of Shîrâz, and the greatest part of the province of Fârs; of which the latter of those princes having been informed, he assembled all his forces, expelled the Soltân of the Seljûks from his new conquest, and<sup>f</sup> then returned to Wâset. Mirkbond writes, that Al Kâjem did his utmost to screen Al Malec

(A) In the original Arabic it is, 'Ali Omrâ Al Arab w' Al Ajem, that is, to the Emîrs of the Arabs and the Barbarians, or to the Emîrs of the Arabs and all other nations. The word Ajem, or Al Ajem, properly denotes in Arabic what Βάρβαρος, or Barbarian, did in Greek. For, it is applicable to every nation, besides the Arabs; though it sometimes signifies Persia in particular, and every thing comprized under the empire of the Persians. The phrase Al Arab w' Al Ajem is, however, always to be understood of the people of the whole earth, and never only of the Arabs and Persians. According to this general signification of Al Ajem, the Grand Signor styles himself the Soltân Al Arab w' Al Ajem, that is, the king of all the nations of the world (1).

- a Al Rabîm, who had taken refuge in his palace, from the fury of Togrol Bek; but without effect. He also relates, that the Seljuks destroyed the city of Baghdâd with fire and sword; and that they spared neither the living nor the dead. The tombs of the latter, if this author may be credited, were all opened; a suspicion being entertained, that something valuable might probably be discovered in them<sup>1</sup>.

THE next year, being the 448th of the Hejra, beginning March 21st 1056, Abu Man-<sup>The principal</sup> sûr, having vanquished and killed in battle his brother Abu Sa'id, secured to himself the throne of Fârs. His Wazîr, who had served his father in the same capacity, upon some<sup>occurrences of</sup> suspicion, he soon after put to death; and advanced to the honourable post thereby become vacant Fazel Ebn Al Hasan, called likewise, by Mirkbond, Huya. Fazel was no sooner settled in his employment, than he imprisoned his master in a castle, and assumed the title of king. Malec Maverd, a Seljuk commander, then in the province of Kermân, being informed of this, marched against Huya; who fled to Alp Arslân, another Seljuk captain, at his approach. He afterwards, if we will believe this writer, farmed Alp Arslân's lands; and, growing very rich by that means, rebelled against him. However, he was soon taken, with Nczâm Al Molk, or Al Molk, his son, and confined in the fortress of Estakhr, where both of them died. About this time, Al Kâsem Beamri'llab, the Khalif of Baghdâd, married Khadîjah, the sister of Togrol Bek, who gave her a dower of 100,000 dinârs. Togrol Bek, having stayed thirteen months, and thirteen days, at Baghdâd, moved from thence towards Al Mawfel; carrying with him battering rams, and other engines of war. Al Basîsîri, who had a little before made himself master of that city, abandoned it, on his approach. Togrol Bek then laid siege to Tecrît; at what time the people of Cûfa, Wâset, and Âin Al Tamr, falling off from their allegiance, caused prayers to be made in the name of Al Mostanser Bi'll- lab, the Khalif of Egypt. Al Kâsem seems to have dignified Togrol Bek with the title of Rucno'ddîn, or Rocno'ddîn, that is, the pillar of the faith, or the religion, either this or the preceding year<sup>m</sup>.

THE following year, being the 449th of the Hejra, commencing March 10th, 1057, Al<sup>What happen-</sup>
Kâsem Beamri'llab, the Khalif of Baghdâd, honoured Togrol Bek with the imperial vest, and crowned him king of Baghdâd. He likewise adorned him with the collar and bracelets;<sup>d, the follow-</sup> appointed him ruler over his court, and ordered money to be coined in his name. Nor durst any enemy presume to appear against him, either in the Persian and Arabian Irâks or Khorasân. The same year, Tbamâl, or Bamâl, Moezzo'ddawla surrendered the citadel of Aleppo to Mâkîno'ddawla Al Hasan Ebn Ali Ebn Molhem; who took possession of it, in the month of Dhu'lkaada, for the Khalif of Egypt. After the surrender, or rather cession, of Aleppo, Moezzo'ddawla went to Mesr, and Atiyah, his brother, to Al Ramla. Makîno'ddawla made his public entry into Aleppo, as the Emîr, prefect, or governor, of that city, the 27th of Dhu'lkaada, the present year<sup>n</sup>.

IN the 450th year of the Hejra, which began Feb. 28th, 1058, Al Kâsem was deposed,<sup>The chief oc-</sup> and Al Mostanser Bi'llab, the Khalif of Egypt, proclaimed at Baghdâd, in his room. Togrol<sup>success of</sup>
Bek having marched to Al Mawfel, and from thence to Nasûîn, with a design to subdue those places, was attended by his brother, Ibrahim Nial, or Neal, Al Seljûki, in this expedition.
 Some time after Togrol Bek had begun his march, Al Basîsîri, by his emissaries, excited
Ibrahim to a revolt; giving him hopes of a kingdom, and promising his assistance. Ibrahim, therefore, having prevailed upon the soldiers to take an oath of fidelity to him, advanced at the head of a great army to Al Ray, and rebelled against his brother. He afterwards, according to one of the eastern writers followed by M. D'Herbelot, took Hamadân; upon which, Togrol Bek moved towards that city with a powerful army, in order to drive him from thence. This gave Al Basîsîri, continues that author, an opportunity of making himself master of Baghdâd, and seizing upon the Khalif's person. The last particular, however, seems not so consonant to what has been delivered by Al Makî; who relates, that Al Kâsem made his escape to the eastern part of the city. Al Basîsîri, if this author may be credited, entered Baghdâd, on Sunday, the 8th of Dhu'lkaada, with the Egyptian standards, exhibiting the following words inscribed upon them, Al Imâm Al Mostanser Bi'llab Emîr Al Mûne- nîn Abu Tamîm Ma'bad. The Imâm Abu Tamîm Ma'bad Al Mostanser Bi'llab, the commander, or camel through the streets of Baghdâd, dressed in a woollen gown, with a high red bonnet, and a leathern collar about his neck; a man lashing him all the way behind. Then, being sewed up in a fresh bull's hide, with the horns placed over his head, he was hung up on hooks, and beaten without ceasing till he died. In the mean time, the Khalîf arrived at the camp, where a tent was set up for him, on the east side of the city. Upon his retreat, the mob plundered the imperial palace of things to an inestimable value. On Friday, the fourth of Dbu'lhajja, there was no divine service in the Khalîf's mosque; but in all the others prayers were made, that day, in the name of Al Mostanser Bi'llah, the Sâheb, or lord, of Egypt. The Khalîf of Baghdâd, Al Kâjem Beamri'llah, was afterwards conveyed to Hadîtha, and left in chains there with Mabrâs, the governor of the town. Some of the Persian writers ascribe this confinement of the Khalîf to Al Basâsîri; who, according to them, had secured his person before. They also remark, that he was detained in custody not at Hadîtha, but at Baghdâd. Neither of which particulars, though they have both been copied by M. D'Herbelot, can be evinced from Al Makîn °.

THE next year, being the 451st of the Hejra, commencing Feb. 17th, 1059, Togrol Bek marched against Ibrahim Neal Al Seljûki, his brother, defeated him, took him prisoner, and ordered him to be strangled with a bow-string. He also put many of the Turkmâns, who had joined him, to the sword. In the mean time, Al Basâsîri, who still maintained himself in Baghdâd, sent for the Kâdi of Kâdis, or the supreme judge, Abu Abî'llah Ebn Al Dâma'ani (E), with the preachers and princes of the house of Hâshem, required from them a recognition of the authority of Al Mostanser, the Khalîf of Egypt, and obliged them to take the oath of allegiance to that prince. Notwithstanding which, Togrol Bek, after the defeat of Ibrahim, advanced to Baghdâd; which Al Basâsîri, who had been apprized of his march, abandoned at his approach. When he drew near that capital, he was met by Mabrâs, the Sâheb, or lord, of Hadîtha, on the 11th of Dbu'lkaada, who brought Al Kâjem Beamri'llah, the Khalîf of Baghdâd, with him. That prince had already received, as presents, from Togrol Bek, several things of great value, besides many rich garments, and 5000 dinârs; as also sixty-five suits of cloaths for his wife. As soon as Togrol Bek entered the city, his troops plundered it, especially that part called Al Carkeb. They likewise collected a vast number of tents, chariots, and other moveables; all which they sent to the Khalîf, with Abd'almâlec Al Canderi, his Wazîr, and Abu Becr Al Astâd. The Khalîf then went into a tent, that had been set up for him, where he continued two days. After which, on the 25th of Dbu'lkaada, he made his public entry into Baghdâd, from whence he had been absent a whole year, accompanied by Togrol Bek, who held the bridle of his mule till he had passed through the stone gate. It must here be remarked, that Togrol Bek, who deduced his origin from a province of the Upper Turkestan, denominated by some authors Desht, or Desht Kapjâk, was a zealous Sunnite, had an utter aversion to the Fâtemite Khalîfs, whom he looked upon as hereticks, and the highest regard for those of the house of Al Abbâs. No wonder then that, in consequence of this disposition, he should abolish the spiritual authority of the former, and establish that of the latter, wherever his arms prevailed; and that he should treat Al Kâjem, the Khalîf of Baghdâd, on this occasion, with such uncommon marks of reverence and distinction as those mentioned both by Khondemir and Al Makîn °.

BEFORE Togrol Bek's arrival at Baghdâd, Al Basâsîri thought fit to retire to Wâset; and having collected a large quantity of corn, he put it on board some vessels then in the river there. But receiving advice of the new revolution at Baghdâd, he advanced to Al Nomâniâ, a place at no great distance from that city. The Soltân sent against him part of his army, under the command of Hemâr Makîn, and other generals; following himself, with the rest of his forces, towards the end of Dbu'lkaada. A battle hereupon ensued, which was fought between Wâset and Cûfa, and ended in the defeat of Al Basâsîri. That usurper was either killed in the action, as we find asserted by Al Makîn, or by some of Togrol Bek's soldiers, in the pursuit, as Khondemir writes, not far from Cûfa. His head being brought to Togrol Bek, he ordered it to be carried on a pike through the streets of Baghdâd. Al Basâsîri's death has been placed in the 450th year of the Hejra by Abu'l Faraj; who relates, that Togrol Bek's troops carried off all the women and camels belonging to him and Nûro'ddawla Dobais, who attended him in his retreat. It cannot well be a doubted, but Al Basāsiri's name Roslân is a corruption of Arslân; the latter of these being a true and genuine Turkish proper name, whereas the former was scarce ever heard of before it appeared in Erpenius's depraved MS. copy of Al Makîn. M. D'Herbelot, in one passage, gives us to understand that Al Kâjem conferred the title of Rucno'ddîn upon Togrol Bek, either in the year of the Hejra 447, or 448; and, in another, he ranks that event amongst the transactions of the year we are now upon. Our readers will, however, upon a perusal of those passages, adhere to the former notion. The first of Togrol Bek's expeditions to Baghdâd seems to have been confounded with the other, undertaken the present year, by M. Renaudot<sup>1</sup>.

In the mean time, Al Mostanser Bi'llah, receiving advice of what had happened, sent Abu Ali Al Hasan Nâsero'ddawla, of the house of Hamdân, with a powerful army, to the relief of the place. Mahmûd, being informed of his approach, led his forces against him, engaged him not far from Kinnisrîn, and intirely defeated him. Nâsero'ddawla himself was taken prisoner in the action; but being released by Mahmûd, he repaired directly to Mesr. Of which Makîno'ddawla being apprized, he put both the city and castle of Aleppo into the hands of Atiyah Afado'ddawla Ebn Sâlah; who entered the town the 10th of Shaabân. The next day, however, he was obliged to abandon it; and, on the 12th, Mahmûd Azzo'ddawla took possession both of the town and the citadel. About the same time, Nûro'ddawla Dobais Ebn Mozîd made his submission to Togrol Bek, and was honourably received by him. This year, the Soltân returned from Wâset to Baghdâd, after he had appeased some commotions in the former of those places; and, upon his return, had presents made him by the Khalîf, from whom he met with a most gracious reception. He then appointed Abd'almâlec Al Canderî, his Wazîr, to preside over the city of Baghdâd, whilst he pacified some troubles that had disturbed the repose of Al Jebâl, or the mountainous part of the Persian Irâk. We must not forget to remark, that Al Kâjem declared his grandson Abd'allah successor to the Khalîfat
d of Baghdâd, and surnamed him Al Moktadi, before the close of the year we are now upon<sup>2</sup>.

In the 453d year of the Hejra, commencing Jan. 26th, 1061, Moezzo'ddawla Al Mar- and of the dâfi made himself master of Aleppo, which had been a short time occupied by Mahmûd year 453-Azzo'ddawla, as has been already observed. The town he took in the former Rabî, and the citadel soon after surrendered to him. About the same time, Jaafar Bek, Togrol's brother, died in Khorasân, and left for his successor Alp Arslân, his son, called Alb Arslân by the Arab writers. This year, Togrol Bek demanded Al Kâjem's daughter in marriage; but was refused her, by the Khalîf. This occasioned many messages and threatenings, on the part of the Soltân; the particulars of which it would be too tedious to relate. Al Canderi, Togrol's Wazîr, who, by his address afterwards obtained this princess for him, is denominated Amîd Al Molc by Khondemir, the Persian historian<sup>3</sup>.

c THE next year, being the 454th of the Hejra, beginning Jan. 15th, 1062, Al Kâjem still The most me-thinking this too great an honour for a Turk, Amîd Al Molc, Togrol's Wazîr, advised his actions of the master to retrench by degrees the Khalîf's revenues. The Soltân hereupon forbade Al Kâjem's year 454.

officers to touch the public money. This reduced the Khalîf to such straits, that he suffered himself to be persuaded to let Togrol take the princess, though sore against his will, according to Al Makîn. The Soltân, having thus carried his point, revoked the order he had given for seizing the Khalîf's treasures, and, being highly pleased with that prince's compliance, sent him very rich presents. The same year, on the 25th of Dhu'lkaada, Moezzo'd-
f dawla Al Mardâfi, the Sâheb, or lord, of Aleppo, departed this life, and was buried in the citadel there. A tomb was erected for him, which remained to the days of Al Mâlec (or king) Redwân, who levelled it with the ground, and destroyed all traces of it. With regard to Moezzo'ddawla's disposition, he is reported to have been a just, merciful, and generous prince. A servant having once by accident beat out one of his foreteeth, he said "this happened by the providence and power of God," and would not punish him for it; which has been produced as an instance of his superior goodness and clemency by Al Makîn. After his death, Atiyah Abu Dawâba Afado'ddawla Ebn Sâleh Ebn Mardâs, his brother, who retired to Al Ramla, in Palestine, when Thamâl, or Bamâl, repaired to Mesî, mounted the throne; but was soon driven from thence by Mahmûd Azzo'ddawla Ebn Nasr, who, after his late expulsion from Aleppo, retired to Harrân. Atiyah, finding himself not able to make head against Mahmûd's forces, departed first to Al Rakka, upon the Euphrates, and afterwards to Constantinople, where he ended his days. This year, likewise, died Belkîn Ebn Mohammed, the king of the Hammadites, in the African province of Bajayah, or Bujiyah; having been cut off by the treachery of Al Nasr Ebn Alnas Ebn Hammad, who succeeded him, after he had swayed the sceptre there about seven years<sup>1</sup>.

Togrol Bek's
marriage,

THE following year, being the 455th of the Hejra, which commenced Jan. 4th, 1063, Seïda, the Khalîf's daughter, was conducted by Amîd Al Molc, Togrol Bek's Wazîr, to Tauris, where that prince then was, and attended by a considerable retinue. Togrol received the princess with great demonstrations of joy, and bestowed gifts on all the Khalîf's servants that accompanied her. Soon after her arrival at Tauris, the marriage between her and the Soltân was concluded, and the contract signed. Togrol from thence repaired to Al Ray, his royal seat, then the capital of the Persian Irâk, where the nuptials and consummation of the marriage were to be performed. At this time, Soltân Ibrahim, the son of Mas'ûd II. according to Ebn Shohnab, reigned at Gazna; though his empire, as he had been almost intirely dispossessed by the Seljûks of Khorasân and Mawarâ'lnahr, was scarce the shadow of what it had formerly been<sup>2</sup>.

TOGROL BEK having made the proper dispositions for receiving Seïda at Al Ray, with the utmost splendor and magnificence, and finding the heats there at that time excessive, he retired to Rudbâr, a most delicious place, where he had a very beautiful palace. Here he proposed to take some refreshment, in that hot and sultry season; but was attacked by a bloody flux, which carried him off in a few days. He died on Friday, the 23d of Ramadân, a little above six months after the conclusion of his marriage with Seïda, the Khalîf's daughter. He has been represented as a merciful and prudent prince, extremely well versed in the art of government, by Al Makîn. He was about seventy lunar years old, at the time of his death, and reigned either twenty-five or twenty-six years. Ahmed Ebn Yusef, however, relates, that the length of his reign did not exceed sixteen years; and that he presided over Khorasân, Deylam, and Mawarâ'lnahr. All the neighbouring princes exceedingly feared him, and wrote in a submissive manner to him. The best oriental authors agree, that he departed this life at Al Ray; and that he was a zealous Moslem, according to the principles, or tenets, of the Sonnites. Abu'l Kasem Al Kermâni and Amîd Al Molc were successively his Wazîrs. As he left no issue behind him, Alp Arslân, or Abu Shajâ' Mohammed, his nephew, succeeded him, not only in the sovereignty of his extensive dominions, but likewise in the post of Emîr Al Omrà at Baghdâd. It has been already observed, that Togrol Bek was the Tangrolipax, the Tangrolipix, or rather the Tangrolipex, of the Greek writers. His nephew, Alp Arslân, who succeeded him, is called Axan, the son of Tangrolipex, by those writers, Alb Arslân Ebn Dawd Jagri Beik by Abu'l Faraj, and Al Soltân Adado'ddawla Alb Arslân Mohammed Ebn Dawd Ebn Mîkâyyel Ebn Seljûk by Al Makîn<sup>3</sup>.

The princess Seïda returns
to Baghdâd.

THE princess Seïda finding Togrol dead, upon her arrival at Al Ray, returned as she came to Baghdâd. Kemel Ismael, a Persian poet, composed a distich, in his own tongue, upon the place where Togrol died. Those verses, according to M. D'Herbelot, were to the following effect. "The country of Al Ray is an enemy to strangers; and if its air did not occasion his death, the hour of his departure was come." We must not forget to remark, that Mahmûd Ebn Shablo'ddawla drove Asado'ddawla Abu Dawâba Atiyah Ebn Sâleb Ebn Mardâs to Al Rakka, and possessed himself of Aleppo, in the month of Ramadân, the present year<sup>4</sup>.

events of the
year 456.

IN the 456th year of the Hejra, which began Dec. 24th, 1063, Alp Arslân, after the Khalîf had conferred the post of Emîr Al Omrà upon him, and ordered his name to be mentioned in the public prayers at Baghdâd, made war upon Kotolmîsh, or Kûtûlmîsh, Ebn Israel, his cousin-german, who had rebelled against him in the province of Dâmegân, or Kûmes, called Karws by Nasîr Al Tûsî and Ulugh Beik. Kûtûlmîsh advancing, at the head of a fine

- a body of troops, against the Soltân, to give him battle, his horse on a sudden fell under him, threw his rider, and broke his neck; upon which, his army submitted, and were pardoned. This Kûtûlmîsh, of whom we shall give a fuller account, in our history of the Seljûks of Irân, is denominated by the Greek writers, and particularly Cedrenus, Kutlumas, not Kutlu Moses, or Muses; which by no means corresponds with the Greek, ΚΟΥΤΛΟΥΜΟΥΣ. The manner in which this rebellion was extinguished has been related at large in the Wassaiya, which contains many more historical facts relating to the prince at this time sitting upon the Seljûk throne. That piece was written by the famous Nadbâm Al Molc Al Tawâsi, Alp Arslân's Wazîr. The Soltân, soon after his accession, imprisoned Al Canderi, surnamed Amîd Al Molc, Togrol's Wazîr, for abusing his master's authority, in the preceding reign.
- b He afterwards put that minister to death, for the iniquitous conduct he had been guilty of in his administration; and raised to the charge of Wazîr Nadbâm Al Molc Al Tawâsi, the most celebrated politician of his time. As Alp Arslân was the sole and absolute monarch of all the vast tract lying between the Amû and the Dijlat, or the Oxus and the Tigris, comprehending Persia, or Irân, in its largest extent, which he had acquired partly by right of succession, and partly by his own valour; he was justly esteemed, by all his neighbours, as one of the most puissant potentates of the East. The Khalîf, therefore, on account of his own power and merit, as well as that of his predecessor, honoured him with the title of Adado'dâin, not Adbadeddin, or Adbadoddin, as we find intimated by M. D'Herbelot, which denotes, the protector of the faith, or the religion. Kûtûlmîsh was no sooner dead, than Kara
- c Arslân set up for himself in Kermân and Fârs. But he was soon reduced to the obedience of the Soltân by Fadlûiyab, one of his most valiant commanders; who, for the important service done his master on this occasion, was rewarded by him with the government of the latter of those provinces. Fadlûiyab afterwards, renouncing his allegiance to the Soltân, shut himself up, with a body of select troops, in a castle, which was deemed impregnable. However, Nadbâm Al Molc, by his master's order, presented himself with an army before the place. But, having for some time continued his attacks without any hopes of success, and being a person of exemplary piety, he resolved to leave the issue of the affair intirely to the conduct of providence. He, nevertheless, comforted himself with some of those salutary maxims that he had formerly taught others; one of which was to the following effect. "The
- d "man who afflicts himself with the apprehensions of future evils, which may either happen "or not happen to him, only anticipates and enhances the misery they will produce, should "they certainly happen, by his present chagrin; and that, without receiving the least "advantage therefrom." The pious disposition of the Wazîr, and the justice of the Soltân's cause, adds the Mohammedan author now in view, soon procured from the great Arbiter of events a miracle, in favour of Adado'ddawla's arms. For, if this writer may be credited, one morning, at break of day, after the Wazîr had spent in great inquietude and agitation of mind the preceding night, he was agreeably surprized to hear the garison beat the chamade, and that Fadlûiyab offered to surrender the place; which, as one of the besieged afterwards informed him, was owing to the springs and cisterns, then very numerous in the
- e fortrefs, drying up all at once. A similar miracle was wrought for the Soltân's forces in the vast desert of Nûbandijân, which separates Kermân from Khorasân, and is destitute of all things necessary to support an army, where, as the same author will have it, they were supplied with a sufficient quantity both of corn and water in a supernatural manner. Ibrahim, the son of Mas'ûd II, king of Gazna, was employed about this time in building mosques, oratories, and hospitals; and in making irruptions into Hindostân, or Indostân. He gained so many victories, in that country, that he was styled Al Modhaffer and Al Mansûr, that is, the conqueror and the triumphant. Notwithstanding the wars he was engaged in, he bore the character of a very charitable, just, and religious prince.

- f THE next year, being the 457th of the Hejra, which commenced Dec. 13th, 1064, Alp Arslân led an army into Khowârazm, to chastise the insolence of Khazan, who had asserted his independency there. Having routed his forces, consisting of 30,000 men, most of whom were put to the sword, he conferred the government of that province upon Mâlec Shâh, his eldest son. In his return from this expedition through Khorasân, he visited the sepulchre of Ali Ebn (B) Mûsa Al Riza, Al Radi, or Al Redâ, as he is called by the Arabs (not

(B) It may not be improper to remark here, that Riza, or Al Riza, is the Persian surname of this Imâm; Al Redâ that which occurs in Dr. Pocock's MSS. of Abu'l Faraj; and Al Radi, which has been preferred to the other Arabic one by Golius, that assigned him by Erpenius's manuscript of Al Makin. The two Arab writers exhibit Dâd, or D, as the second letter of this surname; and the Persians their Zâd, or Z, which answers to the Arabic (not Ali Ridha, or Ali Redha, as M. D'Herbelot names him), the eighth Imâm, who was buried at Tûs. After this, he took the road of Radekân, and encamped there in a most delightful place. From thence he dispatched couriers through all the provinces of his empire, to convoke the governors and great lords to a general assembly of the states. Being met, he declared Mâlec Sbâb for his successor, and only heir to his dominions. This done, he commanded his son to sit on a throne of gold, prepared for that purpose, and obliged all the officers of the empire to take an oath of fidelity to him. The good understanding still subsisted between Alp Arslân and Soltân Ibrahim, who reigned at Gazna; both the Seljuks and the Gaznevids keeping within their own frontiers, in conformity to the principal article of the last concluded treaty. The latter of those princes spent a great part of the night in prayer, and much of his other time in works of piety and devotion. This we learn from the authors of the Lebtârîkh; who likewise relates, that he fasted three months every year, viz. Rajeb, Shaabân, and Ramadân<sup>2</sup>.

THE following year, being the 458th of the Hejra, beginning Dec. 3d, 1065, the Seljuks, according to some of the Greeks writers, made an irruption into Mesopotamia, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, destroying all the country through which they moved with fire and sword. They afterwards possessed themselves of Neocæsarea and Aleppo, and retired from the former of those cities with a very rich booty. But Romanus Diogenes, the emperor, following them, at the head of a chosen body of light-armed horse, came up with them the third day, killed a great number of them, and recovered the spoil. He then pursued his march to Aleppo, which he retook, together with Hierapolis, where he built a strong castle. This expedition, however, seems to have been placed in the 462d year of the Moslem æra by Al Makîn. About this time, Alp Arslân acquainted all the chiefs and generals of his armies, that he designed to attempt the conquest of Turkestan, from whence he deduced his origin, and commanded his forces to hold themselves in readiness to advance to the Amû, and pass that river, in order to enter the vast region he intended to subdue, which was inhabited by the warlike nations of the Turks, Tartars, and Moguls. But the invasion of that country, which proved fatal to him, was not undertaken before the year of the Hejra 465. A young woman was delivered of a boy with two heads, two faces, two necks, four hands, and only one body, near the gate Al Azaj, at Baghdâd, according to Abu'l Faraj, the present year<sup>3</sup>.

The most material occurrences of the
year 459.

In the 459th year of the Hejra, which commenced Nov. 22d, 1066, a dreadful earthquake laid in ruins Al Ramla, Tanis, and many other cities. About this time, the Turkish troops, under the command of Abu Ali Al Hasan Nâsero'ddawla Ebn Hamdûn, who began now to rebel against the Khalîf of Egypt, committed horrible devastations in that country; destroying all the places, to which they approached, with fire and sword. The havock made by the above-mentioned earthquake was so great, that 25,000 men, women, and children, perished at Al Ramla only; vast numbers also meeting with the same unhappy fate, in many of the neighbouring cities. A grievous famine likewise raged in Egypt, the present year; insomuch that an Artaba, or three Roman bushels and an half, of flower was sold for 80 dinârs. A dog was not to be bought for less than five dinârs, nor a cat for less than three. Abu'l Mokarim, Al Mostanser's Wazîr, came one day to the imperial palace, attended by a single servant, the few others that remained alive being so feeble for want of food that they could not walk, and left his horse at the gate. But he had scarce entered the palace, when three men carried off the beast, and killed him, that they might feed upon his flesh. The Wazîr complaining of this insult to the Khalîf, they were immediately executed, and their bodies affixed to a gibbet, erected for that purpose. The next day, however, nothing was to be seen of them but the bones; the flesh being all greedily devoured by the miserable wretches, inhabiting the spot where the gibbet stood. For, the Egyptians did not only eat the carcases of all kinds of beasts, but likewise the bodies of men, women, and children; many of the latter of which they boiled, and sold publickly for food. Before the beginning of this dire calamity, the Khalîf had about 10,200 horses, mules, and camels, f

- a in his stables ; but, at the end of it, he had only three horses left. Nay, that prince himself was obliged to part with all his plate, tapestry, sumptuous garments, treasures, jewels, and valuable furniture, for sustenance. Not only all the money amassed by his predecessors, the Fâtemite Khalîfs, but likewise all the rich moveables belonging to the Khalîfs of the house of Al Abbâs, which Al Basâsiri had sent to Mesr, after he had taken and plundered the city of Baghdâd, were intirely dissipated, on this melancholy occasion. Some authors moreover relate, that 80,000 costly vests, 20,000 coats of mail, 20,000 beautiful swords, most richly ornamented, and even all the splendid furniture of the seraglio, were distributed amongst the troops, instead of money and provisions, to keep them in good humour, and prevent a mutiny, whilst the famine raged. Several Black, or Nigritian, b soldiers in the Khalîf's guards fed upon the bodies of certain women, whom they had secretly killed ; but they were at last discovered by a fat woman, they had taken, who, after she had lost half of her posteriors, which they had cut off, and began most voraciously to eat, made her escape. The Wazîr, being informed of the affair, ordered them all to be put to death. The people of Egypt were also visited by a plague or pestilence, this year, which swept away the greatest part of the inhabitants of that country. These calamities, we are told, were presaged by comets, that appeared a little before they happened, and other prodigies, which have been taken notice of by the Egyptian writers. Some authors pretend, that both Syria and Irâk were scenes of blood, ravages, and confusion, through the whole course of the year we are now upon ; but this, as we apprehend, cannot be certainly c inferred from any of the most celebrated oriental historians <sup>b</sup>.

- THE next year, being the 460th of the Hejra, which began November 11th, 1067, Abu and of the following year.
Ali Al' Hasan Nâsero'ddawla Ebn Hamdân, whose troops had been in motion the preceding year, with a body of 5000 Turks and Curds, besieged Al Mostanser Bi'llab, the Khalîf of Egypt, in his palace. That prince, not being in a condition to make head against the rebels, found himself obliged to put all the money he had left, and every thing valuable belonging to him, into their hands. They afterwards ravaged the tract called Al Rîf, or The Lower Egypt, extending from Al Kâbirab to the sea, and from Al Asçandariyah, or Alexandria, to Al Hawf, and the desert of Al Kolzom ; killing great numbers of the inhabitants, and pillaging many of the rest. Christodulus, the Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria, being d seized by these barbarians, was tortured by them in a cruel manner. But he was at last dismissed, upon his engaging to pay them for his liberty 3000 dinârs. The third part of this sum was raised by Abu'l Taib, Nâsero'ddawla's secretary, himself ; who likewise passed his word for the payment of the remainder. The rebels are named Lowanians by a certain author of considerable note, but Curds and Turks by others. Several officers of rank joined Nâsero'ddawla in his defection, according to Al Makîn <sup>c</sup>.

- THE following year, being the 461st of the Hejra, commencing October 31st, 1068, What happened in the year 461 ;
a civil war broke out in the city of Damascus ; some of the inhabitants declaring for the Fâtemite Khalîf, and others for Alp Arslân and the Khalîf of Baghdâd. In this interval of confusion, the church there was set on fire ; by which all its ornaments, together with the e most beautiful part of the fabrick, were reduced to ashes. The preceding year, according to Abu'l Faraj, died Ebn Redwân, an Egyptian physician, who was at first one of the lowest kind of astrologers, or rather a common fortune-teller, but afterwards made some little progress both in logic and physic. He had several scholars, and was held amongst his countrymen in some esteem. He wrote a few books, extracted from a variety of authors ; there being scarce any thing of his own in them. He taught both logic and physic, almost to the day of his death. One of the most famous of his cotemporaries was Cotaisât, a Christian, who was physician to Al Basâsiri, and extremely eminent for his skill in his profession, as well as for the success that attended his practice. For a farther account of Ebn Redwân, our learned readers may have recourse to Abu'l Faraj. The Lowanians still continued in arms, f and ravaged several districts of the Lower Egypt, the present year <sup>d</sup>.

IN the 462d year of the Hejra, beginning Oct. 20th, 1069, Al Emîr Azzo'ddawla Mab- and in the year 462.
mûd Ebn Nafr, the Sâheb, or lord, of Aleppo, ordered prayers to be put up in that city, and all its dependencies, for Al Kâyem Beamri'llab, the emperor, or commander, of the faithful, and Alp Arslân Adado'ddawla, the Emîr Al Omrà, or king of Baghdâd. He had before prayed for Al Mostanser Bi'llab, the Khalîf of Egypt ; but Soltân Adado'ddawla having laid siege to Aleppo, he was reduced to such straits, that he found himself obliged to recognize the spiritual authority of the Khalîf of Baghdâd. He likewise acknowledged Alp Arslân for his sovereign and prince ; upon which, the Soltân made him some valuable presents, treated him with great marks of distinction, and then departed with his forces to Irâk. The same year, Romanus Diogenes, the Greek emperor, undertook an expedition into Syria, advanced to Manbij, and besieged that city for sixteen days. He also put to flight a body of Moslem troops, that pretended to oppose him, killed some of them, and took several prisoners; but provisions failing in his camp, the greatest part of his army perished, and with the rest he returned to Constantinople. In his way back he was met by a numerous body of Turks, who attempted to cut off his retreat; but the emperor, pretending at first through fear to decline an engagement, attacked them afterwards, when they least expected it, with such vigour, that he routed them at the first onset, and might have gained a complete victory, had he thought it adviseable to pursue them. After this, the Turks abandoned some considerable towns at his approach. But the autumn being far advanced, he retired into Cilicia, and from thence to his capital. This year, Bedr Al Jemâl, who was afterwards Al Mostanser Bi'llab's Wazîr, a cruel, flagitious, and abandoned person, and a professed enemy of all learned men, ordered the Sbarîf Heidara, a man famed for his superior knowledge, to be flay'd alive, on account of a secret grudge that he bore him. The rebellion still continued in the Lower Egypt, which remained a scene of blood, ravages, and confusion, the present year<sup>e</sup>.

Alp Arslân
the Greeks.

THE next year, being the 463d of the Hejra, which commenced Oct. 9th, 1070, Alp Arslân advanced to Akblât in Armenia, with a body of 40000 horse, in order to attack the Greeks; whose formidable army he overthrew, took their general, who was a nobleman, prisoner, and cut off his nose. The emperor Romanus Diogenes himself afterwards moved to Akblât, and from thence to Malâzjerd, or Malâzkerd, called by the Greek writers Maze-kerta, at the head of 100000 men, with an intention to give the enemy battle. The Soltân, who was then at Khûnaj, in the province of Adherbijân, receiving advice of the emperor's motions, marched against him with the utmost expedition; though he could not assemble, at that time, when he was at too great a distance from the center of his dominions, above 15000 horse. Being arrived at Al Zabra, where Romanus had taken post with all his forces, the Soltân sent to the emperor to desire peace; but that prince returned for answer, that he would not even grant him a truce, unless he would deliver up the city of Al Ray, then the capital of the Seljukian empire, into his hands. The Soltân, provoked at this, and finding that the dispute must be left to the decision of the sword, on Friday in the afternoon, implored the divine assistance with prayers and tears; the troops, excited thereto by their monarch's example, themselves likewise shedding tears in great abundance. At last the Greeks, after a most bloody battle, which was fought on Friday, the 26th of Dbu'lkaada, were put to flight; and lost in the engagement, and the pursuit, which, according to Al Makîn, continued all the following night, an incredible number of men. The emperor himself was taken prisoner in the action; though with regard to the person into whose hands he fell, the eastern authors are not perfectly agreed. However, the Soltân soon set him at liberty, on condition that he paid a stipulated sum, released all the Mohammedan prisoners in his empire, and remitted to Al Ray an annual tribute. The first money, according to Abu'l Faraj, was to amount to 1000000 dinârs; though the Soltân insisted upon receiving 1500000 dinârs, if we may credit Al Makîn. The tribute is fixed by the latter of these authors at 360000 dinârs, but the Lebtârikh swells it to ten millions of those pieces. Romanus, after he had been dismissed by the Soltân with the highest marks of honour, finding it impossible to collect above 200000 dinârs, sent that sum to Alp Arslân, together with a jewel worth 90000 dinârs; solemnly protesting, that it was not in his power to do any more. The Mohammedan writers differ, as to the number of men the Soltân commanded at the battle of Zabra. Some pretend, that he had but very few troops with him; and others, that such a prodigious number of Greek deserters flocked to him, that, by their assistance, he found it no difficult matter to give Romanus the above-mentioned defeat. One author relates, that Alp Arslân had an army of 600000 horse, besides a body of infantry; and that he laid siege to Orsa, or Edeffa, then defended by 8000 Armenians, 20000 Syrians, 6000 Greeks, and 1000 Franks. To which he adds, that the Soltân, upon receiving advice of Romanus's irruption into Armenia, and being disheartened by the gallant defence of the garrison, thought fit to raise the siege. This, however, seems not to be sufficiently supported by other writers. But, for a full and ample account of the victory gained by Alp Arslân over the Greeks at Zabra, together with the principal circumstances immediately preceding and following that event, we must beg leave to refer our readers to the history of the Seljuks of Irân, a subsequent part of this work, to which it will more properly belong<sup>f</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> THE following year, being the 464th of the Hejra, which began Sept. 29th, 1071, Alp Arslân conquered the province of Gurjestân, or Georgia, deprived the grandees of their liberty, and obliged them to wear iron rings in their ears, as a mark of their slavery; to avoid which ignominy, many of them made an exterior profession of Mohammedism. However, the Soltân could not so thoroughly subdue the people of this country, who were extremely attached to the Christian religion, though in appearance Mohammedans, and their own natural prince, but that they were still possessed of a great number of strong holds in the mountains, which required much time to reduce. As the Soltân, therefore, was called away by other affairs, he left his son, Mâlec Shâh, to continue the war. That prince, in order to complete the conquest which his father had begun, had the fortresses of Caucasus to make himself master of. The principal of these was a place called, in the Persian tongue, Mirîâm Nishin, that is, the place, or dwelling, of Mary; on account of a monastery and church dedicated to the Virgin Mary, situated in the middle of a lake. This Mâlec carried by assault, and ruined the monastery; which seems to have put an end to the operations of the campaign. That the reduction of Gurjestân happened in the year we are now upon, Al Makîn and the author of the Lebtârikh leave us no manner of room to doubt. For, the former of those writers affirms, that the battle of Zabra was fought on Friday, the 26th of Dbul'kaada, not many days before the close of the preceding year; and the latter of them gives us sufficiently to understand, that this decisive action was soon followed by the conquest of Gurjestân. Either in the 463d or the 464th year of the Hejra, according to the Kharajian supputation of time, the Lowanians retired into Al Sa'id, or the Upper Egypt, plundered many monasteries there, put a great number of monks to the sword, and obliged all the rest to fly into the Lower Egypt. The outrages they had committed, which had well-near depopulated several of the provinces of Egypt, excited Al Mostanser Bi'llah to send an army against them, under the command of his Wazîr; who drove them out of Al Rif, and obliged them to enter Al Sa'id. However, the troubles in Egypt were intirely appeased, not long after the death of Nâsero'ddawla, the Lowanian general, as will soon more fully appear<sup>2</sup>.

IN the 465th year of the Hejra, which commenced Sept. 17th, 1072, Alp Arslân set out from Baghdâd, in order to subdue Turkestân, with an army of 200,000 men, towards Mawarâ'lnabr. Having advanced to the Jibûn, he threw a bridge over that river, for the passage of his numerous forces, in the month of Safar. This, however, took him up no less than twenty days. Here he staid to possess himself of certain castles, which might, if not reduced, have incommoded his passage. The first that he attacked, was that of Berzem, Barzam, or Barza, in which Yusef Kotbwâl, an intrepid Khowârazmian, commanded. This governor defended the place vigorously for several days; but being at last made a prisoner of war, the Soltân commanded him to be brought into his presence, and gave him very injurious language, for his temerity in daring to resist so long such a formidable army. Yusef, who rather expected to be praised by the Soltân for his bravery, being provoked at such outrageous treatment, answered with a great deal of fire, and even at last lost all respect. Whereupon Alp Arslân ordered his hands and feet to be tied to four posts, that he might be put to a cruel death. Yusef, hearing his sentence pronounced, took out a knife, which he had in one of his boots; and threatening the Soltân, said, "O wicked man! is this the treatment which a person of my merit deserves?" This menace so enraged Alp Arslân, that he let fly three arrows successively at him; but without effect. Upon which, Yusef, full of fury, ran at the Soltân with all his force, and mortally wounded him in the side. The assassin defended himself a long time against the prince's guards, and wounded several of them; but was at length dispatched, according to the author of Lebtârikh, by Gameah, one of the Soltân's pages, with a stone. Alp Arslân was brave, liberal, just, patient, witty, and sincere; constant in prayer, and giving alms. He greatly feared God, and was a strenuous advocate for Mohammedism. His shape and mein have been represented by some of the eastern writers as so very engaging, that he gained the respect and affection of all who approached him. He had long whiskers, and wore commonly a high turban, made in form of a crown. He was buried at Merû in Khorasân. The Soltân, after he had received the wound of which he died, was induced, by the counsel of Nadbâm, or Nezâm, Al Mslc, his Wazîr, to declare Mâlec Shâh his successor, though he was not his eldest son. At the same time, he required both this minister and the officers of the army to take the oath of allegiance to that prince, according to Al Makîn. The same author relates, that Mârûbîl Ebn Dawd Al Seljûki, having been informed of Alp Arslân's death, raised an army, and marched from Al Ray, in order to assert his right to the crown. But Mâlec Shâh met him near Hamadân, and attacked him with so much bravery that he defeated him, and took him prisoner. Soon after which, Kaderd, Mârûbîl's brother, set up for himself in the province of Kermân, and advanced with a considerable force to Kurj. But Mâlec Shâh <sup>a</sup> having in a most bloody battle overthrown him, by the valour of the troops of Khō-rasân, and gotten him into his hands, sent him under a strong escorte to a castle in that country; where he for some time kept him in durance, and afterwards poisoned him. Alp Arslân was born, in the year of the Hejra 421; and reigned nine years, six months, and twelve days. Mâlec Shâh did not only succeed him in the sovereignty of his dominions, but likewise in the post of Emîr Al Omrâ at Baghdâd. For, Alp Arslân was no sooner dead, than he was acknowledged his father's lawful heir and successor, at the head of the armies which he had commanded; and the Khalîf not only sent him the instrument of investiture confirming to him the title and power of Soltân, but he likewise added thereto the quality of Emîr Al Mûmenîn, that is commander of the faithful, which the Khalîfs, <sup>b</sup> till then had reserved to themselves, without conferring it on any other Mohammedan prince whatsoever. This year, if we will believe some of the writers followed by M. Renaudot, Nâsero'ddawla, who had so long persisted in an open rebellion against Al Mostanser Bi'llah, the Khalîf of Egypt, and ravaged so considerable a part of that fertile region, was cut to pieces by Begdekûr, a Turk, one of his principal officers, whose daughter he had married, in the city of Mesr. The parts of the mangled body the assassin sent into different provinces, in order to shew his contempt and detestation of the person to whom they had belonged. We must not forget to remark, that, according to Khondemir, Alp Arslân presided over the people of Khorasân, in quality of lieutenant-general to Togrol Bek, ten years before he ascended the Seljukian throne <sup>c</sup>.

Bedr Al Jemâl THE next year, being the 466th of the Hejra, beginning Sept. 6th, 1073, if some of <sup>c</sup> came first into M. Renaudot's authors may be credited, Bedr Al Jemâl, the Khalîf Al Mostanser Bi'llah's Egypt, in the Wazîr, came first into Egypt; though one of the writers he frequently follows makes that year 466. event to have happened, in the Kharajian year of the Hejra 463. With regard to the Kharajian year, it may not be improper to remark, that this has been fully described by Al Makrizi; though our readers may expect a short account of it, either when we come to the transactions of the year of the Hejra 501, wherein the custom of computing by Kharajian years was suppressed, or in the history of the Fâtemite Khalîfs of Egypt. As Begdekûr cut off all Nâsero'ddawla's brothers, either when he murdered that general, or in a short time after, his barbarity on this occasion proved the total extinction of the house of Hamdân <sup>d</sup>.

THE following year, being the 467th of the Hejra, commencing Aug. 27th, 1074, Al Kâjem Beamri'llah, the Khalîf of Baghdâd, departed this life, on Thursday, the 13th of Shaabân, according to Abu'l Faraj. But he died, on Monday, the 10th of that month, if we may certainly depend upon Al Makîn. At the time of his death, he was seventy-six years and three months old, and had sat forty-four years and nine months upon the Moslem throne. As soon as he perceived his end to approach, he appointed Abu'l Kâsem Abd'allah Ebn Mohammed Ebn Al Kâjem, his grandson, to succeed him; and sent for the principal grandees, the supreme Kâdi, or chancellor, and Ebn Jabîr, the Wazîr, to attend as witnesses to this designation. With regard to his disposition, Al Kâjem was learned, patient, mild, and sincere; a prince of an excellent political head, capable of giving the most salutary advice on any emergency, just, and one who greatly feared God. The first day of his reign was Tuesday, and the last Thursday. He cultivated the belles lettres, and had a taste for poetry, according to Khondemir; having left behind him several specimens of his poetical compositions, held in good esteem, if we will believe that author. Mirkhond relates, that, not long before his demise, such heavy rains fell in the Arabian Irâk, that they occasioned an extraordinary inundation of the Tigris; insomuch that many animals, both wild and tame, were carried away by the rapidity of the current. To which he adds, that the Khalîf himself was in an instant so surrounded by the waters, on his throne, that he must inevitably have perished, had not one of his slaves, by taking him on his shoulders, preserved him from the impending fate <sup>e</sup>.

They were governor by a prince, who bore the title of Ung, Wang, Onk, or Awank, Khân. He was also styled by the Arab writers King John, and by the European travellers Prester John. The news of the irruption mentioned here was communicated by the Nestorian metropolitan of Samarkand, in a letter, which was read in the Khalif of Baghdâd's palace. We might add many other particulars on this head; but, as the history of the kingdom of Prester John will be inserted in the supplement to this extensive work, we shall supersede all farther accounts of it here <sup>1</sup>.

S E C T. XLVIII.

b ABU'L KASEM ABD'ALLAH EBN MOHAMMED EBN AL KAYEM was created Khalif the Al Moktadi Beamri'llah same day on which his grand-father, Al Kâyet Beamri'llah, did, and assumed the title, or surname, of Al Moktadi Beamri'llah; after which, the nobles and great officers of the court took the oath of allegiance to him. The new Khalif said the funeral service at his predecessor's interment, and enjoyed a prosperous reign. The people of Syria, Arabia, Palestine, and Irâk, recognized his authority; and the city of Baghdâd flourished, whilst he sat on the Moslem throne. He was born six months after his father Mohammed's death, and was the only male of Al Kâyet's family that survived him. He has been represented as a brave and magnanimous prince, highly revered by his subjects. In his time, the Moslems recovered Al Roba, or Edessa, and Antakiah, or Antioch, from the Greeks. He was the twenty-seventh Khalif of the house of Al Abbâs, and had more respect paid him by Mâlec Shâh, the Emîr Al Omrâ, than had been received from the Soltân, or prime minister of the Khalifat, by many of his predecessors <sup>m</sup>.

c THE same year, Mâlec Shâh Al Seljûki, the Emîr Al Omrâ, according to Khondemir, sent his cousin Solimân Ebn Kâtûlmîsh into Syria, with an army capable of reducing that province. Solimân acquitted himself so well of his commission, that in a short time he subdued all that part of the country extending from the Euphrates to Antioch, a city then of very considerable note. About this time, the face of affairs in Egypt was intirely changed; plenty and order, after Nâsero'ddawla's death, succeeded scarcity and confusion there. However, the Fâtemite Khalif's Wazîr began now to rule with an absolute sway. Nor did the following Wazîrs, who either acquired their dignity by force, or by bribing the soldiery, without any manner of regard to the consent of the Khalif, who was obliged to confirm the choice the troops had made, lose this power, till the time of Salâb'addîn, or Salâbo'ddîn, who ejected the Fâtemites out of Egypt. Mahmûd Azzo'ddawla, the Sâheb, or lord, of Aleppo, a prince of great honour and bravery, whose praises have been celebrated by the poet Ebn Habûs, departed this life, the present year, according to Al Makîn. He repossessed himself of the city of Aleppo, in the month of Ramadân, and the year of the Hejra 455; and, in the 460th year of that æra, took the castle of Arta from the Greeks. Al Emîr Nasr Ebn Mahmûd, his son, mounted the throne of Aleppo, after his demise. Al Emîr Nasr's mother was the house of Bûiya, if we will believe the last mentioned author. But, notwithstanding what has been advanced on this head by Al Makîn, Mahmûd Azzo'ddawla, if Abu'lfeda merits any attention in this point, died, in the month of Dhu'l-hajja, the following year <sup>n</sup>.

d IN the 468th year of the Hejra, beginning Aug. 16th, 1075, Aksîs Al Khowârazmi, The most powerful army, formed the siege of that city, and at last obliged it to capitulate, for want of provisions. At this time, the famine raged so grievously there, that a Gerâra (F) of <sup>year 468</sup>

(F) The word Gerâra, or, with the article prefixed, Al Gerâra, properly denotes a large sack, capable of containing hay, corn, or any thing of that kind, as we are informed by Goliûs. But, in the passage here referred to, it must be taken in a more confined and limited sense; though the particular kind of measure our author had in view, we cannot take upon us to determine (38).

corn was sold for above twenty dinârs. He likewise reduced the greatest part of Syria, and caused the oration to be made in the name of Al Moktadi, the Khalîf of Baghdâd; that of Al Mostanser, the Khalîf of Egypt, having before been mentioned in the mosques of this country. The last article, which we have extracted from Abu'l Faraj, if admitted, will in a good measure invalidate Khondemir's account of Solimân Ebn Kâtûlmish's expedition into Syria, the preceding year. Al Emîr Nasr Ebn Mahmûd was assassinated by some Turkish soldiers, near Aleppo, the 2d of Shawâl, according to Al Makîn. He was, if that author may be credited, a munificent, upright, and magnanimous prince; treading in his father's footsteps, through the whole course of his short reign. The poet Ebn Habûs celebrated his praises in a copy of verses, a specimen of which has been preserved by Al Makîn; for which, Al Emîr Nasr made him a present of 1000 dinârs in a silver dish. This excited other poets to follow Ebn Habûs's example; but, their performances being inferior in point of merit, they did not meet with so ample a reward. Al Emîr Nasr was succeeded by Al Amîn Sâbek Ebn Mahmûd Ebn Nasr Ebn Sâleh Ebn Mordâs, his brother; who presided over the people of Aleppo till the year of the Hejra 472, as we learn both from Abu'lfeda and Al Makîn °.

THE next year, being the 469th of the Hejra, which commenced Aug. 4th, 1076, Mâlec Shâh Al Seljûki, surnamed Jalâlo'ddîn, or Jalâlo'ddawla, went to Baghdâd, and paid the Khalîf the honour due to his high dignity. He ever afterwards likewise lived upon good terms with him. This was contrary to the ordinary custom of the Soltâns, who heretofore generally treated the Khalîfs in a very disrespectful manner. Mâlec Shâh returned to his Persian territories, after he had made a short stay at Baghdâd °.

Aksîs Al
Khowârazmî invades
Egypt.

THE same year, Aksîs Al Khowârazmî, called Aysar Al Afsîs by Al Makîn, after he had reduced Damascus and Hems, marched into Egypt; which so frightened Al Mostanser Bi'llah, the Fâtemite Khalîf, that he resolved to fly by night from his capital. But, the citizens of Al Kâbirah and Sawdân, advancing against him, defeated his troops, though much superior in number. In his return to Damascus, he put a considerable number of men to the sword at Al Ramla, and 3000 at Jerusalem, amongst whom was the Kâdi of the place. It seems probable from Mirkhond, that Ibrahim, Ferokhzâd's brother, the Soltân of Gazna, extended his conquests in Indostân, about the time that we are now upon °.

The principal
events of the
year 470,

THE following year, being the 470th year of the Hejra, which began July 25th, 1077, Jalâlo'ddawla Mâlec Shâh, entertaining an opinion that Al Afsîs, Al Aksîs, or Aysar, had been slain in the Egyptian expedition, wrote to his brother Tâjo'ddawla to go and conquer Syria. Tâjo'ddawla no sooner arrived at Diyâr Becr, than he was informed, that Aysar, or Al Aksîs, the lord of Damascus, was alive, and in perfect health; who, hearing that the other was advancing against him, offered to pay the Soltân an annual tribute. This proposal being accepted by Mâlec Shâh, he commanded his brother to abandon Diyâr Becr, and retire to Manbij. Tâjo'ddawla, therefore, in pursuance of the orders he had received, moved at the head of his forces to the latter of those places, and marched from thence to Haleb, or Aleppo, then possessed by Al Sâbek Ebn Mahmûd Ebn Nasr Ebn Saleh Ebn Mardas: but, not being able to reduce that city, he returned by Harrân to Diyâr Becr; which put Moslem Ebn Koreish (G) Ebn Bedrân Al Okaili, the Sâheb, or prince, of Nasîbîn and Sinjâr, or Senjâr, the Singara of the antients, upon his guard. It appears from some good authors, that about this time considerable numbers of Moslems, or Mohammedans, were settled in the kingdom of Nubia; though the greatest parts of the inhabitants of that vast tract, if we will believe these writers, professed the Christian faith. It may not be amiss to remind our readers here, that the people of Nubia had been subdued, or rather rendered tributary to the Khalîf, by the Arab forces, under the command of Abd'allah Ebn Sa'id, the governor of Egypt, as early as the year of the Hejra 31 °.

(G) Erpenius, in his Latin version of Al Makin, writes this name Coraisus, and consequently supposes the last letter in the original Arabic word to be Sîn; whereas, from the very manuscript he followed, it appears to be Shîn. This is farther confirmed by the Leyden manuscript of Abu'lfeda's chronicon, or rather by M. Reiske's Latin translation of a passage in that manuscript; wherein this Sharfo'ddawla Moslem is called filius Coraischi, that is, Ebn Koraisb, or rather Ebn Koreish, in conformity to Erpenius's manuscript of Al Makin. The same name likewise occurs in Dr. Pocock's MSS. of Abu'l Faraj; which puts the point we are now insisting upon beyond all dispute (29).

- a IN the 471st year of the Moslem æra, which commenced July 14th, 1078, Mâlec Shâh and of 471. undertook the conquest of the country beyond the Jibân, whose Khân, called Solimân, he overthrew with very great slaughter, took him prisoner, and sent him under a strong escorte to Esfahân, then the capital of his dominions. For a farther account of this expedition, our readers may have recourse to the history of the Seljuks of Irân, which will have a place assigned it hereafter in this work. The same year, the Soltân took to wife Turkân, or Tarkân, Khatûn, the daughter of Tamghaj Khan, the son of Bagra Khân, or Terâh, king of the Turks, as he is called by Al Makîn. That princess brought him a son, in 479, denominated Sanjâr, from a little city of that name in Khorasân, where he was born. Some, however, have given this prince the appellation of Mahmûd. About this time, Ibrahim Ebn
- b Mas'ûd, the ninth Soltân of the race of Gazna, after his return from India, where he had considerably extended his conquests, being informed, that Mâlec Shâh was making great preparations to attack him, sent ambassadors to the Seljukian court; who prevailed upon the Soltân to desist from his intended invasion of the territories of the house of Gazna. They even persuaded Mâlec Shâh to enter into an alliance with Ibrahim, and to marry his daughter to Mas'ûd, that prince's son. According to some writers followed by M. Renaudot, Christodulus, the Jacobite Alexandrian patriarch, departed this life, the present year<sup>c</sup>.

- THE next year, being the 472d of the Hejra, beginning July 4th, 1079, the forces of Mesr, or Egypt, advancing to Damascus, in order to besiege it, Aksîs, or Afsîs, who com-<sup>What happened in the year of the Hejra 472,</sup> manded in that city, sent for assistance to Tâjo'ddawla; at whose approach the Egyptians thought fit to retire. Hereupon Afsîs, coming to visit him, was seized, and slain, by his command. Then, taking the city, he became master of all his riches and valuable effects. After this, the inhabitants, who had fled into Irâk and Khorasân, to avoid the tyranny of Afsîs, returned to enjoy the protection of the Seljuks. The same year Sharfo'ddawla Ebn Moslem Ebn Koreish, the Sâheb, or lord, of Al Mawfel, having obtained leave of Mâlec Shâh to subdue Haleb, or Aleppo, on condition of paying him annually 300000 dinârs, marched against that place; which, after it had been for some time besieged, was, together with the castle, delivered up to him. The Sâheb, or prince of Aleppo, when Sharfo'ddawla took possession of it, was Sâbek, or Sâbak, Ebn Mahmûd Ebn Nafr Ebn Sâleb
- d Ebn Mardâs, whose ancestors had reigned near sixty years there. As Mâlec Shâh had received the instrument of his investiture from Al Moktadi, the Khalîf of Baghdâd, so all the lesser Mohammedan princes, Sâhebs, or Emîrs, derived their authority from the Soltân. The Seljukian empire was at this time one of the most potent monarchies that had ever been erected in the East, extending from the borders of Egypt, according to some authors of good repute, to a considerable distance beyond the Jibân, the Amû, or the Oxus. Cyril, the Jacobite Alexandrian patriarch, answered a synodical letter, written in the name of Dionysius, the Jacobite patriarch of Antioch, the metropolitans, bishops, and priests, under his jurisdiction, and directed, or addressed to Christodulus; whose name, on account of his death, was expunged, and that of Cyril substituted in his room. The letter was
- e brought by one Thomas, a Syrian presbyter, from Antioch to Mesr, and read publicly in the Jacobite churches there. After this, Dionysius's name was inserted in the diptychs, and mentioned at the altars, during the time of divine service. As for Cyril, he resided for the most part at Mesr, near the church of St. Michael, generally called Mokhtâra, or Al Mokhtâra, in a neighbouring cell. He afterwards intended to have fixed his residence in Al Rif; but was prevented from carrying his design into execution, not only by the frequent conferences he had with Al Mostanser Billah, the Khalîf of Egypt, but likewise by the numerous legations out of Nubia and Ethiopia<sup>f</sup>.

- THE following year, being the 473d of the Hejra, commencing June 22d, 1080, Sedido'ddawla Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Moklad Ebn Nafr Ebn Monkad Al Catâni advanced
- f to Shaizar at the head of a powerful army, laid siege to that city, and at last obliged it to surrender to him. This fortress, with the district appertaining to it, which comprehended a considerable prefecture of Syria, remained in the possession of Sedido'ddawla's family, till it was taken by Al Mâlec Al Adel Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki, after an earthquake, which had destroyed a great part of the place. When this dire event happened, all Sedido'ddawla's descendents were buried in the ruins of the walls and buildings that had been demolished by the shocks, according to Al Makîn. The same year, Salmon, or Solomon, the king of Nubia, having abdicated his kingdom, and placed George, his sister's son, upon the throne, entered upon the monastic state; and, that he might entirely devote himself to the service of Almighty God, retired into the valley of Abunefser, or St. Onufrius, where a church had been erected, under the protection of that saint. This church was about three days journey from the confines of Nubia. The governor of Afwân, being informed that the king of Nubia, some of whose subjects were Mohammedans, had taken up his residence in a neighbouring desert, sent a party of twenty soldiers to remove him from thence, and conduct him to Al Kâbirah. The governor had received his intelligence from one of Kenazo'ddawla's brothers, who had been defeated by Bedr Al Jemâl, and made his escape into Nubia; but was sent back into Egypt, by Salmon, at the requisition of that Emir. Upon his arrival at Mesr, Salmon was treated with uncommon marks of distinction; trumpets sounding, and drums beating, when he entered that city, by the Fâtemite Khalîfs command, in order to do him the greater honour. Bedr Al Jemâl, the Wazîr, or Emir, for he was dignified for both those titles, entertained him in a very hospitable manner, ordered a proper apartment to be magnificently fitted up for him, and most copiously supplied him with all the necessaries and elegancies of life. He died about a year after his arrival at Al Kâbirah, and was buried in the monastery of St. George in Kbandek. He assigned as a reason for his abdication the almost inevitable necessity kings lie under of indulging their irregular appetites, shedding blood, and committing acts of injustice; which, however specious and agreeable their conduct may appear to men, must render them extremely criminal and reproachable in the sight of Almighty God. With regard to Salmon's appointment of his successor, before he abdicated the crown; this, we are told by an Armenian author, was perfectly consonant to the laws and political constitution of Nubia, according to which the king's nephew, by his sister, after his death ascended the throne. Nor were there lately wanting instances of the same kind in other remote countries, particularly the Indies, if we will believe M. Renaudot, and any attention is to be paid to several of the most eminent Portuguese writers <sup>a</sup>.

The chief occurrences of the year 474,

THE 474th year of the Hejra, which began June 11th, 1081, was rendered remarkable by the death of Nûro'ddawla Dobais Al Asadi; who departed this life before the close of it. He reigned fifty-seven years, lived eighty, and was adorned with many excellent virtues. His subjects almost adored him, for the rectitude and moderation of his government. Mansûr, surnamed Bahao'ddawla, his son, who succeeded him, bore likewise the character of a most upright and equitable prince. Immediately after his accession, he was confirmed in the sovereignty of the province over which his father had presided by Mâlec Shâh, and honoured by Al Moktadi Beamri'llah, the Khalîf of Baghdâd, with a royal vest. About this time, Severus, a youth of great erudition, at the recommendation of Bedr Al Jemâl, the Wazîr, who had received some very valuable presents from him, and a promise of several more, was ordained by Cyril, the Jacobite Alexandrian patriarch, the metropolitan of Ethiopia <sup>b</sup>.

and of 475.

IN the 475th year of the Hejra, which commenced June 1st, 1082, Sedîdo'ddawla Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Moklad Ebn Nasr Ebn Monkad Al Catâni, died at Sbaizar, after he had reigned there a year and several months. He was a wise, excellent and magnanimous prince. Abu'l Merhaf Nasr Ebn Ali Moklad, his son, succeeded him at Sbaizar, and was surnamed Mâleco'ddawla. As for Sedîdo'ddawla, besides his other accomplishments, he had a taste for poetry, and was even himself an eminent poet. A specimen of his poetical performances has been preserved by Al Makîn <sup>c</sup>.

THE next year, being the 476th of the Hejra, beginning May 20th, 1083, produced not many remarkable events, at least scarce any account of any such events has been handed down to us by the oriental writers. However, it may not be improper to remark, that Mohammed Ebn Habeth, who succeeded his father Habeth Ebn Abu'l Kasem, in the year of the Hejra 461, reigned through the whole course of it at Corduba in Spain. This prince's dominions were of very considerable extent. He presided over the Moslems of Corduba and many other towns, whom he governed with great lenity and moderation, and in a very prosperous manner, till he was dispossessed of all his territories by the Al Moravides, called Al Morabeta and Molathemiyah by the Arabs under the command of Yusef Ebn (H) Tassefin; a relation of whose conquests will be inserted in a future part of this work, to which it will more properly belong <sup>d</sup>.

- <sup>a</sup> THE following year, being the 477th of the Hejra, commencing May 9th, 1084, Mâlec Shâh sent Al Kastakar, his Hâjeb and general, to Baghdâd, as his lieutenant there; at which time, his Wazîr's son was in that city. The same year, his brother Takash rebelled against him; and, having taken Merû, or Marwa, in Khorasân, would not permit his army to enter it for three days. However, he and a select party that attended him plundered it during that term, lay with such women as were prohibited by the Moslem law, and drank wine in the great temple or mosque, in the month of Ramadân. But, receiving advice, that Mâlec Shâh was marching against him, he retired into the castle of Berjes; which being taken, he was thrown into irons, and confined in a fortress of considerable strength. This year, Sbarfo'ddawla Ebn Koreish, the Sâheb of Aleppo and Al Marwâs, moved at the head of his forces to attack Antioch, then in the hands of Solimân Ebn Kotolmîsh; who put his army to flight, and he died of his wounds. Before the beginning of the action, he had sent a detachment of his troops to summon the city, but found the garrison determined to defend it to the last extremity. About this time, Severus, who had promised Bedr Al Jemâl, Al Mostanser's Wazîr, to prevail upon some of the Abissinian princes to submit to the Fâtemite Khalîf, when he appeared as metropolitan, was opposed by one Cyril, said to be an intruder and impostor, who pretended to have been ordained by, and received a proper authority from, Christodulus, the Jacobite Alexandrian patriarch, in Ethiopia <sup>1</sup>.
- <sup>b</sup> IN the 478th year of the Hejra, which began April 29th, 1085, Al Mâlec Tâjo'ddawla, and of the having been apprized of Sbarfo'ddawla Ebn Koreish's death, marched towards Aleppo, accompanied by Artâk Al Turkmâni, or the Turkmân, who had made himself master of Holwân and Al Habel. These two commanders agreed to attack Solimân, the Sâheb of Antioch, who seems to have been then either in possession of Aleppo, or to have formed the siege of that city. They fought several battles with him, under the walls of Aleppo; in the last of which Solimân was slain, and his forces routed. After this victory, Tâjo'ddawla seized upon Aleppo, and reduced to his obedience the whole country of Syria. It appears from Anna Comnena, that Tâjo'ddawla was called by the Greeks Tutuses; which appellation is not very remote from Tatash, the name, or rather surname, given Tâjo'ddawla by Abu'l Faraj. Anna Comnena likewise relates, that the great Soltân, being informed of Tutuses's, or Tâjo'ddawla's, success, and fearing he would grow too powerful, in order to strengthen himself, sent a Chaus, or Chausb, that is, a messenger of state, to the emperor Alexis, to propose an alliance with him by way of marriage; of which we shall oblige our readers with a more particular account, in a future part of this work. About the time that we are now upon, though the year in which this event happened has not been precisely determined, Bedr Al Jemâl, Al Mostanser's Wazîr, put to death his son. That young nobleman, having been made the governor, or rather commandant, of Alexandria, at the instigation of some of his officers, whose fathers, or other relations, had been executed, for joining Nâsero'ddawla in his defection, rebelled against the Fâtemite Khalîf. But, after he had sustained a siege for two months, he was obliged to surrender to his father, who commanded the Khalîf's troops, upon terms; the principal of which was, that the citizens of Alexandria, who had joined the Wazîr's son in his rebellion against the Fâtemite Khalîf, and even cut off that prince's garrison in their city, should be fined or mulcted a very considerable sum. The Wazîr, being in possession of the town, insisted upon a larger sum, amounting to 120000 dinârs, than what had been stipulated in the capitulation; which seems to have highly exasperated his son, as he afterwards, with several other persons, conspired against his father's life. This Wazîr, therefore, finding him absolutely incorrigible, confined him to his chamber eighteen months, and at the end of that term put him to death; though as to the manner in which this was done, the Egyptian writers are far from being perfectly agreed <sup>2</sup>.
- <sup>c</sup> THE next year, being the 479th of the Hejra, which commenced April 18th, 1086, Mansûr Ebn Babao'ddawla Mansûr Ebn Nûro'ddawla Dobais Al Asadi departed this life, and was succeeded in the sovereignty of Hella Al Nil, and all the other places he possessed, by Saifo'ddawla Sadaka, his son. Hella, or Hellab, the first of these, a city seated on the Euphrates, not far from Anbâr, is supposed, with good reason, to have been erected either on or near the spot where Babylon stood. We must not forget to remark, that, according to some of the authors followed by M. D'Herbelot, Yusef Ebn Tefsefin, the Molathemiyan general, gained the battle of Zalab, or Zalafab, near the city of Badajos, or Badajox, wherein king Alphonfus was defeated and slain, the present year. That general had before secured the person of Mohammed Ebn Habeth, the king of Corduba, who had called him to his assistance against the king of Castile; so that the victory obtained at Zalab enabled him to complete the conquest of the Moslem part of Spain. It ought to be here observed, that this Alatbeniyan prince acknowledged for his sovereign, and recognized the authority of, Al Moktadi Beamrillab, the Khalif of Baghdád <sup>a</sup>.

Al Moktadi marries Mâlec Shâh's daughter. THE following year, being the 480th of the Hejra, beginning April 7th, 1087, the Khalif Al Moktadi espoused the daughter of Mâlec Shâh. This princess was a lady of transcendent beauty, and the public rejoicings at Baghdád, when she made her entry into that capital, were such as surpassed every thing of the same kind that before had happened in the Moslem world. For, all the streets of the city were illuminated with wax torches on this occasion; and the Khalif, in order to demonstrate his affection for so charming a creature, prepared for her a most magnificent festin; in forming the desert of which, 24000 pounds weight of sugar was consumed. Every other article of this most superb entertainment, if one of the eastern writers may be credited, who has been followed in this valuable work by M. D'Herbelot, were proportionably grand <sup>b</sup>.

Mâlec Shâh performs the pilgrimage to Mecca. IN the 481st year of the Hejra, commencing May 27th, 1088, Mâlec Shâh performed the pilgrimage to Mecca, according to Hamdallah Mestûfi, in the Târikh Khozideh, with an incredible expence. For, besides abolishing the usual tribute which the pilgrims paid, he laid out very large sums in building towns in the desert; where he ordered a great number of wells and cisterns to be made, and water to be conveyed to them from all sides. He likewise commanded plenty of provisions to be carried, for the subsistence of the pilgrims; and distributed immense sums amongst the poor, with an unparalleled liberality. We must not forget to observe, that Ibrahim Ebn Mas'ûd, either the eighth or the ninth Soltân of the house of Gazna, who had entered into an alliance with Mâlec Shâh, died according to Mirkhond, the present year <sup>c</sup>.

What happened in the year 482. THE next year, being the 482d of the Hejra, beginning March 16th, 1089, Mâlec Shâh's daughter, who had been married to Al Moktadi Beamrillab, the Khalif of Baghdád, left her husband in disgust <sup>d</sup>, and returned to Esfabân, then her father's residence, and the capital of the Seljukian empire. Here she remained to the time of her death; but when that happened, we have not been certainly informed. This year, the brother of Severus, the metropolitan of Ethiopia, came into Egypt out of that country, with presents for Bedr Al Jemâl, Al Mostanser's Wazîr; which, if we will believe the author here referred to, by no means pleased him. The Wazîr had no sooner received them, than he sent for the Jacobite Alexandrian patriarch; who immediately, with ten bishops, waited upon him. He then asked the patriarch, Why he had ordained the metropolitan of Ethiopia, without paying the usual sum to the Fâtemite Khalif? He likewise complained, that the metropolitan had neither caused any mosques to be erected in Ethiopia, nor sent him any rich presents, as he had promised to do. To this the bishop of Danku, one of those who attended the patriarch, made answer, That the metropolitan of Ethiopia had not been ordained but by his express order; to which the Wazîr replied, that both he and the patriarch lied. He then signified to them, that he insisted upon two bishops being immediately dispatched into Ethiopia, who should take care to have a certain number of mosques built there, and see that divine service was performed in them after the Mohammedan manner. The Wazîr also gave them to understand, that the Moslem merchants, as he had been informed, were not permitted to traffick in Ethiopia; and that, if this was true, he knew what course to take. When he dismissed them, he obliged the bishops to take with them two soldiers a-piece, and to pay each of them a dinâr a day; with which money, by his command, they were to be supplied by the patriarch. He farther intimated to them, at their dismissal, that this mulct should be continued till Mark, the bishop of Wissim and Gizet, and Theodore, the bishop of Sinjâr, or Senjar, were sent upon the abovementioned errand into Ethiopia. In the mean time, an embassy arrived at Al Kâbirah from Basilus, the king of Nubia, with magnificent presents for the Wazîr; the principal of which embassy was the son of the late king, who desired to be ordained a bishop. The Wazîr hereupon sent for the patriarch, the ten bishops, with the soldiers that lived upon them, and the brother of the metropolitan of Ethiopia. When they appeared before him, he communicated to them the contents of a letter he had received from a Mohammedan merchant; who therein accused the metropolitan of shutting him out of Ethiopia, and seized upon all his subsistence by force. But it was proved, in answer to this accusation, that, at the time when these things were supposed to be done, Severus, the metropolitan, was in prison, where he had been before confined by the king of Ethiopia. The Wazîr then said, that the metropolitan had promised him to erect four mosques in Ethiopia, and that he had not been as good as his word. His brother instantly replied, that he had actually built seven mosques there; but that

- a the Ethiopians had levelled them with the ground, and the king had imprisoned him for what he had done. This pacified the Wazîr, who thereupon demanded what they intended to do? We will, said they, write letters to the metropolitan and the king of Ethiopia, in Coptic and Arabic, drawn up in whatever terms you shall think fit to dictate to us, which shall be read to you, for your approbation; and we will moreover send two bishops with them into Ethiopia, that they may have the greater weight there. By this means they extricated themselves out of the difficulties in which they were involved, and pleased the Wazîr; who thereupon supplied the two bishops with all things necessary for their intended journey, and took their brethren and the patriarch again under his protection. The same author adds, that he was told by persons worthy of credit, that the Wazîr likewise dispatched an ambassador with the bishops to the court of Ethiopia, with a letter to the king, importing, that, if he did not comply with every one of his demands contained therein, he would absolutely demolish all the Christian churches in Egypt. To which, continues this writer, the Ethiopian monarch made answer, that if he displaced but a single stone in any of the Christian churches under his jurisdiction, he would send him all the stones and tiles of the temple at Mecca, and make up every one that was wanting with its weight in gold. Hence it appears, that the Ethiopians, or Abissinians, were at this time so far from being Moslems, that Mohammedism, though professed by some of the Fâtemite Khalîf's subjects in that country, was not publicly tolerated in Ethiopia.

- c THE following year, being the 483d of the Hejra, which commenced March 6th, 1090, the Bâtaniyah, not Bathania, or Bathaniyah, as they are called by M. D'Herbelot, began to subdue the castles of Deylam and the Persian Irâk. The first they took was in the former province, and denominated Al Rûdiyâr. It belonged to Kamâb's, a prince in alliance with Mâlec Shâh; and was delivered by Kamâb's lieutenant to Al Hasan Ebn Masbâh, who had seduced him, for 1200 dinârs. This Al Hasan, who had persuaded the governor of Rûdiyar to turn Bâtanist, was a native of Merû in Khorasân, and had been secretary to Abd'alrezak, or Harâm. Afterwards going to Egypt, he met with a Bâtanist, who brought him over to their persuasion; and by the consent of the people, made him, whose family was one of the noblest in Merû, the chief, and head, of the sect. He had many followers, who paid an implicit obedience to him. As he soon grew considerable, Mâlec Shâh sent him a threatening letter, requiring his submission. Al Hasan hereupon ordered the Soltan's messengers to be brought before him; when he sent for a company of his people, and commanded one of them, a young man, to kill himself: Which he instantly did, without the least hesitation. He ordered another to throw himself headlong from the top of the castle; which he performed immediately, and broke his neck. After this, Al Hasan told the Seljukian ambassador, that he had no other answer to return the Soltân, than that he had 70000 men at his command, who obeyed him in the manner which he had seen. Mâlec Shâh was not a little surprized, when these things were reported to him; and, having other affairs on his hands, he thought it not adviseable to enter into a war with that prince. His troops therefore, in a short time, reduced several other castles; and, amongst the rest, that of Al Amût. This, being rendered almost impregnable, they esteemed as their strongest hold, and royal seat. These Bâtanites, or Bâtenites, are likewise called Ismaelians, by some authors, and were nearly related to the Karmatians, if they were not a branch of them. They are also termed, by the Arabs, Al Molâhedak, or the impious; and, by the writers of the history of the holy wars, Assassins. They agreed with the Karmatians in many respects; such as their inveterate malice against those of other religions, and especially the Mohammedan, their unlimited obedience to their prince, at whose command they were ready for assassinations, or any other bloody and dangerous enterprize, their pretended attachment to a certain Imâm of the house of Ali, &c. These Bâtanites dispersed themselves over several parts of the east. The word signifies Esoterics, or people of inward or hidden light or knowledge. As these enthusiasts now possessed themselves of the best part of Al Jebâl, in the Persian Irâk, under the conduct of Al Hasan Ebn Masbâh, or Al Hasan Sabâh, as he is sometimes called, the commencement of the dynasty of the Ismaelian princes is generally placed in the year that we are at present upon. The style, or title, adopted by these princes was, Sheikh Al Jebâl, that is, the prince of Al Jebâl, or the chief of the mountainous country; the province of Al Jebâl being such a sort of tract, and even from this circumstance deriving its modern name. The words Sheikh Al Jebâl may likewise be properly rendered the senior, or old man, of the mountain, as to every one in the least acquainted with the Arabic very clearly appears. The Persians give this territory the name of Kûbestân, or Kûbistân, a term in their language of the same import with Jebâl in the Arabic tongue, and denoting a mountain, or mountainous tract. Hence the chief of these Assassins goes under the appella-

THE 484th year of the Moslem æra, which began Feb. 23d, 1091, seems not to have produced many memorable events. However, Mâlec Shâh, during the course of it, according to some of the eastern writers, undertook a second journey to Baghdâd, and returned from thence to Esfahân, his royal seat. About this time, or rather a little earlier, Severus, the metropolitan, who had ineffectually endeavoured to expel polygamy from thence, introduced several salutary regulations, tending to reform the manners both of the king and his subjects, into Ethiopia<sup>e</sup>.

Nodhâm Al
Molc, Mâlec Shâh's Wazîr,
is deposed and
assassinated,

THE next year, being the 485th of the Hejra, which commenced Feb. 12th, 1092, was rendered remarkable by the deposition and assassination of Nodhâm, or Nezâm, Al Molc, Mâlec Shâh's Wazîr. The Soltân having sent Kûdan, one of his principal slaves, to Merû in Khorasân, Othmân Ebn Jamâl Al Molc, Nodhâm Al Molc's grandson, the governor of that city and the prefecture belonging to it, presuming on his grandfather's uncontrollable power, and excited thereto by the indiscretion of his youth, treated him extremely ill; which so incensed the Soltân, that he sent him a sharp and expostulating letter, to the following effect: "If you are in reality my partner in the empire, go on as you please; but if you are my minister, you ought not to pass the limits prescribed ministers and subjects. This has been done by some of your family, and particularly by Othmân Ebn Jamâl Al Molc, your grandson, in Khorasân." This letter being delivered to the Wazîr, the purport of his answer was as follows: "Do you not remember, that, when your father was slain, I had the management of all your affairs, and suppressed all the rebellions that soon after broke out against you? At that time your whole dependence was upon me. But now, after you have proved superior to all your enemies, and when every one of your subjects obeys you, you give ear to my accusers, and listen to the calumnies they have forged against me. Are you ignorant that the agreement and connection between your turban and my ink-stand are the true cause of the prosperity you have enjoyed; and that your future felicity, and the stability of your throne, will intirely depend upon them?" The imprudent and unguarded expressions in this answer extremely irritated Mâlec Shâh, who thereupon immediately deprived him of his employment. Khondemir writes, that this Wazîr was greatly imbroiled with the Soltâna, Tarkân Khâtûn, upon the subject of the succession, which she had a mind should fall upon her youngest son; but was opposed herein by Nodhâm Al Molc, who was for elevating to the throne after his father Barkiarok, as being both the eldest son and the most capable of taking upon himself the government. The Soltâna, therefore, according to this author, in order to carry her design into execution, meditated the destruction of the Wazîr. For which purpose, she accused him of absolutely disposing of all places in the empire, and dividing them amongst his sons; which, by reason of a bold answer returned by the Wazîr to a message he received from the Soltân, finally terminated in his disgrace. Abmed Ebn Mohammed Abd'aljaasar Al Kazwîni, the author of the Nighiaristân, ascribes Nodhâm Al Molc's dismissal to the conduct of his son Mowayyad, or Mowayyed, Al Molc; who, soon after he had been made secretary of state, turned out Abu Jaasar Al Zûzeni, surnamed Al Adib, the first clerk in the office, esteemed the most excellent writer of the large character called by the Turks and Persians Togra of his time, though put in by the Soltân's order, and returned an insolent answer to Mâlec Shâh, when he sent to have him restored. This at last drew the Wazîr himself into the dispute, and ended in his amotion from the sublime post he had filled with so much reputation about thirty years. Nodhâm Al Molc, after he was dispossessed of his charge, followed the court, which just at that time set out from Esfahân for Baghdâd; and being arrived at Nahawând, a boy of the Bâtanite sect, approaching him under pretence of begging, or otherwise, stabbed him with a knife, by the procurement of Taj Al Molc Kami, the president of the privy council, who succeeded him in his sublime office. But Al Hasan Sabah, prince of the Bâtanites, according to the Lebtârîkh, commanded the assassin, who was a Deylamite, to perpetrate the horrid fact. Before the Wazîr expired, he wrote a letter to Mâlec Shâh in Persian verse, conceived in the following terms: "Supported by your authority, great monarch, I have spent one part of my life in banishing injustice from your dominions. I am now going to give an account of my administration, which I carry with me, as a witness of my fidelity to your majesty, to the sovereign king of heaven. The fatal term of my life happens in the ninety-third year of my age, and it is the blow of a knife that puts a period to my " days,

- a “ days. Nothing remains but to deliver into the hands of my son a continuation of the “ long services I have rendered you, by recommending him to God and your majesty.” Hence it appears, that Nodbâm Al Molc was cut off in the 93d year of his age; though he was not above seventy-seven years old, at the time of his death, according to Abu'l Faraj. His father is said to have been the prefect, or governor, of a small town in the territory of Tûs. He learned Arabic, in his younger years, and was secretary to Bajer, lord of Balkb. But that prince plundering him the beginning of every new year, and telling him he was grown too fat, he fled to Jaafar, or Jagri, Bek Dawûd, Togrul Bek's brother; who made him preceptor to Alb, or Alp, Arslân, his son. His palace was open to all learned and virtuous men, to whom he always professed himself a patron; which is not to be wondered at, as he was himself both learned and virtuous. The liberality, which this great man exercised, vastly enhanced his other rare qualities. In the first progress, which Mâlec Shâh made through his extensive dominions, the Wazîr distributed amongst the poor, out of his own coffers, no less than 280,000 dinârs. Many epicedia, or copies of verses in praise of him after his death, were made by the Arab poets of that age; the best of which seems to have been one written by Shablo'ddawla, that has been handed down to us by Abu'l Faraj. But, for a full and ample account of this celebrated minister, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to the reign of Mâlec Shâh, the third Soltân of the Seljuks of Irân, to which it more properly belongs<sup>h</sup>.
- b

- c THE same year, soon after the assassination of Nodbâm Al Molc, Mâlec Shâh proceeded to Baghdâd; where he arrived the 14th of Ramadân. He went a hunting, with many attendants, on the third of Shawâl; and, eating some of the flesh of the game, returned sick to his palace. A vein being opened, but little blood came out; which increased his illness to a burning fever; so that he died on a Friday, about the middle of the same month. He survived Nodbâm Al Molc, his Wazîr, only eighteen days. His wife, Tarkan Kbâtân, concealed his death while she stayed at Baghdâd, and probably carried his remains with her to Esfahân. She also distributed considerable sums of money amongst the military men; by which means, and the assistance of Taj Al Molc, the Wazîr, she prevailed upon the army to take the oath of allegiance to Mahmûd, the youngest of Mâlec Shâh's sons. The death of the Soltân occasioned a tetraſtich, or quatrain, in Persian, made by a Magrebian poet, the sense of which was to the following effect: “ The old Wazîr dies in one month, and the “ young king follows him in the next. The power of God discovers to us the weakness “ of princes, to the end that we should adore him alone, and not attach ourselves too “ closely to any thing else.” This great prince, who was the third Soltân of the Seljuks of Irân, lived thirty-seven years, and five months; of which he reigned twenty, and some months over. As to his person, he was very handsome both in shape and features, besides being extremely polite in his behaviour. With regard to his character, he was an excellent prince, wise, liberal, courageous, had fine parts, and was remarkable for his sincerity and piety. He reduced the taxes, and put a stop to other vexations; repaired bridges, high roads, and canals; erected the temple of Baghdâd, called Al Jûma' Al Soltân, the temple of the Soltân, and also the Hanîſcan college, near the chapel of the famous Imâm, Abu Hanîſa Al Nômân Ebn Thâbet, in the quarter of the city called Al Rusâfa, and most munificently endowed it. He likewise ordered, according to Khondemir, other colleges, besides hospitals, and houses of pleasure, to be built in several parts of his dominions. He moreover constructed market-places and towns. He acquired an immense quantity of plunder, during the wars in which he was engaged, obtained many victories over his enemies, and extended the frontiers of his empire from Turkeſtân to the Holy Land and Yaman. He made the roads secure, and, by the wise measures he pursued, procured plenty of every thing in all places. He was a terror to bad men, and a support to the innocent, the widow, and the poor; who had always justice done them in his courts. Soon after Nîs, Takaſh, or Takaſh, his brother, had rebelled against him, he went to Tûs, in order to visit the Masjhad Ali Ebn Mûſa Al Radi, that is, the ſuplckre, or place of martyrdom, of Ali Ebn Mûſa Ebn Jaafar Al Radi, descended in a right line from Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, and esteemed by the Persians as one of the twelve Imâms. He was attended in this journey by Nodbâm Al Molc, his Wazîr; who prayed most devoutly, as soon as he reached Ali Ebn Mûſa's tomb. The Soltân, observing this, could not forbear asking him what might be the object of such fervent supplications? He immediately replied, “ I am now offering up my prayers to heaven for “ your majesty, that you may extinguish the unnatural rebellion lately broke out in your “ dominions; and prove superior to your brother Takaſh.” To which the Soltân made answer, “ My prayer is of a different kind ; it is conceived in the following terms. “ O a “ Almighty God, if my brother will govern the Moslems better than I, let him gain the victory ;

 “ if not, let me prove superior to him.” Many other such instances of real piety and devotion were exhibited by him, according to Al Makin. Though he lived in good understanding, and even perfect amity, with the Khalif, he ordered that prince to retire from Bagh- dâd ; that he might be the supreme soveraign, and have the chief command, in the metropolis of the Moslem empire. The Khalif, after the Soltân’s arrival there, begged he might be permitted to stay ten days longer in his capital ; and before the expiration of that term, says Al Makin, Mâlec Shâb departed this life in that city. The same author relates, that he was buried at Baghdâd ; though Tarkân Kbâtûn carried his corpse with her out of that place, probably to Esfahân, according to Abu’l Faraj. The two chief blemishes in his b character seem to have been his intended expulsion of the Khalif Al Moktadi Beamri’llah from Baghdâd, and the suspicion he lay under of being privy to the murder of Nedâm Al Molk.
 With respect however to the former of these, it was not improbably occasioned by something which the Soltân might judge censurable in the Khalif’s conduct ; especially, as we have been told, that Mâlec Shâb commanded that prince to depart the city in twenty-four hours, and was not without some difficulty prevailed upon to suspend his banishment for only ten days. As to the latter, there does not appear to be any real foundation for it ; the assassin having, by the Soltân’s order, met with the punishment due to his atrocious crime.
 He was naturally merciful, and spared many great offenders ; tho’ the exigency of affairs, c and the necessity of the times, obliged him to put to death his uncle, and others of his relations. Some writers have represented him as a patron of learned men, and one who had an uncommon affection for those who cultivated the sciences. The Seljukian empire in the reign of Mâlec Shâb comprehended Syria, or at least the most considerable part of that region, Mesopotamia, Fârs, Kermân, the Persian and Arabian Irâks, Khorasân, Khawârazm, Anatolia, Great Bukhâria, or Mawarâ’nahr, the kingdom of Kâshgar, or Little Bukhâria, extending to the borders of Tibet, and several others provinces. It was governed by princes, who originally derived their authority from the Soltân ; though many of them, several of whom were related to him, afterwards set up for themselves, and seemed to be independent on him. Nay, he is said to have disposed of not a few of the above-mentioned provinces, in his life-time, amongst his relations and domestics. He gave to his cousin Solimân Ebn d Kotolmîsh, or Kûtûlmîsh, the country of Al Rûm, or what he had taken from the Greek emperor ; of which Arzerûm, or Erzerûm, was then the capital. He established Soltân Shâb, the son of his uncle Kaderd, with whom he had been imbroiled in the beginning of his reign, in Kermân ; of which he was the second Seljuk Soltân. Part of Syria he assigned to his brother Tâjo’ddawla, Tatash, or, as M. D’Herbelot calls him, Tebis ; Khawârazm to Tûstakîn
 the district of Aleppo to Aksankar ; that of Al Mawfel, or Mosul, to Tchagirmîsh, or Jagar- mîsh ; and Mâredîn, or Mâradîn, to Katmûr. From whence we may conclude, that Mâlec Shâb’s ambition was confined within moderate bounds ; though he was the most powerful, as well as the most excellent, of the Seljukian princes. From some of the aforesaid prefects, or lieutenants, of provinces, descended the Atâbeks of Fârs and Irâk, the latter of which e were the princes of the house of Zenki, or Zengi, settled at Al Mawfel, who possessed themselves of almost the whole country of Syria. Several of their descendants were likewise cut off by the Franks in Palestine and Syria, others were destroyed two hundred years after by the Tartars, and others did not only preserve, but likewise enlarge the territories they had acquired. One of these was the famous Nûr’oddîn, who overthrew the Franks, after a bloody battle, near Antioch ; in which Raymond, the prince of that city, was slain. Mâlec Shâb’s greatest passion was for hunting. He kept 47,000 horses for his ordinary guard, and the chace ; in which he spent a good deal of time. The author of the Lebtârîkh relates, that he had constantly on foot a standing army of 48,000 horse. For every beast, which f he killed himself, he gave a dinâr to the poor : and it once happened, that he either slew or took 10,000 of them in a day. On this occasion he probably surrounded a whole forest with his nets and toils, as Mohammed IV, the Othmân Soltân, did, in the last century ; by which means he got into his hands, in so short a time, such an infinity of game. He is said also to have taken vast delight in travelling, and to have made the tour of his extensive dominions no less than ten times. The reformation of the Persian kalendar, called Târîkh Al Jalâli, or the Jalâlean kalendar, derived its name from Jalâl, or Jalâlo’ddawla, a title conferred upon Mâlec Shâb, and was owing to an order of that prince ; but of this our readers may expect to meet with a full and ample account, in a subsequent part of this work <sup>i</sup>.

- a THE same year, according to several authors of good repute, died Cyril, the Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria, who sat fourteen years, three months, and fifteen days, in the patriarchal see there, and was buried in the church of Al Mokbtâra in the isle of Mesr; from whence he was afterwards transferred to the monastery of St. Macarius in the valley of Habib. He read, some time before his death, the four gospels in Coptic, and wrote Tafasser, or commentaries, upon them in Arabic; the Coptic being then, especially amongst the common people, but little understood. He spent all the money he could spare in relieving the poor, in repairing and rebuilding churches, and in other acts of charity; so that, when he died, he did not leave so much as a single dirhem behind him. He fasted often, and lived for the most part till evening upon pulse; other sort of food being prepared for his scholars, or disciples. He spent much of his time in praying, and frequently conversed with those he was to instruct upon divine subjects. When he administered the holy communion, he made use of a form in the Coptic tongue. He was extremely well versed in the sacred writings, and acquainted with every thing that could in any manner contribute to a proper illustration and interpretation of them. One Mikbâyyel, or Michael, who had been formerly detained in prison at Sinjâr, or Senjâr, was elected patriarch in his room. We must not forget to remark, that a dreadful earthquake made terrible havock at Antioch, and many other cities of Syria, the preceding year. Jerusalem at that time was in the hands of the Az (H), or rather Gaz, Turks; who seem to have succeeded the house of Artak there. Soon after the earthquake above-mentioned, the city of Antioch was laid almost intirely under water by an inundation of the Orontes; which overthrew a vast number of buildings, and did incredible damage in that place. The Nile likewise overflowed its banks the same year, and fertilized some of the remoter provinces of Egypt in a most wonderful manner; insomuch that a greater plenty was then observable in them than had ever before been known. Artak Ebn Aksak (I), the Turkmân, the prince of Mâredin, who had formerly been put in possession of Haleb, or Aleppo, by Mâlec Shâh, departed this life, in the year of the Hejra 484; after whose death, Sakmân and Ilgâzi, his sons, occupied Jerusalem, and many other towns in Syria of considerable note. But they soon (K) relinquished their territories in these parts to the Gaz Turks above-mentioned; who, as well as the descendents of Artak, acknowledged for their Soltân Mâlec Shâh. Nor was it an unusual thing for the petty princes, who recognized the authority of that chief, to quarrel among themselves, and engage in bloody wars one with another, though they were all tributary to the Seljukian Soltân; who was by no means displeased with this unaccountable conduct, as it weakened them all, made them more tractable, and obliged them to persevere in their obedience to him, by rendering them incapable of rebelling against him. Some writers pretend, that a supernatural luminous appearance was seen in the church of the resurrection at Jerusalem, either in or about the year that we are now upon *.

- It has been already observed, that, by the management of Tarkân Khâtûn, and Taj Al Molc, the Wazîr, the army had been engaged to take the oath to Mahmûd, her son; who had been appointed to succeed him, though he was then not six years old, by his father Mâlec Shâh. This was done by concealing the Soltân's death, by carrying his corps privately out of Baghdâd, and by distributing money copiously among the troops. Tarkân was a lady of great prudence and sagacity, and had a body of 10,000 Turks, that she could depend upon, intirely at her devotion. She found it therefore no difficult matter to prevail upon the Khalîf to confirm Mahmûd in the dignity of Soltân. This he did by ordering his name to be published in the pulpits, by sending him the ensigns of investiture, and by commanding him to be cloathed with the Soltân's Kastrân, or vest, in the presence of Abu'l Mansûr Ebn Hamyar. At the same time, the crown was put on his head, and the royal sword girt to his side. On this occasion it has been observed by Al Makîn, that never prince so young

(H) In some of the manuscript copies of Abu'l Faraj, these Turks, or Turkmâns, are called Az, and in others, Gaz; the same character standing for A and G, in the Arabic alphabets, and being determined to the latter by the diacritical point (i).

(I) This we learn from some of the authors followed by M. Renaudot, in the piece referred to here; though if this Artak Ebn Aksak, or Ortok Ebn Aksak, as he is sometimes called, be the same person with the Aksankar, or Kasmaroddawla, of Al Makîn, as there is some reason to believe, he must have been killed in battle by Tajoddawla, in the year of the Hejra 487 (2).

(K) Notwithstanding this is plainly intimated, or rather positively asserted, by M. Renaudot; yet it clearly appears from Abu'l Faraj, that Sakmân and Ilgâzi, or Aylgâzi, the sons of Artak, occupied the city of Jerusalem, when it was taken by the Egyptians, a little before it fell into the hands of the Franks, in the year of the Hejra 492 (3).

behaved with better grace, he moving neither hand nor foot, nor any other part of his a body, whilst the ceremony was performing; and that, after Abu'l Mansûr Ebn Hamyar, the Khalîf's Wazîr, who conducted the whole affair, had made him his master's compliments, he returned thanks for the favours received in a very handsome manner. Abu'l Mansûr then went to Tarkân Khâtûn, and congratulated her on her son's elevation to the Seliânat, as well as condoled with her in the Khalîf's name for her husband's death. After which, the young Soltân and his mother paid their acknowledgements to the great arbiter of events for the assistance he had vouchsafed them; and then marched at the head of a body of troops to Nakrawân, where they incamped. It appears from Khondemir, that the Soltâna procured the instrument of investiture from the Khalîf chiefly by dint of rich presents; and that Mahmûd, wherever he might have been at the time of his father's death, was crowned and inau- b gurated at Baghdâd<sup>1</sup>.

Tâjo'ddawla In the mean time, Tâjo'ddawla, the Sâkeb of Damascus, and brother to Mâlec Shâh, receiving advice of the Soltân's demise, set up for himself in that city. He also dispatched a minister to Baghdâd, to bring him the patent of investiture from the Khalîf; but was refused it by that prince, who had before granted to Tarkân Khâtûn his declaration in favour of Mahmûd. Tâjo'ddawla hereupon marched to Rahaba upon the Euphrates, and possessed himself of that city; after which, he obliged Kasmaro'ddawla, on whom the government of Aleppo had been conferred by Mâlec Shâh, to make his submission to him. It may not be amiss to remind our readers here, that Haleb, or Aleppo, fell into the hands of Tâjo'ddawla, who was afterwards forced to cede it to Kasmaro'ddawla by Mâlec Shâh, in the year c of the Hejra 478<sup>m</sup>.

Barkîârok is proclaimed Soltân at Esfahân. WHILE Mahmûd was crowned at Baghdâd, Abu'l Modhaffer Kâsem, called Barkîârok, the deceased Soltân's eldest son, was acknowledged, in right of his birth, for legal successor at Esfahân, where he at that time made his residence. He was joined by many people there on account of his primogeniture, and because they thought him more capable of governing the state than a woman and a child. Tarkân Khâtûn, being informed of what had happened at Esfahân, marched thither with a considerable army of Turks from Nakrawân, and surprized Barkîârok in that city, which she took. But some domestics of Nodhâm Al Molc, the late Wazîr, who had always wished well to that prince, found means for him to escape out of his mother-in law's hands, and retire to Shîrâz; where resided Takâsh Takîn, who d had been made Atâbek, or lieutenant-general, of Fârs by Mâlec Shâh. This prince did not only furnish Barkîârok with troops, to defend him from all the attempts of his enemies, but likewise conducted him in person under a strong escorte to Al Ray, one of the capitals of the Persian Irak; where he ordered him to be proclaimed Soltân, in his father's room. In the mean time, Tarkân Khâtûn caused her son Mahmûd to be crowned at Esfahân, the other capital, and sent troops to pursue Barkîârok; but many of them going over to his side, he defeated the rest. Among the prisoners taken on this occasion was Taj Al Molc; who being brought to the Soltân, the friends of his predecessor slew him. He was a person endowed with many virtues, and excellencies of every kind; but all his good qualities were defaced by the murder of Nodhâm Al Molc. Abu'l Ma'âli Nûbas, a poet of some note, being not e a little affected with his tragical fate, was thereby induced to write several stanzas upon the inconstancy of fortune, and the instability of human affairs. It must be remembered here, that Mâlec Shâh left behind him four sons, Barkîârok, Mohammed, Sanjar, and Mahmûd. The first of these, probably by a wrong position of the diacritical points, is named Tarkîârok in Dr. Pocock's manuscripts of Abu'l Faraj<sup>n</sup>.

Mahmûd resigns. AFTER the desertion and defeat of Mahmûd's troops, Barkîârok advanced to Esfahân, and laid siege to that city, where his brother was then shut up, with an army of 20,000 men. Tarkân Khâtûn, finding herself pressed, and her subjects disposed to a revolt, made proposals for an accommodation to Barkîârok; which being accepted by that prince, Mahmûd and his mother were left in possession of Esfahân, with its dependencies, and Barkîârok f received half of his father's treasure, amounting to 500,000 dinârs. The peace being concluded, the Soltân raised the siege, and turned his arms towards Hamadân, where Isma'îl, one of his uncles, then commanded. It appears from Khondemir, that the name Barkîârok received at his circumcision was Kasem, or Kassem. The life of that celebrated minister Nodhâm Al Molc, so famous over all the East, has been written by several of the oriental historians and biographers, and particularly by Ebn Khalecân<sup>o</sup>.

- a THE following year, being the 486th of the Hejra, which began Feb. 1st, 1093; Ismael, The most memorable occurrences of the year 486. Barkîârok's uncle, having been allured by Tarkân Khâtûn, with hopes of marriage, led all the forces he could draw together in the district of Hamadân against his nephew. The two armies, which were pretty equal, met in the plains of Hamadân; where, after an obstinate engagement, Ismael was overthrown, in the month of Ramadân. Being taken prisoner in the action, he was immediately put to the sword. This rebellion was scarce extinguished, when Takâsh Shâh, the son of Arslân Shâh, another of Barkîârok's uncles, declared war against him; and, having a much greater force, obliged him to retire towards Esfahân, where he was very kindly received by his brother Mahmûd, whose mother was then dead. However, Mahmûd's friends, judging they should do him important service
- b by such a measure, came to a resolution to seize upon the person of Barkîârok; which having executed, they confined him in a certain castle. Nay, it is said, an order was actually given to deprive him of his sight; when, by another more absolute order of providence, Mahmûd, being taken with the small-pox, died in a few days. This unforeseen accident proved extremely favourable to Barkîârok; who was hereupon set at liberty, and saluted emperor, by the very people who just before had imprisoned him, and would have rendered him incapable of government. Being thus seated a second time on the throne, he chose for his Wazîr, or prime minister, Mowayyad Al Molc, the son of Nadbâm Al Molc, who had the management and direction of all affairs in the reign of Mûlec Shâh. He did not, however, continue long in that sublime post; the Soltân soon dismissing him, through
- c some distrust, and putting his brother Fakhr Al Molc, whom he sent for out of Khorasân, in his place. These particulars, which we have extracted from Khondemir, nevertheless run counter to what has been handed down to us on the same head by Al Makîn. That author gives us to understand, that Kasimaro'ddawla, having renounced his allegiance to Tâjo'd-dawla, went over with a formidable body of troops to Barkîârok, and excited him to come to a rupture with his brother Mahmûd; who was deserted by his forces, and driven by his brother from Baghdâd, according to the same writer, the following year. Nor did Tarkân Khâtûn depart this life before the commencement of that year, notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary by Khondemir, if we will believe Al Makîn <sup>p</sup>.

- d In the 487th year of the Hejra, commencing January 21st, 1094, the Khalîf Al Moktadi Al Moktadi's death and character. Beamri'llah died at Baghdâd; of which event the following circumstances have been handed down to us by the eastern historians. Soltân Barkîârok having entered Baghdâd, on the 15th of Al Moharrâm, the present year, made many rich and valuable presents to the Khalîf, and demanded the patent of investiture of that prince. This being granted by Al Moktadi, he ordered the instrument to be drawn out in form, perused it, signed it, laid it before him, and commanded the Soltân's Kaftân, or vest, to be carried to Barkîârok. After he had dined, and washed his hands, he read the patent over a second time; and then immediately asked Shems Al Nabâr, one of his women, then with him, who those persons were that presumed to come into the room, and to approach him without his permission? Shems Al Nabâr, astonished at this, turned her head about to discover who they were; but seeing nobody, she
- e cast her eyes upon the Khalîf, and perceived his countenance changed. His hands and feet at the same time failed him, and that very instant he dropt down dead on the ground. Which so terrified her, though she thought him at first only in a swoon, that she immediately called in Tamîn, his servant. Abu'l Mansûr, his Wazîr, and Abu'l Abbâs Ahmed, his son and successor, being then sent for, his body was prepared for interment, and afterwards inhumed with the usual ceremonies. He lived thirty-eight years, eight months, and some days; of which he reigned nineteen, and eight months, according to Abu'l Faraj. The author of the Nighiaristân relates, that after the table was taken away, only two of his women, Kahermânab and Shamsalnahâr, or Shams Al Nabâr, continued with him; that he drank no more than his usual quantity of liquor that day; and that he suddenly, as if in a state of distraction,
- f proposed to Shams Al Nabâr the question above-mentioned. With regard to his character, he is said to have been extremely well versed in the rites and institutions of Mohammedism, pious, a lover of learned and honest men, brave, courteous, beneficent, and a very good poet. A specimen of his poetical performances has been preserved by Al Makîn. He has been represented by Khondemir as a prince who had the reputation of being an admirer of justice, and as one who reformed a great number of abuses, that had crept into the state, in contempt of the laws, whilst he sat upon the Moslem throne. As he took vast delight in patronizing men of erudition, several excellent persons dedicated their works to him. Amongst these may be ranked Sa'id Ebn Hebatallah (K), the author of the book

(K) This Sa'id Ebn Hebatallah seems to be the Hebatallah Ebn Sa'id Ebn Al Talmid of Abu'l Faraj. He was physician to several of the Khalîfs of the house of Al Mo'w. Hist. Vol. I.

book, intituled, Mogni fil Tebb, a physical treatise written for the use of this Khalif, and Ebn Yazlah (L), who composed a piece, bearing the title of Takwim Al Abdân, another physical performance, dedicated to Al Moktadi, the twenty-seventh Khalif of the house of Al Abbâs. His views for the advancement of the sciences were admirably well seconded by Mâlec Shâh and Nodbân Al Molt, this prince's Wazîr. For, if Ebn Shohnah may be depended upon, they, by the Khalif's order, assembled all the famous astronomers of those parts of the East, that flourished at this time, in the year of the Hejra 467, and the beginning of Al Moktadi's reign; who fixed the Newrûz, or first day of the solar year of the Persian kalendar to the first degree of Aries, it having then, by the negligence of astronomers, or rather a succession of years, been gradually removed to the fifteenth degree of Pisces, insomuch that they found themselves obliged to suppress fifteen intire days. The Julian kalendar was reformed after much the same manner, in the year of our LORD 1582, when ten whole days were suppressed, in order to bring back to the first degree of Aries the vernal equinox. The 467th year of the Moslem æra was therefore the true and genuine epoch of the reformation of the Persian, or Falâlean, kalendar; though Zacuti, a Jewish author, places this epoch in the year of the Hejra 472, five years later than the Arab writers, and makes the Newrûz to have fallen on the fourteenth day of the month Nisan, or March. Both the first and last days of this Khalif's reign were Friday, according to Al Makin. The distemper that carried him off so suddenly is called by the Arabs Fajia and Mefajian, a name which they likewise assign to the plague. The Mohammedans believe, that it proceeds from certain spirits, or goblins, armed with bows and arrows, sent by God to punish men for their sins, whenever he pleases; and that when the wounds are given by spectres of a black colour, they certainly prove mortal, but not so, when the arrows are shot by those that appear white. It is in this manner that the Moslems reason upon the plague, and it is upon this foundation that they never take any precaution (M) to guard themselves against it <sup>a</sup>.

Al Mostanser Bi'llah, the Khalif of Egypt, dies.

THE same year, died Al Mostanser Bi'llah, the Khalif of Egypt, on Thursday, the 18th of Dhu'l-hajja, at midnight, after he had reigned about sixty years. He survived only a few months Bedr Al Femâl, the Armenian, his general and Wazîr; who for several years had the sole management and direction of the Egyptian affairs, Al Mostanser Bi'llah, the Fâtemite Khalif, himself being in reality nothing better than a nominal prince. A little before the Wazîr departed this life, he obtained the instrument of investiture from his master, by which Abu'l Kâsem, his son, was appointed to succeed him in the post of Wazîr, had the title of <sup>d</sup>

We shall give a farther account of him, when we come to the transactions of that year (1).

(L) Tabya Ebn Isa Ebn Yazlah was originally a Christian, and studied physic among those of his own religion at Baghdâd. But none of the Christians there being at that time versed in logic, which he was desirous of learning, he applied himself to Abu Ali Ebn Al Walid, a celebrated adept therein, to be instructed in the principles of that art. He did not therefore teach it Ebn Al Walid, as M. D'Herbelot asserts. As his master was one of the principal doctors of the Motazalites, he at last prevailed upon him not only to embrace Islamism, but even the tenets of the Motazalite sect. He had not long professed himself a Moslem, before he was caressed and employed by Abu Abd'allah Al Dâmagâni, or Dâmaghâni, chancellor to the Khalif Al Moktadi; who had the highest regard for him, both as a physician and a scribe. As he excelled in both those capacities, he is frequently styled Al Kateb and Al Thabib Al Baghdâdi, by the Arab writers. In this situation, he discharged the duties of his posts with reputation and applause; and prescribed for all his friends and acquaintance, without fee or reward. After his apostacy, he is said to have written a letter, which he addressed to Elias a Christian priest, in order to justify his conduct. In this letter, by a deplorable blindness, he pretends to prove, that Mohammed had been predicted and announced both in the Old and New Testament. His two physical treatises ought to be held in more esteem. That which he wrote first bore the title of Takwim Al Abdân, and the other that of Al Menbâj. They consist of tables divided into several parts, where all kinds of diseases, and their respective cures, are treated of in an alphabetical order. Dr. Pocock's manuscripts of Abu'l Faraj make the Al Menbâj to have been composed first by Ebn Yazlah; whereas that it was written after the other, most clearly appears from the preface prefixed to it, wherein the Takwim Al Abdân is mentioned, as a piece that had seen the light before. As for the Al Menbâj, it was evidently not published 'till after its author became a convert to Islamism. Abu'l-feda, in the preface to his geography, says, that he borrowed the method of his tables from Ebn Yazlah, which he applied to the description of countries and provinces, and for this reason he has given those tables the title of Takwim Al Boldân. Ebn Yazlah left all his books to the chapel, or oratory, of Abu Hanîfa. He died, in the year of the Hejra 463, not 493, as M. D'Herbelot asserts, according to Abu'l Faraj (2).

(M) Some of the Turks at present seem to have receded from the practice of their ancestors in this particular. For, according to Dr. Mackenzie, who was himself then upon the spot, the better sort of Turks took greater precaution than usual, when the dreadful plague, which made such terrible havock there, broke out at Constantinople, in the year 1751. Hence it came to pass, that only two of their great men then died; though four of the grand signor's ladies, in the seraglio, were said to have been carried off at that time by the distemper (3).

- a Shâhinsbâh, or Shâhensbâh, that is, king of kings, conferred upon him, and received the honourable appellation of Afdal. As for Al Mostanser himself, he was famous for nothing but the uncommon length of his reign. He at first designed to declare Nezar, his eldest son, his successor; but altered his intention, some time before his death, and called to the succession Abu'l Kâsem Ahmed, surnamed Al Mosta'li Bi'llah, his younger son; then not above twenty years of age. Some of the Mohammedan writers inform us, however, that after Al Mostanser's demise, Al Mosta'li was saluted Khalif, by the influence and activity of Afdal, the Wazîr; who prevailed upon the Emîrs, Kâdis, and other great men of the court, to espouse the interest of this prince, and take the oath of allegiance to him. Nezar, continue they, made the Wazîr his enemy, by treating him in a contumelious manner, because
- b he did not light off his horse once when he met him; on which occasion, that prince, considering himself as next heir to the crown, and being highly provoked at the affront, said to Afdal, by way of contempt, "Armenian, get down." It is also reported by these authors, that Nezar had engaged to advance one of his own friends to the dignity of Wazîr, as soon as he had seated himself upon the throne. On both which accounts, Afdal conceived an utter aversion to Nezar, and persuaded Al Mostanser to defer from time to time obliging his subjects to take the oath to Nezar, as his immediate successor, as he intended to have done; and at last, by his intrigues, induced all the officers of the army, the learned men of the law, and those who filled the principal posts in the state, to acknowledge Al Mosta'li, after his father's demise, for their sovereign. The last point he carried, by publicly
- c declaring, that Al Mostanser, a little before his death, nominated Al Mosta'li to succeed him; and by producing witnesses, as he pretended, of undoubted credit, in support of his assertion. Nezar and his brothers were therefore obliged to submit to Al Mosta'li, and recognize his authority; though Nezar afterwards fled to Alexandria, and set up for himself there. But he was besieged, and made a prisoner, by Afdal; who, notwithstanding the heinousness of his crime, spared his life. However, soon discovering an inclination to revolt again, he was thrown into irons, and starved to death with hunger. Others write, that he was immured, or shut up between two walls, just sufficient to inclose him; and that he there, probably for want of sustenance, miserably ended his days<sup>r</sup>.

- BEFORE we conclude our short account of Al Mostanser Bi'llah, the Fâtemite Khalif of Al Mostanser
- d Egypt, and his two last Wazîrs, in this place, it may not be improper to relate a most remarkable occurrence (N) of his reign, transmitted down to us by Al Makin. This Khalif, according to that historian, sent Michael, or Mikhâyyl, the Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria, as his ambassador, with magnificent presents, to the Najâshi, or king of Ethiopia, to prevail upon that monarch to open the chanel that conveyed water to Egypt, which for some time had been stopped. This had reduced the Khalif's subjects almost to the last extremity, for want of provisions; it being well known, that the whole tract of Egypt has always been fertilized by the overflowings of the Nile. The Najâshi readily granted the patriarch's request; that prince himself, as well as the greatest part of his people, being then of the Jacobite sect. The consequence of which concession was, that the Nile, which had before
- e vastly failed, rose three yards in one night, and rendered the land of Egypt as capable of cultivation as ever. The Khalif treated the patriarch with uncommon marks of distinction, at his return, and munificently rewarded him for the important service he had done him. Whether this remarkable event happened under the administration of Bedr Al Femâl, or that of his son Afdal, we have not been certainly informed; but that, the latter of those Wazîrs ruled the Egyptians with great prudence, equity, and moderation, an author, frequently cited by M. Renaudot, has not scrupled to affirm<sup>s</sup>.

(N) Al Makrizi has extracted his account of this memorable occurrence from Al Makin. For the better understanding of which account, it may not be improper to remark, that the springs, or fountains, of the Nile are in Ethiopia; as we have fully evinced in our antient Universal History; so that a surprizing decrease of the Nile, from the cause here hinted at, can by no means be deemed impossible. This likewise appears from what Gregory, the Abyssinian, or Abissinien, related to the famous Job Ludolfus; from Alfon-

sus Albuquerque's commentaries; and from what has been observed by other reputable authors. However, M. Renaudot believes Al Makin not to be worthy of the least degree of credit in this particular. But, as we have not room here for the arguments that may be urged for and against the authority of Al Makin in the point before us; we must beg leave to refer our learned and curious readers, for farther satisfaction on this head, to the last-mentioned writer, and our antient history of the Ethiopians (1).

S E C T. XLIX.

Abu'l Abbās
Ahmed Al Mostadher is proclaimed
Khalif.

ABU'L ABBAS AHMED, Al Moktadi's son, by one of his concubines, was acknowledged <sup>a</sup> for Khalif and Emir Al Mūmenīn by the people of Baghdād, as soon as his father's death was publickly known. He was in a short time after inaugurated in form, and assumed the title, or surname, of Al Mostadher Bi'llab, as we learn from Abu'lfeda, Al Makīn, and Abu'l Faraj. Al Soltān Barkiārok Ebn Jakīlo'ddawla Mālec Shāb was then at Baghdād with his army, and confirmed by his authority Al Mostadher Bi'llab's elevation to the Moslem throne. He also secured to himself the office of Emir Al Omrā, or Soltān, as the prime minister to the Khalif was at this time called; and, in consequence of the sublime post he filled, as well as by the vast power he had acquired, was not only master of Al Mostadher's person, but likewise of the Khalifat itself.

Barkiārok's success.

It has been already observed, that Tarkān Khātūn died, the present year, according to Al <sup>b</sup> Makīn; and that about the same time, or rather a little after that princess's decease, Barkīārok drove his brother Mahmūd out of Baghdād. The Soltān had no sooner possessed himself of that city, than he ordered his name to be mentioned in the pulpits, and received the title of Rocno'ddīn, or Rucno'ddīn, that is, the pillar, prop, or support of the faith, or religion, from the Khalif. He also assumed that of Emir Al Mūmenīn, which no prince before Mālec Shāb had been honoured with. Having settled his affairs, he applied himself intirely to war. His first expedition was against Takash, or Tacash Shāb, one of his uncles, who had obliged him to retire to Esfabān, the preceding year; and, after some bloody engagements between them, Tacash Shāb at length was slain. This year, Al Mālec Tājo'ddawla led an army against Aksankar, or Kasmaro'ddawla, whom Mālec Shāb had made governor of <sup>c</sup> Haleb, or Aleppo, after he had taken it from Tājo'ddawla, his brother, and fought several battles with him. The war was, however, terminated by the death of Aksankar; who was killed, in the former Jomāda, the present year. After which, Tājo'ddawla possessed himself of Aleppo, and made the necessary dispositions for carrying his victorious arms into Irāk <sup>d</sup>.

Tājo'ddawla
is vanquished
and slain.

THE next year, being the 488th of the Hejra, beginning Jan. 11th, 1095, Tājo'ddawla <sup>e</sup> Tataash advanced at the head of his forces to Al Ray, in the Persian Irāk; where he was met by Barkīārok, and overthrown with very great slaughter. This battle was fought, in the month of Safar, according to Al Makīn. Tājo'ddawla, who was killed in the action, had before sent Yusef, the son of Artak, not Arsak, as he is called in Erpenius's MS. of Al Makīn, <sup>d</sup> the Turkmān, to Baghdād, with a body of troops, as it should seem from the last-mentioned author, in order to prevail upon the Khalif to acknowledge him Soltān. But Al Mostadher Bi'llab, who had already honoured Barkīārok with the Kaftān of Soltān, or imperial vest, crowned him king of Baghdād, adorned him with the collar and bracelets, and appointed him ruler over his court, being informed of his approach, dispatched his Hājeb, or chamberlain, to Yusef; commanding him to quit, without delay, the territory of Baghdād. But he was so far from paying any regard to the Khalif's commands, that he laid waste part of that district, and even formed a design to plunder the capital itself. But whilst he was intent upon the execution of this pernicious scheme, he received the news of Tājo'ddawla's death and defeat; upon which, he immediately fled to Aleppo. The text of Al Makīn, in the passage here referred to, may by some perhaps be thought to imply, that the Khalif at first proposed to detach his Hājeb with some of his forces to attack Yusef Ebn Artak; and that afterwards, for some particular reasons omitted by this historian, that measure was laid aside. But whether this sense, or the other just assigned the passage before us, which is pretty intricate and obscure, be more eligible, and consonant to the author's meaning, we must leave to our learned and intelligent readers to decide <sup>e</sup>.

Other events

REDWAN, surnamed Fakhr Al Molc, then at Damascus, being apprized of his father Tājo'ddawla's death, made the best of his way also to Aleppo; and, upon his arrival there, possessed himself both of the citadel and the town. Dekāk, generally called Shams Al Moluc, <sup>f</sup> the sun of kings, his brother, was no sooner informed of his father's fate, than he retired likewise to Aleppo, out of Diyār Becr, from whence he was attended with a considerable body of troops. He had not been long at Aleppo, when he received a letter from Sūbekīn Al Hādem, the governor of the castle of Damascus for Tājo'ddawla; who therein offered to deliver up that city, and the territory appertaining to it, into his hands. Dekāk, therefore, left privately his brother Redwān; who, being informed of what had happened, sent in

- a pursuit of him a detachment of 400 men. But they not coming up with him, he arrived safe at Damascus, where Sûbekîn Al Hâdem, in conformity to his promise, obliged the troops to take an oath of fidelity to him. Dekâk, in return, made that officer his lieutenant there. But he soon after put him to death, and appointed Atâbek, not Abâbek, as he is styled in Erpenius's faulty manuscript of Al Makîn, Ta'belîn to succeed him. This Ta'belîn had formerly been one of Tâjo'ddawla's slaves; and was not at first much esteemed by his master. But finding him afterwards a person of merit, that prince conferred on him the post of Hâjeb; and at last raised him to the government of Damascus, in order to reward his conduct and bravery. Tâjo'ddawla likewise appointed him to preside over the people of Mayyâfârikîn, and even made him preceptor to Dekâk himself. He was taken prisoner in the battle of Al Ray, at the time that Tâjo'ddawla was killed. Being released by Barkîârok, he went to Damascus, and became one of Dekâk's greatest favourites, after Sûbekîn Al Hâdem had settled his authority there. This giving Sûbekîn no small disgust, he grew jealous of Ta'belîn, whom he looked upon as a formidable rival in his master's affections, and even conceived an utter aversion to Dekâk himself; which occasioned such a contumelious treatment on his part of that prince as brought on his disgrace, and at last a deprivation of life itself. After which, Ta'belîn was placed at the head of the administration; and took to wife one Al Khâtûn, a lady for whom Dekâk himself had a vast esteem *.
- b

WE must not forget to observe, that Anna Comnena, the Greek historian (O), mentions the death of Tâjo'ddawla, Tatash, or Tutus, as she calls him. She says, that Puzan, who had been sent by the Soltân against Apel Kasem, or Abu'l Kasem, at Nice, as soon as he heard of his master's death, marched towards Kherasân, against Tutus, and was slain in battle. After which, continues she, Tutus expected to be acknowledged Soltân; but, being met by Barkîârok, the late Soltân's son, was routed, and slain. According to this account, Puzan must have been the Aksankar, or Kasmaro'ddawla, or Al Makîn. Abu'l Faraj relates, that Tatash, or rather Tacash, one of Barkîârok's uncles, was smothered under water, and his son killed at the same time, the preceding year. He also writes, that Tatash Ebn Alb Arslân, or Tâjo'ddawla, another of them, was slain, in the year we are now upon. He does not, however, hand down to us any of the circumstances of his death; but only remarks, that, after he was killed, Barkîârok was firmly settled upon the throne †.

- d THE following year, being the 489th of the Hejra, which commenced Dec. 31st, 1095, Redwân Fakhr Al Molc Ebn Tajo'ddawla, the Sâkeb of Aleppo, having received advice that Dekâk Shams Al Molc, his brother, the Sâkeb of Damascus, had marched at the head of his forces toward the sea coast, presented himself before the latter of those cities with a powerful army, and laid siege to it. But the citizens so annoyed him with stones, discharged out of their military engines from the walls, that he found himself incapable of making his approaches in a regular manner; and therefore ordered his men to retire to their tents, which were pitched at some distance from the town. In the mean time Dekâk, returning from his late expedition, entered Damascus, without opposition; which so discouraged Redwân, who had before met with a very vigorous resistance, that he immediately abandoned the siege. As there was nothing he more ardently desired than to possess himself of Damascus, where he received his education, and which he looked upon as the most charming place in the world, the bad success that now attended his arms proved an exceeding great mortification to him. He, therefore, wrote to Al Mosta'li, the Khalîf of Egypt; promising to have his name published in the pulpits of Aleppo, if he would move to his assistance, and enable him to take Damascus from his brother Dekâk. This the Khalîf engaged to do, and the Khotbah was made accordingly in his name; but failing to send Redwân the stipulated succours, that prince transferred his allegiance from him to his former master, the Khalîf of Baghdâd ‡.

f THE same year, the astrologers at Baghdâd predicted an inundation, little inferior in its extent and effects to the general deluge that happened in the days of Noah; which struck the people of that metropolis, as well as the court itself, with the utmost terror and consternation. Hereupon the Khalîf Al Mostadher sent for Ebn Isûn, or rather Abn Aysûn, one of his most celebrated astrologers, in order to interrogate him about the impending judgment.

(O) It may not be improper to remark, that Anna Comnena calls Barkîârok, Aksankar, and Tatash, if we chuse not to strip her names of the Greek terminations, Spargarouk, or Paragharouk, Puzanes, and Tutus, as appears from the passages of her history here referred to.

Her account, however, of the Moslem affairs, at this time, is very confused and indistinct; so that, for a satisfactory relation of them, we must necessarily have recourse to the eastern writers (2).

ment, with which he and his subjects, and even almost the whole race of mankind, were a threatened. Ebn Aysûn, being brought before him, said, “ that in Noah’s time all the “ seven planets met in the sign of Pisces; but that only six of them, Saturn being in another “ part of the heavens, would meet in that sign the present year. Had Saturn, continued
 “ he, occupied any part of the abovementioned sign, when all the other six planets “ appeared there, an universal deluge would have been the necessary and immediate effect “ of so great a vicinity of those celestial bodies. However, subjoined he, there will most “ certainly be a dreadful inundation, which will lay under water some considerable city, “ tract, or district, where a vast multitude of people from different countries will be “ assembled.” As there was a prodigious concourse of merchants and others, coming b from all even the remotest regions of the East, at Baghdûd; this prediction so terrified the inhabitants of that capital, who were extremely numerous, that they erected mounds, or dams, in those places that seemed to be the most exposed to an irruption of the waters, and took all other precautions which they judged necessary for their security. And, in conformity to this prediction, it happened, that most of the pilgrims going to Mecca, who had pitched their tents in the valley of Al Manâkeb, were carried away by an irresistible torrent, together with their beasts of burden, baggage, and every thing they brought with them, and drowned; a few of them only escaping, who found means to retire to the neighbouring mountains. This tragical event so raised the reputation of Ebn Aysûn, that the Khalîf made him a present of a sumptuous vest, in order to do him honour, as a reward for the skill he had shewn in his art, according to Abu’l Faraj <sup>a</sup>.

Barkîârok becomes master
of Khorasân.

In the 490th year of the Hejra, which began Dec. 19th, 1096, Barkîârok marched into c
Khorasân, where Arslân Shâh, the father of Tacash, or Takash, who commanded there, had on foot a considerable body of troops. But the Soltân was delivered from all future apprehensions of Arslân Shâh, by one of that prince’s sons; who slew his father, before he had an opportunity of coming to an engagement with Barkîârok. He committed that parricide, in order to seize his father’s government; which yet did not fall to his share. For Barkî-ârok, having made himself master of Khorasân, appointed Sanjar, one of his brothers, to preside over that province, and returned to Irâk. However, Arslân Shâh, or Arslân Argûn Ebn Arslân, as he is called by Abu’l Faraj, was assassinated by one of his domestics, to free mankind, as he gave out, from his injustice, according to the last-mentioned author. The d Franks defeated Soltân Solimân (P), and reduced the city of Nice in Bithynia, if we will believe some of the eastern writers, the present year <sup>b</sup>.

The most memorable transactions of the
year 491.

THE next year, being the 491st of the Hejra, commenced Dec. 9th, 1097, a vast army of Franks, under the command of king Baldwin, called Bardawîl by some of the oriental historians, entered Syria, sat down before Antioch, and took it. In consequence of what has been related here, our readers will observe, that the reduction of this city happened either in the first or second campaign of the famous crusade, or war of the cross, most commonly denominated the holy war. Some time before the Franks, or Franji, under which appellation the Europeans, or western Christians, frequently go amongst the eastern authors, undertook this expedition, they had made themselves masters of Toledo, and other cities of Andalusia, expelled c the Moslems from Sicily, and wrested out of their hands a considerable part of Africa. Kawâ-mo’ddawla Codbûka, named Corbanas and Corbagath by the western historians of the crusade, who was then in Mesopotamia, being informed of the surrender of Antioch to the Franks, marched with all the troops he could assemble into Syria, and laid siege to it. There were then in the city five Christian princes; namely, Bardawîl, or Baldwin, Sakhâl, or Sanjil,
 i. e. the count de St. Giles, Conodfri, or Godfrey, Al Kâmes, or Al Kormes, the Sâheb of Al Robâ, and Baymûnd, the Sâheb, or prince of Antioch. These, the third of whom was the famous Godfrey of Bullcin, afterwards king of Jerusalem, and the fourth the count of Edeffa, falling in want of provisions, sent to Codbûka, offering to quit the town, on condition that he would suffer them to depart, and permit them to be safe in their persons: but he refused, f saying, they should escape no otherwise than by making their way with the sword. At this critical juncture, a monk in high esteem amongst them, who was a person of great craft and subtlety, told them, that they should certainly vanquish their enemies in battle, if they could find the staff of St. Peter, strengthened with iron at the end, which was buried in the church of the priests; but that, if they could not discover this, they should all infallibly perish.
 He, therefore, ordered them to fast and pray, that they might obtain the divine assistance

(P) Anna Comnena denominates him Amîr, or Emîr, in vogue amongst the Turks, at least, if not the Arabs, Solimân; but the title Soltân, or Al Soltân, was more at the commencement of the crusade (3).

- a in this most important and interesting affair; which having done for three whole days, he led them on the fourth to the aforesaid church, and at last by digging in all parts of it found the staff. Animated by this good omen of victory, they marched out of the city, on a Thursday, about five or six at a time. Codbûka's officers advised, that their soldiers might stand at the gates, and kill all who came forth; but he said that it was better to let them all come out first, and then to put them to the sword. When they were all come out to the last man, they formed a numerous army, which put the Moslems to flight. The last who fled was Sakmân Ebn Artak. The Franks, on this occasion, cut to pieces many thousands of the enemy, made themselves masters of their camp, and seized all the provisions, riches, beasts of burthen, and arms, they found therein. After this victory, which intirely
- b re-established their affairs, they advanced to Maarra Al Nomân, or Ma'ra Al Na'mân, a city in the province or district of Hems, and possessed themselves of that place. The prince, styled Al Mâlec, or the king, by Al Makîn, who presided over the people there, they slew; and, according to the last-mentioned author, maintained themselves in that town till the year of the Hejra 526. From Maarra Al Nomân they moved to Rama, or Al Ramla, a very antient city of Palestine; which, without any remarkable resistance, surrendered to them. They also took several other places of lesser note, and massacred a very considerable number of Mohammedans they met with therein. We must beg leave to remark, that the Franks are called Al Afranj by Abu'l Faraj <sup>c</sup>.

- THE following year, being the 492d of the Hejra, beginning Nov. 28th, 1098, the Egyptians, perceiving the weakness of the Turks, formed the siege of Jerusalem, termed Al Beit Al Makdes by Abu'l Faraj; where Sakmân and Aylgâzi, the sons of Artak, the Turkmân, with their uncle Sûnej, were shut up. The besiegers battered the town with their military engines above forty days, and at last obliged the garrison to capitulate; permitting the troops that composed it, with Sakmân at their head, to retire to some other place. In the room of Sakmân, the Egyptians substituted one Aftekbâr'oddawla, to command in the holy city. Soon after, the Franks presented themselves before it; and, having erected two towers against it, they took it on the north side, and put the people they met with to the sword. They continued to kill the Moslems in the adjacent country for several weeks together; destroying in the chapel Al Akfa, or the farther chapel, above 70,000 of them at once.
- d They likewise drove all the Jews into their temple, and burned them in it. Amongst the booty acquired on this occasion, which was immense, there were above forty silver lamps, weighing each 3600 drachms; a furnace, weighing forty pounds; and above twenty lamps of gold. Some authors relate, that the Egyptians reduced Jerusalem, in the year of the Hejra 489, about three years before it fell into the hands of the Franks; and that this expedition was conducted by Afdal, the Fâtemite Khalîf's Wazîr. They farther intimate, that the Egyptians kept possession of it from the year 489 to the time they were expelled by the Franks. But this apparently runs counter to what has been advanced on this head by Abu'l Faraj; who clearly and positively asserts the Egyptians to have made themselves masters of Al Beit Al Makdes, or Jerusalem, in the 492d year of the Moslem æra, as has been already observed.
- e We are also told, that the loss of Jerusalem was not less regretted by the Jacobite Christians than by the Moslems themselves; since the Franks would not permit them to go on pilgrimage thither, nor even on any account whatsoever to approach that place. Jerusalem is said to have been recovered from the Mohammedans on Friday, the 13th of Shaabân, the present year <sup>d</sup>.

- OF the reduction of Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, the loss of which so affected the Moslems of all ranks and denominations, Abu'lfeda, the celebrated Arabian historian, has handed down to us the following particulars: "In the 492d year of the Hejra, the Franks made themselves
- " masters of Al Kuds. That city had been formerly delivered by Tanash into the hands of
- " Al Emîr Artak; after whose decease, it came to Sakmân, or Sokmân, and Aylgâzi, his sons.
- f " These princes were possessed of it till the year of the Hejra 489, when they were ejected
- " from thence by the forces of the Khalîf of Egypt. Of all which transactions an account
- " has already been given. The sons of Artak being thus expelled Al Kuds, Sokwân went
- " to Al Robâ, or Edessa, and Aylgâzi, or Ilgâzi, into Irâk. But the Franks wrested that
- " city (Al Kuds) this year (492) out of the hands of the Egyptians, after a siege of between “ learned and pious men, taken under the more immediate protection of ALMIGHTY GOD, a “ dwelling constantly in his house, and famous for their unspotted chastity and austerity of “ life. The spoils taken on this occasion were so immense, that no proper estimate could “ be made of them. The news of this terrible destruction reached Baghdād, in the month “ of Ramadān. The terrified couriers, who brought it, implored both the Khalīf’s and “ the Soltān’s assistance in the most moving terms. The inhabitants of Baghdād were so “ affected with the melancholy news, that with continued tears, and even opprobrious “ language, they insisted upon immediate relief. Nay so transported were they with grief, “ so infatuated, and so regardless of their duty to God, that, being fatigued and even “ worn out with sorrow, they polluted by their daily meals the fast of Ramadān. To this “ extreme of misery were the Moslems reduced by the discords, dissensions, and intestine b “ wars, that reigned amongst the Seljukian Soltāns; which enabled the Franks to ravage “ whole provinces, almost without opposition. It was a reflection upon these tragical “ affairs which inspired with such indignation the poet Al Modhaffer Al Abiwerdi, that he “ wrote a poem (A) upon them, full of spirit and fire, of which the following verses are “ a small part.” Hence it appears, that, according to Abu’lfeda, as well as the author followed by M. Renaudot, the Egyptians occupied Al Kuds, from the 489th year of the Hejra, when they drove from thence the family of Artak, to the 492d year of that æra, when they were forced to give way to the Franks. This is, however, flatly contradicted both by William of Tyre and Abu’l Faraj; who affirm, that it was taken by the Egyptians from the Turks, the same year in which it was obliged to surrender to the Franks. As, therefore, c

William of Tyre, is a writer of the best authority, and lived almost upon the spot, not far from the time of the transaction itself, and consequently could not have been ignorant of what had so lately happened there; and as Abu’lfeda was not only much posterior to William of Tyre, but likewise something later than Abu’l Faraj, an author greatly esteemed in the East, both by Christians and Mohammedans; we are strongly inclined to adopt what has been advanced, in the point before us, by the two last writers *.

Mohammed, ‘Barkīārōk’ brother;
 rebels;

MOWAYYAD AL MOLC, being greatly chagrined at his dismissal from the post of Wazīr, did his utmost to foment new troubles in the state. He began by spiriting-up Anzār, who was formerly one of Mālec Shāb’s slaves, and had no small influence in the province of Irāk.
 By his assistance, Anzār set a considerable army on foot; and might have given the Soltān d much trouble, had he not been taken off by an assassin, in the city of Sawa, to which place he was advanced, in order to give his sovereign battle. He afterwards applied to Moham- med, brother to Barkīārōk, then residing in Adherbijān; and, by his continual solicitations, at last prevailed upon him to take up arms against his brother. This Mohammed, surnamed Gayātho’dīn, and Sanjar were brothers by the same venter, and both of them sons of Mālec Shāb. Mohammed, after his father’s death, followed the interest of his brother Mab- mūd; but being reconciled to Barkīārōk, he obtained, from that prince, the city of Ganja (B), and its dependencies, for his support. From this place he moved, in the year we are now upon, with a small army; which soon became formidable by the accession of a vast number of male-contents, who daily flocked to him. For, the lords of Barkīārōk’s court e being incensed against Mojared Al Molc, his Wazīr, cut him in pieces, and obliged the Soltān himself to abandon Irāk to his brother. This, together with the influence of Moway- yad Al Molc, who exerted himself in his favour, did not only supply Mohammed with troops, but likewise put him in possession of an extensive territory without striking a stroke. He therefore made Mowayyad Al Molc, who had been so serviceable to him, his Wazīr, and sent an ambassador to Baghdād, to demand the patent of investiture; which was granted him, in

(A) We have not given our readers an English translation of that part of this poem preserved by Abu’lfeda here, as this would a little interrupt the thread of the history; and as such a translation, however well it might be received, would by no means come up to the spirit and fire of the original. Al Aberwerdi was born at Abiwerd, a city of Khorasān, that has given birth to several very great men. He pretended to be descended in a right line from Othmān, the third Khalīf of the Moslems, and was honoured with the appellation of the glory of Khorasān. He was the author of a Dirwān, which he composed in Arabic verse, with a preface at the head of it in prose. This work is in the French king’s library, num. 1073. He died, in the year of the Hejra 507 (1).

(B) Ganja, called by the Arabs Canja, or Hanjab, is a city of Arrān, considered by some as part of Adherbijān, near the river Kūr, and the borders of Georgia. Others, however, and particularly Abu’lfeda, make Arrān to be a separate province; distinguishing it, in express terms, from Adherbijān. The city of Ganja was taken by Kouli Khān, though the Turks had before thrown into it a garrison of 5000 men, in the month of October 1734. It stands, if Abu’lfeda may be credited, in long. 74°. lat. 48° (2).

<sup>a</sup> the month of Dhu'l-hajja, by the Khalif. We must not forget to remark, that the city of Ganja, in Adherbijân, is corruptly named Hamkha in Erpenius's manuscript of Al Makîn; at which we are not to be so much surprized, as the forms of the Arabic letters constituting those two words are so similar, that a careless and inattentive transcriber may very easily be supposed to have committed such a mistake <sup>c</sup>.

In the 493d year of the Hejra, commencing Nov. 17th, 1099, Barkîârok, repairing to Baghdâd, assembled a powerful army; at the head of which he advanced to Mahdân, in order to attack his brother Mohammed. Hereupon a fierce conflict ensued, in which Barkîârok was overthrown with very great slaughter, and made his escape with only fifty horse. Upon which, Mohammed resumed the office of Emîr Al Omrà, or Soltân, the 14th day of Rajeb, at Baghdâd. After his defeat, Barkîârok fled from Al Ray to Khûzestân; where Ayyâz, formerly slave to Mâlec Shâh, ruled with almost an absolute sway. Ayyâz having joined the Soltân with all the troops under his command, that prince found himself once more in a condition to make head against Mohammed, and assert his right to the Seljukian crown. In his flight from Al Ray, Barkîârok passed by Esfakân, the residence of the Seljukian princes; but did not enter that capital. We are informed, that the Nile rose to eighteen cubits, and fifteen digits, in the year that we are now upon <sup>f</sup>.

The next year, being the 494th of the Hejra, which began Nov. 6th, 1100, Barkîârok was so effectually succoured by the efforts Ayyâz had made to support him, that he brought into the field an army of 50,000 men. Soltân Mohammed met him, with all the forces he could assemble; which did not amount to above 15,000 strong. The two armies had not long faced each other, before an obstinate engagement ensued; in which Mohammed, being borne down by numbers, was obliged to betake himself to a precipitate flight. Hereupon, taking the route of Khorasân, in order to seek aid of king Sanjar, his brother, he stopped at Jorjân. Here Sanjar joining him with a body of troops, they advanced to Dâmâgân; where the army laid waste the country to such a degree, that the inhabitants, for want of dogs and dead animals, fed upon one another. After this, marching against Barkîârok, they were overthrown; and their mother, who attended them in this expedition, being made captive, was exchanged for some of Barkîârok's men, who had been taken prisoners by Sanjar before. This year, the Franks carried Hayfa by storm, and Arsûf by capitulation; making themselves masters of most of the maritime places. We are informed by Khondemir, that several actions happened this campaign between the princes of the house of Seljuk; in one of which Mowayyad Al Molc, Mohammed's Wazîr, fell into the hands of Barkîârok, and afterwards met with the reward which his treason had so justly deserved. The increase of the Nile was estimated at eighteen cubits, and seven digits, the present year. It must be remembered here, that the defeat of Sanjar, or Senjar, however repugnant this may be to Abu'l Farej, has been ranked amongst the principal events of the preceding year by Al Makîn <sup>g</sup>.

The following year, being the 495th of the Hejra, which commenced Oct. 26th, 1101, Al Mosta'li, Al Mosta'li Bi'llab, the Khalif of Egypt, departed this life, after he had sat upon the Fâtemite throne seven years, and two months, according to Al Makîn. The last two months are, however, omitted by Abu'l Farej. He was succeeded by Abu Ali Al Mansûr, his son, then only five years old; who had the title, or surname, of Al Amer Beahcâmi'llab, and made Afdal, or Al Afdal, his Wazîr. The young prince was inaugurated immediately after his father's death; but could not sit on horseback, by reason of his tender age. The Khalif was no sooner dead, than Abu Mansûr Berâr, his brother, fled to the citadel of Alexandria; where Aftekin, Al Afdal's Mamlûk, or purchased slave, at that time commanded. Upon his arrival there, he promised peace and security to the people of Alexandria; and was proclaimed Khalif by Aftekin. He assumed the title of Al Mostafi Addîn; but did not long enjoy the high dignity to which he had aspired. For Al Afdal soon marched with a body of troops to that place, laid siege to the castle, and got both Berâr and Aftekin into his hands; though what afterwards became of them, we have not been told. Amer Beahcâmi'llab was the seventh of the Fâtemite Khalifs that reigned in Egypt, and the tenth of those that had acquired large dominions in Africa. Though his infancy rendered him incapable of business himself, Al Afdal Ebn Bedr Al Femâl, his Wazîr, and the commander in chief of all his forces, who had served his father in the same capacities, governed the Egyptians with such justice, lenity, and moderation, that he was universally applauded and esteemed. Amer, the new Khalif, lived thirty-five, and reigned near thirty, years. He is censured by all the historians who have taken any considerable notice of him, for being, after the example of his predecessors, a favourer of the Shiites, cruel, obstinate, crafty, false, proud, a addicted to gaming, attached to all kinds of unlawful pleasures, and ungrateful to Al Afdal. It has been by them, however, allowed, that he did not want parts, was learned, and wrote an elegant style. But we shall expatiate more largely upon his character hereafter, in the supplement to this extensive work; to which the histories of all the Mohammedan dynasties, collateral with the Khalifs of the house of Al Abbâs, will more properly belong<sup>h</sup>.

The farther
progress of the Franks.

THE same year, the Franks advanced to Tripoli, and formed the siege of that city. Whereupon Dekâk Shams Al Molûc, the prince of Damascus, and Hosein Henâbo'ddawla, the Sâheb of Hems, having been applied to by Fakhr Al Molc Ebn Amâr, the sovereign of the place, for assistance; they sent a body of troops to his relief. But the Moslem auxiliaries, b at a small distance from the town, were attacked and routed by the Franks. The animosity that reigned between the Khalifs of Egypt and Baghdâd, on the score of religion, as well as their different political views, and the division of Syria, or Al Shâm (most of the principal cities of which tract were at this time governed by their respective Emîrs, who had set up for themselves there), into several lesser states, greatly facilitated the reduction of that country to the obedience of the Franks, and the erection of the kingdom of Jerusalem; of which a full and ample account has already been given, from the Christian writers, in another place<sup>i</sup>.

occurrences of
the year 496;

IN the 496th year of the Hejra, which began Oct. 15th, 1102, Soltân Barkiârok shut up Soltân Mohammed, his brother, in Esfabân; but, for want of forage and provision, was c obliged to raise the siege of that city. Mohammed hereupon assembled a body of troops, with which he engaged his brother; but being overthrown, he fled into Armenia, and left Barkiârok in possession of Irâk. Hosein Henâbo'ddawla, the Sâheb of Hems, quitted Fakhr Al Molc Redwân's party, of which he had hitherto been, this year, and went over to Dekâk; whereupon Redwân hired three Bâtanists, or Bâtenites, to assassinate him in the great Jâmâ', or temple, at Hems. The news of which being brought to Atâbek Tagtakîn and Dekâk, they marched to Hems, and made themselves masters both of the town and the castle. This happened just at the time when the Franks arrived at Rustan, or Rosten, seated upon the Assi, or Orontes, between Hems and Hama, with a design to attack Hems; but, on advice that Dekâk was there, they returned. About the same time, died Michael, the patriarch of the d Jacobites at Alexandria, and was succeeded by Macarius in that see. Either in or about this year, Ardsbir, or Ardesbir, Ebn Mansûr, a native of Merû, in Khorasân, so distinguished himself by his preaching, in the mosque erected by Nodhâm Al Molc at Baghdâd, that 30,000 persons frequently resorted thither to hear him. Amongst them there was a great number of women and beautiful youths; who all, at his persuasion, cut off their hair. A thing so extraordinary this, that several of the Mohammedans have looked upon it as almost exceeding the bounds of all belief. Many of the Moslems likewise who had accustomed themselves to wine, influenced by his exhortations, ever afterwards abstained from that liquor. Some writers pretend, that this impostor died in the year we are now upon; as did also another, according to them, named Sheikh Abu'l Mubal, a person of uncommon austerity of life, who e always slept in a sitting posture, and had never more than one garment. Such knaves as these, says a modern author, did the father of lies raise up in the East, whilst the Franks, or western Christians, were there, in order to hinder the Mohammedans from receiving the truth, and to prevent the glorious light of the gospel from shining amongst them<sup>k</sup>.

THE next year, being the 497th of the Hejra, commencing October 5th, 1103, Dekâk Shams Al Molûc, the Sâheb of Damascus, died in that city. His mother, who was married to the Atâbek Tagtakîn, is supposed by some to have sent him a servant maid, who poisoned him, by pricking a grape with an invenomed needle, which he plucked and ate. This, say they, corroded his intestines, and destroyed him. Be that, however, as it will, after his death, Tagtakîn, who was surnamed Thabîro'ddîn, or Dbabîro'ddîn, made himself f master of the kingdom of Damascus, and its dependencies. Dekâk, however, who was of the house of Seljûk, left behind him a son under age, the care of whose education he committed to Tagtakîn. The same year, the Franks took Aca, or Acca, according to Al Makîn. Baldwin, who had wrested Jerusalem out of the hands of the Mohammedans, invested the place with his troops. He was accompanied by the Genoese Franks; by the addition of whose ships, his fleet amounted to ninety sail. Having, therefore, for some time, straitly besieged the city both by sea and land, he at last took it by storm. Zabro'ddawla Al Habûsi commanded then in the town for the Khalif of Egypt. After the loss of the place, he retired a to Damascus, and from thence into Egypt. He was Bedr Al Jemâl's freed-man, besides which we scarce meet with any particulars in history relating to him. Some authors write, that Baymünd, or Boamund, and Tancred, two generals of the Franks, were overthrown by the Mohammedans in Syria, and lost 10,000 men, the present year <sup>1</sup>.

THE following year, being the 498th of the Hejra, beginning Sept. 23d, 1104; a partition of the Seljukian empire was made between the Soltâns Barkiârok and Mohammed, the sons of Mâlec Shâb. As their armies had often skirmished, for some time past, without coming to a general engagement, and in such a manner that no considerable advantage had been gained on either side; those princes had both had leisure to think seriously of an accommodation. In order to this, therefore, conferences were held; which, by the interposition of their common friends, ultimately terminated in a treaty of peace: whereby b Fârs, Al Jcbâl, Irâk, Khorasân, Kermân, Ma warâ'lnabr, and that part of India on this side the Ganges, were to be possessed by Barkiârok. As for Mohammed, by virtue of the same treaty, he remained master of Al Shâm, or Syria, Diyâr Becr, Al Jazîra, or Mesopotamia, Al Mawfel, or Mosul, Adherbijân, Armenia, and Georgia. It was also agreed, that Barkiârok should not meet Mohammed with drums, nor be named in the pulpits with him, in any of the provinces, which, by the foregoing convention, were ceded to him. With regard, however, to the particular countries assigned each prince by this treaty of partition, authors are not perfectly agreed; Khondemir enumerating them as here laid down, Abu'l Faraj making Georgia, Armenia, and Adherbijân, to appertain to Barkiârok, and another writer affirm-c ing that Khorasân, of which he had long been governor, or rather sovereign, was allotted Sanjâr, another of the sons of Mâlec Shâb. The eastern historians likewise a little disagree, in relation to the year wherein the aforesaid division of the Seljukian territories was made;
Khondemir, as followed by M. D'Herbelot, intimating that it happened in the 498th year of the Hejra, and Abu'l Faraj, whose authority in this point is preferred to that of Khon- demir by M. Renaudot, placing it in the 497th year of that æra. Which of the above-mentioned writers, on the foregoing heads, are the most to be depended upon, we shall not here take upon us to determine; but leave this to our learned and curious readers, who are the best acquainted with oriental history, to decide <sup>m</sup>.

AFTER the late pacification, Barkiârok advanced towards Baghdâd, where his friend and Barkiârok benefactor Ayyâz, or Ayyâd, as he is called by Al Makîn, commanded with an absolute d sway; though Al Mostadher was acknowledged for Khalîf, Emîr Al Mûmenîn, and sovereign pontiff of the Moslems, in that city. His design herein was to enjoy with Ayyâz their common good fortune, and to fix upon a lasting foundation the future repose of his dominions.
 But he was stopped upon the road by death; when he had lived thirty-four years, and reigned fourteen, if we may credit Al Makîn. Khondemir nevertheless informs us, that he died in the twenty-fifth year of his age, after he had sat upon the Seljukian throne about thirteen years. Being afflicted both with a consumption and the piles together, he found himself obliged to rest, for some time, at Esfahân; where, both his distempers increasing, he at last expired. Before his death, he declared Mâlec Shâb, the second of that name, his son, for his successor; who was then only four years, and ten months, old. By reason, e therefore, of his tender age, he put him under the tutelage of Ayyâz and Sadeka, two of his most trusty friends; in whose fidelity, which he had often experienced, he could intirely confide. The succession being in this manner settled, he ordered the young prince to be cloathed with a Kaftân in his presence, and appointed Ayyâz his principal Atâbek, or governor; all his great officers at the same time attending, and promising to obey his commands. After which, the Khotbah was made in the infant Soltân's name; and he was dignified with the title of Jalâlo'ddawla, or the ornament of the state. Notwithstanding which,
Soltân Mohammed repaired without delay to Baghdâd, entered that city, and took possession of the Soltânat, or post of Emîr Al Omrà, there; though Ayyâz had assembled a body of 25,000 horse, if we will believe Al Makîn, to oppose him. For, an accommodation f taking place between them, Al Mostadher Bi'llah, the Khalîf of Baghdâd, presented Moham- med with the Kaftân, and delivered into his hands the command of the palace. The new Soltân was no sooner confirmed in his sublime office, than he put Ayyâz, in violation of the late convention, to death. An historian, cited by M. Renaudot, relates, that Barkiârok's, age did not exceed twenty-four years, at the time of his demise; and that Mâlec Shâb II, his son, who was never ranked amongst the Seljukian Soltâns of Irân, his authority having been recognized only a few days, was just four years old, when that tragical event gave him a right to the crown <sup>n</sup>.

The most memorable events
of the year

In the 499th year of the Hejra, commencing Sept. 13th, 1105, Soltân Mohammed marched from Adherbijân to Al Mawfel, in order to take that place from Jakarmîsh, the lord, or Sâheb, of it. He first invested the town with his troops, and then besieged it. The people of the country, however, on his approach, rose in their sovereign's defence, and attacked him with great bravery. A strong party of infantry likewise sallied upon the besiegers, and killed them abundance of men. The siege nevertheless continued from the month of Safar to that of the former Jomâda ; when Jakarmîsh, receiving advice of Barkîârok's death, resolved to make his submission to Mohammed. For this purpose, he first addressed himself to the Wazîr, and afterwards waited upon the Soltân himself, from whom he met with a most gracious reception. That prince, having embraced him, said, " Go back to your subjects, whose hearts are set upon you ; they, with impatience, expect your return." Jakarmîsh then prostrated himself, and the next day prepared a most magnificent entertainment for his friends without the city. He also sent very valuable presents both to the Soltân and the Wazîr. When he went to Mohammed, the inhabitants of Al Mawfel threw dust upon their heads, and shewed all the expressions of sorrow, usual on the most doleful occasions ; imagining, that the Soltân would not only strip him of his territories, but deprive him likewise of life itself. This year, the Ismaelians, Bâtanites, Bâtenites, or Assassins, took the castle of Apamia, and slew Ablaf Ebn Mulakeb, by the command of Abu Thâber, their chief. Some writers assert this Abu Thâber to have been the same person with Al Hasan Ebn Masbak, the founder of the Bâtanite sect. Be that as it will, several smart actions happened between these Ismaelians and the Franks, according to some good authors, during the course of the present year <sup>a</sup>.

year 500.

THE next year, being the 500th of the Hejra, beginning Sept. 2d, 1106, Al Jâwali Sakâwwâ, the Sâheb of Al Rohâ, or Orfa, marched against Jakarmîsh, the lord of Al Mawfel, with only a body of 1000 men ; and put to flight his troops, though double that number. As for Jakarmîsh himself, he was taken prisoner in the action ; having been abandoned by all his men, and not able to make his escape. He was carried in a litter to the engagement ; having been rendered incapable of mounting a horse by a paralytic disorder. As soon as he fell into the enemies hands, he was brought before Al Jâwali ; who ordered him to be confined, and his keepers to have a watchful eye over him. The news of his captivity reaching the ears of the citizens, they conferred the supreme command upon Al Emîr Zenki, his son. Afterwards Al Jâwali, besieging Al Mawfel, exposed Jakarmîsh to the view of the people daily on a mule ; offering to set him at liberty, in case they would surrender the city to him : Upon their refusal to comply with what he required, he imprisoned him in a place under-ground, where they one day found him dead. Hereupon his subjects wrote to Kelij Arslân, or Kilij Arslân, the son of Solimân Ebn Kotolmîsh, or Kutulmîsh, Al Seljûki, the Sâheb of Koniya, or Iconium, and Aksara ; promising to deliver up the city to him, if he would move to their assistance. Al Jâwali being informed, that Kilij Arslân was on his march for Al Mawfel, though fit to raise the siege at his approach. Kilij Arslân, having possessed himself of the city, encamped at Al Mogreka ; where he honoured Zenki and his attendants with Kaftâns, ordered the name of Soltân Mohammed to be suppressed in the pulpits, and his own to be mentioned there in its room. He then advanced against Al Jâwali, who had retired to Al Rohâ, and attacked his forces upon the banks of the Khâbûr ; but was overthrown with great slaughter, and hotly pursued by the victors. Being, therefore, obliged to enter the river, where he defended himself with his bow and arrows against the enemy, his horse carried him out of his depth, and he was drowned. His body appearing some days after, he was buried at Al Shamâniyah. Before this defeat, Kilij Arslân had not a little ingratiated himself with the soldiery, by distributing money amongst them, and reforming several abuses that had crept into the army. His father was routed by the Franks, about ten years before this tragical event happened, as has been already observed. Al Jâwali, after the victory he had gained, returned to Al Mawfel, and without any difficulty made himself master of that important place. M. Renaudot, from whom we have extracted many particulars in this work, writes, that Sanjar, the son of Mâlec Shâh, was assassinated by the Bâtanists, or Bâtenites, this year ; and yet, in another place, he relates, that this prince was alive in the year of the Hejra 548. He is, therefore, not only inconsistent with himself, in the point before us, but has likewise been pleased to assert what is apparently false. For, that Sanjar succeeded his brother Mohammed, in the year of the Hejra 511, and died in the 552d year of that æra, will hereafter very clearly appear <sup>b</sup>.

What happened, in the year 501. THE following year, being the 501st of the Hejra, which commenced Aug. 22d, 1107, Ayyâz, or Ayyâd, and Al Emîr Saifo'ddîn Sadeka Denîs Ebn Ali Ebn Yerîd Al Asadi, the

- a Sâheb of Hella, took the field, according to the author, or authors, made use of by M. D'Herbelot, in favour of Mâlec Shâb II, son to Barkîârok, with a powerful army. Being met by Soltân Mohammed, who had seized that part of the Seljukian empire assigned to Barkîârok, the proper dispositions were made on both sides for an engagement. But whilst the two armies faced each other, expecting the signal for battle, there appeared in the sky a cloud, in form of a dragon, which cast down so much fire upon the troops of Mâlec Shâb, that the soldiers, terrified with so frightful a meteor, threw down their arms, and begged quarter of Mohammed; who, by this means, became master of the persons both of his nephew and his two generals, whom he sent prisoners to the castle of Lehed. This account, however, our readers will observe, runs counter to what has been advanced by Al Makîn; who intimates that
- b Mohammed possessed himself of the territories which had been ceded to Barkîârok, deposed young Mâlec Shâb, and put Ayyâz, or Ayyâd, to death, in the year of the Hejra 498. Be that as it will, if we may believe the last mentioned writer, Soltân Mohammed Gayâtbo'ddîn Ebn Mâlec Shâb marched against Al Emîr Saïfo'ddîn Sadeka, routed his forces, and slew him, after he had reigned at Hella twenty-two years, and lived fifty-six, the present year. If the historian, or historians, followed by M. D'Herbelot may be credited, Mohammed, as soon as his nephew's troops had submitted to him, repaired directly to Baghdâd, obtained of the Khalîf Al Mostadher the title of Gayâtbo'ddîn, or Mogâyatbo'ddîn, that is, the propagator of the faith, after he had paid his devoirs to that prince, and received the most ample and honourable patent from him. In this instrument, he was styled Al Soltân, and Emîr Al Mûmenîn, or commander of the faithful; in virtue of which, he assumed an absolute power over all the Khalîf's subjects.
- c Whilst the Soltân resided at Baghdâd, he was informed that one Abmed, surnamed Atthasb, a famous impostor, had, by his juggling tricks, gained many proselytes, amongst whom he passed for a prophet; and that he had made himself master of the fortress of Dizghûeb, an important place built by Mâlec Shâb, near Esfabân, in order to bridle the inhabitants of that large city, who were very subject to revolt. This fortress Atthasb had reduced to his obedience, by debauching the minds of the garrison with his impious opinions; which, had he not soon been subdued, would in all probability have enabled him to become formidable both to the Soltân and the Khalîf. On this advice, therefore, Mohammed moved at the head of his forces thither, forced the siege of the castle, and at last, having escaped the treason
- d of Saïd Al Mela, surnamed Awji, his Wazîr, who had been infected with Atthasb's infamous notions, and had corrupted a surgeon, who blooded him every month, with the promise of a thousand Zechins, and a purple vest, to destroy him with a poisoned lancet, forced it to surrender at discretion. After which, Atthasb himself was conducted to Esfabân, tied neck and heels upon a camel; where having been exposed as a laughing-stock to the people for several days, he was executed, with many of his followers, who had joined in the revolt. A certain writer, not seldom cited here, relates, that Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, laid siege to Saïdâ, Saydâ, or Saydân, the antient Sidon, before the close of the year that we are now upon<sup>a</sup>.

- e THE same year, being the fifth of the patriarch Macarius, the method of computing by The Coptic the Kharâjîan years, which were solar, was suppressed in Egypt, by an edict of the Wazîr. supputation by Of this computation, which has been copiously described by Al Makrîzi, we shall here beg Kharâjîan leave to give a short account; as it has never been touched upon, unless we are greatly deceived, years is sup- by any of our chronologers. The Christians of Egypt observed the æra of the martyrs, called pressed. likewise the æra of Dioclesian, which commenced in the year of our LORD 284; especially in all ecclesiastical affairs; but in civil they likewise supputed their years from the Hejra, or flight of the Moslem prophet, in common with the Mohammedans. However, as the latter made use of lunar, and the former of solar years; a considerable difference between the Coptic and Moslem methods of computation in process of time ensued, the Mohammedans gaining a year of the Copts, or Egyptian Christians, in every thirty-three years. The tribute, denominated by
- f the Arabs Karâj, exacted of the Christians by the Moslems, was collected according to the order of those months, which formed the Egyptian, or solar year; whence it came to pass, that this was called, both by the Christians and Mohammedans, the Kharâjîan year. That manner of supputing having been found very inconvenient, Al Afdal, the Fâtemite Khalîf's Wazîr, at this time issued an edict for the abolition of it; so that we find no mention made of the solar, or Kharâjîan, year, in any of the public accounts, or other civil affairs of Egypt, after the year we are now upon. We are told by M. Renaudot, that the suppression of the method of computing by the Kharâjîan year had been before ineffectually attempted by Al Mostanjed Bîllab, the Khalîf of Baghdâd; but this must be a mistake, as Al Mostanjed did not mount the Moslem throne before the year of the Hejra 555. It may not be
- g improper to inform our readers here, that Joseph Scaliger, though the most learned man of the age in which he lived, knew nothing of the Coptic supputation of years taken notice of in this place; which occasioned his falling into many errors, when he was endeavouring to correct those of other great men. We must beg leave farther to remark, that Takio'ddîn Ahmed Al Makrizi is the only author who has mentioned the edict issued by Al Afdal, on the aforeſaid occaſion, the preſent year *.

The principal tranſactions of the year 502. IN the 502d year of the Hejra, which began Aug. 11th, 1108, Mawdûd Ebn Altûn Takîn, or Tacaſh, with Soltân Mohammed's army, advanced to Al Mawſel, and expelled Al Jâwali and his adherents from that city. The ſame year, the Franks took Tripoli by capitulation, after a ſiege of ſeven years; in which the greateſt part of the inhabitants had been deſtroyed, by famine and the ſword, together with the continual fatigues they found themſelves obliged to ſuſtain. Tripoli was, at this time, a very large city, full of Mohammedans and learned men. This we learn from Al Makîn. But according to Abu'lfeda, in the piece ſo often referred to in this work, that place did not ſurrender to the Franks before the month of Dhu'lhajja, the following year †.

The moſt material occurrences of the year 503. THE 503d year of the Hejra, commencing July 31ſt, 1109, proved very favourable to the Franks; their military operations being attended with good ſucceſs, this fortunate campaign. Tancrî Al Franji, or Tancred the Frank, the Sâheb of Antioch, or Antâkiya, marching to Al Thogûr Al Shâmiya, reduced Tarſus and Adena, and laid ſiege to Heſn, or Hiſn, Al Acrâd, that is, the caſtle of the Curds; which, in a ſhort time, ſurrendered to him. This we find affirmed by Abu'l Faraj. But, according to Al Makîn, the inhabitants of Heſn Meſiâf and Heſn Al Acrâd bought their peace, by agreeing to pay an annual tribute. Notwithſtanding which, continues that writer, the Franks ſome time after circumvented them, and violated the treaty they had concluded with them before. The Franks likewise poſſeſſed themſelves of Heſn Acâd, or Accâd, Heſn Al Minattara, and Beyrût, or Bayrût, the Berytus of the antients; the laſt of which places, being garrifoned by the Khalîf of Egypt's troops, ſuſtained a long ſiege, and made a very vigorous defence. The ſame year, died Korâjâ, the Sâheb of Hems; and was ſucceeded in that principality by Samsâm Harbân, his ſon. Some authors relate, that Mohammed Shâh, the Soltân of the Seljûks, having been joined by Sakmân Ebn Artak, or Sokmân Ebn Ortok, the prince of Khalât, or Akblât, in Armenia, Sharfo'ddîn Mawdûd, the Sâheb of Al Mawſel, and Nojmo'ddîn, the Emîr of Mâredîn, advanced againſt the Franks, under the command of Baldwin and Tancred, and gained ſome advantages over them, before the cloſe of this campaign ‡.

and of the year 504. THE next year, being the 504th of the Hejra, beginning July 20th, 1110, the Franks made themſelves maſters of Saidâ, Saydâ, or Saydân, the Sidon of the antients, and Rardîâ, with all the coaſt of Al Shâm, or Syria. This year, a dreadful tempeſt happened in Egypt; which filled the air with clouds of duſt, through all the tract it traversed. The air for ſome days after was exceſſively hot, and the ſky as red as fire. A ſpecies of the Aurora Borealis, reſembling flames, moving from one part of the hemisphere to another, at the ſame time appeared; which was followed by ſuch a thick darkneſs, as had not before been known in the memory of man. Theſe ſtrange and ſurprizing phænomena ſo terrified many people, that they abandoned their houſes; imagining that the day of judgment, of which they took theſe to be the forerunners, muſt certainly be at hand §.

Mawdûd is killed by the Bâtaniſts in the year 505. THE following year, being the 505th of the Hejra, which commenced July 9th, 1111, Mawdûd, who had been ſent againſt the Franks by Soltân Mohammed, who was alarmed at the great progreſs of their arms in Syria, was killed by either one or more of the Bâtaniſts, near the city of Damaſcus, according to Al Makîn. This event, however, is ſaid to have happened in the 507th year of the Moslem æra by Abu'l Faraj. Be that as it will, it can ſcarce be doubted, but the Franks extended their conqueſts in Al Shâm, or Syria, and that Al Emîr Mawdûd, the lord of Al Mawſel, at leaſt made preparations to oppoſe them, the preſent year ¶.

What happened in the year of the Hejra 506. IN the 506th year of the Hejra, which began June 28th, 1112, Al Emîr Mawdûd, the Sâheb of Al Mawſel, encamped near Al Robâ, or Edeſſa, the modern Orſa, whoſe corn-fields were devoured by his army, according to Abu'l Faraj. This happened in the month of Al Mobarram. From Al Robâ he moved to Sarîj, where his troops did the ſame thing. In this expedition, he held the Franks in great contempt, and took not the leaſt precaution againſt them. Nay he ſcarce ever thought of them, till Joſſîn, or Joſſeline, the Sâheb of Tel Bâſher, ſurprized him whiſt his horſes were diſperſed in the paſtures. This gave Joſſîn an opportunity of taking moſt of them, and killing a good number of Mawdûd's men. After which, Joſſîn returned to Tel Bâſher, without having ſuſtained any conſiderable loſs. With regard to Sarîj and Tel Bâſher, or Tel Bâſer, as it is called by Abu'lfeda, we ſhall only obſerve, that the former of thoſe places was a town of Mefopotamia, about ten miles from Edeſſa, near the ſame diſtance

- a from Harrân, and a day's journey eastward of Bir, or Birta; and the latter, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, a fortress, or garrison, two days journey to the north of Aleppo, abounding with water and gardens. The same year there was a most dreadful earthquake, at Mesr. The very night this happened, the church of St. Michael, going under the appellation of Al Mekkâra, was demolished, as Al Afdal, Al Amer Beahcam'llab's Wazîr, caused to be given out, by the earthquake; though many people believed, that this was done by his command. Al Makrizi writes, that the best part of this church was really damaged by one of the shocks; and that Al Afdal, after some of it was fallen down, ordered the rest to be demolished, because it stood too near his gardens. Another author relates, that one Iusef, or Joseph, a renegado, and superintendant of Al Afdal's workmen, then employed in building an exceeding large edifice in the island of Rauda, near Mesr (whom the Christians had promised money, if he would not extend his structure to this church, but were afterwards so far from paying it him, that they threatened to complain of his exactions to the Wazîr), gave private orders to the people under him to level it with the ground, the night after the earthquake, by way of revenge. After which, continues this writer, his emissaries every-where published, that the church, which had long been going to ruin, and decayed with age, had, at last, tumbled down, through the carelessness and avarice of the Christians; who, notwithstanding the ruinous condition it had for many years been in, neglected to repair it. Bâsil Al Armeni, or Basil the Armenian, Ebn Laôn, that is, the son of Leo, the Sâheb of Belâd Darûb, surnamed the robber, or thief, because he secured to himself the possession of many castles, bordering upon his own frontiers, and remaining in the hands of the Armenians till the days of Abu'l Faraj, as it were by robbery, or theft, departed this life, in the year we are now upon *.

- THE next year, being the 507th of the Hejra, commencing June 18th, 1113, the Moslems, uniting their forces, made an irruption into the acquisitions of the Franks; who, after a very sharp and obstinate engagement, were defeated near Tiberias, a city we have already described. After the end of the action, Al Emîr Mawdûd Ebn Altûn Tûkîn, or Tacash, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel, one of the allied princes, permitted his troops to return, and refresh themselves, till the following spring, when he proposed to attempt another invasion of the Christian territories. In the mean time, he went himself to Damascus, to spend the season with Tagtakîn, the Sâheb, or lord of that city. But one day, after he had entered the temple, or Jâma', in order to perform his devotions there, a Bâtanist approaching him, under pretence of begging alms, stabbed him four times with a knife; of which wounds he died the same day, and the assassin was put to death. After the execution, the Bâtanist's head was cut off, and, together with the body, reduced to ashes; but who he was, or by whom employed to perpetrate so horrid a fact, could never be discovered. The same year, Redwân Fakhr Al Molc, the son of Al Mâlec Tâjo'ddawla Tatafsh, the Sâheb, or prince, of Aleppo, departed this life, and was succeeded by Tâjo'ddawla, surnamed Al Abras, his son. It is remarkable, that Redwân never thought fit to oppose the Franks; though they made continual excursions even to the gates of Aleppo, and carried many Moslems away with them into captivity. His son Tâjo'ddawla Al Abras, who likewise went under the name of Alp Arslân, was but sixteen years old, when he mounted the throne. After the murder of Al Emîr Mawdûd, Soltân Mohammed conferred the government of Al Mawfel and Jazira upon Aksankar; and assigned him for his Wazîr one Zenki, denominated corruptly Sanguinus and Sanguineus by the western historians. This Zenki was the father of the famous Nûre'ddîn Mahmûd, who abolished the Khalifat of the Fâtimites in Egypt, and obliged the people of that country to recognize the authority of Al Mostadi Ebn Al Mostanjed, the Khalîf of Baghdâd *.

- THE following year, being the 508th of the Hejra, which began June 7th, 1114, Alp Arslân Tâjo'ddawla Al Abras, the Sâheb of Aleppo, who succeeded his father Redwân there, 508. the preceding year, was assassinated, according to Al Makîn. He is said to have been about seventeen years old, at the time of his death. After this tragical event, the city and castle of Aleppo fell into the hands of Lûlû, page to Tâjo'rawarjâ Ebn Al Jalâl, under whose tuition Alp Arslân Tâjo'ddawla Al Abras had been placed by his father. Lûlû, probably by Soltân Mohammed's command, afterwards resigned them to Al Soltân Shâh, another of Redwân's sons. A dreadful earthquake happened in the East, which shook a considerable part of Syria and Cilicia, by its terrible concussions, and levelled with the ground the cities of Al Mafsîsa, or Mâmestra, Ma'rcsh, and others, the present year †.

IN the 509th year of the Hejra, which commenced May 27th, 1115, Atâbek Tagtakîn, the Sâheb, or prince, of Damascus, went to Baghdâd, in order to offer his service to Al to Baghdad.

Mostadher Bi'llah, and Soltân Gayâtho'ddîn Mohammed, who received him with great honour. <sup>a</sup>
The same year, Al Afdal, the Khalif of Egypt's Wazîr, concluded a truce with Baldwin, the king of Jerusalem, after that prince had made himself master of a rich Moslem caravan; the Fâtemite Khalif despairing of doing his subjects, who had been plundered by the Franks, justice by force of arms. Baldwin pillaged the caravan near some salt pits, denominated from thence the salt pits of Baldwin; which name they retained, for many years, after that action had happened <sup>2</sup>.

What happened, the year following.

THE next year, being the 510th of the Hejra, which began May 16th, 1116, Atâbek Tagtakîn returned to Damascus, extremely well pleased with the reception he had met with at Baghdâd. The same year, Lûlû departed from Aleppo, in order to possess himself of the castle of Jaafar; but was assassinated near Bâlis, a small town of Syria, seated upon the western bank of the Euphrates, on his march. Hereupon Abu Ma'âli Ebn Al Mahali, the secretary of war, took upon himself the command of the citadel of Aleppo, in his room. Bâlis stands in the Jund Kinnisrîn, or district of Kinnisrîn, fifteen parasangs from Aleppo, and thirteen from Al Rakka, upon the Euphrates. The castle of Jaafar, in some copies of Abu'lfe'da's description of Syria, is called the castle of Jaabar, according to Goliûs. It is situated on the eastern bank of the Euphrates, about five parasangs from Bâlis. It first went under the appellation of the castle of Dawshar, which it derived from the name of its founder. At this place Solimân Shâh, the grandfather of Othmân, the progenitor of the Othmân Soltâns, attempting to pass the Euphrates, with his forces, was drowned. This year, George, a native of Antioch, surnamed, The Philosopher, by way of derision, a Christian, and Abu'l Khair, a Jew; two paltry physicians, practised in Egypt. Rezkallah, an astrologer, likewise set up for a fortune-teller there. A woman, coming once to consult him, and to demand the resolution of a certain question of him, he immediately erected a scheme; but refused to give her any satisfaction in the point required, till she had put a piece of money into his hand. He then told her, that the house of riches in the scheme before her indicated a great defect of cash in her coffers. To this she replied, "that he had hit the nail upon the head, and ought to be deemed an oracle." He then asked her, "Whether she had ever lost any money?" To which she made answer, "Yes, the money I have just given you;" and then immediately left him. Such ignorant pretenders to physic and astrology as these Egypt at this time abounded with. Notwithstanding which, Al Kâdi Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Al Nafsîr, surnamed Al Adîb, or the man of letters, a person of most profound erudition, and even one of the brightest ornaments of the age, flourished in that country, the present year, according to Abu'l Faraj <sup>3</sup>.

Soltân Mohammed's death and character.

THE 511th year of the Hejra, which commenced May 5th, 1117, proved fatal to Al Soltân Gayâtho'ddîn Mohammed Al Seljûki, the son of Mâlec Shâh. He died, in the month of Dhu'lhajja, at Esfahân; being about thirty-seven years old, at the time of his death, if we will believe Al Makîn. The author of the Lebtârikh likewise makes him to have been born in the year of the Hejra 474; though, according to the copy followed by M. Goinin, he places his death in the 501st year of the Moslem æra, and says he was then twenty-four years of age. Whence it is plain, that the two last numbers must have been corrupted, and mistaken for 37 and 511, in that copy. He reigned about thirteen years. When he perceived his end to approach, he sent for Abu'l Kâsem Mahmûd, his son, but fifteen years old, whom he had declared his successor, kissed him, and wept. After which, he commanded him to sit on the throne; which the young prince declined, saying, it was, by the indication of the stars, an unlucky day. The Soltân answered, You say true; but it is so to your father, not to you, who gain an empire on it. Then ascending the throne, he was there adorned with the diadem and bracelets, and acknowledged for Soltân. With regard to his character, Gayâtho'ddîn Mohammed Al Seljûki was eminent for his gravity, justice, clemency, and valour. He was strong, and could talk well. However, notwithstanding his good qualities, as he left behind him in the treasury eleven millions of dinârs, besides furniture and other effects of equal value, he seems, at least during certain intervals, and on some particular occasions, to have been of a rapacious disposition. This might also be sufficiently evinced by a story related of him in the Nighiaristân, which is too long to be inserted here; especially, as it will more properly make its appearance in a subsequent part of this work. He was interred, with the usual ceremonies; and his son Mahmûd was first prayed for at Baghdâd, on Friday, the twenty-third of Al Moharram, the following year. We are told, that five of his sons survived him, viz. Mas'ûd, Mahmûd, Togrol, Solimân, and Seljûk; the second of whom, Mahmûd, surnamed Mogayâtho'ddîn, was proclaimed Soltân at Baghdâd, and inaugurated there in form, immediately after his father was inhumed <sup>4</sup>.

- a THE same year, Al Emîr Bolgâri Ebn Aryk possessed himself of Aleppo, according to Al Emîr Makîn. In the sovereignty of this city and its district he maintained himself five years. Bolgâri possessed himself of Aleppo, this year. This Al Emîr Bolgâri, from his name, seems to have come originally from the country of Bolgâr, or Bulgaria, a very large tract, extending itself to the east of the Volga, formerly called Bolgâr, or Bulgâr, a denomination from thence applied to the whole region itself. Al Berjendi and Ebn Alwardi, in the seventh climate of their respective geographies, write, that the city of Bolgâr, or Bulgâr, the capital of this extensive tract, was, in their time, inhabited by Moslems of the sect of Al Shâfeî, and that it had formerly been a very considerable place; but that the Russians having taken it, in the year of the Hejra 358, demolished it, and reduced it to the miserable condition in which it remained at the time
- b they wrote. They add, that the city of Bolgâr was distant from Sarai in the Crimea about twenty stations. Notwithstanding what is advanced to the contrary by Al Makîn, if we will believe Ebn Shohnah, the inhabitants of Aleppo, being afraid of the Franks, put themselves into the hands of Ilgâzi, or Aylgâzi, Ebn Artak, the lord of Mâredîn, who sent his son Tamertâsh to govern them, in the year that we are now upon<sup>c</sup>.

- THE following year, being the 512th of the Hejra, beginning April 24th, 1118, the Khalîf Al Mostadher Bi'llah departed this life, at Baghdâd, the sixteenth day of the latter Rabi, according to Abu'l Faraj, or the twenty-third of that month, if we will believe Al Makîn. He died in the forty-second year of his age, and the twenty-fifth of his reign. The Khalîf Al Mostadher Bi'llah's death and character. With regard to his character, he is said to have been adorned with many fine intellectual endowments, mild in every point of conduct, liberal, eloquent, a good poet, a favourer of learned men, a lover of justice, and constant in giving alms. Macarius, the Jacobite patriarch, was enthroned at Alexandria, either in the 496th or 497th year of the Hejra, whilst Al Mostadher Bi'llah sat upon the Moslem throne. He vacated his see by death, towards the close of the 524th, or the beginning of the 525th, year of the Mohammedan æra, according to both Al Makrîzi and Al Makîn. The first day of Al Mostadher's Khalîfat was Saturday, and the last Monday. He outlived three Soltâns, or Emîr Al Omra's, who were his contemporaries, viz. Tajo'ddawla Tatash Ebn Alb, or Alp, Arslan, Barkîârok, and Mohammed, all of them sons of Mâlec Shâh. The last of these he survived only four months, and some days, as we learn both from Al Makîn and Abu'l Faraj<sup>d</sup>.

- d THE Moslem throne was no sooner become vacant, by the death of Al Mostadher, than Al Mostarshed Bi'llah; having already been prayed for in the mosques, as his father's successor, twenty-three years, according to Abu'l Faraj. It appears from Khondemir, that the beginning of this prince's reign was by no means peaceable; his brother Abu'l Hasan retiring then to Hella, a city of the Arabian Irak, where he assembled a body of troops, which enabled him to advance to Wâset, upon the Tigris, and possess himself of that important place. It was here that he openly revolted against his brother Al Mostarshed, and took the title of Khalîf. The dignity to which he aspired was, however, very short-lived; Dobâis Ebn Sadeka, governor of the country for Al Mostarshed, soon coming up with him, and giving him an intire defeat. Abu'l Hasan himself, being taken prisoner in the action, was sent to the Khalîf; who generously granted him his life, and set him at liberty. This appeased all the troubles of the empire, that had been excited by the defection of this prince. The same year, Baldwin (Q), the king of Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, marched with a powerful army into Egypt, in order to make himself master of that opulent region; but swimming in the Nile near Belbeis, or Balbais, a wound, which he had formerly received, opened, and could not be

(Q) The Egyptian author so frequently made use of by M. Renaudot informs us, that Baldwin, the king of Jerusalem, took Farmâ, or Al Farmâ, a maritime town of Egypt, on the coast of the Mediterranean, and, having contracted a distemper on his march, expired at Arish, in the year of the Hejra 512, the very year assigned by Abu'l Faraj and William of Tyre to this expedition.

The Egyptian writer adds, that his body, after it had been embalmed, was carried to Jerusalem, as he had ordered before his death, and buried in the church on mount Calvary; where his sepulchre, with an epitaph upon it, was very lately to be seen. Ebn Shohnah and Ebn Khalecân place the above-mentioned event in the year of the Hejra 511 (1).

healed. This obliged him to return to Jerusalem, where he died, after having recommended the care of his kingdom to Al Kames, or Al Komes, that is, the count, the Sâheb, or lord, of Al Robâ; who had formerly fallen into Jacarmish's hands, and been released by Al Jawâli. We are told, that this very year, soon after Al Mostarsbed's accession, Togrol Bek, surnamed Ilgâzi Ebn Artak, made himself master of a great part of Syria, or Al Shâm. It appears from the eastern writers, that Mogayâtbo'ddin Mahmûd Ebn Mohammed Al Seljûki acted as Soltân at Baghdâd, during the course of the present year <sup>e</sup>.

The Seljûkian empire is divided between Mahmûd and Sanjar.

In the 513th year of the Hejra, commencing April 14th, 1119, a sharp and bloody war began between Soltân Mahmûd and his uncle Sanjar; who, according to Khondemir, had presided over the large province of Khorasân for twenty years, under the reigns of the Soltâns Mohammed and Barkîârok. Sanjar, having received advice of Mohammed's death, raised a puissant army, and marched into the Persian Irâk, where Mahmûd had assumed the title of Soltân, as successor to his father. The vicinity of the armies commanded by those two princes soon brought on a general action between them; which ending in Mahmûd's defeat, he was constrained to retire to the castle of Saveh, or Sawa, a place of great strength and importance. Finding his affairs intirely ruined, he was obliged to sue for peace to his uncle, and sent to him for that purpose Kemalo'ddin Ali, his Wazîr, a very eloquent person; who, by his address, brought about an accommodation. The treaty of peace was no sooner concluded, than Mahmûd went to visit Sanjar; and was so well received, that he obtained of him the investiture of the province of Irâk. This we learn from Khondemir. However, if M. D'Herbelot may be credited, that historian, in another place, says, that Sanjar made Mahmûd his governor and lieutenant-general of both the Persian and Arabian Irâks. Be that as it will, as it does not appear from any of the oriental historians, that Sanjar ever exercised the least power within those provinces, Mahmûd seems to have acted independently of him, and consequently to have ruled there with an absolute sway. The conditions on which Mahmûd had allotted him by Sanjar the province, or provinces, of Irâk, were, according to Khondemir, to the following effect: that the name of Sanjar should always be mentioned in the public prayers before that of Mahmûd; that this latter should not have the fourth veil, or curtain, hung before the door of a room for state, in his apartments; that the trumpet should not sound when he went in or out of his palace; and lastly, that he should retain the officers whom his uncle had established in that part of the empire he was to govern. These conditions Mahmûd thankfully submitted to, and, after Sanjar had imposed them upon him, spent as much of his time in hunting, without meddling with public affairs, as his situation would permit. We are told, that his hunting equipage was so magnificent, that he kept four hundred blood-hounds and grey-hounds; every one of which wore a collar set with jewels, and a covering edged with gold and pearls. Ebn Shohnah relates (R), that Ilgâzi Ebn Artak, the Sâheb of Mâredîn, intirely defeated the Franks, near Aleppo, this year <sup>f</sup>.

The Seljûks are invaded, the following year.

THE next year, being the 504th of the Hejra, which began April 2d, 1120, the Kôrj, who are the same with the Khozârs, the Kasjâks, and other nations, uniting their forces, made an irruption into the Moslem territories; of which Al Emîr Ilgâzi, or Aylgâzi, lord of Mâredîn, Dobais Ebn Sadeka, the Sâheb of Hella, and Al Mâlec Togrol, Mahmûd's brother, to whom belonged Arrân and Nakhjawân, having received advice, they advanced to meet them as far as Teflis, with an army of 30000 men. The troops on both sides being drawn up in order of battle, a body of 200 Kasjâks appeared, with an intention, as the Moslems supposed, of surrendering themselves prisoners. But, in this, they were egregiously mistaken: for the Kasjâks, or Kipjâks, as soon as they came within distance, attacked their front so vigorously with arrows, that they put them into disorder; which those in the rear taking for a flight, they fled with such precipitation, that they fell upon one another. The Kôrj pursuing for twelve parasangs, with the utmost ardor, slew the greatest part of them, and took 4000 prisoners. Al Mâlec Togrol, Aylgâzi, and Dobais, however, found means to make their escape. The consequence of this defeat was the loss of Teflis, which the

(R) If we will believe Ebn Shohnah, the sepulchre of Abraham, in which Isaac and Jacob were likewise interred, was discovered near Beit Al Makdes, Al Kuds, or Jerusalem, this year. He adds, that the bodies of those three patriarchs were found therein, intire, and not in the least injured by time, together with several gold and silver lamps; and that these were all seen by many people, seated in the neighbourhood of the place. The Mohammedans hold in such veneration Abraham's tomb, that they go in pilgrimage thither; though this is not done till they have visited Mecca, Medina, and Jerusalem, on the same occasion, and performed, with proper devotion, all the prescribed ceremonies there (1).

- a Korj immediately besieged, and carried by storm, the following year. Some of the eastern geographers place the city of Teflis, Teflis, or Tiflis, in the province of Shirwân, others in Georgia, and others in The Greater Armenia; but it has been considered as the capital of Korj, or the country of the Korj, not far from the borders of Arrân and Adherbijân, by Nasir Al Tâsi and Ulugh Beik. Whence we may conclude, that the Korj, or Khazars, kept possession of Teflis, and looked upon it as one of the principal towns, if not their capital, at a least considerable time, after their reduction of it, in the year 515. It appears from Ebn Shohnah, that Al Emîr Ahmed Ebn Tomart, or Al Emîr Mohammed Ebn Tomrut, and Mâlec Abd'almlmen, the founders of the dynasty of the Al Moâbedun, called Al Mohades by the French and Spanish historians, began to make a figure about the time that we are
- b now upon. The Al Moâbedun, or Al Mohades, whose leaders pretended to deduce their origin from Al Hosein, the son of Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, first set up their standard in the country of Harejab, near the mountain Al Sûs Al Akfa, the mount Atlas of the ancients, and soon became formidable to the house of Teffesin. They even, by the decollation of Isaac, the last of the descendants of Yusef Ebn Tefsesin, and the reduction of Fez and Morocco, abolished the kingdom of the Al Morabeta, or Mclathemiyah, the Al Moravides of the Spanish writers, in the year of the Hejra 540. Roderic of Toledo, however, gives us to understand, that the Al Moâbedun possessed themselves of the territories of the Mclathemiyah in Africa before that year. For, he informs us, that the Al Mohades chased the Al Moravides out of Spain, after they had expelled them from Africa, in the 539th year of the Moslem æra. Al Nowairi,
- c or Al Noweiri, the Moslem historian, has given seventeen princes to the dynasty of the Al Moâbedun; which he makes to have commenced in the year 514, and to have ended in the year 666. But the author of the Nighiaristân has assigned this dynasty only thirteen princes, reigning from the 524th to the 686th year of the Hejra, and has handed down to us a catalogue of them. We shall expatiate no farther upon this race of princes here, as our readers will be obliged with a particular history of them hereafter, in the supplement to this large and extensive work, to which it will more properly belong<sup>s</sup>.

- THE following year, being the 515th of the Hejra, which commenced March 22d, 1121, Solimân, the son of Ilgâzi Ebn Artak, or Aylgâzi Ebn Ortok, having then just completed the twentieth year of his age, rebelled against his father. Ilgâzi Ebn Artak, having been apprized
- d of this rebellion, marched at the head of his forces against Solimân with so much expedition, that he surprized him, and seized those persons who had excited him to this revolt. Amongst these there was a certain Emîr, who had been brought up by his father Artak, and received from him the name of Nâsir, when he was intirely destitute of friends. This man Ilgâzi was determined to punish for his treason, which was aggravated by ingratitude. He, therefore, ordered his eyes to be plucked out, and his tongue cut off. One Al Hamawi, or a native of Ilama, another of them, whom Ilgâzi himself had made governor of Aleppo, he condemned to be first deprived of sight, and then to have his hands and feet chopt off; which occasioned his death. After these executions, his son Solimân was brought drunk before him; but, being restrained by natural affection from inflicting upon him a
- e punishment adequate to his crime, he gave him his life. However, notwithstanding his father's lenity to him, Solimân fled to Damascus. He was, perhaps, banished to that place, by Ilgâzi's command. This seems to be insinuated, though not directly asserted, by Abu'l Faraj. In the room of Al Hamawi, Ilgâzi conferred upon Solimân, his brother Abd'aljabbâr's son, the government of Aleppo, and named him Badro'ddawla. Having re-established his affairs in this manner, he returned to Mâredîn, then the place of his residence. The same year, the Seljukian Soltân assigned to Ilgâzi, or Aylgâzi Ebn Artak, the city of Mayyâfârakîn; as he did to Al Emîr Aksankar Al Borsaki Al Mawfel, Al Fazîra, and Senjâr. It may not be improper to remark here, that Al Fazîra, in the passage of Abu'l Faraj now before us, does not denote the whole region of Mesopotamia, as Dr. Poccock took it to do, but either the
- f fourth nome, or district, of that peninsula, which had for its metropolis Al Mawfel, and is generally denominated by the Arabs Diyâr Al Fazîra, or a little island of the Dijlat, or Tigris, about ten miles in circumference, chiefly inhabited by Christians, about twelve miles above Al Mawfel. This island goes amongst the Syrians under the appellation of Gozarta, or rather Jozarta, that is, the island, and sometimes Jozarta Cardu, from the neighbouring Curd, Cardoan, or Carduchian mountains. The Arabs call it simply Fazîra, or Al Fazîra, the island, and sometimes Fazîra Ebn Omar. Ammianus Marcellinus names it Bezabda and Bizabda, St. Jerom Zabdicene, and Masius Gezerta. The bishop of this island was the eighth in rank of those subject to the Masriân, or metropolitan of the east, as the Jacobites styled their pontiff. with,

with, we must beg leave to refer our learned and curious readers to the last but one of a the authors cited in this paragraph. The writer so often followed by M. Renaudot, makes Al Emîr Al Afdal, the Fâtemite Khalîf Al Amer's Wazîr, to have been assassinated by two Bâtanîsts sent by the Khalîf himself to perpetrate that horrid fact, in the year that we are now upon. Some authors relate, that Al Amer employed these Bâtanîsts to murder Al Afdal, because that minister, finding himself upon very bad terms with his master, had several times attempted to take off the Khalîf himself by poison. Others will have it, that the Emîr, or Wazîr, arrogated so much to himself, that the Khalîf could not bear him, and therefore got him dispatched by the ruffians abovementioned. The Wazîr, being carried to the palace, was found dead, upon his arrival there. As for the assassins, they were immediately secured, and met with the punishment due to so atrocious a crime. The Khalîf ordered him a very pompous funeral, and attended it himself; saying at the grave the prayers, usual on such occasions. He had, however, seized before all the Wazîr's money, amounting to 4,000,000 dinârs; as also his rich cloaths, tapestry, jewels, hories, arms, and every thing valuable belonging to him; all which he caused to be confiscated. About this time, the Tamanian pillars of the Caaba were thrown down; but whether this happened by accident or design, we have not been told. Al Sheikh Yezîdo'ddîn Al Hosein Ebn Ali Tograi Al Esfabâni, who had an employment under Mâlec Shâb, and was advanced to the post of Wazîr by Soltân Ma'sûd, being taken prisoner by Mahmûd, after he had vanquished his master in battle, was put to death by that prince, and the famous Abu'l Kâsem Ebn Mohammed Al Harîri, the celebrated author of Al Makamât, or the Confessus, died, before the close of this year. The reason assigned by Soltân Mahmûd for his severity to Al Sheikh Yezîdo'ddîn was, that he found him to be an infidel and an impious person. That Sheikh wrote a Diwân, or collection, of poems; one of which was that intituled, Lamiat Al Ajem, published, with notes and a Latin version, by the great Dr. Pocock, at Oxford, in 1661. Another piece in prose, concerning the education of children, bearing the title of Arskad Al Awlad, has likewise been attributed to him. At the time of his death, which, according to Ebn Shobnah, happened in the year of the Hejra 515, though it has been placed in 513, by M. D'Herbelot, he was above sixty years old. He is said by some to have been much addicted to chymistry, and to have made a considerable progress in that art. With regard to Al Harîri, who likewise paid the common tribute to nature the pre- sent year, he resided for the most part at Harîr, a town of Fârs; though, according to Ebn Shobnah, he was a native of Basra. Hence he is surnamed both Al Harîri and Al Basri by the Arab writers. The Makamât, or Mokamât, which he composed at the request of Abu Shirwân Ebn Khâled, Soltân Mahmûd's Wazîr, is esteemed as a master-piece of Arabian eloquence, inasmuch that, says Al Zamakhshari, the most learned of the Arab grammarians, it ought to be written upon nothing but silk. It contains (S) fifty discourses, or declamations, upon different moral subjects; every one of which bears the name of the place where it was recited. Okbari Al Baghdâdi obliged the Moslem world with an explication of all the difficult words that occur in the Makamât; a copy of which is preserved in the French king's library, N<sup>o</sup>. 1120. Several eastern authors, of good repute, have also commented upon it; of which Al Motarezzi, Al Modbafferi, and Al Shîrâzi hold the first rank. Al Harîri, if Ebn Shobnah may be credited, was born in the year of the Hejra 446. The word Makamât denotes properly what rhetoricians call common places in the Arabic tongue <sup>a</sup>.

(S) It may not be improper to remark here, that the three first of the Confessus were published, with notes and a Latin version, by the famous Albert Schultens, at Franker, in the year of our LORD 1731; and the next three, at Leyden, in the year 1740. The Arabic manuscript made use of by Schultens, on this occasion, was that preserved in the public library at Leyden, which contains a great number of very valuable oriental manuscripts. The learned editor has prefixed to the last of these performances an extract from Ebn Khalecân, exhibiting the character of Al Harîri, whom that writer calls Abu Mohammed Al Kâsem Ebn Ali Ebn Mohammed

Ebn Othmân Al Harîri Al Basri Al Harâmi, as well as a short history and description of this celebrated part of his works. This we think it needless to transcribe, as the book itself is new, and in almost every one's hands. The first of the Confessus, intituled Al Sanaani, had been before published, with a Latin translation, and short marginal notes, by Golius; who, at the same time, communicated to the learned world a particular account both of the author and the work, of which that piece he edited, as a specimen, was a part. This may be seen in one of the later editions of his excellent, and universally admired, Arabic grammar (1).

a THE 516th year of the Hejra, beginning March 12th, 1122, seems not to have produced many actions of éclat. It was, however, remarkable for the death of Ilgâzi Ebn Artak. That Emîr departed this life at Mayyâfûrakîn, in the month of Ramadân. Hereupon Hofâmô'ddîn Tamartâsh seized the castle of Mâredîn, and his son Solimân Mayyâfûrakîn; Badro'ddawla Solimân Ebn Abd'aljabbâr Ebn Artak remaining at Aleppo, till he was driven from thence by his cousin Balac Ebn Babrâm Ebn Artak, the following year. Al Emîr Ilgâzi Ebn Artak, the Sâbeb of Mâredîn and Mayyâfûrakîn, makes a considerable figure in the Moslem history, as appears from what has been already related of him. Some of the oriental writers call him Togrol Beg, looking upon Ilgâzi only as a surname. The house of Artak, or, as the Turks pronounce it, Ortok, deduced that name from a mountain in Turkestân, opposite to mount Gurtak. Between these two hills, the latter of which is sometimes denominated Gbertak, is situated the city of Karâkûm, inhabited by Scythians, or oriental Turks, in the middle of a vast and extensive plain, covered with black sand, from whence it derives its name; the word Karâkûm, in Turkish, signifying black sand. It stands in 116° 40' long. and 30° 36' N. lat. Here Kara Khân, the father of Ogûz Khân, one of the most ancient kings of the Turks, or Moguls, held his royal seat. The two aforesaid mountains, that bound on the north and the south the abovementioned plain, are branches of mount Imaus, where the Turkish, or Mogul, cavalry take up successively their summer and winter quarters. Ilgâzi in Wilb. Tyrius, or William of Tyre, goes under the appellation of Gazzi, and by Marinus Sanutus he is still more corruptly named Gariz. Some of this prince's coins may be seen amongst those, with Arabic characters upon them, published by Honorius Arigonus, at Trevifo, in 1745<sup>1</sup>.

c OUR learned readers will perhaps not be displeased, if we here attempt to restore the true reading of a passage in Erpenius's MS. and printed edition of Al Makîn; especially, as this can by no means be deemed foreign to the present subject. If Al Emîr Bolgâri Ebn Aryk, who possessed himself of Aleppo, in the year of the Hejra 511, was in reality no other person than Ilgâzi Ebn Artak; the name of this prince has been as much corrupted by the Latin translator of Al Makîn, as by either William of Tyre or Sanutus. And that this is really the case, we have pretty good reason to believe. For the characters forming the words Ilgâzi Ebn Artak and Bolgâri Ebn Aryk, divested of the diacritical points, must be allowed to be the very same; and, in support of this sentiment, it may be farther observed, that Ilgâzi occupied Aleppo, according to Abu'l Faraj, till the time of his death, in the year of the Hejra 516, that is, five years after Bolgâri Ebn Aryk is said to have made himself master of that city, the very duration assigned the government of this Emîr in Erpenius's MS. and printed copies of Al Makîn. To which we may add, that Ebn Shobnah, in confirmation of what has been proposed, asserts Ilgâzi Ebn Artak to have taken under his protection the people of Aleppo, in the year of the Hejra 511; which seems to set the point, now recommended to the consideration of our learned and intelligent readers, beyond dispute<sup>2</sup>.

d IN the 517th year of the Hejra, commencing March 1st, 1123, Balac Ebn Babram Ebn Artak, finding his cousin Solimân not able to defend his country against the Franks, laid close siege to Aleppo, which at last was surrendered to him. A little before this happened, the Franks, attended by Saifo'ddîn, the Sâbeb of Hella, advanced to Aleppo, in order to possess themselves of that place; which being destitute of a garrison, and in want of all kinds of necessaries, the inhabitants desired ten days time to deliberate upon proper terms of capitulation. This being granted them, and the ninth day come, without their having arrived at any resolution, the river Kowaik, which runs by the town, that day overflowed its banks, laid a considerable extent of territory under water, carried away all the baggage and military chest of the Franks, drowned a vast number of them, and, in fine, obliged them to raise the siege. The defenceless state of Aleppo, which was hindered from falling into the hands of the Franks only by the aforesaid unexpected event, induced Balac Ebn Babram to make himself master of it, lest it should soon be intirely lost to the house of Artak. The place, however, sustained a siege, before it submitted to him, as we learn from Abu'l Faraj; his army being probably much inferior, both in number and goodness of troops, to that of the Franks<sup>3</sup>.

f THE following year, being the 518th of the Hejra, which began Feb. 19th, 1124, Balac Ebn Babram Ebn Artak marched against Manbij, or Manbej, took it, and then formed the siege of the castle. This, for some time, he carried on vigorously; but was at last killed by an arrow, in one of his attacks; upon which, his forces immediately dispersed. The same year, Aksankar Al Borsaki reduced the city of Aleppo, as the Franks did Sár, or Tyre.<sup>a</sup> The inhabitants, however, and the Moslem garison, of the latter of these places, defended themselves with so much bravery, and made so stout a resistance, that the Franks lay before it five months. Nor could they at last have possessed themselves of it, had they not starved it to a surrender: which is not to be wondered at, as it was, both by nature and art, rendered one of the strongest and most impregnable fortresses of the East. Ebn Shohnah writes, that the Franks granted the Moslems very honourable terms; permitting them to march out of the town with bag and baggage, and to carry out all their riches along with them. This year, died Al Hasan Sabab, the founder of the dynasty of the Ismaelians of Asia, or Assessins, after he had reigned thirty-five years in Al Jebel, or the Persian Irak, and was succeeded by Buzruk Umid Al Rûdbâri, a native of the city and castle of Rûdbâr; of which princes we shall hereafter give a more particular account, in the supplement to this work, to which it will more properly belong<sup>m</sup>,

Nothing remarkable happened the following year.

THE next year, being the 519th of the Hejra, which commenced Feb. 8th, 1125, Kosaimo'ddawla Aksankar Al Borsaki remained in the peaceable possession of Aleppo, where his son Mas'ûd then resided in quality of governor, and made the proper dispositions for securing to himself that place. At this time, Buzruk Umid Al Rûdbâri, in imitation of his predecessor, took several assassins into his service; some of whom barbarously murdered Al Emîr Aikankar, the Sâheb of Aleppo, the following year<sup>n</sup>.

The most material transactions of the year 520.

THE 520th year of the Hejra, beginning Jan. 27th, 1126, according to Ebn Shohnah, did not prove very favourable to the Franks. Having assembled a very considerable force, they moved towards Damascus, in order to form the siege of that city, and advanced first to Shafjab, where they encamped. Tagantakin, the Moslem governor of Damascus, being informed of their approach, marched against them at the head of his troops, with an intent to give them battle. His horse soon came up with them, but were broken and dispersed by the cavalry of the Franks; who pursued them with so much ardor, that they left their foot to take care of themselves. The Moslem infantry, seeing them thus deserted by their horse, fell upon them with such fury that they put them to the rout, penetrated to the enemy's camp, plundered it, and put all the Christians they met with there to the sword. The cavalry of the Franks, upon their return from the pursuit, finding their foot defeated, and the Moslems in possession of their camp, betook themselves likewise to a precipitate flight.<sup>d</sup> This blow obliged the Franks to lay aside all thoughts of attacking Damascus, and in the utmost confusion to abandon the Moslem territories. The same year, in the month of Dhu'lkaada, Kosaimo'ddawla Aksankar Al Borsaki, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel, was assassinated by some Bâtanists, one Friday, in the great Jama', or royal temple, of that city. Hereupon 'Azzo'ddîn, or Ezzo'ddîn, Mas'ûd, his son, who came from Aleppo for that purpose, took possession of Al Mawfel without opposition. It is looked upon as very wonderful by Abu'l Faraj, that 'Azzo'ddîn should be apprized of his father's death by the Sâheb, or lord, of Antioch, before a courier brought him the news. However, he accounts for this by observing, that it was sooner known to the Franks, by reason of the diligence they used to learn the true state of affairs among the Moslems. Ebn Shohnah gives Al Emîr Aksankar the character of the best of governors, and of a brave magnanimous prince<sup>o</sup>.

and of the year 521.

IN the 521st year of the Hejra, commencing Jan. 17th, 1127, 'Azzo'ddîn Mas'ûd Ebn Aksankar sent Al Emîr Kinaz as his governor to Aleppo, to preside over the people there; he having been obliged to leave that place, in order to take upon himself the government of Al Mawfel, after his father's death. This year is remarkable for being the first of the dynasty of the Atibeks of Irak, founded by Omâdo'ddîn, or 'Amâdo'ddîn, Zenki, the son of Aksankar; who was established in the government of the city of Baghdâd, by Soltân Mahmûd. His brother 'Azzoddîn Mas'ûd dying, the same year, 'Amâdo'ddîn Zenki became possessed of Al Mawfel, and its dependencies. Al Emîr Kinaz behaving extremely ill at Aleppo, the inhabitants deposed him, and substituted one Solimân, who had formerly ruled them with more equity and moderation, in his room. The famous Kotbo'ddîn, founder of a new monarchy, and first Shâh of Khowârazm, of whom we shall speak more largely hereafter, departed this life, the present year<sup>p</sup>.

THE following year, being the 522d of the Hejra, which began Jan. 6th, 1128, Soltân Sanjar, who came for that purpose out of Khorasân, and Soltân Mahmûd, his nephew, had an interview at Al Ray, where they sat very amicably together upon the same throne. This a year, 'Amâdo'ddîn Zenki Ebn Akfankar made himself master of the city and castle of Aleppo, according to Abu'l Faraj. That fortress, as we are told by Nicetas Croniates, was besieged by the forces of the emperor Joh. Comnenus, who had concluded a treaty of alliance with Raymond, prince of Antioch, the preceding year; but without effect. Al Emîr Tagantekin, the Sâleb, or Atâbek, of Damascus, a person of great prudence and sagacity, died, according to Ebn Shobnah, in the year that we are now upon<sup>a</sup>.

THE next year, being the 523d of the Hejra, which commenced Dec. 26th, 1128, Atâbek and of the 'Amâdo'ddîn Zenki Ebn Akfankar, who had before, if we may depend upon Ebn Shobnah, year 523. reduced Harrân, Senjâr, or Sinjâr, Nasîbîn, or Nisbîn, and Jazîra Ebn Omer, in Mesopotamia, possessed himself of Hama, or Hamah, in Syria. Having sent an ambassador to b Tawzi Ebn Tagantekin, the Atâbek of Damascus, in order to procure his assistance against the Franks; the Atâbek dispatched his son Sunaj, then his deputy at Hama, to have a conference with him. But Sunaj no sooner appeared, than Zenki took him prisoner, and carried him to Hama; whither he immediately marched with a body of troops, and seized upon that city. He then returned to Al Mawfel, attended by his prisoner Sunaj; and afterwards overthrew the Franks with great slaughter, near the castle of Al Atârab, which he made himself master of, and levelled with the ground, before the end of this prosperous campaign<sup>c</sup>.

IN the 524th year of the Hejra, beginning Dec. 15th, 1129, Soltân Sanjar passed the Jibîn, and entered Mawarû'nahr, in order to reduce Abmed Ebn Solimân, the governor c of Samarkand, who had set up for himself there, and refused to pay the usual tribute. Being obliged to surrender after a vigorous siege, the Soltân spared his life; only depriving him of the government, which he gave to one of his slaves. But Abmed, finding means to get into Sanjar's favour, was in a little time restored. The same year, Al Amer Beahcamî'llab Abu Ali Ebn Al Mosta'li, the Khalif of Egypt, was assassinated by several Bâtanists, supposed to have been hired by some of the grandees of his court for that purpose, on the second of Dhu'lkaada, as he returned from taking a walk. As he left no son behind him, he was succeeded by Abu'l Maimûn Abd'al Majîd, the son of Abu'l Kasem Ebn Al Mostanser, his cousin-german, who assumed the title, or surname, of Al Hâfedh Bedinî'llab. However, he was not inaugurated in form, nor would the Egyptians take the oath of allegiance to d him, before it should appear, whether the child, of which the Khalif's widow was then big, were a son or not. In case the infant proved a son, Al Hâfedh Bedinî'llab was, however, appointed to act as his deputy. A certain author writes, that no less than ten Bâtanists were employed in the assassination of the Khalif Al Amer Beahcamî'llab, by some of the friends of Al Afdal, the late Wazîr, as was believed, in order to revenge that minister's death. This year, there were seen at Baghdâd scorpions with wings, and a double sting; which struck all people with terror, and did much damage in that place. Ebn Shobnah relates, that Al Amer Beahcamî'llab, the tenth Fâtemite Khalif, was thirty-four years old, at the time of his death; and that he reigned twenty-nine years, five months, and fifteen days<sup>e</sup>.

e THE 525th year of the Hejra, commencing December 4th, 1130, proved fatal to Soltân and in 585 Mahmûd Ebn Mohammed Ebn Mâlec Shâb, who died, in the month of Shawâl, at Hamadan. He was twenty-seven years old, of which he reigned thirteen, at the time of his death, according to Abu'l Faraj. Khondemir, however, as cited by M. D'Herbelot, affirms him either to have governed or reigned alone twenty-seven years. The author of the Lebtârikh makes him to have lived only twenty-five years, and yet places his birth in the year of the Hejra 487; which extends his life, in opposition to what he had before advanced, to thirty-eight years. In this state of uncertainty and contradiction, we cannot, therefore, help preferring to that of the other two writers the authority of Abu'l Faraj. And, in farther confirmation of this, Ebn Shobnah writes, that Soltân Mahmûd lived twenty-seven years, f and reigned twelve years, seven months, and twenty days. He was a prince of a very handsome person, and a generous soul; affable, prudent, and merciful; though the love of women and hunting gradually impaired the great character, and the shining reputation he had acquired. He has been particularly blamed for squandering away the best part of his finances upon his hunting equipage, which frequently rendered him short of money, and incapable of paying his troops. Notwithstanding which, he never fleeced his subjects, in order to recruit his coffers; nor would he ever suffer his favourites to offer them any injury. He forbore to punish those who spoke ill of him. No prince ever studied the art of reigning more. He is said to have been skilled in grammar, poetry, and chronology.

He was also very eloquent, and wrote a beautiful hand. We are farther told, that he was a versed in the art of oneirocritic, and had by him at his death a collection of the interpretations of dreams. He left for his successor Soltân Togrol, his brother, surnamed Rucno'ddîn, or Rucno'ddîn, and called Dawd, or David, by Abu'l Faraj. His brother Mas'ûd nevertheless disputed the crown with him, and several battles were fought between them, in the space of three or four years, which he reigned. It appears from Khondemir, that Soltân Togrol II. had a son also named Dawd, whom some of his subjects at Hamadân endeavoured to place upon the throne, after his death; but without effect. We must not forget to remark, that Macarius, the patriarch of the Jacobites at Alexandria, died, either in the beginning of this or the end of the preceding year, after he had sat in that see, according to Al Makrizi, twenty-six years, and forty-one days. He was buried in the church of Muhallaca at Meſr; though his body was transported to the monastery of St. Macarius, in the second year of the patriarchate of Gabriel, surnamed Ebn Tarik, and sometimes going under the appellation of Abu'lola, who was one of the best families in Al Kabirah, and succeeded him in the patriarchal see, after it had been vacant about two years, and two months. Whilst Macarius presided over the Christians of the Jacobite sect in Egypt, both the Fâtemite Khalîf Al Amer Beabcamî'llah and Al Asdal his Wazîr were assassinated by the Bâtanists, as has been already observed. The latter of these, if we will believe Ebn Shobnah, was dispatched by three of those assassins in the street called Siakalah, in the year of the Hejra 515, and succeeded by Abu Mohammed Abd'allah Al Bataychi, or rather Al Batîbahi, in the sublime post of Wazîr. The gentile name Al Batîbahi seems to intimate, that this Abu Mohammed Abd'allah was originally of Al Batîba, or Al Batîbah, the marshy district formed by the reſtaginations of the Tigris, in the neighbourhood of Wâſet.

The Atâbek
Zenki is defeated by the Khalîf.

THE following year, being the 526th of the Hejra, beginning Nov. 23d, 1131, Soltân Sanjar wrote to 'Amâdo'ddîn Zenki, Atâbek of the Arabian Irâk, and Dobais Ebn Sadeka, the Sâheb of Hella; commanding them to march into Irâk, against the Khalîf Mostarshed. Accordingly they advanced into that province, and incamped at Al Manâriya, which belonged to Dojayl, or Dokhayl, the country extending itself, for some space, along the Tigris, to the north of Baghdâd. The Khalîf, having received advice of their approach, passed the Tigris with all his forces, and pitched his tents at Al Abbâsiya, on the western bank of that river. The armies faced each other at Hadrâ Al Barâmaca, and came to a general action there. Atâbek Zenki attacked the Khalîf's right wing, in which Jamâlo'ddawla Akbâl was posted, and put the troops of which it was composed to flight. But the Khalîf, supported by Nasr Al Khâdem (the eunuch), who commanded his left wing, fell upon the enemy's right with such fury, that, after a sharp dispute, he defeated it, killed a great number of the rebels upon the spot, and took many of them prisoners. This matter, however, seems to be differently related by Khondemir, who assures us, that Dobais Ebn Sadeka, who had been so faithful to the Khalîf Al Mostarshed, in the beginning of his reign, and then suppressed the rebellion excited against him by his brother Abu'l Hasan, was at last induced to take part with his enemies; insomuch that having joined Togrol Al Seljûki, he undertook, conjointly with him, to surprize the Khalîf in Baghdâd. This had actually been done, continues that author, had not Togrol been suddenly seized with a burning fever, and Dobais hindered from appearing at the place of rendezvous by a violent storm. Nevertheless the Khalîf's troops, availing themselves of this advantage, obliged the rebels to betake themselves to a precipitate flight. This war, adds he, was carried on till the year of the Hejra 526, when Mas'ûd, the son of Mohammed Gayâtho'ddîn, succeeded his brother Mahmûd. For, the name of this Soltân having been published in all the mosques, with the consent of Al Mostarshed, the Khalîf afterwards changed his sentiments, in relation to Mas'ûd, and, at the sollicitation of some of the grandees of his court, ordered his name to be suppressed in the public prayers; depriving him both of the title and quality of Soltân. This year, the Atâbek Al Shabîd recovered Ma'ra Al Na'mân, or Maara Al Nomân, in Syria, or Al Shâm, from the Franks, according to Al Makîn. From the Khalîf Al Mostarshed's appearing at the head of his forces in the field, and extinguishing in person the aforesaid rebellion, we may conclude, that he was more warlike and brave than many of his latter predecessors; though he has been represented by some of the eastern historians as a mild and pacific prince. The same year, according to Ebn Shobnah, Tauzi, surnamed Tâj Al Molûc, that is, the crown of kings, the son of Tagantakîn, or, as he is called by Al Makîn, Tagiakîn, the Atâbek of Damascus, departed this life, in that city. He left his kingdom by will to Shams Al Molûc, that is, the sun of kings, Ismael, his eldest son; and to his other son, Shamso'ddawla, or the sun of the state, he assigned Baalbec, with its district

- a and dependencies. As for Shams Al Moluc Ismael, he grew very powerful at Damascus, and took Baniās, or Paneas, together with its castle, from the Franks, by capitulation. He also wrested Hamah out of Atabek Zenki's hands, which he carried by storm. These conquests struck the Franks with such terror, that they retired from the Moslem frontiers, and were obliged to act intirely on the defensive. We must not forget to remark, that Al Amer Beahcami'llab's widow having been brought to bed of a daughter, Al Hâfedh, who before had been placed at the head of the administration at Al Kâbirah, was proclaimed Khalif of Egypt; though Abu Ali Ahmed, Al Afdal's son, then Wazir and commander in chief of the Egyptian forces, endeavoured to set up for himself, but without effect, about the time that we are now upon <sup>u</sup>.
- b THE next year, being the 527th of the Hejra, commencing Nov. 12th, 1132, the Khalif Al Mostarshed sent a pretty sharp message to Atabek Zenki, by Al Sheikh Babâ'oddin Abu'l shed besiges Fotâ Al Esfarâjeni; who, relying on the power and authority of his master, added several Al Mawfel reproaches of his own. For which insolence, Zenki, having arrested him, treated him very ill. Al Mostarshed, having received advice of the insult offered him in the person of his embassador, marched with an army of 30,000 men from Baghdâd towards Al Mawfel; and was met by Zenki, at a small distance from the latter of those places, with part of his forces, the rest being left, under the command of Nasîro'ddin, his deputy, in the town. But not being able to make head against the Khalif, that prince invested the city of Al Mawfel, in the month of Ramadân, and afterwards besieged it in form: whilst he pressed
- c the place closely without, a company of plasterers within agreed to betray it to him. But being discovered, and executed, he raised the siege, after he had carried it on ineffectually about three months, and returned to Baghdâd. About this time, the repose of the army, as well as of the court, in Egypt, was disturbed by factions; one of which was headed by Abu Ali Al Hâkem, Al Hâfedh's son, who endeavoured to excite the Emîrs to a revolt. The soldiers were divided into two powerful parties; some of them espousing the tenets of the Sunnites, and others those of the Shiites. This division occasioned the points in debate between those two sects to be controverted amongst the troops, already inflamed against one another by political broils, with so much heat, that from words they came at last to blows, and many on both sides were slain <sup>w</sup>.
- d IN the 528th year of the Hejra, which began Nov. 1st, 1133, a peace was concluded A peace con- between Atabek Zenki and Al Mostarshed Bi'llah, the Khalif of Baghdâd. The distractions, cluded between owing to Abu Ali Al Hâkem's conduct, still continued in Egypt; every thing at this time, Zenki and according to Ebn Khalectân, and other writers of good repute, being in great confusion the Khalif. there <sup>x</sup>.
- e THE 529th year of the Hejra, which commenced Oct. 22d, 1134, proved fatal to Soltân The Khalif Al Togrol and the Khalif Al Mostarshed. The former of those princes, who was the eighth Mostarshed is Soltân of the Seljuks of Irân, died at Hamadân, in the month of Al Moharram; being about assassinated by twenty-five years old, of which he had reigned three, at the time of his death. He was the Bitanists. just and valiant, good-natured and liberal. The art of governing he perfectly well understood, and did nothing unbecoming a prince. Upon Togrol's death, his brother Mas'ûd, then at Baghdâd, was invited by his friends at Hamadân to repair immediately to that city, in order to take the government of it upon him, and a courier was dispatched to him for that purpose. In the mean time, another party formed at court, sent an express to Dawd, or David, the son of Togrol, with the same view. But the uncle being more expeditious than the nephew, and reaching Hamadân first, Mas'ûd was unanimously saluted Soltân by the grandees, and Dawd no more thought of. Having been apprized in the city of Al Ray, where he then held his residence, that the Khalif of Baghdâd, in violation of his engagements, had ordered his name to be suppressed in the public prayers, and deprived him of the title and quality of Soltân, he advanced at the head of a powerful army into the
- f Arabian Irâk; where he was met by Al Mostarshed, accompanied by a great number of the principal noblesse, and lords of his court. The two armies had not long faced each other, before they came to a general action, on the tenth of Ramadân; when the Khalif's left wing deserting to the Soltân, he was surrounded and taken, whilst his right wing, after a slight opposition, fled. After this defeat, Baghdâd opened its gates to Mas'ûd, without making any resistance. The Soltân, meditating another expedition, carried Al Mostarshed with him into the province of Adherbijân. Being arrived at Marâga, the Khalif was confined in a tent at some distance from the army, near the gate of that city; where messages passed between him and the Soltân relating to peace. At length it was agreed, that Al Mostarshed, besides paying annually 400,000 dinârs, should remain in Baghdâd, and not raise any other troops besides his ordinary guards. The agreement being thus settled, the Khalîf was permitted to ride on horseback, with the harness of a horse, in token of honour, carried before him. He was even upon the point of returning to Baghdâd, when news being brought of the arrival of an ambassador from Soltân Sanjar, the people followed Mas'ûd to meet him, and amongst the rest some of those who had the care of the Khalîf. The defenceless condition of that prince, who was now left without a guard, excited twenty-four Bâtanists to rush into his tent, and assassinate him, by giving him no less than twenty wounds. Not satisfied with the perpetration of this horrid crime, they barbarously cut off his nose and ears, and left him, by way of contempt, naked upon the spot. Many believed, with good reason, says Khondemir, that Mas'ûd was at the bottom of this affair; and amused him with the appearance of an accommodation, on the terms above-mentioned, only in order to cover his design. Al Mostarshed was of a thin habit of body, but an excellent constitution. He was very eloquent, and had the talent of expressing himself so well in a few words, that he always comprehended a great deal of good sense in his discourse. Ebn Shohnah affirms him to have been a prince of a pacific disposition, and a fine writer. His mother's name was Omm Walid, as we learn from the same author. He was murdered on Thursday, the 17th of Dhu'lkaada, in the forty-fourth year of his age, after he had reigned seventeen years, and seven months, near the gate of Marâga, where he remained till the citizens buried him. Mirkhond, on the other hand, relates, that this Khalîf was a man of a military genius, and fought several battles with Soltân Mas'ûd Al Seljûki, with various success. He also farther assures us, that Mas'ûd, having routed Al Mostarshed, in a decisive action near Tauris, or Tabriz, the capital of Adherbijân, took him prisoner; and, soon after he fell into his hands, caused him to be put to death.

THE Khalîf Al Mostarshed having been cut off by the Bâtanists, hired for that purpose probably by Soltân Mas'ûd, Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr, his son, was declared Emîr Al Mûmenîn, or commander of the faithful, in his room. The new Khalîf, immediately after his accession, took the title, or surname, of Al Râshed Billah, and received the oath of allegiance from his subjects, the last Monday in Dhu'lkaada, the month in which his father was slain. He had before been acknowledged successor to the preceding Khalîf, by the people or Baghdâd, and therefore met with no opposition, after Al Mostarshed's tragical exit, in his elevation to the Moslem throne. He had not long been inaugurated, when Dobais Ebn Sadeka, the Sâheb of Hella, was assassinated by a young Armenian, imployed by Soltân Mas'ûd; who cut off his head, as he was slooping with his fingers on the ground, before his tent, near the city of Kbûnej. For Mas'ûd was jealous of his power, and had only made use of him as an instrument to oppose Al Mostarshed. The same year, Shams Al Mohûc was assassinated by some of his servants, at the instigation of his mother. Shahab'oddîn, the son of Tâj Al Mohûc Tarwzi, succeeded him, at Damascus, which was soon after attacked by Atâbek Zenki; though, a truce being concluded between him and Shahab'oddîn, the Atâbek thought fit to draw off, and retire into his own dominions. The troubles in Egypt, occasioned by Abu Ali Al Hâkem's defection, still remaining, and the minds of the soldiery being alienated from him; they solicited Babarâm, or Bahrâm, surnamed Tâjo'ddawla, an Armenian, who presided over the western part of the Fâtemite empire, to come to Al Kâbirah, take upon himself the office of Wazîr, as well as that of general of the Khalîf's forces, and restore the public tranquillity, which had been so long disturbed. Bahrâm, upon their application to him, though the post of Wazîr by no means pleased him, found himself obliged to comply with their request, and therefore set out for Al Kâbirah, as soon as the solicitation reached him; where he arrived, according to some good authors, the present year. He was by religion a Christian, and accompanied Bedr Al Jemâl out of Syria into Egypt. As he had gone through all the posts in the army with vast applause, and had raised himself to the supreme command solely by his own merit, he was so beloved by the troops, and his reputation arrived at so high a pitch, that as soon as he entered Al Kâbirah, Al Hâkem abandoned the palace. This gave Al Hâfedb, the Fâtemite Khalîf, his father, an opportunity of repossessing himself of it; he having been, by the intrigues of his rebellious son, expelled from thence before. In testimony, therefore, a therefore, of the grateful sense he retained of the service done him, he appointed Babrâm his general and Wazîr, the very day on which, by the assistance of this kind benefactor, he had been so happily restored <sup>2</sup>.

THE following year, being the 530th of the Hejra, beginning Oct. 11th, 1135; Babrâm <sup>The most remarkable occurrences of the year 530.</sup> Shâh, Soltân of the house of Gazni, whose kingdom extended from the province of Gazna, to the east of Khorasân, a vast way into Indostân, formed a design to shake off the Seljukian yoke; of which Soltân Sanjar receiving advice, he entered the territories of Gazna with a numerous army. But Babrâm, finding himself too weak to resist so great a force, sent embassadors to pay the usual tribute, and to do homage for his crown, by which means he diverted the impending storm. The same year, Soltân Mas'ûd having sent to demand of the Khalîf Al Râshed the money due to him for tribute from Al Mostarsched; the Moslem pontiff was so incensed at this demand, that, seeing himself supported by the inhabitants of Baghdâd, he resolved to drive from that capital all the friends, relations, and domestics of Soltân Mas'ûd that could be met with there. At this juncture, happily for the Khalîf, Dawd Ebn Mahmûd, a Seljuk, but an enemy to Mas'ûd, arrived at Baghdâd, with a body of troops from Adherbijân, being likewise followed by Atâbek Zenki, with a reinforcement from Al Mawfel. The Khalîf, being strengthened by these succours, thought himself obliged in point of gratitude to dignify Dawd with the title of Soltân, and order his name to be published in the mosques, in the room of that of Mas'ûd; which he accordingly did. The Soltân, having been apprized of the Khalîf's conduct, advanced with a powerful army to Baghdâd, and besieged that city above fifty days. But, finding, notwithstanding all his efforts, that he could do nothing against it, he resolved to return to Hamadân. He was actually making the necessary dispositions for carrying this design into execution, when Tarentây, the Sâheb of Wâset, arriving with a great number of barks, he resumed the military operations, and pushed on the siege with the utmost vigour. At the same time, the princes who had assembled at Baghdâd falling out amongst themselves, king Dawd returned home, and the rest dispersed. The Khalîf, seeing himself pressed in his capital, began to think in earnest of making his escape. In order to which, he retired out of the city, took the route of Naharwân, which he found open and unobstructed, and arrived at Al Mawfel; or rather, if we chuse to follow Abu'l Faraj, passed the Tigris, directed his course to d Atâbek Zenki's camp, which was on the west side of that river, and was conducted by the Atâbek himself to his metropolis. Hereupon Soltân Mas'ûd entered Baghdâd, fixed his seat there, and assembled the Kâdis, or judges, witnesses, and those learned in the law, before whom he laid the oath made to him by Al Râshed, in his own hand-writing, and drawn up in the following terms: I, in case I shall assemble any forces, march out, or put to the sword any of Soltân Mas'ûd's adherents, depose myself from the empire. Accordingly he was, by their sentence, deposed; and his name suppressed in the pulpits both of Baghdâd and all the provinces dependent on that capital. The Soltân then called another council, who, after declaring Al Râshed unworthy of the Khalîfat, elected Al Moktafi Beamr'illah, the son of Al Mostadher, supreme Imâm and commander of the Moslems. This year, according to e Ebn Shohnab, a body of Atâbek Zenki's troops marched from Hamah and Aleppo, and made an irruption into the territories of the Franks; ravaging all the country through which they moved in a dreadful manner, and carrying off with them an immense quantity of spoil. Al Râshed Bi'llah, the thirtieth Khalîf of the house of Al Abbâs, if we will believe the last mentioned author, reigned only eleven months, and ten days. About this time, died Gregory, the Armenian patriarch, in Egypt, whither he undertook a journey, in order to pay a visit to Babrâm, his brother, the Fâtemite Khalîf's Wazîr; who governed the Egyptians with such prudence and moderation, as gained him an uncommon esteem. In the room of Gregory, one Ananias was pitched upon to preside over the Armenians, in the capacity of patriarch; who was ordained in Egypt, a circumstance that, according to M. f Renaudot, rendered his ordination irregular and invalid, as the Armenian Jacobites were under the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Antioch, and bore no manner of relation to that of Alexandria. We must not forget to remark, that Abu Ali, an excellent geometri- cian, and a person extremely well versed in all kinds of polite literature, a specimen of whose verses has been preserved by Abu'l Faraj, flourished in Egypt through the whole course of the present year <sup>2</sup>.

Al Moktafi
Beamri'llah
succeeds Al
Râshed.

AFTER the juridical assembly of the Kâdis and doctors of the law, convoked by Soltân Mas'ûd for that purpose, had declared Al Râshed unworthy of his sublime station, by reason of his oppressive conduct, and formally deposed him, the Soltân consulted the grandees of Baghdâd about a proper person to preside over the Moslems, in his room. The Wazîr gave a high character of Mohammed Ebn Al Mostadher, on account of his prudence, lenity, continence, and regular performance of all religious duties, upon which, being brought before the Soltân and the Wazîr, they took the oath usual upon such occasions to him. Then Mas'ûd re-assembled the princes, Kâdis, or judges, and doctors of the law, who acknowledged him for Khalîf and Imâm, and inaugurated him, the 12th of Db'ulhajja, in the year of the Hejra 530; when he assumed the title, or surname, of Al Moktafi Beamri'llah, according to Abu'l Faraj. As this Khalîf was intirely Soltân Mas'ûd's creature, he did not exercise the least power or authority during that prince's life; but, after his death, he asserted his independency, and continued the remainder of his days absolute master of the Babylonian Irâk.<sup>b</sup>

The principal
events of the
year 531.

THE next year, being the 531st of the Hejra, commencing Sept. 29th, 1136, Al Hâfedh, the Khalîf of Egypt, removed Babrâm, a person rendered illustrious both by his virtues and the nobility of his extraction, being related to the royal family of Armenia, from the post of Wazîr; and substituted Redwân, Redwân Al Wakhshi, Redwân Ebn Wakhshi, or Redwân Ebn Walahakshi, for in different authors he goes by all these names, in his room. Though no administration was ever better calculated for the welfare and happiness of the people than that of Babrâm, yet some of the most rigid Mohammedans exclaimed bitterly against him, for filling many of the publick offices of the Diwâns, and the principal posts in the state, with Armenian Christians; especially, as this induced no inconsiderable number of Mohammedans, in order to get preferment, to embrace the Christian religion. These discontented Moslems raised a tumult in Al Kâbirah, and advanced at the head of a large body of men, armed with lances, having copies of the Korân affixed to them, to the palace. Babrâm, though with his Armenian cavalry and archers, who were intirely at his devotion, he could easily have dispersed them, ordered as many of his troops as were willing to attend him into the Upper Egypt, whither he was determined to bend his course; as he was not willing to be the cause of such an effusion of blood, as must have been occasioned by a resolution to maintain himself in his office by force. The kingdom of Egypt belonging to the Moslems, he thought it would be iniquitous to carry on a war, in order to plunder and pillage them there. Wherefore he judged it would be more expedient for him to retire into the country of Thebais, Al Sa'id, or the Upper Egypt, to his brother, who presided over the city and district of Kûs. But Redwân, the principal ring-leader of the seditious Moslems, who aspired at the charge of Wazîr, which he soon after obtained by force and violence, had before sent messengers to Kûs, to excite the Mohammedans there to a revolt; whose suggestions had such an effect upon them, that they cut to pieces Yasaf, Babrâm's brother, their governor, and, to treat his body with the greater indignity, buried it in a dunghill. They then shut their gates against Babrâm, who besieged the place for several days; but his troops gradually deserting him, he shut himself up in a monastery, and became a religious there. Abu'lfeda adds, that Redwân, who succeeded him, pursued Babrâm with a considerable body of troops into Al Sa'id, and took him prisoner; but understanding that he had entered upon the monastic state, he presently released him. The amotion of Babrâm from the office of Wazîr has been placed by that writer, as well as Ebn Shohnah, in the present year. The latter of these historians and Al Makrizi relate, that Babrâm treated the Moslems with too much contempt! which brought upon him, notwithstanding the influence he had over the Khalîf, his disgrace. As for Redwân, some of the authors, here referred to, report, that, after his return from Al Sa'id, he entered Mesr with his army, destroyed the best part of that city, gave up the houses of the Christians to be plundered by his troops, and pillaged all the churches both in the suburbs and the town. The Armenian convent, called Zaberi, he burnt; and, to demonstrate the hatred he bore the nation to which it belonged, massacred the patriarch, who had been lately ordained, and all the monks that fell into his hands. The deposed Khalîf, Al Râshed, not thinking himself safe at Al Maw-sel, retired from thence to Hamadân, where he found king Dawd, who had endeavoured to support him, the preceding year. He afterwards went to Esfahân, where he was assassinated by some of his domestics, who came out of the province of Khorasân, or, as Khondemir will have it, by the Bâtanists, at noon, while he took a nap, after his recovery

a from a fit of sickness, towards the end of the month of Ramadân; being then about forty years of age. He was buried at Shabrestân, without the city of Kesfahân, according to Abu'l Faraj. We must beg leave to observe, from Ebn Shobnah, that Al Tûfeik, the Khalîf of Egypt, surnamed Redwân, his new Wazîr, Mâlec Al Afdâl, and dignified him with the title of Mâlec Mîsr, or the king of Egypt, which had never been conferred on any Wazîr before; and that Atâbek Zenki reduced Maarra Al Nomân, Casar-Tûb, and Hems, in the province of Syria, or Al Shâm, in the year that we are now upon <sup>c</sup>.

In the 532d year of the Hejra, which began Sept. 19th, 1137, the Atâbek Zenki came to Hamah, and sent from thence to Shâhâbo'ddîn, the Sâheb of Damascus, desiring he might marry his mother Zomorrod Khatûn, daughter of Al Jâwali; the same lady who built the college out of Damascus, near the river Baradâ. By this means, says Abu'l Faraj, Hems and its castle fell into his hands; but, if Ebn Shobnah may be depended upon, he made himself master of them, the preceding year. His motive to the marriage was, that, as the affairs of Damascus seemed to be under her direction, he was in hopes thereby to gain that city, with the country appertaining to it; but, when he found himself disappointed in his expectations, he immediately departed from her. Either this or the preceding year, Soltân Mas'ûd having been informed, before his return to Baghdâd, that the governor of Fârs made some difficulty to recognize the authority of the Khalîf Al Moktafi, he sent his brother Sel-jûk Shâh, with the Atâbek Kerafankar, to bring him to a sense of his duty. But the Atâbek had no sooner made one day's march, than he gave the Soltân to understand, that he would proceed no farther, unless he sent him Pîr Mohammed Khâzen, his prime Wazîr, whose death he sought. This Wazîr managed state affairs extremely well; but was accused of being too firm and haughty in his carriage, which rendered him very disagreeable to the lords of the court. Mas'ûd would not consent at first to so unreasonable a demand; but, as Kerafankar had all his forces at his devotion, he was obliged at last to send him the Wazîr's head. The Atâbek, satisfied with this compliance of the Soltân, resumed his march, but did not long enjoy the fruit of his revenge; for he died a few days after he had got rid of his enemy. Hereupon the Soltân gave his command to Ildighîz, who held the first rank in the dynasty of the Atâbeks of Adherbijân, with the almost absolute government of that province and Curdîstân. He likewise bestowed upon him in marriage his sister-in-law, who had been promised formerly to Soltân Togrol, his brother and predecessor. By this princess Ildighîz had afterwards two sons, Mohammed and Kezel, or Kozul, Arslân; both of whom succeeded him in the dignity of Atâbk, and presided over the province of Adherbijân, with an almost unlimited power. Soon after Ildighîz's elevation, Al Abbâs, the governor of Al Ray, with some other conspirators, rose, in favour of Solimân Shâh, brother of Mas'ûd, and set him on the throne. But this plot was soon quashed, and Mas'ûd remained in peaceable possession of the Soltânat to the day of his death. About this time, Redwân, the Khalîf of Egypt's Wazîr, excluded the Christians from all the offices of the Diwâns, and other eminent posts in the state. He commanded them all to wear girdles, that by this means they might be distinguished from the Moslems; forbade them the use of horses, as some of the Khalîfs had formerly done; and doubled their tribute, as well as that of the Jews. The tributaries he divided into four classes; those in the best circumstances paying annually four dinârs a head, and those in the meanest one dinâr. We must not forget to observe, that Mâlec Hosâmo'ddîn Tarmartâsh, Ilgâzi's son, the Sâheb of Mâredîn, took the castle of Al Hetâkb, from the last of the princes of the house of Merwân, settled in Mesopotamia, the present year <sup>d</sup>.

The following year, being the 533d of the Hejra, which commenced Sept. 8th, 1138, Shâhâbo'ddîn, the Sâheb of Damascus, was assassinated upon his couch, by three of his domestics; one of whom escaped, but the other two were taken, and put to death. Jamâ-lo'ddîn Mohammed Ebn Tawzi, his brother, the Sâheb of Baalbec, upon receiving advice of what had happened, repaired immediately to Damascus, in the month of Shawâl, and took upon him the government of that city. Atâbek Zenki, being informed of Jamâlo'ddîn's departure from Baalbec, marched with an army against that place, battered its walls with stones, discharged out of fourteen military engines he brought with him for that purpose, and, in the month of Dhu'lkaada, obliged it to surrender, by capitulation, to him. However, he was no sooner possessed of the town, than he broke the capitulation, and put great numbers of the inhabitants to death. Many violent shocks of earthquakes were felt in and in 534.

THE next year, being the 534th of the Hejra, beginning Aug. 28th, 1139, Jamâlo'ddîn Mohammed Ebn Tawzi Ebn Tagantakîn, the Sâheb of Damascus, departed this life; and was succeeded by Mojiro'ddîn Abu Mohammed Ebn Tawzi Ebn Tagantakîn, his brother, called corruptly, as we apprehend, Mojiro'ddîn Atek Ebn Mohammed Ebn Buri, or Bûzi, Ebn Tagantakîn in Dr. Pocock's MS. of Abu'l Faraj. About the same time, Atâbek Zenki laid siege to Damascus; but without effect. However, he afterwards took Shabrazûr, or Shabrezûr, a town placed by Abu'lfeda in the Belâd Al Jebâl, and by Sharif Al Edrisi in Adberbijân, communicating its name to the circumjacent tract, with its territory, from Kafjak Ebn Alb, or Alp, Arslân Shâh, the Sâheb of it, before the close of the campaign<sup>f</sup>.

Ebn Khâkân dies.

THE principal event of the 535th year of the Hejra, commencing Aug. 17th, 1140, handed down to us by the Moslem writers, is the death of Abu'l Fatab Ebn Mohammed Ebn Abdallah Ebn Khâkân; who was killed in the ditch, or trenches, of Mârâkesh, or Morocco, according to Ebn Shohnab, in some part of it. He was a person of great abilities, and wrote many books. In one of these, intituled, the golden collar, he mentions a vast number of philosophers, poets, and learned men; who, by their valuable works, had rendered themselves famous over the whole Moslem world<sup>g</sup>.

Redwân, the Khalif of Egypt's Wazîr, is deposed.

IN the 536th year of the Hejra, which began Aug. 7th, 1141, Redwân, the Khalif of Egypt's Wazîr, who had suffered the Mohammedans to demolish the church of the Christians called Moniat Rafti, which Michael, the bishop of Sabariet, had caused with great expence to be repaired, was driven, by a seditious party formed against him, out of Egypt, and obliged to fly into Syria. Having assembled a body of troops, composed of Arabs, and others, he returned into Egypt; and in the first battle defeated his enemies, but was overthrown by them in the second. After which, Al Hâfedh, the Fâtemite Khalif, for his farther security, took him into the palace; but deprived him of his office, and would not permit him to exercise the least authority there. We are told, by an author of some credit, that, after the deposition of Redwân, the Khalif sent to Babram, his former minister, and desired him to accept of the post of Wazîr; but that he begged to be excused from concerning himself in public affairs, as he had entered upon the monastic state, and ought to be considered not in the light of a soldier or statesmen, but that of a religious or monk. However, continues this writer, he was prevailed upon to come to the palace, where he spent the remainder of his days; and, after his death, was carried to the church of the Armenians called Zaheriat, in great pomp, and there interred. As Egypt and its dependencies at this time formed so considerable a part of the Moslem world, we cannot intirely pass the affairs of that country over in silence here; though we forbear expatiating upon them, till we arrive at the supplement to this work, to which a particular account of them will more properly belong<sup>h</sup>.

Mohammed Ebn Dânishmand, the Sâheb of Malâtia, dies.

THE following year, being the 537th of the Hejra, which commenced July 27th, 1142, Mohammed Ebn Dânishmand, the Sâheb of Malâtia, or Malatiya, and Al Thogur, departed this life; upon which, Al Mâlec Mas'ûd, the Sâheb of Koniya, or Iconium, and Aksara, of the house of Seljuk, the son of Kelj, or Kilij, Arslân, of whom we have already given our readers some account, took possession of his territories, according to Abu'l Faraj. The same year, as it seems to appear from Khondemir, Atsiz was endeavouring, with more ardour than ever, to render himself independent on Soltân Sanjar in Khowârazm<sup>i</sup>.

The most material occurrences of the year 538.

THE next year, being the 538th of the Hejra, beginning July 26th, 1143, Atâbek Zenki concluded a treaty of peace with Soltân Mas'ûd. He also made himself master of all the fortresses in Diyâr Becr, that had been taken by the Franks. The same year, Atsiz encroaching more and more upon Soltân Sanjar's authority, he found himself obliged to take the

(T) The Arabic manuscript of Ebn Shohnab, now in the possession of the reverend and very learned Dr. Hunt, professor of Hebrew and Arabic in the university of Oxford, canon of Christ Church, and fellow of the royal society, a gentleman of most profound erudition, to whom we think ourselves extremely obliged for several valuable extracts he has been pleased to communicate to us out of it, exhibits Halet, in the passage referred to here. But, as we meet with no town in Syria of that name; and as the letters of which that word consists, only by an application of different diacritical points to the last of them, likewise form the word, Halab, the Arabic name of Aleppo; we make not the least doubt, but that city must be the place intended here (1).

a field against him; and, having reduced several passes and strong places in the way, came and besieged him in his capital city. Atsiz, finding himself reduced to the last extremity, sent very rich presents to Sanjar, intreating pardon, which was granted by the generous Soltân; who, on his taking a new oath of fidelity to him, left him in possession of his government. But all this clemency had no effect on the ambitious mind of Atsiz. Sanjar receiving advice, from several parts, that he was raising forces, and paid no regard to his orders, sent Adib Sâber, one of his great lords, to inform himself of the conduct of Atsiz; who, on his arrival in Khawârazm, set guards over him, and sent assassins to Merû to kill the Soltân. But Adib, coming to the knowledge thereof, gave notice to Sanjar; so that the ruffians were discovered, and put to death. Atsiz hereupon had that lord, from whom b he concluded the intelligence came, thrown headlong from the top of his castle into the Jikûn, or Amû. This Adib was surnamed Al Termedi, from Termed, a city on the Jikûn, to the north of Balkh, where he was born. This year, Dawd, the son of Soltân Mahmûd Ebn Mohammed Ebn Mâlec Shâh, was murdered by a gang of assassins, whose names and places of abode, according to Ebn Shohnah, were unknown. It must be remembered here, that the famous Abu'l Kasem Mahmûd Ebn Amer Al Zamakhshari (U), born at Zamakhshar, a city of Khawârazm, in the month of Rajeb, 467, whose works are held in such high esteem amongst the Moslems, and particularly the Keshâf, which is looked upon by them as the best commentary upon the Korân, died, the present year<sup>k</sup>.

THE 539th year of the Hejra, commencing July 4th, 1144, did not prove very favourable and of the c to the Franks. The Atâbek Amâdo'ddîn Zenki took from them the cities of Al Robâ; or year 539. Edeffa, and Sarûj, together with all the other places they occupied to the east of the Euphrates. He also formed the siege of Al Bîra, a strong castle of Mesopotamia upon the Euphrates; but when he was upon the point of making himself master of it, an express arriving, with an account, that Nasîro'ddîn, his deputy in Al Mawfel was slain, he broke up his camp, and departed. However, the Franks, fearing his return, sent to Nojmo'ddîn, successor to Hosâmo'ddîn Tamartâsh Ebn Ilgâzi mentioned above; the lord of Maredîn, and delivered it up to him. Nay, so intimidated were they, if we will believe Ebn Shohnah, at Zenki's success, that they fled by night into their own territories, with the utmost precipitation. About this time, the Najâshi, or king of Ethiopia, endeavoured to force Michael, d before his ordination named Habib, the metropolitan there, to ordain in that country more bishops than seven, which had heretofore been always looked upon as the prescribed number. His view herein was to have a metropolitan, whenever the see should become vacant, ordained by his own bishops, for which ten were sufficient, and so to withdraw his subjection to the Jacobite patriarchal see of Alexandria. Michael, perceiving the Najâshi's motive to this attempt, declared, that he could not do what was required of him, without the consent of the Jacobite Alexandrian patriarch. The Najâshi, therefore, wrote to Gabriel, the patriarch, desiring he would refuse him a favour which would prove so advantageous to his subjects. He likewise at the same time sent an ambassador to Al Hâfedh, the Fatemite Khalîf, begging he would interpose his authority in this affair, and oblige the patriarch to e comply with his request. Hereupon the Khalîf commanded Gabriel to gratify the importunity of the Najâshi, and dispatch his orders accordingly to the metropolitan of Ethiopia. But Gabriel excused himself, and demonstrated to the Khalîf, that the Ethiopian monarch

(U) The titles of this celebrated doctor were Al Imâm, Al Ostad, Al Alamah, Al Imâm Al Aimah, Sheikh Al Arab w' Al Ajem, Fakhr Khawârazm; the Imâm, the master, the great and illustrious doctor, the Sheikh of the Arabs and all other nations (not Persians, as M. D'Herbelot has inconsistently with himself asserted), the glory of Khawârazm. The most noted of his works, besides the Keshâf, are the Rabî Al Abrâr, or the spring of the just, at the head of which all the above-mentioned titles stand; Al Faik, a treatise of traditions; Al Mofassal, a book of distinctions; Al Annudaj and Mokhtalef Al Asma, two grammatical performances; and Raidh fil Furâidh, a book of successions. The Rabî Al Abrâr is a choice and ample collection of sentences, composed by its author in order to recreate the minds of those who should be fatigued with a long and attentive reading of his Keshâf, or commentary upon the Korân. Abu Haïan mentions all the aforesaid pieces in the preface of his book, intitled, Bahr Al Mobith. There is a copy of the Annudaj,

daj, commented upon by Al Ardebili, in the French king's library, num. 1089. Al Zamakhshari was likewise dignified with the title, or honourable appellation, of the neighbour of God, on account of the long abode he made at Mecca, where he composed his Keshâf, or commentary upon the Korân. Other pieces have also been ascribed to him by Abu Haïan, as Al Coshtas, or the balance, in which many difficulties that occur in the Mohammedan law are weighed and examined; Al Motasafi Amthal Al Arab, or a book of Arab proverbs; Al Shukaik Al Neman; Al Manhaj; and a commentary upon the Abiyat of Sibûiyah. The city, or town, of Zamakhshar, where he was born, is situated upon the Jikûn, or Amû, in long. 84°. 30'. and lat. 41°. 45'. N. to the east of the Caspian sea. When Al Zamakhshari left Mecca, he returned into his own country, and died at Corcânj, or Jorjâniab, then the capital of Khawârazm (2).

wanted to have the number of his bishops augmented, with no other view than to render a himself thereby independent on the patriarch of Alexandria; which could he once effect, he would soon, as Gabriel told Al Háfedh, attack his Moslem neighbours. The patriarch, having satisfied the Khalíf, wrote afterwards to the Najáfí, and begged he would not persist in his design. Whilst these things were in agitation, continues the writer before us, a great part of the Najáfí's palace was burnt by lightening; and a famine, drought, and pestilence raged at the same time in all the provinces of Ethiopia. These public calamities being ascribed to the Najáfí's intention of withdrawing his obedience to the patriarch of Alexandria, that prince was prevailed upon to ask by letter Gabriel's pardon and benediction; which having obtained, if any credit be due to this author, they immediately ceased<sup>1</sup>.

Atábek Zenki In the 540th year of the Hejra, which began June 24th, 1145, the 5th of the latter Rabí, b is assassinated, the Atábek 'Amádo'ddín Zenki Ebn Aksankar, the Sáheb of Al Mawfel and Al Shâm, or Syria, by his slaves; was assassinated asleep, whilst he was carrying on the siege of the castle of Ja'bar, by some of his slaves. William of Tyre relates, that he was drunk, when this accident happened. The assassins, after the perpetration of the horrid fact, fled to the castle. The besieged, rejoicing on this occasion, called out to the army; letting them know, that their general was slain. Upon which, entering his tent, they found him breathing his last, and soon after he expired. Atábek Zenki was more than sixty years old, at the time of his death. He was a prince of a fine person, though he began to grow grey, and of a swarthy complexion. With regard to his disposition, he behaved with great gravity both towards his army and his subjects, who vastly revered him, and was perfectly skilled in the art of c governing. The city of Al Mawfel, before he took it, was, for the most part, destroyed; the buildings between the old temple, the market-house, and the Sáheb's, or Emír's, palace, which all appeared to a person standing in the drummers street, having been intirely demolished. The adjacent territory also, which in Abu'l Faraj's time abounded with fruits and odoriferous plants, was the most barren in the world. Ebn Shohnab relates, that Atábek 'Amádo'ddín Zenki Ebn Aksankar was not only possessed of Al Mawfel, and the district appertaining to it, but likewise of every part of Syria, except the country belonging to Damascus, and its capital. It has been before observed, that he was called Sanguin, which is an apparent corruption of Zenki, by the western historians<sup>m</sup>.

and succeeded NURO'DDIN MAHMUD EBN ZENKI, who was in the camp, when his father was slain, d by Nuro'ddín drawing the ring off his finger, went strait to Haleb, or Aleppo, and took possession of that Mahmúd, his city. Soon after this, Saifo'ddín Gâzi, Nuro'ddín's brother, hastened from Shabrazúr, which son. had been before assigned him as his share of Atábek Zenki's dominions, to Al Mawfel; whither he had been invited by Zino'ddín Ali Gújec, his father's deputy there. Upon his arrival, he was saluted Sáheb of the place, and presided over the people of it about four years. In the mean time, Nuro'ddín, who had fixed his residence at Aleppo, having received advice, that the Franks, who had been lately reinforced by a large body of fresh troops from Al Almân, or Germany, and Constantinople, were pushing on the siege of Damascus, he moved at the head of his forces to the assistance of Mojíro'ddín Abu Mohammed Ebn Tawzi, or, according to Abu'l Faraj, Búzi, the Sáheb, or rather Atábek, of that city. The Franks e having been informed, that the succours, under the command of Nuro'ddín Mahmúd Ebn Zenki, were advanced to Hems; they did not think fit to wait their approach: but immediately decamped, and retired into their own territories. That they suffered considerably in this attempt, there is great reason to believe; though Ebn Shohnab, who has mentioned their retreat, has handed down to us no particular account of the loss they sustained<sup>n</sup>.

What happened in the year 541, THE following year, being the 541st of the Hejra, which commenced June 13th, 1146, Gabriel Ebn Tarik, the Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria, departed this life, after he had sat fourteen years, and six months, in that see. Something above four months after his death, one Mikháyyel Ebn Dakalti was substituted in his room. We are assured, that Gabriel, one night, the preceding year, when he was extremely ill, saw in a dream several priests and monks, with the gospels, crosses, and censers, in their hands; who told him, that they were then come to visit him, but that the next year they should return, and carry him away with them. About this time, Atsíz, who had rebelled against Soltân Sanjar, in Khowârazm, and assumed the title of Khowârazm Shâh, seems to have provoked the Seljúkian monarch, by some particular points of conduct, which must have been very disagreeable to him; as he undertook an expedition against that rebel, the subsequent year<sup>o</sup>.

and 542. THE next year, being the 542d of the Hejra, beginning June 2d, 1147, Mikháyyel Ebn Dakalti, the Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria, was poisoned by some monks of the convent of Ebn Haidara; who bore him a grudge, because he introduced, not only by reproofs,

- a but likewise by stripes, a very strict and severe discipline amongst them. The Jacobite Christians of Egypt, or the Copts, exercised their religion, without the least molestation, either from Al Hâfedh, the Fâtemite Khalîf, or his Wazîrs, during the short interval he sat in the patriarchal see. The same year, Soltân Sanjar undertook once more to punish the treason of Atsiz. In order to which, he marched with a powerful army to the castle of Hezar Asb, where Atsiz had posted himself with a body of troops; it being the strongest place, according to Khondemir, in the country of Khowârazm. The name of this castle in the Persian tongue signifies a thousand horse. This gave occasion to the poet Anvari, then in Sanjar's camp, to write a Persian quatrain upon the siege; which being fastened to the end of an arrow, was shot into the fortress, and answered by Rashîdi, a poet no less eminent than
- b Anvari, at Atsiz's command, who reflected upon Soltân Sanjar in the most bitter terms. That answer was sent by the same canal into the besiegers camp. In the mean time, Soltân Sanjar gave several assaults to the place, and at last took it by storm. However, Atsiz, after he had acquired the glory of making a vigorous defence, found means to escape to his capital. This city, which as well as the province, bears the name of Khowârazm, was not in a condition to sustain a long siege; insomuch that Sanjar, who pursued him thither, would have possessed himself of it with much more facility than he did the castle of Hezar Asb. But, either by reason of his being tired with the fatigues of the campaign, or through his aversion, on all occasions, to the effusion of blood, he listened to Atsiz's proposals of peace; and at last, by the intervention of a Derwîsh, or religious man, named Abûpûsh, employed by Atsiz
- c in the negotiation, pardoned him, on condition only that he should repair to the bank of the Jihûn opposite to the Soltân's camp, and there, prostrating himself, kiss the earth. But the performance of this easy condition, which was so shining an instance of the Soltân's moderation, notwithstanding the need he stood in of a pardon, Atsiz endeavoured as much as possible to evade. He came, indeed, to the place appointed; but, without alighting off his horse, only stooped forward, and bowed his head, to salute the Soltân. Sanjar, unmoved by this arrogance, granted him the pardon he had promised. After this, all hostilities ceased between them, during the remainder of the days of Atsiz; who died, in the year of the Hejra 551. It ought to be remembered here, that the ceremony of kissing the earth, which the Persians call Rowi Zemin, that is, the visage towards the earth, was that made use of by
- d subjects, when they did homage to their princes, and prevails in Persia at this very day<sup>p</sup>.

THE 543d year of the Hejra, commencing May 22d, 1148, did not produce many remarkable events in the Moslem world. However, Modhaffero'ddîn Moshakar Ebn Marwâd The chief transactions of of the year. 543,

- e Al Salgari, who is placed at the head of the first branch of the dynasty of the Atâbeks of Fârs, began to reign in some part of it. These princes fixed their residence at Skiraz, in that province. They were originally Turkmâns, and of the family of Salgâr. Invading Fârs, or Persia properly so called, they assumed the title of kings. As they were descended from Salgar, the Turkmân, they are frequently called Salgarians by the eastern writers. Their dynasty continued in Fârs, according to one of the oriental historians, about an hundred and twenty years. Redwân, who had formerly been the Khalîf of Egypt's Wazîr, made his
- f escape out of the imperial palace, where Al Hâfedh had for some time detained him in a friendly state of confinement, by getting through a hole he made in the wall. Upon his arrival at Mesr, he was joined by the Blacks, and others of his old adherents, who raised a tumult there in his favour; which enabled him, without much difficulty, to seize upon the city. However, though Al Hâfedh, the Fâtemite Khalîf, did not oppose him, but kept himself shut up in his palace, Redwân, in the sedition, was cut to pieces by some of the Blacks themselves. After his death, according to the author followed by M. Renaudot, Al Hâfedh governed his people, without the assistance of a Wazîr. This year, Yahya Ebn Abu'l Fatab, or John, the son of Abu'l Fatab, if Al Makrîzi may be depended upon, was confirmed by Al Hâfedh in the patriarchal see of Alexandria; in which he had been placed
- g unanimously by the Copts, or Egyptian Jacobite Christians, over whom he presided, about four months, or, as others say, above a year, after his predecessor's death. We must beg leave here to remark, that Al Hâfedh, at this time, restored the Christians to their offices in the Diwâns, of which they had been deprived by Redwân, as has been already observed. The principal of these was Ebn Yûnes, whose advancement, or rather restoration, drew after it that of the rest. Nevertheless Al Hâfedh, excited thereto by the calumnies of certain Samaritans, soon after put both him and his brother to death; which fate those false accusers themselves met with, in less than the compass of a year, in the very same place<sup>q</sup>.

- In the 544th year of the Hejra, which began May 11th, 1149, Saïfo'ddîn Gâzi, the son of Atâbek Zenki, and Sâheb of Al Mawfel, died in that city. He enjoyed the sovereignty of Al Mawfel, with its territory, and Al Jazîra, about four years. When he found himself in danger, he sent for Awkado'zamân Abul Baracât, a celebrated physician, then at Baghdâd; who prescribed for him, after his arrival at Al Mawfel, but without effect. He departed this life, the last day of the latter Jomâda, and was succeeded by his brother Kotbo'ddîn Mawdûd. Saifo'ddîn has conferred upon him by Ebn Shohnah the character of a generous and magnanimous prince. Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki, his elder brother, who presided over the people of Haleb, or Aleppo, and Hamah, in Syria, marching into Al Jazîra, took Senjâr, without any opposition; his brother Kotbo'ddîn, to whom that place belonged, being not much in a condition to make head against him. But peace being afterwards concluded between them, Nûro'ddîn resigned Senjâr, and received in lieu of it Hems and Rababa, upon the Euphrates, in Syria. He then besieged Hûrem, invaded the territories of the Franks, in the neighbourhood of Antioch, and defeated them, after a bloody battle; in which Raymond, the prince of Antioch, was slain. His son Baymond, or Boamund, being called to the succession, his mother, as he was an infant, and incapable of holding the reins of government, ruled the kingdom during his minority. The same year likewise died Al Hâfedh Ledini'llah, the Khalîf of Egypt, after he had reigned, according to Ebn Shohnah, twenty years, and five months. He was about seventy-seven years old, at the time of his death; after which, Abu Mansûr Ismael, his son, was saluted Khalîf. Abu Mansûr had no sooner ascended the Fâtemite throne, than he assumed the title of Al Dhâfer Beamri'llah, and advanced Nojmo'ddîn Ebn Mesâl, one of his father's greatest favourites, to the sublime post of Wazîr. But Ali Ebn Selâr, one of the grandees of the court, who was viceroy, or Emîr, under the Khalîf, of Alexandria, and the district appertaining to it, having drawn together a body of troops out of the western provinces, which was reinforced by the neighbouring garrisons; he formed a powerful army, with which he advanced directly to Al Kâbirah. Having entered that city, he expelled from thence Nojmo'ddîn Ebn Mesâl, and obliged the new Khalîf, then only about seventeen years of age, to confirm him in the Wazîrat; which, after the expulsion of his predecessor, he had seized. In the mean time, Nojmo'ddîn, having armed the Blacks, was determined to attempt driving Ali Ebn Selâr from the Khalîf's councils; but being soon after killed in battle, his head was cut off, and carried through all the streets of Al Kâbirah upon the point of a spear. We must not forget to remark, that Abmed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Al Hosein, commonly called Nasero'ddîn Al Arjâni, the Kâdi of Tustar, and Iyâd Al Sobti, a celebrated Kâdi of Marâkesb, or Morocco, departed this life, the present year. The former of these learned men, who was denominated Al Arjâni, from Arjân in Khûzestân, wrote several poetical pieces, a specimen of which Ebn Shohnah has preserved, held in good esteem. The latter of them was the author of Al Acmâl fi Sharab Moslem, a perfect piece, explaining the principles of Islâm, or Mohammedism; Moshârek Al Anwâr fi Garîb Al Hadîth, an illustration of strange histories; Al Shifâ, a treatise of medicine; besides other performances, which we cannot here touch upon. He was born at Marâkesb, or Morocco, in the 470th year of the Moslem æra; and consequently was about seventy-four lunar years old, at the time of his decease<sup>r</sup>.

Little material happened in 545.

THE following year, being the 545th of the Hejra, which commenced April 30th, 1150, nothing very remarkable seems to have happened in any part of the Khalîfat, either of Baghdâd or Egypt. Ali Ebn Selâr, however, had not long taken upon him the office of Wazîr to Al Dhâfer Beamri'llah, the Fâtemite Khalîf, before he, by the advice of several of the Mohammedan doctors, abolished all those infamous marks of distinction, which had been imposed upon the Christians by some of his predecessors; hoping, by this means, to draw a considerable sum of money from them. But, finding, in three days time, that they neither opened their purses then, nor gave any reason to believe that they ever afterwards would, he revived the old edicts that had been issued against them. This Wazîr, surnamed Al Adel, or the just, was afterwards deposed and murdered, by Nasr Ebn Al Abbâs; whose father Al Abbâs presided over the city of Belbeis, and all the neighbouring tract. Al Abbâs, after Ali Ebn Selâr's death, moved at the head of all his forces to Al Kâbirah, and, by the indefatigable endeavours of his son Nasr, occupied the post of Wazîr; no one, at that time, being powerful enough to oppose him. The Egyptian author, followed by M. Renaudot, clearly intimates, that some, if not all, of these events happened in the year that we are now upon<sup>s</sup>.

The principal events of the year 546.

THE next year, being the 546th of the Hejra, beginning Apr. 20th, 1151, Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki made an irruption into the territories of Jûslîn, or Joscelin, the earl of Edeffa, which lay to the north of Aleppo; and, being met by that wise and valiant knight, was, after a fierce battle, intirely defeated. A great number of Moslems perished in the action, and many of them were taken prisoners. Amongst the latter was Nûro'ddîn's armour-bearer, whom Jûslîn sent with Nûro'ddîn's arms to Al Mâlec Mas'ûd Ebn Kelij Arslân, g

- a the Sáheb of Koniya and Akfárâ; saying, This is your son-in-law's armour-bearer; after him, something more will come to you. Nûro'ddîn, greatly incensed at this conduct of Jûsûn, resolved to be revenged on him. Accordingly, sending for some of the chiefs of the Turkmâns, he, by large gifts, engaged them to seize Jûsûn, knowing he was not able to cope with him in battle. The Turkmâns, therefore, keeping a watchful eye upon him, surprized him one day as he was hunting, and brought him bound to Nûro'ddîn; who, according to William of Tyre, confined him in the castle of Aleppo, where he afterwards died. Nûro'ddîn here-upon immediately took the castles of 'Ain Tâb, 'Azâz, Kûres, Al Râwandân, Borj Al Refâs, or the tower of lead, Dolûc, Mera'sh, Nabr Al Jawr, Tel Bâshar, or Tel Bâsher, Tel Khâled, Hodbr Al Bârab, Casar Sûd, Casar Lâtha, and several other places of considerable note. It
- b may not be improper to observe, that count Jûsûn transferred his seat from Al Rohû, or Edeffa, to Tel Bâsher, a castle, or fortress, of great strength, seated in a very fertile tract, about two days journey distant from Aleppo, and adorned with gardens and fountains, in a most beautiful manner; for which reason, we find him styled the Sáheb of Tel Bâsher by Abu'l Faraj<sup>1</sup>.

THE 547th of the Hejra, commencing April 8th, 1152, was distinguished by several very and of the remarkable events. Soltân Mas'ûd Ebn Mohammed Ebn Mâlec Shâh died, before the close of it, year 547. at Hamadân. He appointed Mâlec Shâh, his brother Mahmûd's son, to succeed him; whose name Al Emîr Khasbec took care to have mentioned in the mosques; and for some time had the sole management and direction of all public affairs. But aspiring at the Soltânat himself, he afterwards seized upon Mâlec Shâh's person, and sent for Al Mâlec Mohammed, his brother, then in Khûzestân, intending to treat him in the same manner. Upon that prince's arrival, Khasbec placed him upon the throne, and gave him the title of Soltân. But notwithstanding this, Mohammed, having been informed of his traiterous designs, killed him, and Zenki, his armour-bearer, two days after, with his own hands; and exposed both their heads in the public streets, till they were devoured by dogs. Mohammed, having thus dispatched Khasbec, was saluted Soltân, and took upon himself the government, without opposition. Mas'ûd, who was about forty-five years old, at the time of his death, reigned eighteen years, and six months. He was a great lover of pious and learned men, humble and affable; but for religion, clemency, justice, and bravery, superior to all the Seljukian

d princes. He often defeated armies at the first onset, and killed lions with one stroke. He frequently, when a boy, was in battles, and fought himself. He always proved victorious in the wars with his brothers. The people lived in ease and plenty through the whole course of his reign. He disregarded treasures, distributing them amongst his courtiers; which was the reason that he almost perpetually wanted money, and left none in the treasury behind him. This prince was the last of the Seljukian Soltâns, that had any power in the Arabian Irâk; for, upon his demise, Al Moktafi, the thirty-first Khalîf of the house of Al Abbâs, deprived the Seljukians of all authority in the city of Baghdâd. For this reason, Ebn Shohnab places the expiration of this dynasty in 547; and adds, that Mas'ûd's son, who survived him, had neither dominions nor a name. Mâlec Shâh II. surnamed Mogayabo'ddîn, e and, by the author of the Lebtârîkb, Mogayabo'ddîn Abu'l Fatab, who succeeded Mas'ûd, was, according to Khondemir, the son of Mohammed, son of Mâlec Shâh I. But the author of the Lebtârîkb and Abu'l Faraj affirm, that he was the son of Mahmûd, son of Mohammed, and consequently great grandson of the first Mâlec Shâh. Be that as it will, his reign was of no long continuance, as we find intimated by Al Emîr Yakya Ebn Abd'ollatîf Al Kazwîni and Khondemir, as well as Abu'l Faraj; though the two former differ widely from the latter in the particulars they have handed down to us, relating to this prince. The short account of him preserved by Abu'l Faraj, inserted here, accuses Al Emîr Khasbec of an intention to depose Mohammed, after he had dethroned his brother Mâlec Shâh II. in order to seize upon the Soltânat himself. But from the other historians, especially Khondemir, we learn, that

1 Mâlec Shâh II. having rendered himself, by his attachment to pleasures, and indulgence of his appetite, unworthy of the crown, grew jealous of the authority of Khasbec, surnamed Belingberi, who had been in great esteem with Mas'ûd, and passed for one of the most valiant men of his time. Under the influence of this malevolent passion, continues Khondemir, he proposed to arrest Khasbec. But the whole court thinking such a proceeding unjust, Al Hasan Kandar, one of Khasbec's best friends, resolved to prevent the blow; and, under the pretence of giving the Soltân a grand entertainment, kept him three days in a continual debauch, in the midst of which he secured his person, and shut him up in the castle of Hamadân. They sent then for his brother Mohammed, out of Khûzestân, and substituted him in his room. Some time after, Mâlec Shâh, finding means to escape out of prison, fled to the province from whence his brother had been called to the throne; where he a remained till the death of Mohammed, either in the year 554, or 555: when, hastening to Esfabân, he was re-acknowledged for Soltân by his former subjects. The duration of Mâlec Shâh II.'s first short reign has not been determined, either by Khondemir or Abu'l Faraj; but, if the author of the Lebtârikh in this point merits any regard, it expired four months after Mas'ûd's death. About the same time, Hosâmo'ddîn Tamartâsh, the son of Ilgâzi, or Aylgâzi, Ebn Artak, the Sâheb of Mâredîn and Mayyâfârakîn, likewise departed this life, according to both Ebn Shohnab and Abu'l Faraj. He presided over those cities, and their districts, above thirty years; and was succeeded by Nojmo'ddîn Alebbi, his son. This year also proved fatal to the race of the Gazni Soltâns, descended from Sabektekîn. The last of these princes was Khosru Shâh, or, as he is called in Dr. Hunt's MS. of Ebn Shohnab, Hasrû Shâh, the b son of Babrâm, or Babarâm, Shâh; who was stript of his territories by Alao'ddîn Al Hosein Ebn Al Hosein Al Gauri, and taken prisoner, with his son, by Gayatho'ddîn Mohammed, Al Hosein's nephew. This Alao'ddîn Al Hosein, denominated by some Alao'ddîn Al Hasan, founded the dynasty of Gaur, or the Gaurids, upon the ruins of that of Gazni, and assumed the title of Al Soltân Moazem, the great Soltân, if Ebn Shohnab may be depended upon. We are likewise informed by this writer, that the monarchs of the family of Gazni, of whom he gives an exceeding good character, governed their large and extensive empire, and particularly the proper territory of Gazna, with the adjacent part of Al Ajem, or Persia, two hundred and thirteen years. He farther relates, that Alao'ddîn, the first Soltân of the Gaurids, or Gaurides, left Gayatho'ddîn Mohammed, one of his nephews, to take upon him c the government of Gazna, and Shahâbo'ddîn, the other, that of Syria; as also that the Soltâns of this race conquered a very considerable part of India, Hind, or Hindostân, which had not been subdued by any of the descendants of Sabektekîn, and arrived at such a height of power as none of the Mohammedan monarchs had ever done before. We must not forget to remark, that the kingdom of the Hammadites in the African province of Bejayah, or Bujiab, according to Ebn Al Athîr, in his Al Câmel, was abolished by Abd'almûmen Al Garb, or Al Gareb, that is, the western, surnamed Al Mobdi, or the director, who marched with a powerful army from Morocco to Bujiab, and drove from thence Yahya Ebn Al Azîz Bî'llah Ebn Al Mansûr, of the house of Yusef Belkîn Ebn Zeir Al Sanbâji, the last of the Hammadite princes, the present year d.

The most remarkable occurrences of the year 548,

In the 548th year of the Hejra, which began March 29th, 1153, Soltân Sanjar was led, against his inclination, unfortunately enough, to chastise the Turkmâns, who refused to pay the usual tribute of sheep. For his whole army was defeated, and himself taken prisoner, by that rabble, to the great dishonour of the house of Seljûk; which was so much revered by all the Turkish tribes. According to the author of the Lebtârikh, the Gaz, or Turkmâns, crossing the Jibûn, towards the end of Sanjar's reign, suffered great misery; notwithstanding which, the Soltân resolved to attack them. The Gaz begged peace in the most suppliant manner; each family offering a piece of silver, with which the Soltân was content. But the grandees obstructing the treaty, an action, as related by Khondemir, immediately ensued. The Gaz, or Turkmâns, not knowing what to do with the person of so grand a e prince, placed him in the day-time on a throne, and shut him up at night in an iron cage: In which state of confinement, says the same writer, he remained till the year 551. Ebn Shohnab, however, has transmitted down to us a different account of this matter. He reports, that Soltân Sanjar entered this year into a war with the Atrâk, or Turks, in which his arms were at first attended with success; but that he was afterwards routed by them, forced to abandon his kingdom, and became a religious, or monk. He adds, that the Gaz, or Atrâk, made themselves masters of Khorasân, and other adjacent territories, demolished all the mosques they met with, and put many Kâdis, Imâms, &c. eminent for their learning and sanctity, to the sword. The Moslems hereupon applied for assistance to Al 'Adel, one of Sanjar's slaves; who marched with a body of troops he had assembled against these barbarians, and obliged them to quit the provinces they had seized. Al 'Adel, continues he, f being soon after joined by Abâkaj another of Sanjar's slaves, they grew formidable to all the neighbouring princes. The same year, the Franks reduced the city of Askalân, or Askelon, and expelled the Egyptian forces from thence, as we learn from Abu'l Faraj. Abu'l Fatah Mohammed Ebn Abd'alcarîm Ebn Ahmed Al Shabraštâni, one of the most celebrated doctors of the Asbârians, born at Shabrestân, a city of Khorasân between Nisâbûr and Khowârazm, in the year of the Hejra 477, famous for his learned performances in the metaphysics and the scholastic theology of the Moslems, died, according to Ebn Shohnab, in the year that a that we are now upon. The principal of his works were those intituled, Nehaiat Al Ekdâm fi Elm Al Kelam, which occasioned his being denominated Al Motekellem Al Asbâri, the school-man of the Asbârians, and Al Melal wa Al Nabal, or the means of curing melancholy and chagrin. It may not be improper to observe, that Shabrestân, the place of Abu'l Fatah's nativity, from whence he deduced the surname of Al Shabrestâni, was a city, if Ebn Shobnah may be credited, built by Abd'allah Ebn Thâher, the third prince of the Thâberian dynasty, and Emîr of Khorasân <sup>w</sup>.

THE following year, being the 549th of the Hejra, which commenced March 18th, 1154, and 549. Al Dhâfer Beamri'llah Ebn Al Hâfed Ledini'llah, the Khalîf of Egypt, was assassinated, either by Al Abbâs Al Sanbâji, his Wazîr, or Nasr, that minister's son, in the month of Al Moharram. Al Abbâs Al Sanbâji had formerly been the governor of Belbeis, and, by the assistance of his son Nasr, found means to deprive Nojmo'ddîn Ebn Mesâl, his predecessor, both of his office and his life. After which, Al Dhâfer, being a young man, and intirely attached to his pleasures, became so desperately enamoured with Nasr, who was a very beautiful youth, that he could not be easy one moment, either by day or by night, without him. This induced his subjects to believe, that Nasr was the object of the Khalîf's unnatural lust; which rendered both of them infamous, and excited Al Abbâs Al Sanbâji, the Wazîr, to persuade his son to murder the person who had brought such a disgrace upon him. To this he was farther impelled by what Nasr had told him; viz. that Al Dhâfer had instigated him to kill his father, promising him, if he would perpetrate so horrid a crime, to make him Wazîr in his room. Al Abbâs and Nasr, therefore, in pursuance of the plan they had formed for the destruction of the Khalîf, invited him and two of his most intimate favourites to a private entertainment one night at the Wazîr's house, dispatched them all three, and threw their bodies into a well. The next morning Al Abbâs went to the imperial palace, and asked for the Khalîf; who not appearing, the Wazîr ordered Yusef and Gabriel, his brothers, to be executed, together with Sâteh, their cousin-german, for having imbrued their hands in the blood of their sovereign. He also cut off a great number of other persons, whom he pretended to suspect of being accessory to the same crime. He then went to the seraglio, took Al Dhâfer's son Isa, then only five years old, from amongst the women there, gave him the title or surname of Al Fayez Benasri'llah, or, if we chuse to follow Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of Ebn Shobnah, Al Kayem Benasri'llah, and placed him upon the throne. The boy, to whom Al Abbâs obliged all the grandees of the court to take the oath of allegiance, seeing the carcases of those whom the Wazîr had commanded to be slain, was so shocked at the sight, that he became perfectly stupified thereby, and could never afterwards exercise his reason in a proper manner. As for Al Abbâs himself, he did not long remain unpunished. For it being soon rumoured over the whole Fâtemite empire, that Al Abbâs Al Sanbâji and his son Nasr were the real authors of the Khalîf's murder; the principal officers of the army, and even the ladies of the seraglio, who were all vastly concerned at the barbarous treatment Al Dhâfer and his brothers had met with, applied to Talâý' Ebn Zarîc, the Armenian, then possessed of Al Kâbirah, for his assistance. Upon which, the Wazîr and his son fled into Syria; carrying their jewels, money, and every thing valuable acquired by Al Abbâs, during the course of his administration, along with them. Of which Al Dhâfer's sister being apprized, she immediately wrote to the generals of the Franks, who had lately made themselves masters of Askalân, and promised them a great reward, if they would seize upon the two traitors, and secure them in such manner, that they might be brought to condign punishment. Upon the receipt of the letter, some small detachments were sent out of Askalân to intercept them; one of which came up with, and attacked, the party that escorted them. Al Abbâs Al Sanbâji himself was killed in the action, and Nasr taken prisoner; after which, all the rich spoils belonging to them fell into the hands of the Franks, who immediately sent Nasr under an escorte to Al Kâbirah. The ladies of the seraglio soon getting possession of him, he was there put to a most cruel death. The sister of the late Khalîf crush'd his right hand, with which he had assassinated that prince, to pieces. The other ladies beat and bruised him most unmercifully with their shoes, and even ate his flesh; which was pulled off the bones with pincers, before his face. He was then affixed alive to a gibbet, erected for that purpose; and, after his death, his body was reduced to ashes. We are told, that the women of the seraglio cut off locks of their hair, and sent them, fastened to lances, to Talâý' Ebn Zarîc, as a token of their grief, and to excite that commander to revenge the barbarous murder of the Khalîf. Al Fayer Benasri'llah conferred the sublime post of Wazîr upon Talâý' Ebn Zarîc; who, by the direction of one of Al Abbâs Al Sanbâji's servants, discovered Al Dhâfer's body, together with those of his two favourites, who had been assassinated with him. That of the Khalîf he soon after caused to be interred, with exceeding great funeral pomp; and was no sooner confirmed in a his office, than he assumed, if Ebn Shohnab may be credited, the title, or surname, of Al Málec Al Sáleh. The same year, in the month of Safar, Núro'ddín Mahmúd Ebn Zenki obliged Mejro'ddín Artak Ebn Mohammed Ebn Tawzi, or Bázi, Ebn Tagtakin, or Tagantakin, the Sáheb of Damascus, to surrender that city to him; having before received advice, that the Franks were advancing towards the place, in order to annex it to the territories they occupied in Syria. As Mejro'ddín did not give Núro'ddín much trouble in the reduction of Damascus, he first conferred upon him the government of Hems, and afterwards that of Bális, a small town of Syria upon the Euphrates, about seven stations from Salemiyah. He did not, however, remain long at Bális, but retired from thence to Baghdád; where, according to Ebn Shohnab, he at last ended his days *. b

What happened, the following year.

THE next year, being the 550th of the Hejra, beginning March 7th, 1155, Kbofrú Sháb, the son of Babrám, or Bakarám, Sháb, the last of the Gazni Soltáns, according to Khondemir, as cited by M. D'Herbelot, departed this life, in a certain castle, where for several years he had been confined. That author, however, in another extract, inserted in his valuable work by M. D'Herbelot, makes this Kbofrú to have died in the year of the Hejra 555. But as, upon the former supposition, M. D'Herbelot, after Mirkhond, Khondemir, and Al Emír Yahya Ebn Abd'ollatif Al Kazwini, computes the dynasty of the Gaznevids to have remained 155 years, and consequently seems in some measure to evince what he had just before laid down, in relation to the time of Kbofrú's death; that event may, as we apprehend, with sufficient propriety, be placed in the present year. Taláy' Ebn Zaríc, the Fátemite Khalíf's Wazír, rendered himself odious to the Egyptian Moslems, as well as the Copts, by his infamous exactions; fleecing his master's subjects, in order to gratify his avarice, after a most shameful manner. He was also a bitter enemy both to the Christians and the Jews; obliging all of them to wear certain marks of distinction on the tops of their turbans, or caps, that they might thereby be distinguished from the Mohammedans, and listening to every false accusation that was brought to him against them. At this time a powerful prince reigned over the Kera-its, Kara-its, Karits, Kerits, Karites, or Kerites, a tribe of oriental Turks, or Tartars, settled in the remotest part of Turkestan, bordering upon Khotan, Katay, which comprized the northern provinces of China, and the kingdom of Tibet, styled Onk, or Awank, Khán. This prince, the third who bore that title, together with all his subjects, professed the Christian religion, and made a very considerable figure. Some years before, he overthrew in a great battle the Seljúks, or Moslems that occupied Al Jazíra, Fárs, Belád Al Jebál, and Adherbiján; and, according to some good authors, extended his frontiers from the farthest limits of the eastern Tartary to the banks of the Tigris. This conqueror was likewise named by the Arab writers King John, and by European travellers Prester John. His son David, who succeeded him, was vanquished and killed in battle by Jenghíz Khán. The princes of this family were also dignified with the title of kings of India. But as a place will be assigned the history of the kingdom of Prester John in the supplement to this work, it would be both improper and superfluous to expatiate any farther upon it here *. c

Atsiz and Tarkán Khán die.

THE 551st year of the Hejra, commencing Feb. 24th, 1156, was rendered memorable by the death of Atsiz; who departed this life in the valley of Khabískán, one of the most delightful places of Asia. During his last illness, he once heard the voice of a man reading; upon which, he ordered the people about him to listen to it. This had not long been done, before the following passage of the Korán reached their ears, "No man knows in what country he shall die." These words made such an impression upon his mind, that he did not doubt but his death would happen on the very spot where they were heard. And this sorrowful thought, during the short remainder of his life, grew every day stronger and stronger upon him. Reshído'ddín Abd'aljelil, the Persian poet, generally called Reshídi, or Rashídi, who was a native of Balkh, followed his corpse to the grave, and pronounced his funeral elogy in verse. Amongst other insolent amplifications, favouring of the oriental genius, made use of herein, Rashído'ddín scrupled not to affirm, that the heavens themselves trembled, when his hero was angry; that, on all occasions, they were obedient to him; and that no one could be found so ignorant as not to know, that this prince's glorious actions intitled him to the empire of the whole world. Atsiz is said to have reigned twenty-nine years; though, according to some of the eastern writers, he ruled only eighteen years f

- a with an absolute and unlimited sway. He was not only famed for his bravery and military skill, but likewise for his learning and liberality. As he gloried in nothing more than in being the patron and protector of learned men, his praises were celebrated by the principal writers of the age. He had almost completed his sixty-first year, at the time of his death; and was succeeded by Il-Arslân, his son. The word Il, prefixed to this Soltân's name, denotes strong and brave, in the language of Khowârazm. He bore the title of Khowârazm Shâh, which was hereditary in his family, reduced part of the Transoxanian provinces and Khorasân, and made a very considerable figure. The same year, died likewise Tarkân Khatûn, the Soltâna of the Seljuks; who governed Sanjar's dominions, during the confinement of that prince. However, soon after her death, Soltân Sanjar, by the assistance of Al Emîr
- b Elias, one of his confidants, and Al Emîr Ahmed Komaj, the governor of Termed, escaped out of the hands of the Turkmâns, who had detained him as a prisoner amongst them, ever since the year of the Hejra 548, and was conducted by Ahmed's troops to Merû, at this time the capital of Khorasân. The Soltân finding the city of Merû, and all the country through which he passed, in a very bad condition, on account of the incursions made by the Turkmâns during his captivity, fell first into a deep melancholy, and afterwards into a distemper which proved fatal to him. Some authors relate, that Atsîz, in conjunction with Mahmûd, Sanjar's nephew, during the Soltân's detention among the Turkmâns, presided over the state. According to a writer followed by M. Renaudot, the Khalîf Al Moktafi conferred the dignity of Soltân upon Solimân Shâh, the son of Mohammed Al Seljûki, on condition that
- c he should intirely cede to him the province of Irâk, though this runs counter to what has been advanced by Abu'l Faraj, the present year<sup>2</sup>.

In the 552d year of the Hejra, beginning Feb. 13th, 1157, Soltân Sanjar departed this life at Merû, as it should seem from Khondemir, in Khorasân. He was carried off by the cholic and a diarrhœa, in the former Rabî. The author of the Nighiariştân has preserved a distich made upon this Soltân's death, wherein the words Shâh Merû, alluding to the place of his demise, clearly point out the year in which he died; the letters of which those two words consist forming exactly, amongst the Arabs, the number 552. Sanjar fought nineteen battles, of which he gained seventeen; and was much feared by all, though his clemency and liberality not a little endeared him to his subjects. He was diligent in matters

d of government, but hated kingly pride; wearing, for the most part, a coat made only of skins. However, he lived with great magnificence; appointing Kotbo'ddîn Mohammed Ebn Tacash Ebn Arslân and his son Atsîz, Shâhs of Khowârazm, successively his cup-bearers, and assigning them the revenues of the large province of Khowârazm for the salary of their office. We meet with the elogy of Soltân Sanjar in several parts of the works of Selmân, the Persian poet, drawn up with great elegance and beauty. It has been remarked, that this prince established Saad Ebn Zenki, who had been his governor, lieutenant-general of all his dominions, under the title of Atâbek; which signifying father of the prince, and being given to the tutors of the Seljukian princes, became afterwards a title of dignity. This Saad must e have been either Omâdo'ddîn, or 'Amâdo'ddîn, Zenki, the first Atâbek of Irâk, who began to preside over that province, in 521, or Modhaffero'ddîn Moshakar Ebn Mawdûd, the first Atâbek of Fârs, or Pârs, that is, Persia properly so called, who set up for himself there, in 543; both of whom arrogated to themselves the supreme authority, in Sanjar's reign. All the oriental historians praise this Soltân for his valour and justice, magnanimity and goodness. As a proof of this, they write, that he was so well beloved by his subjects, that they continued to publish his name in the mosques for a whole year after his death, as if he had been still alive, and on the throne. They gave him also the surname of Eskander Thani, that is, Alexander the Second; and his name of Sanjar has passed for that of Alexander amongst his posterity. After this prince's decease, Mahmûd, his sister's son, according to Khondemir, succeeded in Khorasân; but, at the end of five years, Moyedabia, one of his lords, who

f had formerly been Sanjar's slave, rebelled against him, fought several battles with him, seized his dominions, and deprived him of sight. The Soltân, or Shâh, of Khowârazm, whose dynasty rose whilst Sanjar swayed the sceptre of the Seljuks, taking advantage of these divisions in Khorasân, made himself master of a considerable part of that country, whilst the other remained in the possession of the rebels, and the Soltâns of the race of Gaur. So that the Seljuks, who still maintained their power in both the Irâks, had no longer any footing in Khorasân. But, notwithstanding the authority of that writer, Mogayâtho'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Mohammed Ebn Mâlec Shâh, who had also the surname of Abu'l Kasem, is said by the Lebtârikh to have ascended the Seljuk throne, the same year that Sanjar died. This is, however flatly contradicted by several authors of good repute; as we shall hereafter more clearly evince, in a future part of this work. Sanjar, according to Ebn Shobnah, was born in the year of the Hejra 479, and was consequently about seventy-three years old, at the time of his death. This writer likewise reports, that Sanjar was prayed for, in the mosques within his jurisdiction, as Soltân, forty years; and twenty, as king, or rather governor, of Khorasân, before he succeeded Soltân Mohammed. The same year, if Ebn Shobnah may be depended upon, Abu Sa'id Ebn Abd'almûmen, who commanded the forces of the Al Moâbedun, or, as they are called by the western historians, the Al Mobades, reduced the city of Korthoba in Al Andalus, or Cordova in Andalusia, and afterwards drove the Al Morabeta, or Al Moravides, out of Spain. He also took Al Rayab from the Franks, after it had remained in their hands about twenty years. Whilst the Al Moâbedun were extending their conquests in the western parts of the world, Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki dispossessed Sahâc Al Bokâ'ye of Baalbec, in the territory of Damascus. Many violent shocks of an earthquake were felt in Syria (X), this year, in the month of Rajeb, which almost entirely destroyed Hems, Hama, Shaizar, Casar Tâb, or Caser Tâb, Al Ma'ra, or Al Marra, Afâmia, or Apamia, Hîsn, Al Acrâd, 'Arkâ, Al Lâdikiya, or Laodicea, Trâbolos, Trâblos, or Tripoli, and Antâkiya, or Antioch. An incredible number of people perished on this occasion, who were all buried under the ruins of the above-mentioned towns. In order to give some sort of idea of this dreadful calamity, it may not be improper to observe, that a school fell down at Hama, or Hamab, the master being then absent on some particular business, and crushed to pieces all the scholars that were therein; none of their parents coming afterwards to enquire for any of them, which renders it probable, that they all likewise met the same fate. When the last shock happened at Shaizar, the Sâheb of that place was circumcising his child; the whole family of the Beni Monkad, who were masters of the town, being assembled at his house, in order to attend the ceremony. When the house being thrown down, only one of them escaped; who was afterwards killed by the kick of a horse, as he attempted to go out at the gate. Of which terrible disaster Al Mâlec Al 'Adel Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki receiving advice, he detached a body of troops to take possession of that city; which, upon their arrival there, they immediately occupied, without the loss of a man. Ebn Al Athir, in his Al Câmel Al Tawarîkh, or general history, affirms the Beni Monkad to have been settled at Shaizar, when Sâleb Ebn Mardâs obliged it to submit to him, in the year of the Hejra 414; but, if we may credit Ebn Khaledân and Al Makîn, Sedîd'ddawla Abu'l Hasan Ali Ebn Moklad, the great grandson of Monkad, wrested it out of the hands of the Greeks, either in 473, or 474. We must not forget to observe, that the Khalîf Al Moktafi ordered the old gate of the Caaba, now greatly decayed through age, to be removed, and a new one, covered with silver plates, to be erected in its room; as also commanded a coffin to be made for himself out of the former, in some part of the year that we are now upon. It appears from one of the writers followed by M. Renaudot, that Mohammed Shâh, the son of Mahmûd Shâh, who aspired at the Soltânat, in order to carry his point, about this time, laid siege to the city of Baghdâd.

year 553.

THE following year, being the 553d of the Hejra, which commenced Feb. 2d, 1158, seems not to have been very fruitful in memorable events, at least not many accounts of such events have been handed down to us by the eastern writers. However, that the affairs of the Seljûks continued to decline, and those of Il Arslân (Y), the third Soltân, or Shâh, of Khorwârazm, to wear a promising aspect, through the whole course of it, we may infer from what has been observed by Khondemir, the Persian historian.

The principal
transactions of
554.

THE next year, being the 554th of the Hejra, which began Jan. 23d, 1159, Mohammed, surnamed Gayâtho'ddîn, having received advice, that his uncle Solimân Shâh had assembled a powerful army in Mazanderân, and been joined by the Khalîf Al Moktafi and the Atâbek Ildigîz, who became afterwards the first Atâbek of Adherbijân, with all their forces; he

(X) Some writers intimate, that Bayrût, or Berytus, Saidân, or Sidon, Sûr, or Tyre, 'Accâ, or Ptolemais, and Haleb, or Aleppo, were likewise almost intirely reduced to heaps of ruins by the violent concussions mentioned here (3).

(Y) This Il Arslân had a younger brother, named Solimân Shâh, who would have disputed the crown with him. He did in effect possess himself of part of his father's dominions; but Il Arslân did not give him time to strengthen himself, in the territories he had acquired. He surprized him, took him prisoner, and kept him in a state of confinement through the whole course of his reign. He also extended his conquests, both in the Transoxanian provinces beyond the Jihûn, and in Khorasân. This Soltân, or Shâh, died in the year of the Hejra 557, and left for his successor his son Soltân Shâh (4).

- a met him on the banks of the Arras, or Araxes, overthrew him with great slaughter, and obliged him to retire to Al Mawfel. After this victory Soltân Mohammed was inclined to have attacked Al Moktafi, who took Solimân Shâh under his protection; but considering, that he had another enemy, Malec Shâh II. his brother, to fear, he judged it requisite to make up matters with the Khalif. Upon which, that prince gave the Soltân his daughter, named Kermân Kbûtân, in marriage; who set out, with a splendid equipage, from Baghdâd for Mohammed's court. The Soltân himself went to meet her; but an hectic fever, which attended him, put an end to his days, after he had lived thirty-two years, and reigned seven, on the road to Hamadân. With regard to his character, Mohammed has always passed for a most accomplished prince, who possessed all the virtues military and civil. He was esteemed, through the whole course of his reign, as an uncommon patron of men of learning, piety, and merit; in which, say the historians, he was the very reverse of his brother Malec Shâh; who re-ascended the throne, after his decease, and survived him not many days. This last Soltân was succeeded by his uncle Solimân Shâh, surnamed Moazzo'ddîn, or Moezzo'ddîn, Abu'l Hâreth Kasem, the son of Soltân Mohammed Ebn Malec Shâh. Being at Al Mawfel, when his two immediate predecessors died, the great lords, after some debate amongst themselves, sent for him, and placed him upon the throne. Mohammed is reported to have quitted life, in the month of Dbu'lhajja, the present year, with extreme regret; insomuch that, before he expired, he ordered his troops, his court, and all his treasures, to pass before him, as it were in review, and, after he had considered all these things, said, How is it possible that a power as formidable as mine is not able to diminish the weight of my disorder one single grain, nor to prolong my life only for a moment? He then, according to the same author, concluded his reflection with the following remarkable words; Unhappy is that person who spends his time in amassing those things which he must leave, and does not make the principal object of his attention and regard that being in whom all things are to be found. This year, on the eighth of the latter Rabî, there happened a dreadful inundation of the Tigris; which laid under water, and destroyed, a very considerable part of the city of Baghdâd. Ebn Shohnab relates, that Abd'mûmen, the general, or chief, of the Al Moâbedûn, took Al Mohdia, at this time, from the Franks, after it had remained in their hands about twenty years <sup>c</sup>.

- THE 555th year of the Hejra, commencing Jan. 12th, 1160, was rendered memorable by the death of Al Moktafi Leamri'llah, the Khalif of Baghdâd. That prince, who reigned twenty-four years and three months, was sixty-six years old, at the time of his decease. We are told, that as he owed his elevation to the credit and authority of Mas'ûd, he had no share in the government of his state, during the life of that Soltân; but that, after his death, he asserted his independency, and would not permit Malec Shâh II. to have any power, or command, in the Soltânat of Baghdâd. He remained sole master in his dominions, which comprehended Arabia and the Babylonian Irâk. In short, it was under this Khalif that the power of the Seljuks, who had been masters of all the forces and possessions of the Khalifs, began to decline, and, by degrees, became extinct. On this occasion, it has been remarked by Abu'l Faraj, that Al Moktafi was the first who reigned in the Arabian Irâk without a Soltân, and governed his armies, as well as subjects, according to his own will, since the time that the Mamlûks, or slaves, that is, the Turkish militia, began to dispose of every thing in the Khalifat, and consequently to deprive of their just authority the successors of Mohammed, under Al Montaser Bi'llah (Z), the eleventh Khalif of the house of Al Abbâs. It appears from Mirkhond, that Al Moktafi recovered almost all that Soltân Mas'ûd had possessed himself of in the provinces of Fârs and Al Jebâl, or the mountainous part of the Persian Irâk; and that no considerable tumults, or commotions, disturbed his repose, during the remainder of his prosperous reign <sup>d</sup>.

(Z) We have taken the liberty here to substitute Al Montaser in the room of Al Mostanser, exhibited in the passage referred to by Dr. Pocock's manuscripts of Abu'l Faraj. That Al Montaser is the true reading, is plain from hence, that the Khalif Al Mostanser Bi'llah did not ascend the Moslem throne before the year of the Hejra 623; and that the Khalif Al Montaser Bi'llah was saluted Emir Al Mûmenîn, or commander of the faithful, by the officers of the Turkish militia, after they had assassinated his father Al Motawakkel, in the year of the Hejra 247. Then commenced the power and usurpation of the supreme authority in the Khalifat of those insolent troops as very clearly appears from all the best oriental writers. It is true, Al Montaser is named Al Mostanser in the printed copies of the Moslem history of Al Makin; but then it is as true, that this is a fault, as has been rightly observed by M. D'Herbelot, either of the manuscript or the impression (1).

Al Mostanjed Bi'llah is raised to the Khalifat.

THE KHALIF AL MOKTAFI LEAMRI'LLAH appointed his son Yusef to succeed him, a little before his death, in the year that we are now upon. One of his concubines, by whom he had a son, surnamed Abu Ali, finding that he grew worse and worse in his last illness, formed a design to assassinate Yusef; hoping, by such a step, to advance to the supreme dignity her own son. For this purpose, she armed a great number of the women of the palace with knives, and hired them to kill him when he went to see his father. But the conspiracy being discovered to Yusef, by a little eunuch, whom he constantly sent to enquire how the old Khalif did, and who once on his return saw them with the knives in their hands; he put on a coat of mail, took his sword in his hand, and went directly to the imperial palace. This he no sooner entered, than the women attacked him; but he defended himself so well, that he wounded several of them, and at last, by the assistance of the governor of the palace, to whom he had before communicated the affair, and some of the grooms of the Khalif's bed-chamber, put them to flight. Abu Ali and his mother, who both fell into his hands, he caused afterwards to be imprisoned; but the female assassins he treated in a more severe and rigorous manner. Some of them were publicly executed, and others thrown into the Tigris. Al Moktafi dying, on the second of the former Rabi, Yusef was saluted Khalif, and inaugurated in form; after which, he assumed the title, or surname, of Al Mostanjed Bi'llah. The foregoing plot is represented as antecedent to Al Moktafi's demise by Abu'l Faraj; though Khondemir, as consulted by M. D'Herbelot, seems to intimate, that Abu Ali and his mother conspired against Al Mostanjed Bi'llah, in the manner related here, after he was settled upon the Moslem throne<sup>a</sup>.

Al Fâyez Isa
Ebn Al Dhâ-fer, the Khalif
of Egypt, dies.

THIS year, died Al Fâyez Isa Ebn Al Dhâfer Ismael, the Sâbeb of Egypt, styled also the Fâtemite Khalif, after he had presided over the Egyptian Moslems about six years. He was succeeded by Abd'allah Ebn Yusef Ebn Al Hâfedh, who took upon him the title, or surname, of Al 'Aded Ledini'llah, and according to Ebn Shohnah, the prænomen of Abu Mohammed. He was the eleventh and last of the Fâtemite Khalifs of Egypt. We must not forget to observe that Al Moktafi has a very good character given him by Ebn Shohnah; who likewise informs us, that Al Mostanjed Bi'llah's mother went under the denomination of Al Tâwas, or the peacock. It must also be remembered, that Mâlec Shâh II. the Soltân of the Seljuks, who after his brother Mohammed's death hastened to Esfahan, in order to resume the government of the Seljukian dominions, died, in the beginning of the present year. If we will believe the author of the Lebtârikh, he swayed the sceptre the first time he sat on the Seljukian throne only four months, and the second time no more than nine days<sup>f</sup>.

The most memorable occurrences of the
year 556,

IN the 556th year of the Hejra, beginning Dec. 31st, 1160, and the month of Safar, Solimân Shâh, the twelfth Soltân of the Seljuks of Irân, departed this life, at the age of forty-five. He succeeded his nephew Mâlec Shâh II. in the beginning of the preceding year. But as he gave himself up intirely to voluptuousness, and the company of women, without minding the affairs of the kingdom, the noblesse seized and imprisoned him at the end of six months; advancing in his room, his nephew Arslân, as we shall hereafter have occasion to observe. Setting aside Solimân's bad conduct, for which he was deposed, he did not want some good qualities. He was very familiar with those about him; and excelled as to behaviour, person, and eloquence. His successor, Soltân Arslân, was the son of Mohammed Ebn Mâlec Shâh, and surnamed Zeyno'ddîn, or Zîno'ddîn, by Khondemir; but he is stiled Rucno'ddawla, or Rocno'ddawla, by the author of the Lebtârikh. He is commonly called Mâlec Arslân by the eastern historians. He was proclaimed Soltân at Hamadân, by the influence of Ildighîz, the first Atâbek of Adherbijân, who began to reign the very same year. From the time he ascended the throne, Kîmar, the governor of Esfahan, and Enbanj, or Inanj, who presided over the people of Al Ray, revolted against him; setting up for Soltân one of his cousins, named Mohammed Seljuk Shâh; with whom, at the head of a great army, they advanced to Hamadân. Arslân went to meet them as far as Kazwîn, engaged them in the neighbourhood of that city, and gained a complete victory. For the new Soltân was killed in the battle, and his two supporters fled to Al Ray; from whence they were constrained afterwards to retire into the province of Mazanderân. Arslân had no sooner put an end to this war, than he found himself obliged to enter upon another. For the prince of the Abkhâz, who was a Christian, situated between Georgia and Gherkassia, invading Adherbijân, ravaged that country as far as Kazwîn. The Soltân, turning his victorious arms on that side, defeated him near the strong castle of Kâk, which he had taken and fortified; but, being afterwards forced by the Seljuk troops, was demolished. This year, in the month of Ramâdân, Al Mâlec Al Sâleb Talây' Ebn Zarîc Al Armeni, or the Armenian, surnamed Abu'l Gârât, that is, the father of expeditions, Al 'Aded Ledini'llab's Wazîr, was assassinated by some ruffians, whom Al 'Aded's aunt had hired to murder him, when he entered the palace. They were armed with knives, and attacked him at the time and place appointed. He did not die upon the spot; but, being carried home, dispatched a messenger to Al 'Aded, to upbraid him with being the cause of his death. Al 'Aded denied with an oath, that he had been either consenting, or in any manner privy, to the horrid design; and, in order the more effectually to disculpate himself, put his aunt, who had been the sole contriver of the execrable scheme, into Talây' Ebn Zarîc's hands. The Wazîr, having got the impious woman into his power, immediately cut off her head; and, after he had obtained of Al 'Aded Ledini'llab, the last Khalîf of Egypt, the post of Wazîr for his son, who assumed the title, or surname, of Al Mâlec Al 'Aded, or the just king, almost instantly expired. It appears from Ebn Shohnah, that Talây Ebn Zarîc was not only extremely well versed in the military art, but likewise very well acquainted with poetry; and that he was even the author of several poetical compositions, a specimen of which has been preserved by that Moslem historian. We must not forget to remark, that Soltân Alâo'ddîn Al Hosein Ebn Al Hasan Al Gauri, called also Al Hasan Ebn Al Hosein, and surnamed Jehânsûz (A), or the person who set the world on fire, the first monarch of the dynasty of Gaur, a country lying between that of Gazna and Khorasân, represented by some of the eastern writers as a very just and excellent prince, departed this life, and was succeeded by his nephew Gayâtho'ddîn Mohammed in the sovereignty of the territories of Gaur, according to Ebn Shohnah, the present year<sup>e</sup>.

THE following year, being the 557th of the Hejra, which commenced Dec. 21st 1161, and of the seems not to have produced many remarkable events. However, during the course of it, year 557. Shâwer, who had been employed by Talây' Ebn Zarîc, met with very injurious treatment from Al Hasan, the prefect of Moniat Beni Khasib, Talay' Ebn Zaric's sister's son; and thereupon made his complaints to Zarîc, Razîc, or, as he is denominated in some of the MS. copies of Ebn Shohnah, Arzîc, the Fâtemite Khalîf's Wazîr, but without effect. Al Hasan, finding he might repeat his insolence with impunity, sent Shâwer, as a present, a little chest of elegant workmanship, with some thongs of leather in it, such as the Moslems at that time used, when they scourged their slaves. This giving Shâwer to understand, that he had every thing to fear from Al Hasan, who was supported by the Wazîr; he retired, with some of his adherents, into the solitude of Lowakat, and maintained himself there against all the forces the Wazîr sent to reduce him, for the space of three months. From thence he marched, through the desert of Alwak, to the pool, or fishpond, near Alexandria, and posted himself at Mehallet Abd'alrahmân; moving from that place to Belkina, a neighbouring village, a little after the close of this year. We must not forget to observe, that Al Sheikh Adi Ebn Mosâfer Al Zahed, a native of Baalbec, who resided for the most part in the country called Al Haccâr, appertaining to the Jazîrat Ebn Omar, or Jazîrat Beni Omar, one of the dependencies of Al Mawfel, died, according to Ebn Shohnah, in the year that we are now upon<sup>h</sup>.

THE next year, being the 558th of the Hejra, which began Dec. 10th, 1162, in What happens the month of Safar, the Khalîf Al 'Aded Ledini'llab advanced Shâwer, one of Talây' Ebn ed in the year Zarîc's eunuchs, to the sublime office of Wazîr. This Shâwer had been at Belkina scarce 558.

(A) This Jehânsûz having entered Khorasân with a numerous army, in the year of the Hejra 544, with a design to make himself master of that province, was overthrown in a great battle by Soltân Sanjar, and, together with his general, named Ali Tcheteri, taken prisoner. As Ali was one of Sanjar's subjects, and had been formerly loaded with favours by him, that prince ordered him to be put to death for his ingratitude and infidelity; but soon after sent Jehânsûz home, that is, to Gaur, in order to govern that country under his authority. Jehânsûz was the grandson of Sam Ebn Sourî, descended from the tyrant Zhobak, who usurped the crown of Fârs, or Pârs, that is, Persia, and was defeated by Ieridûn, king of Fârs, of the dynasty of Pishdâd. But of the princes of the house of Gaur our readers may expect a full and ample account, in a future part of this work, to which it will more properly belong (1).

three days, when he was joined by a great number of Arabs, and soldiers that flocked a to him from the western parts of Egypt, and other places, especially the desert; insomuch that he soon found himself at the head of an army, consisting of 10,000 horse. The Arabs, addicted to rapine, and accustomed to robberies, he detached, in different parties, to ravage and plunder all the lands belonging to those who persisted in their attachment to Zaric Ebn Talay, Al 'Aded's Wazir; giving them the spoils they should acquire on this occasion, that they might be the more active in their depredations. The Arabs, animated by this concession, executed Shawer's orders with great alacrity and success; who thereupon pursued his march almost to the very gates of Al Kabirah and Mesr, and there incamped. The Wazir and his friends were so terrified at Shawer's approach, that they immediately abandoned the metropolis, and betook themselves to a precipitate flight. But before his departure, b he put all his jewels, of almost inestimable value, and even equal to the annual revenues of Egypt, into one little bag, or purse, and a thousand dinars into another, which he placed under the saddle of his horse; and then fled towards the desert, alone, with the utmost precipitation. Falling into the hands of the Arabs, he was stript and plundered by them, and left naked in the desert; where he remained, till he was almost perished with hunger and cold. However, being at last known, Yakub, the Arab Emir, commanded him to be brought into his tent, and to be conducted from thence under an escorte to Shawer at Al Kabirah. Here he was received as a friend, had proper apartments assigned him in the Wazir's palace, enjoyed the company of his favourite concubine, as well as that of his sons, and was attended by some of his own domestics. Nay, Shawer, who had succeeded him in the c post of Wazir, and assumed the title of Emir Al Juyush, that is, the commander of armies, frequently conferred with him, and even invited him to his table. But being some time after accused of meditating a flight, and of exciting the Egyptian Emirs to a revolt, he was thrown into irons; which endeavouring to file off, Tay, Shawer's son, entered the place of his confinement with a sword in his hand, and, to the vast regret of his father, who was not privy to the affair, immediately cut off his head. Shawer had not been long possessed of the supreme authority, before Al Dargam, an officer of rank, endeavoured to drive him from the Fatemitic Khalif's councils; and, at last, after a decisive action, in the month of Ramadan, obliged him to fly into Syria. Here he implored the assistance and protection d of Nuroddin Mahmud Ebn Zenki; promising to remit him yearly the third part of the annual revenues of Egypt, if he would march a formidable army into that country, and re-instate him in the sublime office of Wazir. In the mean time, Al Dargam, who killed Tay, Zaric Ebn Talay's son, in the first engagement between him and his predecessor, took upon himself the government of the Fatemitic empire, and dignified himself with the title of Al Malec Al Afdal; conferring upon one of his brothers that of Al Molhem Al 'Adel, and upon the other that of Nasr Al Moslem. This is said to have happened, in the month of Shawwal. As for Shawer, after his arrival at Damascus, he lived with Nuroddin Mahmud Ebn Zenki there, and was treated with uncommon marks of distinction by that prince. Abulfeda relates, that Al Dargam, after he was vested with the supreme authority, cut off e many commanders who were in Shawer's interest, in order to secure to himself the power he had acquired; and that, by this measure, he so weakened the kingdom, or empire, of Egypt, that it afterwards slipped out of his hands. Ebn Shobnah writes, that a very considerable number of the Egyptian Emirs, at this time, lost their lives; which proved such a blow to the Fatemitic power, that the Khalifat erected by the descendants of Ali in Egypt was thereby reduced to a feeble and languishing condition. The same year, according to the last mentioned historian, Abd'almumen Al Garbi departed this life, in his capital, after he had reigned a month above thirty-three years. He put Casbiab Ebn Tomart to death for a slight offence, and occasioned an incredible effusion of human blood. In the main, however, if Ebn Shobnah may be credited, he was a good governor; and drew many of the Al Garbians, f or people of the west, over to the tenets of Malec Ebn Ans in jurisprudence, and to those of Ebn Al Hasan Al Ashari in Affil, or metaphysics. He farther informs us, that Abd'almumen killed upon the spot every Moslem in the mosque, whose attention was not fixed upon his devotions. But, as our curious readers will meet with a full and ample account of that puissant monarch in the supplement to this work, it would be superfluous to expatiate largely upon his reign and character here<sup>1</sup>.

and in the
year 559.

THE 559th year of the Hejra, commencing Nov. 30th, 1163, produced several actions of note, a brief account of which has been handed down to us by the oriental writers. Shawer informed Nuroddin, a most implacable enemy of the Christians, in order to bring

him

- a him into his views, that the Franks had penetrated into Egypt, and made a very considerable progress in the conquest of that opulent kingdom; and therefore begged he would send an army, not only to expel them from thence, but likewise to re-instate him in the office of Wazir. As an inducement to that prince to comply with his request, Shâwer now engaged both to remit to Damascus the third part of the annual revenues of Egypt, in case success attended their arms, and to defray the whole expence of the expedition. Hereupon, Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki ordered a strong body of his troops, under the command of Asado'ddîn (B) Shairacûb Ebn Shâdi, who was accompanied by Shâwer, to advance towards the frontiers of Egypt. Shairacûb entered that country without opposition, overthrew Al Dargâm at a place called the sepulchre of St. Naphisa, and fixed Shâwer once more at the
- b head of the Fâtemite Kbalîf's councils. That minister being possessed of his former post; and in a state of independency, scrupled not to (C) violate the engagements he had entered into with Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki, by refusing to pay him any part of the stipulated sum. Whereupon, Asado'ddîn, justly incensed at his infidelity, seized Al Sharkiâb and Belbeis, Balbais, or Pelufium. This excited Shâwer to conclude a treaty with the Franks; who, in consequence of the principal article of it, sent some forces to support him. The combined army shut up Asado'ddîn Shairacûb Ebn Shâdi three months in Belbeis, with an intention to starve him to a surrender. But Nûro'ddîn having found means to make himself master of the strong fortress of Hârem, in the prefecture of Aleppo; the Franks thought fit to listen to terms of accommodation, and to permit Asado'ddîn to retire without molestation
- c to Syria. They had been intirely defeated by Nûro'ddîn in a pitched battle, and lost a prodigious number of men, killed and taken prisoners in the action; which accelerated the reduction of Hârem. Amongst the latter were the Sâheb of Antâkiyah, or Antioch, called Al Bornas by the Arab writers, and Al Kûmes (the count), the Sâheb of Trâblos, Trâbolos, or Tripoli. The spoil acquired by the Moslems on this occasion was immense, if Ebn Shobnah and Abu'lfeda may be depended upon. Whether or no the treaty lately signed with Asado'ddîn, or rather Nûro'ddîn himself, was to extend to the territories of the Franks in Syria, or to be confined to the military operations in Egypt, does not certainly appear, either from the last mentioned historians or Abu'l Faraj; though it should seem as if the war still continued in Syria, Nûro'ddîn having carried Bâniâs, or Paneas, after it had been in
- d the hands of the Franks above sixteen years, in the month of Dhu'lhajja, by storm. But,

(B) The title, or surname, of Asado'ddîn, assumed by Shairacûb Ebn Shâdi, brother of Ayûb, and uncle of the famous Salâh'addin, signifies, in the Arabic tongue, the lion of the faith, or of the religion; and, in the Persian language, the word Shairacûb is equivalent to the lion of the mountain. It may not be improper to remark here, that Shairacûb was the son of Shâdi, and not of Ayûb, as M. D'Herbelot is pleased to assert; and that this writer is inconsistent with himself, when, in one place he makes this general to have been the uncle of Salâh'addin, and, in another, his brother (1).

(C) We have here followed Abu'lfeda and Ebn Shobnah, two Moslem writers of exceeding good repute; though a different account of Shairacûb's conduct at this juncture, has been handed down to us by other authors. According to the latter, after Nasr Al Moslemîn, Al Dargâm's brother, had been overthrown, though his forces were much superior in number to those of the enemy, by Shâwer and Shairacûb, Shâwer immediately advanced to the suburbs of Al Kâbirah, and was received into the city. Upon this revolution, Dargâm, or Al Dargâm, endeavoured to make his escape; but having been killed by a person who did not know him, his head was cut off, and exposed to the view of all his adherents. In the mean time, Shâwer, having been informed, that Shairacûb was endeavouring to circumvent him, in order to render abortive his design, refused to admit him within the walls of the capital. This occasioned a terrible ferment amongst the soldiery; who plundered the citizens houses, took by force their wives from them, sold for slaves many Christians, Armenians, Turks, and Egyptians, and committed a vast number of murders in Al Kâbirah. In this tumult, one Shanûfa, a monk belonging to the convent of St. Macarius, was inhumanly butchered, for persisting in his profession of the Christian faith; and was honourably buried, after his martyrdom, in the church of St. Sergius at Mesr. All the Christian churches in and near the metropolis were pillaged, and many of them demolished; amongst the latter of which were those of Hamarah and Zahara, at a small distance from Al Kâbirah. In the mean time, Almeric, the king of the Franks, having been prevailed upon by large presents to march to Shâwer's relief, moved with the utmost expedition towards the capital of Egypt, then besieged by Shairacûb; who had ravaged all the adjacent district, in a most dreadful manner. Shairacûb, having received advice of Almeric's approach, and not being in a condition to make head against him, abandoned the siege, and fled into the country, or province, of Al Sa'id. The Franks, after they had remained about a month in their camp at Belbeis, pursued the fugitives, and at last came up with them near a place called Al Banîn, upon the frontiers of Al Sa'id. The two armies had not long been in sight of each other before a battle ensued, that was by no means decisive, though both sides sustained a very considerable loss. Shairacûb was afterwards shut up, during a considerable term, in Alexandria, by the combined army of Egyptians and Franks; but found means to escape from thence to Al Kâbirah, and even to make himself master of that city. Almeric, perceiving himself between two fires, his forces being in a manner surrounded by two Moslem armies, set on foot a negotiation between the contending powers; which, by his activity and address, terminated in an accommodation. Shâwer, by punctually performing his engagements with Almeric, denominated Meri by the Arab historians, and paying Shairacûb a stipulated sum of money, for which he was to return home, settled himself immoveably in the Wazirat, and enjoyed the dignity annexed to that sublime office until the year of the Hjre 564 (2).

however that may be, as both Al Dargâm and his brother were put to the sword, Shâwer had now no competitor to dispute with him the post of Wazîr to the Fâtemite Khalîf. We are told by Abu'lfeda, that Al Sâheb Talây' Ebn Zarîc reposed great confidence in this minister, made him governor of Al Sa'id, or the Upper Egypt, and advised his son Al Mâlec Al 'Adel, a little before he expired, never to remove him from that government; which rendered him extremely powerful, and even next in dignity to the Wazîr. But Al Mâlec Al 'Adel, continues that writer, after his father's death, rejecting this salutary advice, ordered Shâwer to retire out of the province of Al Sa'id; upon which, he assembled all the forces under his command, marched against the Wazîr, drove him from Al Kâbirab, and at last, having secured his person, put him to death. After which, he seized all the treasures that had been amassed by the house of Zarîc; the glory and lustre of which, by this catastrophe, intirely vanished. Towards the close of this year, Soltân Arslân made a progress to Esfabân. He was met by the Atâbek Zenki Salgari, who commanded in that city, and took the oath of allegiance to him. This so pleased the Soltân, that he confirmed him in his government, of which he extended his limits as far as the province of Fârs. Before the end of the present year, died Jamâlo'ddîn Abu Jaasar Mohâmméd Ali Mansûr Al Esfabânî, Wazîr to Kotbo'ddîn Mawdûd Ebn Zenki, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel. Ebn Shohnab remarks, that none of his slaves (D) or domestics survived him a whole year. After his death, Asad'oddîn Shairacûb Ebn Shâdi, Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki's general, his faithful friend, carried his corps, through Mecca to Medina, where he desired to be inhumed; it having, in Jamâlo'ddîn's life-time, been agreed between them, that the survivor should conduct the body of the other to that place, and bury it there. Asado'ddîn Shairacûb Ebn Shâdi appointed persons to attend the corps, and proclaim prayers in every town they came to for the repose of the deceased's soul. They were also ordered to read certain portions of the Korân, both upon the road, and at every village where they proposed to stop. Upon their arrival at Mecca, the body was carried round the Caaba. From thence it was conveyed to Medina, and deposited in a little chapel, built by Jamâlo'ddîn himself for that purpose, about fifteen cubits, according to Ebn Shohnab, from the tomb of prophet. At the time of his interment, after prayers had been said over him, some verses were pronounced in his praise, which have been preserved by Ebn Shohnab. Jamâlo'ddîn repaired, or rather rebuilt, the mosque on the 'Akaba, or eminence, in the valley of Mîna, denominated Al Kaif (E), about a parasang from Mecca, and settled a very considerable annual sum both upon the Khalîf Al Moktâfi, the supreme pontiff of the Moslems, and the Sâheb of Mecca; for which benefactions he was dignified with the title, or surname, of Jamâlo'ddîn, that is, the beauty, or excellency, of the religion. He likewise ornamented the Caaba, erected the mosque on mount Arafât, with the stairs up to it, raised several other edifices on the same hill, surrounded the city of Medina with a wall, and constructed a bridge over the Tigris, at the island of Ebn Omar, of iron, lead, mortar and stone; though this last work was not finished, at the time of his death. Nasr Ebn Khalaf, the king of Sejîstân, also departed this life, after he had lived above an hundred, and reigned eighty years, being succeeded by his son Abu'l Fatab Ahmed Ebn Nasr, in the year that we are now upon *.

Abu'l Hasan
Hebatallah
died.

In the 560th year of the Hejra, beginning Nov. 18th, 1164, died Abu'l Hasan Hebatallah Ebn Sa'id Ebn Al Talmîd, a Christian physician of Baghdâd, known by the surname of Emîr Al Dowlab, in the month of Sâfar, when he had almost completed the hundredth year of his age. He was a person of immense erudition, and commonly styled the phoenix of the age. He served in the quality of physician the Khalîfs of the house of Al Abbâs, and acquired great honour and reputation in their service. The success that attended his practice was equal to the skill he always discovered in his profession. Hebatallah Ebn Sa'id Ebn Al Talmîd was an old man of a comely aspect, an handsome person, an admirable

(D) The original Arabic of Ebn Shohnab, translated literally, is, And all that served Jamâlo'ddîn were gathered to him in the space of one year; a similar expression to which sometimes occurs in holy writ, as very clearly appears from the passages here referred to. From whence in conjunction with numberless other instances, that might with equal facility be produced, the great affinity between the Hebrew and Arabic tongues, even as the latter is still spoken in the East, may be very easily perceived (1).

(E) Khaif properly signifies the lower part, or descent, of a mountain; and is translated in Latin by Golius, clivus montis, depressior ejus pars, collis. This mosque, therefore, received the name of Al Khaif from its situation. The following words of Golius, Al Khaif, delubrum in monte Mina prope Meccam, quod in ejus clivo extructum, put the point here insisted on beyond dispute (2).

disposition,

- a disposition, excellent conversation, deep thought, uncommon sagacity, consummate prudence, and a most sublime genius. He was also happy in his conjectures, and wrote exceeding fine verses; a few of which have been handed down to us by Abu'l Faraj. He possessed the favour of the most powerful princes, and particularly the Khalifs of Baghdâd, in a vast degree; who loaded him with riches and honours, notwithstanding he professed a different religion. His virtues and learning were so conspicuous, that the Mohammedans, says Ebn Shohnah, were astonished that he never became a convert to Islamism. But, continues the same author, God illuminates whom he pleases, and whom he pleases he permits to go astray. He waited once a week on the Khalif Al Moktafi; who, on account of his age and experience, ever paid him the highest regard. His understanding
- b remained sound and perfect to the last. Hebatallah Ebn Malcâ Abu'l Baracât, another celebrated physician, who was originally a Jew, but in the latter part of his life turned Mohammedan, excelled likewise at this time in every branch of antient literature. He composed the book, intituled, Al Mo'tabar; which treats, in a clear and perspicuous manner, of logic, natural philosophy, and metaphysics, without touching upon any mathematical subjects. Abu'l Baracât having cured one of the Soltâns of the Seljuks, who sent for him from Baghdâd for that purpose; he was amply rewarded with money, horses, rich cloaths, and other valuable presents, by that prince. After this, he returned to Irâk. But, notwithstanding the wealth and reputation he had acquired, being lampooned by Ebn Aflab, who published some satyrical verses upon him, that have been preserved by Abu'l Faraj; he professed himself a Moslem, in order to be the more revered. He performed so many admirable cures, that the Mohammedans surnamed him Abu'l Baracât, that is, the father of benedictions. Before his death, he was both blind and deaf, and was rendered by an inveterate leprosy a most miserable object. He ordered the following short epitaph to be inscribed on his tomb, Here lies Abu'l Baracât, the author of the book Al Mo'tabar. It may not be amiss to observe, that these two eminent physicians seem to have been confounded by Ebn Shohnah; from whom, however, we may infer, that one of them penned the physical treatise bearing the title of Akrâbâdhîn, that is the book of antidotes, or compound medicines, though to which of them this piece is to be ascribed he has not certainly determined. But to whichever of them it is to be attributed, it was held by the gentlemen of the faculty in the East, if this writer may
- d be credited, in no small esteem. Hebatallah Ebn Al Hosein Ebn Ali Al Esfabâni, a physician of transcendent merit, who practised at Esfabân, and has been represented by Abu'l Faraj as the ornament of the age in which he lived, was also one of Abu'l Hasan Hebatallah Ebn Sa'id Ebn Al Talmid's cotemporaries. He was a Mohammedan, and died suddenly of an apoplexy, after the year of the Hejra 530, according to Abu'l Faraj; having been buried, probably, before he was dead, in a vault of his house, as he was found sitting upon one of the steps leading thereto, some months after the accident happened. His poetical performances are said to have been elegant and neat; of which a distich, inscribed on the walls of a bath, in a friend's house, has been preserved as a specimen, by the last mentioned author. In the Khalifat of Al Moktafi, when Abu'l Hasan Hebatallah Ebn Sa'id Ebn Al Talmid
- c flourished, Abu'l Helm Al Magrebi, or Mogrebi, Al Andalusi, a Spanish Moslem physician, esteemed as one of the most learned of his cotemporaries, made likewise a considerable figure. He undertook a journey from Andalusia to Irâk, and settled for some time at Baghdâd. Here he soon grew famous, being as much distinguished by his knowledge of Euclid, as by his chearful and facetious conversation, and read to a vast number of scholars. Retiring afterwards from Irâk, he seems to have been drawn into the neighbourhood of Damascus by the surprizing fertility of the district appertaining to that delightful city. Here he kept an apothecary's shop, and prescribed to many patients as a physician, with good success to the end of his days. With regard to Hebatallah Ebn Sa'id Ebn Al Talmid's sons, one of them, named Ebn Al Masîhi, was a Catholic, an ecclesiastical officer, next in dignity to the patriarch; Abu'l Khair, another of them, was an archdeacon; and Abu'l Hasan Sa'id Al Hadîri, the third, was physician to the Khalif Al Nâser Ledini'llah, and acquired a good deal of reputation in his art; which his brother, the archdeacon, also professed. The pride and insolence of Hebatallah Ebn Malcâ Abu'l Baracât, as well as the humility of Abu'l Hasan Hebatallah Ebn Sa'id Ebn Talmid, have been taken particular notice of by Abu'l Faraj<sup>1</sup>.

THE same year, if we can depend upon what has been advanced on this head by M. Other events
Renaudot, John, the patriarch of the Jacobites at Alexandria, departed this life, and was buried of the year in the church of St. Mercury at Mesr. Whilst he sat in the patriarchal see, the Najâshi,<sup>560.</sup> or king of Ethiopia, wrote to Ali Ebn Selâr, the Fâtemite Khalif's Wazîr, to beg he would compel him to ordain a new metropolitan of Ethiopia; though Mikhâyel, formerly called

Habib, the metropolitan, was then living. This the patriarch absolutely refused to do, <sup>a</sup> as such a procedure would have been contrary to the usage and discipline till that time observed in the Jacobite church. The metropolitan had not only disapproved of the conduct of the Ethiopian monarch, who was an usurper, but likewise reproved him in very sharp terms for his usurpation. The Najâshi, therefore, desired to have him deposed, and a creature of his own substituted in his room; which induced him to write upon that subject both to the patriarch and the Wazîr; but without effect, as the Wazîr could not constrain the patriarch to obey his commands. John was succeeded by Mark, the son of Zaraa, named before Abu'l Faraj Ebn Abu Sabad, a learned Syrian of extraordinary great merit, and extremely well versed in ecclesiastical affairs; who was elected unanimously, not long after his predecessor's decease. It may not be improper to remark, that Khosrû Mâlec reigned at Lahâwar, the capital of Hend, or Hind, according to Mirkbond, the present year. He was, if that writer may be credited, the last prince of the house of Gazna. <sup>b</sup>

Nûro'ddîn
takes the castle
of Al Moneidera.

THE following year, being the 561st of the Hejra, which commenced Nov. 7th, 1165, Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki, took from the Franks the castle of Al Moneidera in Syria; which was a place at no great distance from Tripoli, of considerable strength. This year, Enbanej, who still kept his ground in Mazanderân, entered into an alliance with the Shâh of Khawârazm; by whom being assisted with a large body of troops he penetrated into the Persian Irâk, and ravaged the country about Abber and Kazwîn. But Arslân, attended by Ildighîz, the Atâbek of Adherbijân, coming on him by surprize, obliged him to fly to his old retreat. We must beg leave to remark, that Bobâ'oddîn Ebn Sheddâd, who wrote <sup>c</sup> the life of the famous Salâb'addîn, places the reduction of Al Moneidera in the year of the Hejra 362; though Abu'lfeda, with an equal appearance of truth, affirms it to have happened the preceding year <sup>n</sup>.

Shairacûh
undertakes another expedition into Egypt.

THE next year, being the 562d of the Hejra, which began Oct. 27th, 1166, Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki having received advice that Shâwer had concluded a treaty with the Franks, and being afraid that this would enable the Christians to make themselves masters of Egypt; he sent Asado'ddîn Shairacûh Ebn Shâdi with a body of 1000, as Abu'lfeda will have it, or, according to some copies of Ebn Shobnab, 2000 horse into that country. Bobâ'oddîn seems farther to intimate, that a body of infantry likewise at this time acted under his command. Shairacûh was attended by his nephew Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb, much against <sup>d</sup> his inclination, if Bobâ'oddîn Ebn Sheddâd may be credited, in this expedition. Nûro'ddîn's troops entered Egypt the 12th of the former Rabî, and soon after Shairacûh possessed himself of Al Fiza with inconsiderable loss. Shâwer, having been joined by the Franks, after that junction, put himself at the head of the combined army, went in quest of the enemy, and at last came up with them near a town called Al Abwân. A sharp engagement hereupon ensued, which ended in the defeat of Shâwer and the Franks. This victory put the whole district of Al Fiza into Shairacûh's hands, and facilitated the reduction of Alexandria, before which he in a short time presented himself. Here he left his nephew Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb with a proper garrison, and then moved with his forces towards Al Sa'id. After his departure the enemy shut up Salâb'addîn in Alexandria, and kept him there closely <sup>e</sup> besieged for the space of three months. Shairacûh therefore returned, in order to force the Franks and Egyptians to raise the siege; upon which a negotiation was set on foot, and an accommodation effected between the contending powers upon the following terms. 1. Shâwer shall pay Shairacûh a stipulated sum of money, in order to enable him to defray the expence of the expedition. 2. Upon the payment of this sum, that general shall immediately withdraw his garrison out of Alexandria, and return into Syria. Both which conditions were punctually performed, and the Egyptian troops retook possession of Alexandria, in consequence of this pacification, about the middle of the month Shawâl; and Shairacûh reached Damascus with his army, extremely weakened by his conflicts with the enemy, as well as the other casualties of war, the 18th of Dhu'lhajja, the present year. Shairacûh and Salâb'addîn had no sooner evacuated Egypt, than a new convention was signed between the Egyptians and Franks; the principal articles of which were, that the Franks should be permitted to have at Al Kâbirah a commandant and a garrison of horse, and that they should receive annually out of the public revenues of Egypt 100000 dinârs. We must not forget to relate, that Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki took Sâfitâ and Al Oreiba, or Al Oreima, in Syria, this campaign; and that the progress of his arms in that country obliged the Franks, according to Bobâ'oddîn Ebn Sheddâd, to retire out of Egypt, and repair <sup>f</sup>

a to Syria, to defend their territories there. About the same time, Gâzi Ebn Al Hasan, the Sâheb of Manbij, rebelled against Nûro'ddîn Ebn Zenki, in that city. He was therefore driven from thence, by a body of Nûro'ddîn's forces, that he found himself too weak to oppose, and the government of Manbij was conferred upon Kotbo'ddîn Yanâl Ebn Al Hasan, his brother. It appears from Bohâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, that Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki demolished the fortrefs of Acâf in the desarts of Shâm, and pillaged the town of Honein on mount 'Amila, after he had been reinforced by his brother Kotbo'ddîn and Zîno'ddîn Ali Ebn Sabektekîn, in the month of Shawâl of the year that we are now upon °.

THE 563d year of the Hejra, commencing Oct. 17th, 1167, produced two or three remarkable events, according to the eastern writers. Zeno'ddîn, or Zinoddîn Ali Ebn Sabektekîn, Kotbo'ddîn Mawdûd Ebn Zenki's deputy at Al Mawfel, left that city, and retired to Arbel, the Arbela of the antients. The latter of these places is now corruptly called Irbil, and has a situation assigned it by Abu'lfeda in the district of Shabrezâr; of which it is denominated the metropolis by that author. Zîno'ddîn was the Sâheb of Arbel, and possessed of very considerable territories; all of which, except Arbel and its dependencies, he ceded to Kotbo'ddîn Mawdûd Ebn Zenki, at the time of his departure from Al Mawfel. He died at Arbel, in the month of Dhu'lhajja, the present year. With regard to his character, he has been represented as brave, prudent, upright in all his actions, of an excellent disposition, and extremely liberal, by Abu'l Faraj. As an instance of his liberality, that author mentions the presents he made to Al Hîs Bîs, a Moslem poet, who wrote a copy of verses in praise of him; which consisted of 500 dinârs in money, a sumptuous vest, and other costly garments, the whole amounting to the value of 1000 dinârs. This year, Enbanej, who had rebelled against Soltân Arslân, and set up for himself in Mazanderân, invaded the country about Al Ray, and defeated Mohammed, the son of Ildighîz, the Atâbek of Adherbijân, who was sent against him. Hereupon Ildighîz himself marched at the head of Arslân's forces, in order to re-establish his affairs. Being arrived at Al Ray, he made several propositions to Enbanej; who thereupon agreed to go with him, and make his submission to the Soltân: but the night before this ceremony was to be performed, Enbanej was killed in his lodgings, no one being ever afterwards able to discover either the cause or the author of this unexpected event. The Soltân, on this news, gave the government of Al Ray to the son of Ildighîz, who soon after married the only daughter of Enbanej. The fruit of this marriage was Kâtlûk, or Cotlûk, surnamed Enbanej, or rather Fakbro'ddîn Enbanej, and denominated Kiligh by M. D'Herbelot. It appears from Mirkbond, that Khosru Mâlec, the last of the family of Sabektekîn, who had reigned at Lahâwar, in Hend, or Hind, that is, India, died at Gazna, to which place he had been conducted as a prisoner by Gayâtho'ddîn Mohammed Al Gauri, after he had taken Lahâwar, the present year °.

IN the 564th year of the Hejra, beginning Oct. 5th, 1168, Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki sent an army, under the command of Fakbro'ddîn Mas'ûd Ebn Abu Ali Al Za'frânî, to reduce the castle of Ja'bar, a place of considerable strength upon the Euphrates, in the province of Diyâr Becr, and opposite to Seffein. Fakbro'ddîn, having been reinforced by a body of troops, under the orders of Majdo'ddîn Abu Becr Ebn Al Dâya, Nûro'ddîn's foster-brother, laid siege to that fortrefs, and for some time attacked it with great vigour; but without effect. However, Nûro'ddîn having gotten Shahâbo'ddîn Mâlec Ebn Ali Ebn Mâlec, descended from Al Mosayyeb, the Okeilite Arab, then the Sâheb of Ja'bar, into his hands; he obliged that prince to cede it to him, for the city of Sarûj, with its dependencies, Al Malûb, in the territory of Aleppo, Bâb Bezâga, in the prefecture of Kinnîsrîn, and 20,000 dinârs. It may not be improper to remark, that the family of Al Mosayyeb Al Okeili, or Al Okaili, had been possessed of the castle of Ja'bar, ever since the days of Mâlec Shâh °.

THE same year, the Franks having taken (E) Belbeis, or Pelusium, the first of Safar, and being grown superior to the Moslems in Egypt, Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki sent Asado'ddîn Shaira-

(E) We are told by some writers, that the Franks, taking advantage of the discords and dissensions which at this time prevailed amongst the Moslem princes, made an irruption, under the command of Almeric, king of Jerusalem, into Egypt, and took by storm the city of Belbeis. If these writers may be credited, Almeric treated the inhabitants of that place, both Christians and Moslems, as well as the garrison, on this occasion, with uncommon cruelty; the town being given to up the soldiers to be plundered, and all the troops and people in it being either carried into captivity or put to the sword. Shawer, continue they, having received advice of Almeric's having traversed the vast desert between Syria and Egypt, and entered the latter of those countries themselves

masters of Egypt.

Shairacûb Ebn Shâdi, his general, to drive them from thence, with an army of 80,000 horse. <sup>a</sup> After the Franks had carried the city of Belbeis by storm, they advanced to Al Kâbirab; which they invested the tenth of Safar, and then formed the siege of that capital. Shâwer, the Fâtemite Khalîf's Wazîr, had set on fire the antient city of Mesr, and ordered all the inhabitants to depart from thence to Al Kâbirab, before the Franks appeared in the neighbourhood of that place. This step had been taken, in order to prevent them from occupying Mesr. The Khalîf Al 'Aded, being reduced to great distress by this irruption of the Franks, had implored the assistance and protection of Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki; who thereupon commanded his troops to move, with the utmost expedition, towards the frontiers of Egypt. In the mean time, Shâwer endeavoured to amuse the Franks, by paying them 100,000 dinârs, and promising them 900,000 more, if they would raise the siege; <sup>b</sup> not being able, as he pretended, to collect the last-mentioned sum, as long as they continued before Al Kâbirab. Hereupon, according to Abu'lfeda, the Franks immediately decamped, and returned home. Khondemir, however, seems to intimate, that the approach of the Moslem forces under Shairacûb obliged them to retire out of Egypt. Be that as it will, Nûro'ddîn's army entered Egypt in the former Rabî; being received by the Egyptian Moslems as their deliverers, with open arms. Asado'ddîn Shairacûb Ebn Shâdi, having met with nothing to impede his march, reached Al Kâbirab, then abandoned by the Franks, the 4th of the latter Rabî, to the great joy of the Khalîf Al 'Aded; who invited him to the imperial palace, had a conference with him, and made him a present of the Soltân's Kaftân, or royal vest. He had before received from Nûro'ddîn no less than 200,000 dinârs, besides a <sup>c</sup> sumptuous Kaftân, arms, and many beasts of burden, for his own particular use. The Fâtemite Khalîf also loaded him with presents, as well as the principal officers of the troops under his command. Shairacûb was attended by Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb, his nephew, fore against his will, in this expedition. Shâwer, Al 'Aded's Wazîr, who had egregiously failed in the performance of his engagements, by not remitting to Nûro'ddîn the third part of the public revenues of Egypt, waited every day upon Shairacûb, made him large promises, and endeavoured to excuse his iniquitous conduct. He likewise expressed the highest regard for Shairacûb, Salâb'addîn, and all Nûro'ddîn's other Emîrs; though he had formed a design to invite them to a splendid entertainment in the Wazîr's palace at Al Kâbirab, and secure all their persons there. But this soon transpiring, Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb and <sup>d</sup> Jardîc took an opportunity of seizing him, as they were conducting him to Shairacûb, who went that morning to visit the famous Al Shâfeî's tomb. Shâwer's servants, seeing what had happened to their master, immediately betook themselves to flight. After which, he was brought bound to Shairacûb, the 7th of the latter Rabî. The Khalîf Al 'Aded was no sooner informed of Shâwer's perfidy and imprisonment, than he dispatched a messenger to Shairacûb to demand his head; which was instantly cut off, by Shairacûb's order, and sent him without delay. Al 'Aded then honoured Shairacûb with the robe worn by the Wazîr, and dignified him with the title of Al Mâlec Al Mansûr. Adorned with this robe, Shairacûb repaired directly to the Wazîr's palace, where Shâwer had lived; and was, by an instrument drawn up for that purpose, by the Khalîf himself, part of the form of which Abu'lfeda has preserved, settled in the sublime post of Wazîr. <sup>e</sup> After the return of the messenger, with Shâwer's head, to Al Kâbirab, it was fixed upon the point of a spear, and carried through all the streets of that city. When Shairacûb, however entered the metropolis, both the populace and the soldiery rose upon him, and attacked him with unparalleled fury. Upon which, in order to pacify them, he cried out "The Khalîf has given you all the " immense treasures that Shâwer has amassed." This diverted their rage against Shairacûb, and drove them to Shâwer's palace; which they thoroughly plundered, and stript of every thing valuable belonging to it. Shairacûb was now received every-where with loud acclamations, and all possible demonstrations of joy. He was also congratulated in verse, upon his elevation to the Wazîrat, by El Yamâd, the Syrian, and the other most celebrated poets <sup>f</sup> of the age. Some of the verses published on this occasion by Al Yamâd, as well as by 'Arkela of Damascus, have been handed down to us by Abu'lfeda, in the piece so often refer-with a numerous army, sent an ambassador to Nûro'ddîn to implore his assistance against the enemies of their common religion. Hereupon Shairacûb, by Nûro'ddîn's order, set out at the head of a formidable army for Egypt; and, by forced marches, arrived in the neighbourhood of Al Kâbirab, then besieged by Almeric, before Shâwer was reduced to the last extremity by the Franks. Almeric, being informed of Shairacûb's approach, raised the siege, and advanced to give him battle. But Shairacûb, being more intent upon occupying Egypt than defending it, declined an engagement, and joined the Egyptian forces under Shâwer; of which Almeric receiving advice, he made the best of his way home. Shâwer's conduct on this occasion has been considered in two different lights, by the historians of this age; some accusing him of perfidy and infidelity to the Franks, and others acquitting him of that imputation. But however this may be, several authors do not scruple to affirm, that Almeric might very easily have made himself master of Al Kâbirab, had he not shamefully loitered away his time, after the reduction of Belbeis, before Shairacûb could possibly, notwithstanding the celerity of his march, have arrived with all his forces before that place (1).

a red to here. Al Cāmel, Shāwēr's son, lived as a private person in the palace, to the time of his death; so that Shairacūb enjoyed the high dignity to which he had been advanced, without any opposition, or fear of a competitor. Notwithstanding which, the supreme authority he had acquired was not, according to the eastern historians, of any considerable duration. For, if they may be credited in this particular, he died, as some say, of a debauch, after he had governed the Fātemite empire only two months, and five days, on the twenty-second of the latter Jomāda, being Saturday, in the year that we are now upon<sup>r</sup>.

WITH regard to the origin of Shairacūb, and his brother Ayūb, the father of Salāh'addīn, The origin of or Salāh'addīn, who attended his uncle in the aforesaid expedition, they are universally Shairacūb and allowed to have been Rawādīan Curds, and originally of the city of Dawīn. They afterwards removed into Irāk, and offered their service to Babrūz, the Seljūkian governor of Baghdād and the province of Irāk. Babrūz, finding them men of merit, made Ayūb, the elder of them, commandant of Tecrīt, and appointed his brother Shairacūb to serve under him there. However, they did not arrive at this preferment, before they had gone through all the military posts with great honour and reputation. Ebn Al Fārṣī, an antient oriental writer of considerable note, relates, that their father Shādi entered first into Babrūz's service, and took care to get them advanced in the army, at a proper time; though the former opinion has been adopted by Ebn Shohnah, Ebn 'Al Athīr, and Abu'l Faraj, as well as by Abu'lfeda and Al Makīn. The Atābek 'Amādo'ddīn Zenki, having been routed by the Khalīf's forces, fled to Tecrīt, and met with many civilities and good offices, both from Ayūb and Shairacūb. Some time after, Shairacūb killed a Christian scribe, or secretary, at Tecrīt; which so incensed Mojābedo'ddīn Babrūz, who was a great lover of justice, that he expelled both him and his brother Ayūb that city. This happened in the year of the Hejra 532, the very night, if M. Renaudot's authors may be depended upon, that Salāh'addīn was born. After their expulsion from Tecrīt, the two brothers retired to the Atābek 'Amādo'ddīn Zenki's court, and took on in his service. That prince, remembering the favours he had formerly received from them, loaded them with presents, and bestowed some of his territories upon them. They had not been long at Al Mawṣel, then 'Amādo'ddīn's residence, before the Atābek conferred upon Ayūb the post of commandant of the citadel of Baalbec, which he had lately made himself master of. After Zenki's violent death, the troops of Damascus besieged Baalbec; which Ayūb delivered into their hands, by way of exchange for several other territories and districts, that were ceded to him. This so conciliated to him the affections of the Damascenes, that he was thenceforth considered as their general and commander in chief. As for Shairacūb, he remained with Nūro'ddīn Mahmūd, Zenki's son; who assigned him the government of Rahaba upon the Euphrates, Hems, and other cities. Being likewise acquainted with his bravery, and skill in the military art, he constituted him generalissimo of all his forces. Nūro'ddīn being afterwards desirous of annexing Damascus, with its dependencies, to his dominions; he employed Shairacūb to write to his brother Ayūb, for his assistance in this affair. Shairacūb took his measures so well, and managed this arduous point with so much address, that Ayūb prevailed upon the Damascenes to recognize the authority of that prince. These two able ministers, and great captains, presided over Nūro'ddīn's councils, till the first expedition he undertook into Egypt; when none of his other generals being found so capable of conducting an enterprize of such importance as Shairacūb, he was pitched upon to command the troops to be employed in that expedition. What happened to him from that time to the day of his death, it would be superfluous, as this has been already related at large, even barely to touch upon here<sup>s</sup>.

THOUGH there were many Emīrs, superior both in years and reputation to Salāh'addīn, Salāh'addīn who aspired at the dignity or Wazīr, such were 'Aino'ddawla Al Yārūki, Kotbo'ddīn Yanāl Al Manbijī, Saifo'ddīn Ali Ebn Ahmed Al Māsbūb Al Haccāri, and Shāhābo'ddīn Mahmūd Al Hāremī, Salāh'addīn's uncle; yet the Khalīf Al 'Aded thought fit (F) to promote to that high post of Wazīr;

(F) It has been observed by Abu'l Faraj, that the grandees of Al 'Aded's court advised him to make Salāh'addīn his Wazīr; because, as he was younger than, and inferior in dignity to, the other Emīrs, he would not, as they apprehended, be so likely to lift up his head above theirs, and treat them with contempt. Another author pretends, that Al 'Aded advanced him to the post of Wazīr; imagining that his elevation would so incense all the elder and principal Emīrs, that they would be tempted to destroy him. This, if true, seems to shew, that Al 'Aded was then afraid of him (1).

imploiment Salâb'addîn, and to dignify him with the title of Al Mâlec Al Nâfir. The title <sup>a</sup> imports, the king the defender. But, notwithstanding Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb had been honoured by the Khalîf Al 'Aded with the sublime office of Wazîr, the above-mentioned Emîrs, who envied him the supreme authority, refused to obey his orders, and to act in concert with him. However, they were at last all brought over by the Fakîh Isâ Al Hacâcri, except 'Ainô'ddawla Al Yârûki; who declared he would never submit to Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb, and returned to Nûro'ddîn's court at Damascus. In the mean time, though Salâb'addîn acted as Wazîr to the Khalîf of Egypt, he considered himself as Nûro'ddîn's deputy in that kingdom. Nor did that prince himself view him in any other light. When he wrote to Salâb'addîn, he gave him only the title of Al Emîr Al Esfahselâr, or generalissimo of his forces, and prefixed his seal to the head of the letter, without inserting his name. Nor did <sup>b</sup> he ever dispatch his orders to him alone, but addressed them to him in the following terms: Let Al Emîr Al Esfahselâr, Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb and our other Emîrs in Egypt do so and so. When Salâb'addîn had secured to himself the charge of Wazîr, and found himself master of the Khalîfat of Egypt, he distributed all the immense treasures of Shairacûb, and those which he had extorted from the Fâtemite Khalîf, amongst the Emîrs and the troops; by which instance of liberality, he won their hearts, and absolutely conciliated their affections to him. He likewise abstained from wine and gaming, to which he had been before extremely addicted; and, as it should seem, in order to expiate his former crimes, resolved to enter upon a holy war, and attempt to drive the Christians out of the Moslem territories they had possessed themselves of. He also circumvented and cut off the <sup>c</sup> commander of the Blacks, or Negroes, that guarded the imperial palace, and garrisoned the citadel of Al Kâhîrab; putting, after a sharp engagement, the greatest part of those troops to the sword. That officer, though an eunuch, was a person of uncommon resolution and magnanimity, and for some time singly opposed the power of the new Wazîr. The destruction, or rather excision, of this corps opened a passage for Salâb'addîn into the castle; who thereupon appointed Bohâo'ddîn Karâkûsh, a white eunuch, commandant of that place, and assigned him a proper garrison for its defence. Salâb'addîn, being thus master of Egypt, begged Nûro'ddîn would send his father Nojmo'ddîn Ayûb Ebn Sbâdi, and all the members of his family then at Damascus, to him; which request being granted, upon their arrival in Egypt, he treated them with uncommon marks of distinction, made them <sup>d</sup> many rich presents, and settled upon them lands and possessions of very considerable value. Nay, if Bohâo'ddîn in this point merits any regard, he offered to resign the Wazîrat itself to his father Ayûb, who declined accepting that arduous post; though this runs counter to Abu'l Faraj, who clearly intimates, that Nûro'ddîn insisted upon Ayûb's family's submission to Salâb'addîn, as the essential condition of his permitting them to fix their residence in Egypt. This year, died Abu Mohammed Al Irâki, the Sâheb of the exterior Karâmat, or Karâmata; as did likewise Bârûk, the son of Arslân Al Turkmâni, a man of prodigious parts, who dwelt in the suburbs of Aleppo, where he went under the appellation of Al Bani-kia, and was held amongst the people of that city, of all ranks and degrees, in vast esteem.

The most material events of the year 565.

THE following year, being the 565th of the Hejra, which commenced Sept. 25th, 1169, proved fortunate and prosperous to Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb, the Fâtemite Khalîf's Wazîr; whose power still increased, whilst that of Al 'Aded went more and more to decay, in Egypt. This year, the Franks formed the siege of Dimiyât, or Damiata; which, as they had a vast train of military engines with them, for some time they carried on with extraordinary vigour. However, Salâb'addîn having taken care to furnish the place with a numerous garrison, and to supply it copiously with all kinds of provisions and military stores; the besiegers were obliged to abandon the enterprize, and retire, after they had lain before the town fifty-four days, and sustained a very considerable loss. Their retreat nevertheless seems to have been in some measure owing to an impression made by Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki upon their territories in Syria. But, though ill success attended their arms in Egypt, they reduced the castle of 'Acâr, or Accara, in Syria, and loaded with irons Khot-lakh, one of Nûro'ddîn's slaves, who commanded there, in the latter Rabî; which induced Nûro'ddîn, in order to make a diversion, to besiege Al Carac, or Al Crac, in Arabia Petraea, in the month of Shaabân, though without effect. For, a strong body of Franks advancing out of Palestine to the relief of that fortress, he thought fit to decamp, without venturing a battle. This misfortune was immediately followed by the death of Majdo'ddîn Ebn Al Dâya, who departed this life at Aleppo, to the great regret of Nûro'ddîn, in the month of Ramadân. He was that prince's foster-brother, had vast influence over him, as he was a <sup>e</sup> <sup>f</sup> person

- a person of consummate abilities, and presided over the people of Aleppo, Ja'bar, and Hârm. Majdo'ddîn Abu Becr Ebn Al Dâya being dead, Nûro'ddîn conferred the government of those places upon Ali, that Sâheb's son. About this time, an earthquake made dreadful havock in Syria; Aleppo, and several other towns, being almost intirely destroyed by the violence of the shocks. This excited Nûro'ddîn to make a progress through that part of his dominions; but being informed at Tel Bâsher, or Tel Basbar, a castle of prodigious strength, with a prefecture belonging to it, two days journey, or two mansions, N. of Aleppo, that his brother Kotbo'ddîn died the 22d of Dbu'lhajja at Al Mawfel, he hastened towards that city. Kotbo'ddîn Mawdûd Ebn Zenki Ebn Aksanker, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel, was carried off by an acute or ardent fever, after he had lived forty, and reigned twenty-one years. He has been represented both by Abu'lfeda and Ebn Shohnab as one of the best princes, in all respects, of the age in which he lived. In his last illness, according to Abu'l Faraj, he first appointed his eldest son 'Amâdo'ddîn Zenki to succeed him; but afterwards, as we find intimated by the same author, at the instigation of Fakbro'ddîn Abd'al Masîh, the eunuch; his prime minister, who hated 'Amâdo'ddîn, on account of his attachment, to Nûro'ddîn, he transferred the succession to Al Moezz Saifo'ddîn Gâzi, his younger son. Khâtûn Bint Hosâmo'ddîn Tamartâsh, the mother of those young princes, by acting in concert with Fakbro'ddîn in this affair, not a little contributed to the exclusion of her elder son 'Amâdo'ddîn from the throne. Abu'lfeda does not precisely agree in the point before us with Abu'l Faraj. If he may be credited, the noblesse elected Saifo'ddîn for their prince, after his father's demise. But however that may be, Amâdo'ddîn, as soon as the aforesaid injury had been offered him, fled to his uncle Nûro'ddîn, who hated Fakbro'ddîn Abd'al Masîh, in order to solicit succours, whereby he might be enabled to assert his right to the crown. Before the close of this year, died Abu Hâshem Mohammed Ebn Dhâfar Al Mekki, sometimes denominated by the eastern writers Abu'l Hasan Al Moâzzi, the author of a piece intituled Solwân Al Motâa, the comfort of resignation, a book of morality and devotion, held in the highest repute amongst the Moslems. It contains the principal motives of consolation in all the evils of life. The work is divided into five chapters, comprehending the five sources from whence consolation is to be derived. The first of these bears the title of Tafwîd, the resignation of one's self into the hands of God; the second that of Bas, the forces of the soul and the courage; the third that of Sabr, the patience; the fourth that of Ridha, the conformity to the will of God; and the fifth that of Zehed, the retired and austere life. M. D'Herbelot tells us, that this treatise was composed in the year of the Hejra 565; and that the author thereof died in the 568th year of that æra; which runs counter to what we have extracted here from Ebn Shohnab. A manuscript copy of the Solwân Al Motâa is preserved in the French king's library, num. 923. This celebrated piece was turned into verse by Tâjo'ddîn Abu Abd'allah Ebn Ali Al Sakhawî, who died in the year of the Hejra 769. It has likewise been translated into Persian, under the title of Riâhin Al Molûk fi Riadbat Al Solûk. Dr. Hume's MS. of Ebn Shohnab makes Abu Hâshem Mohammed to have been born in Sicily; but as the authors followed by M. D'Herbelot, with a much greater degree of probability, affirm him to have been a native of Mecca, and as the Moslems had been driven out of Sicily an hundred years before the time of this writer's death, that must undoubtedly be a mistake. The Khalîf Al 'Aded sent to Salâh'addîn, his Wazîr, for the use of the garison of Dimiyât, whilst the Franks lay before that place, out of his own private treasury, no less than 1,000,000 dinârs <sup>u</sup>.

- THE next year, being the 566th of the Hejra, which began Sept. 14th, 1170, Al Imâm Al Mostanjed Bîllah Abu'l Modhaffer Yusef Ebn Al Moktâfi, the Khalîf of Baghdâd, departed this life, the ninth of the latter Rabî. He was born in the year of the Hejra 510, and reigned about eleven years. This prince was a great lover of justice, and one of the best of the Khalîfs. Having thrown a certain calumniator; or false accuser, into prison, and detained him long there; one of the grandees of his court offered him the sum of 10,000 dinârs, if he would release this prisoner. Upon which, the Khalîf said to him, "If you can find me another man with all his bad qualities, I will presently pay you down the same sum; for I should be extremely glad to purge my dominions of such a pestiferous fellow." His death was effected in the following manner, according to Abu'l Faraj. Having commanded his physician Ebn Safiya to write in his name to the Wazîr, and order him to affix to a gibbet, erected for that purpose, Kotbo'ddîn Kâymâz and the prefect of the palace; Ebn Safiya, his master then being at the point of death, shewed them the letter. Perceiving their fate therefore to be inevitable, if the Khalîf recovered, they entered his apartment, attended by some of their friends, carried him from thence by force, and shut

Al Mostadi Ebn Al Mostanjed is proclaimed Khalif.

THE same day that Al Mostanjed died, that is, the 9th of the latter Rabi, 566, Abu Moham-med Al Hasan, his son, was by all Al Mostanjed's domestics saluted Khalif; and, the next day, the principal lords of the court, in the portico, or piazza, belonging to the imperial palace, called Al Taj, or the crown, took the oath of allegiance to him. He then assumed the title or surname of Al Mostadi Beamri'llah; and was afterwards more eminent for his distribution of justice amongst his subjects than even Al Mostanjed himself, who so greatly excelled in this particular. He was also extremely liberal, and gave away vast sums of money, whilst he sat on the Moslem throne. The arts and sciences likewise flourished, in every part of his dominions, throughout the whole course of his reign<sup>x</sup>.

Nûro'ddin reduces the principal towns of Mesopotamia.

THE same year, Nûro'ddin Mahmûd Ebn Zenki receiving advice, that his nephew Saïfo'ddin Gâzi was intirely under the direction of Fakbro'ddin Abd'al Masîh, who governed his kingdom with an absolute sway, and being resolved to dislodge that minister from the young prince's councils; he advanced at the head of a body of horse to Ja'bar, passed the Euphrates there (F), occupied Al Rakka, Al Khâbûr, and Nasîbin, and laid siege to Sanjâr. This soon after surrendering to him, he delivered it into his nephew 'Amâdo'ddin's hands. From thence he marched first to the city of Balad, and afterwards to the castle of Nînûi, or Nineveh, where he incamped. He then crossed the Tigris, and presented himself before Al Mawfel. Fâkbro'ddin finding himself not in a condition to sustain a siege, a very considerable part of the walls of that city having fallen down the very day that Nûro'ddin appeared; he thought fit, on the first summons, to capitulate. The principal articles of the capitulation were, that Saïfo'ddin should remain in peaceable possession of Al Mawfel, with the territories belonging to it, in consideration of his paying annually by way of tribute a stipulated sum; that no violence should be offered either Fakbro'ddin, or any of his domestics; and that this minister should depart with Nûro'ddin into Syria. The town being put into his hands, he immediately possessed himself of the citadel, and gave orders to have the Jâma' Al Nûri erected without delay. He then acknowledged Saïfo'ddin for the Sâheb of Al Mawfel, annexed the city of Senjâr, with its dependencies, to the territories he had assigned 'Amâdo'ddin, and took Fakbro'ddin with him into Syria, after he had staid at Al Mawfel only four-and-twenty days. The tribute at first exacted of Saïfo'ddin, if Abu'l-feda may be depended upon, was afterwards remitted by Nûro'ddin; so that Saïfo'ddin enjoyed the sovereignty of Al Mawfel, and the districts appertaining to it, in the most full and plenary manner. But, notwithstanding this, the division of Kotbo'ddin Mawdûd Ebn Zenki's states between his two sons, as has been observed by Kemâlo'ddin Al Shabrezûri, proved a mortal blow to the family of the Atâbeks of Irâk. For 'Amâdo'ddin, being Kotbo'ddin Mawdûd's elder son, could not be prevailed upon to submit, in any respect, to the younger brother; who, being adorned with the title of king, insisted upon 'Amâdo'ddin's obedience to him. Hence discords and dissensions arising between them, their enemies were thereby excited to attack and overthrow a divided power; which united under one prince, as it formerly had been, would have baffled and frustrated all their designs<sup>y</sup>.

(F) It appears from Bohâo'ddin Ebn Sheddâd, that Nûro'ddin Mahmûd Ebn Zenki reduced the cities of Al Rakka and Nasîbin, in the month of Al Moharram, the present year; that, after the reduction of Senjâr, he moved towards Al Mawfel, and posted himself upon the hill Al Hîsn, opposite to that city, which surrendered, without putting him to the trouble of a siege; and that he entered Al Mawfel the 3d of the former Jomâda, his nephew Saïfo'ddin, called by this author 'Azzo'ddin,

Gâzi then being the Sâheb of the place. He adds, that Nûro'ddin did not only confirm 'Azzo'ddin Gâzi in the sovereignty of Al Mawfel, but likewise gave him his own daughter in marriage. After which, continues he, that prince ceded to his nephew 'Amâdo'ddin the city and territory of Senjâr, departed from Al Mawfel, and reached Alippo, whither he bent his march, in the month of Shaabân, the same year (1).

- a THIS year, Salâb'addîn made an irruption into the territories of the Franks, penetrated as far as 'Askalân and Al Ramla in Palestine, which for some time he kept blocked up, and then moved towards the frontiers of Egypt. He afterwards laid siege to Ela, or Aila, a maritime town on the coast of the sea Al Kolzom; which he took by storm, in the latter Rabî, and gave up to his troops to be plundered. With the last exploit he finished the campaign; and, at the conclusion of it, returned home. He also converted two of the public buildings at Al Kâbirah into schools, or colleges, for the disciples of the famous Sonnite doctor Al Shâfeî; turning at the same time all the Kâdis, or judges (G), of the Shiite persuasion out of their places, and substituting those that professed the tenets of Al Shâfeî in their room. This happened, according to Abu'lfeda, the 20th of the latter Jomâda. Takî-
- b o'ddîn Omar, Salâb'addîn's nephew, likewise purchased a most superb palace, and founded at his own expence some houses of learning or education for the youth trained up in the principles of Al Shâfeî, in the capital of Egypt, the present year<sup>2</sup>.

Salâb'addîn gains some advantages over the Franks, and disconcerts the Shiites.

- THE 567th year of the Hejra, commencing Sept. 4th, 1171, proved fatal to the Fâtemite empire in Egypt. Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki, who was a great favourer of the Sonnites, having been informed that Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb had posted a body of troops in the castle of Al Kâbirah, under the command of Karâkûsh Al Asadi, and was absolute master of the kingdom of Egypt; he sent him an order to issue an edict, injoining an omission of the name of the Khalîf Al 'Aded in the public prayers, and requiring the Egyptians to mention in the room of it that of Al Mostadi Beamrî'llah, the Khalîf of Baghdâd. In answer
- c to Nûro'ddîn's letter, Salâb'addîn wrote him word, that, as the Egyptians were for the most part followers of Ali, he was afraid such a step might occasion an insurrection, and prove extremely prejudicial to his affairs, in Egypt. But Nûro'ddîn letting Salâb'addîn know that his order was peremptory, and that he would be obeyed; the name of Al 'Aded was omitted, for the first time, on the second Friday of Al Mobarram, and that of Al Mostadi mentioned, in the mosques, throughout the Egyptian territories, in the time of divine service. When the edict issued by Salâb'addîn on this occasion was carried into execution, Al 'Aded was sick, and soon after expired; neither Salâb'addîn nor any of the Egyptian Emîrs having thought fit to acquaint him with the deprivation of his authority, by Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki's express command. Al 'Aded was no sooner dead, than Salâb'addîn
- d occupied the imperial palace, and took possession of all the treasures, which were immense, as well as the most rich and invaluable furniture (H), found therein. To the latter appertained a noble library of books, collected by the Fâtemite Khalîfs; a jacinth weighing seventeen Methkâls, or Arabic drachms, and denominated from its enormous size the jacinth-mountain; and a vast number of presents, made by many sovereign princes to Al 'Aded and his predecessors. With regard to the jacinth above-mentioned, Ebn Al Atbîr, in his Al

(G) Ebn Shohnab relates, that he likewise ejected all the Kâdis of Kâdis, or chancellors, who made profession of the sect of Ali, of which the Fâtemite Khalîf was the chief; and appointed others, who had adopted the principles of Al Shâfeî, to succeed them. We are also told, that he displaced all the governors of Egypt, who were Shiites, or followers of Ali; and filled their posts with persons of the Sonnite persuasion, professing the same tenets that he himself had espoused (2).

(H) Some writers inform us, that this furniture consisted of a vast quantity of the richest tapestry, of sumptuous garments of every sort, of porcelain and crystal cups of great price, of jewels and pearls of immense value, amongst which was an emerald a palm and an half long, a string of large rubies, weighing seventeen Egyptian Methkâls, and a union pearl as big as a pigeon's egg, besides many other things equally rare and valuable. The library in particular is said to have contained no less than 100,000 volumes, bound and written in the most beautiful manner. The books were distributed, by the order of the Fâtemite Khalîfs, amongst as many of the doctors of the law, and other learned men, as had occasion to consult them. Nor can this be matter of surprize to any one, who considers the prodigious number of pieces, formed of the works of the Moslem divines, who have interpreted the Korân, of the productions of the most eminent traditionists, professors of jurisprudence, philologers, grammarians, critics, poets, philosophers, physicians, and historians, besides the learned labours of other authors that cannot so properly be ranged under any particular class, in vogue amongst the Mohammedans. To render this the more probable, it may be observed, that the library of Hadji Kalifa, who lived not a vast number of years since, at Constantinople, consisted of above 40,000 different books; many of which, according to M. Renaudot, contained several volumes. Nor did this most ample collection exhibit any of either the writings of the antients or the African authors. As for the Christians, who excelled in any branch of literature, none of their works were here to be found. The Moslem philosophers; mathematicians, and astronomers, made likewise in this library a very inconsiderable figure. The Fâtemite Khalîfs therefore, in the course of so many years, might, without any great difficulty, have collected the number of volumes specified by some of the writers now in view. We are informed by Ebn Khalecân, that Nûb Ebn Al Mansûr Al Sammâni invited one Ismael Abu'l Kasem to come and reside with him; but that he excused himself from accepting of the invitation, because he could not bring his books along with him, 400 camels being scarce sufficient to carry them to that prince's court (3).

Câmel, relates, that he saw it, and weighed it; and represents it as a most valuable curiosity. Abu'lfeda writes, that there was also in the palace a strange and wonderful drum; which if any one struck, when he had a fit of the cholic upon him, he was presently cured. This drum, continues he, was unluckily broken, by some who were strangers to the salutary virtue it contained. Al 'Aded's family Salâb'addîn removed to a private and retired part of the palace, and placed a guard upon them. Of the Khalif's slaves some were sold, some manumitted, and others given away. As to the circumstances attending the suppression of Al 'Aded's authority in Egypt and his death, the Arab authors of the best repute are not perfectly agreed. Some of them affirm, that a Persian Sâfi, or religious, was the first that prayed for Al Mostadi Beamri'llah, the Khalif of Baghdâd, in one of the mosques at Al Kâbirah, no other person daring to do the same, for fear of exciting a tumult amongst the people; and that Salâb'addîn performed the last offices, usual on such occasions, to Al 'Aded, at his request, in his dying moments. Others say, that Salâb'addîn ordered Al 'Aded to be shut up in a certain tower, and afterwards put to death there. Lastly, others intimate, that Salâb'addîn destroyed the Fâtemite Khalif, by obliging him to suck poison out of the bezil of his brother Tûrân Shâb's ring. With respect to the person who first had the courage to mention Al Mostadi's name in one of the mosques of Al Kâbirah, we are told that he was a blind man, and went under the appellation of Al Emîr Al 'Alem, by Abu'l Faraj. According to Abu'lfeda, Al 'Aded earnestly desired to have a conference with Salâb'addîn, when he was so bad that there were scarce any hopes of his recovery; but the Wazîr, suspecting treachery on the part of the Fâtemite Khalif, refused to see him. However, finding, after his death, that there was no foundation for such a suspicion, he was vastly concerned that he had not waited upon him. That prince departed this life, if Bohâo'ddîn may be credited, the 12th of Al Mobarram; but, if we chuse to follow Abu'l Faraj, his death happened on the 10th of the same month. Thus ended the empire of the Fâtemite Khalifs in Africa, after it had continued about 271 years; above 200 of which, as appears from the preceding part of this work, they had maintained themselves upon the throne of Egypt. The princes that formed this dynasty were Shiites, who asserted Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb to have been the first lawful Khalif, and Imâm; and maintained, that the supreme authority, both in spirituals and temporals, of right belonged to his descendants. Nay, they deduced their origin from Ali himself and Fâtema, the daughter of Mohammed; and, in consequence of this pretension, assumed the name of Fâtemites. They also styled themselves Imâmians, and Imâms; intimating thereby, that they were descended in a right line from the head of that family which alone supplied the Moslem world with true and rightful Imâms. They bore an implacable hatred, and utter aversion, to the Khalifs of the house of Al Abbâs; whom they considered as intruders and usurpers, not in the least related to the family of Mohammed, and as propagators of false traditions wherever their power prevailed. As Nûro'ddîn, therefore, was a zealous Sonnite, entertained the highest regard for the Khalifs of Baghdâd, and detested the Shiites; 'tis no wonder the abolition of the Khalifat of Egypt, at this juncture, should have been his principal care. Besides, he might not only have been influenced by religious but likewise by political motives in this affair. He might think, that nothing could contribute more to the humiliation of the Franks, who were then grown formidable to him, than a re-union of the Moslems under one common spiritual head<sup>a</sup>.

As soon as the news of the abolition of the Fâtemite Khalifat in Egypt arrived at Baghdâd, and it was known there that the Khalif Al Mostadi Beamri'llah was prayed for throughout all the Egyptian provinces, public rejoicings, for several days, were made in that capital. Al Mostadi also dispatched 'Amâdo'ddîn Sandal, one of his ministers of state, with royal vests to Nûro'ddîn, Salâb'addîn, and those preachers who had mentioned his name in the mosques of Egypt. He also sent them magnificent presents, and ordered the black standards, used by the house of Al Abbâs, to be carried to Al Kâbirah, where his authority was now recognized, by people of all ranks and denominations. It is worthy of observation, that this revolution was brought about without any effusion of Moslem blood, or, as the Arab writers express it, without so much as two goats butting each other; though the Egyptians had been, for above two hundred years, intirely attached to the family of Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb. For the reflections made by Abu'lfeda upon this great event, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to that author himself, in the passage pointed out to them here*.

- a Not long before the suppression of his authority in Egypt, the Khalif Al 'Aded saw in a <sup>Al 'Aded's dream.</sup> dream a scorpion coming out of one of the mosques at Mesr, called the mosque of Al 'Aded; which made directly towards him, and pricked him. This so terrified him, that he instantly awaked in a great fright; and sent the next morning for the most eminent interpreters of dreams to be met with, in order to consult them. Upon hearing his dream, they unanimously agreed, that some person who should come out of that mosque would do him a mischief. He then commanded the governor of Mesr to send to him the person or persons residing in that temple; who thereupon brought before him a Sheikh of the Sûfis, whose name was Nojmo'ddin Al Khûbasnâni. The Khalif asked him whence he came, and why he inhabited that mosque? To which he gave such plain and simple answers, that Al 'Aded could not apprehend himself to be in any danger from him. He, therefore, dismissed him, with some handsome presents; and, at his departure, begged he would pray for him. However, Salâb'addîn, soon after aspiring at the Khalifat, and meditating the demolition of the Fâtemite power, consulted many of the Moslem sages upon the legality of the point he had in view; who, by their decisions, excited him to carry into execution his design. Amongst others that attended the Wazîr's levee, on this occasion, Sheikh Nojmo'ddin Al Khûbasnâni appeared; and expatiated so much upon the perfidious abandoned conduct of the Fâtemites, and represented in such strong colours the many mischiefs they had been the authors of, that he not a little contributed thereby to their downfall in Egypt. This, continue Abu'lfeda and Ebn Shohnah, was looked upon as a clear accomplishment of the prediction exhibited by the Khalif Al 'Aded's dream<sup>b</sup>.

- SALAH'ADDIN* being master of all Al 'Aded's treasures, which amounted to a prodigious sum, sent part of them to Nûro'ddin in Syria, and the rest he distributed amongst the troops; reserving not a single dinâr, according to the authors here referred to, for his own use. Not long after the Fâtemite Khalif's death, Salâb'addîn moved at the head of a large body of troops towards the frontiers of Syria, and at last sat down before Al Shawbec, a fortress of the Franks on the confines of Hejâz; but, upon Nûro'ddin's approach, he raised the siege, lest the reduction of this place should have opened a passage directly for that conqueror's numerous forces into Egypt. This was highly resented by Nûro'ddin; who from that time grew jealous of Salâb'addîn, and entertained a suspicion of his real attachment to him. Some writers intimate, that Salâb'addîn was apprehensive of being deserted by the Syrian officers of his army, as soon as their old master Nûro'ddin should appear; and that this induced him to abandon the siege of Al Shawbec, and retire into Egypt. But however that may be, Nûro'ddin was so incensed at this point of conduct, that he caused it to be given out, that he intended soon to undertake an expedition against Salâb'addîn with all the forces he could assemble. Upon the arrival of this news at Al Kâbirah, Salâb'addîn summoned all his great officers, and amongst the rest his father Ayûb, whom he had made his lord treasurer, to attend him in the palace. When they were come, he imparted to them the advice he had received of Nûro'ddin's intention to invade Egypt, and asked them, with no small concern, what course they would advise him to take? "If Nûro'ddin," said Takîo'ddin, "should dare to attack us, we will repel force by force." "By no means," replied the old crafty Ayûb; "if Nûro'ddin should do us the honour to pay us a visit here, "I would prostrate myself before him." Then directing his discourse to Salâb'addîn, "Son," said he, "write to our master Nûro'ddin without delay, and tell him, that if he will "be pleased to send any of his slaves with a towel to tie about your neck, in order to draw "you after him into Syria, you will follow him with the utmost alacrity to your sovereign's "court." The council then (I), that had been called on this occasion, broke up. Ayûb, however, waited upon Salâb'addîn in his own apartment, and addressed him in the following terms: "Be of good courage, son; if Nûro'ddin attempts to penetrate into Egypt, I "myself will head your forces against him. But, let us keep our counsel to ourselves. "For, though you shall not send him so much as a single sugar-cane, if he demand it, "you must not openly assert your independency on him. If this should be done, he will "lay aside all his other designs, and particularly the war he is now meditating against the "Franks, and attack you with his whole power; the consequence of which, as the issues "of war are uncertain, no man can foresee. Whereas, by pretending to persist in your "allegiance to him, you will gain time; and be thereby enabled, with the divine assistance,

(I) A certain author pretends, that Ayûb declared publicly at this council, in order to carry on the farce, that they were all Nûro'ddin's slaves; that no army was necessary to keep his son within the limits of his duty; and that he himself would cut off Salâb'addîn's head, if Nûro'ddin commanded him so to do (4).

Nûro'ddîn
takes 'Arkâ
from the Franks.

NûRO'DDÎN, being satisfied with Salâb'addîn's assurance of his fidelity to him, continued his military preparations, for a war with the Franks, in pursuance of the plan he had formed, with the utmost vigour. He dispatched his orders to Saif'eddîn Gâzi, the Sâbeb of Al Mawfel, his nephew, to join him with all the forces he could assemble, that he might be thereby enabled to enter upon action without delay. After the junction of Nûro'ddîn's troops and those of Al Mawfel, that conqueror advanced to 'Arkâ, a town with a pretty strong castle in the territory of Damascus, laid siege to it, and at last took it by storm, in the month of Al Moharram, the present year. 'Arkâ is adorned with many beautiful gardens, and a rivulet running by it; being, according to the eastern geographers here referred to, about 12 miles S. of Tripoli, 60 of Baalbec, and a parasang from the sea<sup>d</sup>.

The Katayans,
or Khatayans,
make an irruption into Khowârazm.

THE same year, the Katayans, Khatayans, or eastern Tartars, passed the Jibân, and made an irruption into Khowârazm. The news of this invasion being brought to Arslân Ebn Akfar, the Shâb of Khowârazm, he advanced at the head of all his forces to Amarwayb, in order to give them battle; but was there taken ill, and died. However, an Emîr, or general, of great note amongst the Khowârazmians, took upon him the command of the army, came up with the enemy, and engaged them; but was defeated, taken prisoner, and carried by the Katayans into Mawarâ'lnabr. As for the Shâb of Khowârazm himself, he was carried from Amarwayb, where he fell sick, to his capital, and there in a few days expired; being succeeded by Soltân Shâb Mahmûd, his younger son. This so incensed 'Alâo'ddîn Tacash, or Takash, his eldest son, who was then at Jondi, that he repaired directly to the king of Katay's court, and solicited his assistance; who thereupon sent an army under the conduct of Fûmâ, his general, to penetrate into Khowârazm, and place 'Alâo'ddîn Tacash upon the throne. Fûmâ moved to the frontiers of Khowârazm, without meeting with any obstruction in his march; of which Soltân Shâb Mahmûd and his mother having been informed, they immediately abandoned the kingdom of Khowârazm, and retired into Khcrâsân. This enabled 'Alâo'ddîn Tacash Shâb to ascend the throne of Khowârazm, without striking a stroke. It may not be improper to remark, that the country called Kitay, Katay, or Khatay, by the oriental writers, contained the northern provinces of China, and a great part of Tartary, to the north and north-west of it. The capital of this vast region was Cambalu, or Khân-balik, denominated by the present Chinese Pekin, Pe-king, and Shun-tein-fu, the metropolis of the whole empire, and the residence of the emperor himself; of which we shall have occasion to speak more largely, in a future part of this work<sup>e</sup>.

A body of Turks take Tripoli in Africa.

IN the 568th year of the Hejra, beginning August 23d, 1172, Karâkîsh, the Mamlûk, who had been one of Takio'ddîn Omar Ebn Shâbînshâb Ebn Ayûb's slaves, marched with a body of Turks out of Egypt to Tripoli in Africa, formed the siege of that city, and at last made himself master of it. He also reduced to his obedience several provinces, or districts, in that part of Africa, before the close of the campaign<sup>f</sup>.

Nûro'ddîn
leads an army
against the Soltân of Al
Rûm.

THIS year, Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki led an army against Kilij Arslân II. the son of Mas'ûd, the Seljukian Soltân of Al Rûm, penetrated into his dominions, and possessed himself of Mar'ash, Babnesâ, Marzabân, and Saywâs, or Sîwâs, without having sustained any considerable loss. Kilij Arslân finding himself not able to make head against the Atâbek's forces, and fearing to be driven even from his capital, sent an embassy to Nûro'ddîn, desiring peace. This Nûro'ddîn refused to grant him, unless he would restore Malatîa to Dhu'lnûn Ebn Al Rânesbmend, whom he had unjustly deprived of it. The restitution of Malatîa being by no means relished by Kilij Arslân, Nûro'ddîn proposed to him in lieu thereof the cession of Sîwâs to Dhu'lnûn. This proposal proving more agreeable to Kilij Arslân, he readily complied with it; upon which, Nûro'ddîn concluded a treaty of peace with him, and then returned into Syria. But, notwithstanding this treaty, after Nûro'ddîn's death, Kilij Arslân made an irruption into Dhu'lnûn Ebn Al Rânesbmend's territories, besieged Sîwâs with a body of troops that Dhu'lnûn could not oppose, and in fine expelled him from that place<sup>g</sup>.

besieges Al Ca-

THE same year, Salâh'addîn, having conciliated to himself the affections of the Egyptians, by his liberality, and the lenity of his administration, to a very wonderful degree, invaded the districts of Al Carac and Al Shawbec; sitting down before the former of those places.

- a But receiving advice, that Nûro'ddîn was advanced to Al Rakim, near Al Carac, in order to have an interview with him; he raised the siege of Al Carac, and retired with great precipitation towards the borders of Egypt. However, he sent Nûro'ddîn some very rich presents, and acquainted him with his father Ayûb's illness, and the danger he was in of losing Egypt, if that consummate statesman should die; which he assigned as a reason for his hasty retreat. This Nûro'ddîn thought fit to admit, though he was no stranger to the motive of Salâh'addîn's conduct. As for Ayûd Ebn Shâdi, his father, a man of an exceeding good character, famed for his wisdom and rare virtues, whose death was occasioned, or at least accelerated, by a fall from his horse, he died on the 20th of Dhu'lhajja, after he had languished in his palace a few days, in the year that we are now upon <sup>b</sup>.
- b THIS year, according to Khondemir, the mother of Mâlec Arslân Ebn Togrol, Soltân of the Seljuks of Irân, a princess of transcendent virtue, likewise died in the house of Ildighîz, the first Atâbek of Adherbijân; and that great man himself, of whom we shall give a more particular account in a proper place, followed her not long after. The Soltân, afflicted at two such great losses, fell sick of a languishing illness, which at last carried him off. Abu'l-feda intimates, that Karâkûsh the Mamlûk, who had been one of Takîo'ddîn's slaves, made himself master of Tripoli in Africa, the present year; but another writer expressly affirms, that one of Salâh'addîn's brothers, with a body of troops under his command, then reduced that place. We must beg leave to observe, that Salâh'addîn abandoned the siege of Al Carac at Nûro'ddîn's approach, because the reduction of that fortress, which must have been delivered into the Atâbek's hands, would have opened a passage for his troops into Egypt; Salâh'addîn, not without reason, suspecting that he had projected an expedition thither <sup>1</sup>.

The mother of
dies.

- THE following year, being the 569th of the Hejra, which commenced Aug. 12th, 1173, Nûro'ddîn Al Mâlec Al 'Adel Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki, the Sâheb of Al Shâm and Al Jazîra, or Syria and Mesopotamia, as well as of several other provinces, departed this life. He died, according to Abu'l-feda and Ebn Shohnab, on Wednesday, the eleventh of Shawâl, of a quincy, or squinancy, in the castle of Damascus. If Bohâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, however, may be credited, his death (K) happened on the 21st of that month. He was then upon the point of invading Egypt, in order to deprive Salâh'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb of the sovereignty of that kingdom; having appointed Saifo'ddîn Gâzi, his brother's son, to command the army destined to act against the Franks, whilst he undertook the Egyptian expedition. By his demise, therefore, Soltân Salâh'addîn was delivered from all apprehension of so formidable an enemy and competitor, and fixed upon the throne of Egypt. Nûro'ddîn was tall, of a comely majestic person, and a swarthy complexion. He had no whiskers, but only a small beard on the lower part of his chin. His dominions were very extensive; he having been prayed for not only in Syria, Mesopotamia, Al Yaman, when that country was subjugated by Tûrân Shâh Ebn Ayûb, and the two Harâms, or sacred cities, that is, Mecca and Medina, but likewise in Egypt. He passes amongst the Moslems, even at this day, not only for one of their greatest princes, but also for one of their saints. For, he acquired the highest reputation for his justice and probity; having united in his person piety and valour, qualities which seldom meet in the same subject. Ebn Shohnab has handed down to us the following eulogy of him, which was given him in his life-time, and confirmed after his death. "To an incomparable greatness of soul he had joined the most profound humiliation of heart before his lord; and exhibited to the view of his subjects, when performing his devotions in the mosque, one sanctuary within another." He spent much of the night frequently in prayer, and amidst his immense riches considered himself only as the depositary (L) of the public treasure; from whence he drew an exceeding small sum for his household expences, insomuch that his domestics not seldom complained of being in want of common necessities. Notwithstanding which, with respect to every thing regarding the public, he was liberal to a vast degree. He built several colleges for the disciples of the

(K) Abu'l Faraj differs from all the authors here mentioned, in this point; placing Nûro'ddîn's death on Wednesday, the fourteenth of Shawâl, the present year (5).

(L) In confirmation of what is here observed, we are told by Abu'l Faraj, that Nûro'ddîn's wife once complaining to him of her poverty, he gave her three work-houses, or rather public offices, in the city of Hems, which brought her in about twenty dinârs a year. But thinking this too small a matter, she demanded something more of him. Whereupon he said to her, "This is all that I can strictly and properly call my own. For, all the money in my hands belongs to the body of the Moslems. I am only their treasurer. I will not defraud them of any thing, nor will I for your sake enter into hell-fire (6)."

celebrated Imâms Abu Hanîfa and Al Shâfeî. He adopted himself the principles of the sect <sup>a</sup> of Abu Hanîfa; but without any tincture of bigotry, according to some of the best Moslem writers. He raised the walls of the cities of Damascus, Haleb, or Aleppo, Hems, Hamah, Shaizar, Baalbec, and others, which had been thrown down by the violent shocks of earthquakes, at his own expence. Some authors relate, that he was the first Moslem prince who established a chamber of justice against the violence offered the lower part of his subjects by the noblesse, and gave the name of Dar Al 'Adel, or the house of justice, to this commission. Nûro'ddîn having made Damascus his residence, and his court there being composed of many Emîrs, or commanders of his troops, who kept a vast number of servants; Shairacûb, Salâb'addîn's uncle, one of the principal of them, allowed those belonging to him a <sup>b</sup> good deal of liberty, who thereupon arrived at such a pitch of insolence, that complaints were carried to the Kâdi Kemâlo'ddîn of their behaviour every day, without his being able to apply any remedy, by reason of their masters powerful protection. The Soltân being informed of these disorders, and having a mind to bring back the Emîrs themselves to a sense of their duty; he ordered the commissioners, he had nominated on this occasion, to inquire with the utmost rigour into the injuries and wrongs suffered by the people from the <sup>c</sup> grandees, and to punish the guilty, with all possible severity, without any regard to the rank and quality of the offender, Shairacûb, perceiving that this tribunal was levelled particularly at him, ordered all his domestics upon pain of death to pay an exact obedience to the ordinances of the police issued by the Kâdi, that they might not be brought before this court of justice, of which he himself was even afraid. Such a prudent and equitable institution could not but indear the Soltân to his subjects, and render his memory in the highest degree grateful to them. This to a demonstration appeared from the following accident that happened some time after his death. A man of Damascus having received some outrage, for which he could meet with no redress, cried out, as if he had been imploring his assistance, "O Nûro'ddîn, where are you?" Salâb'addîn, who then reigned, having been apprized of the action, commanded immediate satisfaction to be made him, and every subject of complaint to be removed. But neither did this reparation, however ample it might seem, dry up the complainant's tears; who answered the persons demanding the cause of them in these terms: "I lament the loss of that great king, who was so just, and so <sup>d</sup> equitable; for, since his death we have not lived the life of men, but that of beasts." The above-mentioned colleges, erected at Damascus, Al Mawfel, Hems, Aleppo, and other places of note under his jurisdiction, he very richly endowed. He also built a large number of splendid mosques, and settled very considerable revenues upon them. Nor was he less conspicuous for his temperance, than for his justice, liberality, and solid piety. Ebn Shobnab has preserved a distich in Arabic, celebrating his praises, and importing, that he was valiant, submissive to his God, and constant, as well as fervent, in his devotions. The many hospitals he founded, for the reception both of the poor and the infirm, in several parts of his dominions, were monuments of his extensive charity. In fine, he seems to have wanted nothing requisite to the formation of one of the best, as well as one of the greatest, princes that ever lived, as he was adorned with many rare virtues, and void of <sup>e</sup> every vice, but a profession of the true religion. He was born, according to the Moslem historians, in the year of the Hejra 511<sup>k</sup>.

<sup>f</sup> Al Mâlec Al Sâleh Ismael Mahmûd, his son, then only eleven years old, was appointed to succeed him, in the sovereignty of his vast dominions; and the troops of Damascus, where he proposed to reside, accordingly took the oath of allegiance to him. Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb, having received advice of his accession, acknowledged himself his vassal, and ordered prayers in all the mosques within the Egyptian territories to be put up for him. Money likewise, notwithstanding his tender age, was coined in his name: but, being incapable of holding the reins of government, Al Emîr Shams'o'ddîn Mokammed, commonly called Ebn Al Mokaddem, had the management and direction of all public affairs. Al Mâlec Al Sâleh had not long ascended the throne, before Saïso'ddîn Gâzi Ebn Kotbo'ddîn Mawdûd Ebn Zenki, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel, invaded Al Fâzîra, or Mesopotamia, and possessed himself of every part of that large province. Al Mâlec Al Sâleh Ismael Mahmûd, the son of Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki, is considered by the oriental writers as the third Atâbek of Irâk<sup>l</sup>.

<sup>f</sup> SALAH'ADDIN YUSEF EBN AYUB, having been informed, that Nûro'ddîn was making the necessary preparations to attack him, and being desirous of having a place to retire to, in case he should be obliged to abandon the kingdom of Egypt, projected the conquest of

- a Nubia; and sent his brother Mâlec Shamsô'ddawla Tûrân Shâb, with a powerful army, thither for that purpose. But Tûrân Shâb, after he had penetrated into that barren and uncultivated tract, finding Nubia not worth conquering, on account of its sterility, returned with his forces into Egypt; and was ordered by Salâb'addîn to undertake an expedition into Al Yaman, which then groaned under the tyranny of Abd'alnabi, an Emîr that was descended from the antient inhabitants of that country. Tûrân Shâb having entered Al Yaman, without opposition, and brought Abd'alnabi to a general action, intirely defeated him, took him prisoner, and threw him into irons. He likewise made himself master of Zabîd, overthrew Yasîr, the Sâheb of 'Aden, and imprisoned him. He also carried the city of 'Aden itself by assault, plundered it, and reduced to the obedience of Salâb'addîn
- b about eighty castles, or fortresses, of considerable strength. Some authors pretend, that Salâb'addîn employed his brother Tûrân Shâb, a man of a turbulent and haughty disposition, with the troops under his command, that were extremely prone to mutiny and sedition, in this war, lest they should have meditated a revolt. The same writers observe, that Nûro'ddîn himself approved of this enterprize; though he soon after dispatched one Ebn Al Kaiser to Al Kâbirah, with an order to Salâb'addîn to send him a minute and particular account of all the treasures, and valuable curiosities, amassed by the Fâtemite Khalîfs. Salâb'addîn did not only comply with this order, but likewise made Nûro'ddîn a present of a vast sum of money; though he had before sent him many things (M), out of the imperial palace in Al Kâbirah, of almost inestimable value. To this he was excited by the conduct of the
- c Egyptians, who had conspired against him, and formed a design to restore the Fâtemite family to the Khalîfat of Egypt. But, the conspiracy being detected, Salâb'addîn caused all the persons concerned therein to be crucified; and amongst the rest Abd'alsamad, the secretary, Al Kâdi Al Owayres, and the first crier, as also 'Amâra Ebn Ali Al Yamani, the poet, who had written many elogies on the descendants of Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, of whose verses specimens have been preserved by some of the most celebrated Moslem historians. Bohâo'ddîn, one of Salâb'addîn's contemporaries, seems to intimate, that Tûrân Shâb, whom he represents as a person of transcendent merit, notwithstanding what has been given out to the contrary by another writer, entered Al Yaman, in the month of Rajeb, and put Abd'alnabi Ebn Mohdi, whom he accuses of rebellion, to the sword, after he had fallen into his
- d hands. Abu'lfeda relates, that Shamsô'ddawla Tûrân Shâb Ebn Ayûb acquired a large quantity of spoil at 'Aden, as well as all the immense riches collected by Abd'alnabi Ebn Mohdi, in this successful expedition <sup>m</sup>.

THE next year, being the 570th of the Hejra, which began Aug. 2d, 1174, Al Canz, or Al Cand, called by some authors Kenaz, or Kenazo'ddawla, the governor of Aswân, having assembled a considerable body of Blacks, rebelled against Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb, the Sâheb, or Soltân, of Egypt. The Egyptians flocking to him from all parts, he formed a powerful army, and advanced into the territory of Kûs. But here the rebels were met by Al Mâlec Al 'Adel Saifo'ddîn, Salâb'addîn's brother; who attacked them with so much bravery, that he put them to flight, killed a great number of them upon the spot, and so effectually dispersed them that they could never afterwards be rallied. This battle, which extinguished the rebellion, was fought, according to Bohâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, the 7th of Safar, the present year. We must not forget to remark, that Bohâo'ddîn denominates the

(M) The following list of these presents has been handed down to us by Al Makrizi. Five tents made of silk imbroidered with gold, having golden rings, clasps, and joints; some jewels of an unusual size; fifty vials of most exquisite balsam; forty vases, or vessels, of porcelain of Chinese workmanship, extremely beautiful to the eye; a large piece of odoriferous lignum aloes, with which the orientals perfume themselves; and two fragments of amber, one of which weighed thirty, and the other twenty pounds. Hence it appears, that the Egyptians, at this time, carried on a flourishing commerce both with the Indians and the Chinese; the former supplying them with odoriferous lignum aloes, from the peninsula of Comar, from whence the promontory called by the Europeans cape Comorin derives its name, and the latter with the most beautiful earthen ware. But that the Moslems trafficked with the Indians and the Chinese, three hundred years before the period that we are now upon, and that all these nations kept their ports open to one another, is most evident, from a piece written upon this very subject by Mohammed Al Sirâfi; whose native city Sirâf, upon the Persian gulph, was then the great emporium of the East, and the place to which the riches, that were the produce of those remote countries, at that time came. As for the aloes, or lignum aloes, above-mentioned, this was either brought to Egypt directly from the Indian ocean, by the way of the Red Sea; or else it was carried from the Persian gulph to the port of Al Kofr, a town about three days journey, through a frightful desert, from Kûs, a famous city of Al Sai'd, or Thebais, and conveyed from thence into the Lower Egypt by means of the Nile. The aforesaid presents, which were returned to Salâb'addîn, after Nûro'ddîn's death, were valued, according to Al Makrizi, at no less than 200,000 dinârs (7).

As for Al Canz, or Kenaz, himself, he fell upon the field of battle. Al Makrīzi calls him Habas Ebn Shādi, and tells us, that he took the city of Kūs; which seems to imply, that at first he met with good success. The Egyptians were excited to this revolt, which was easily suppressed, by the prospect of placing one of the late Khalif Al 'Aded's sons upon the Fātemite throne<sup>a</sup>.

The Franks
raise the siege of Alexandria.

THE same day that Al Canz was defeated by Salāb'addīn's troops in the territory of Kūs, if Bokāo'ddīn Ebn Sheddād may be depended upon, the Franks, under the command of William II. king of Sicily, raised the siege of Alexandria; abandoning their camp with so much precipitation, that they left all their baggage and military engines behind them. William, as this writer assures us, appeared off that place with a fleet of 600 sail, having 30,000 land forces on board. He carried on his attacks with great vigour and resolution for three days, but without effect. For, Salāb'addīn advancing with a formidable army to the relief of the town, the Franks did not think fit to wait for him; but, being struck with a sort of panic on his approach, immediately abandoned the siege, after they had sustained a very considerable loss. Al Makrīzi writes, that the Christians having been exceedingly harrassed by the sallies of the Moslem garrison, and lost several of their ships, either sunk or burnt, found themselves obliged to draw off. William of Tyre informs us, that this expedition, which he places in the 1173d year of Christ, or the 569th of the Moslem æra, continued only six days; and that it miscarried, through the ill conduct of the officers who commanded the Christian troops. It may not be amiss to observe, that some authors refer this expedition to the year of the Hejra 572<sup>o</sup>.

places in Syria.

THIS year, Shams'o'ddīn Ebn Al Dāya, who resided at Aleppo, invited Sa'do'ddīn Camosh Takīn and Al Mālec Al Sāleb Ismael Ebn Nūro'ddīn Mahmūd Ebn Zenki to that city. Soon after their arrival at Damascus there, Al Mālec Al Sāleb Ismael took upon himself the government of Aleppo, and fixed his residence in that place; but as he was incapable of conducting public affairs, by reason of his tender age, he not being above twelve years old, Sa'do'ddīn Camosh Takīn, his prime minister, ruled with an absolute sway. Being jealous of Shams'o'ddīn Ebn Al Dāya, Camosh Takīn ordered both him and his brothers to be put under an arrest. He also secured the persons of Ebn Al Khefāb, the prefect of Aleppo, and his brothers; which giving Al Mokaddem and the other officers of the troops at Damascus dreadful apprehensions of his power, they immediately wrote to Salāb'addīn, and begged that he would accept of the sovereignty of their city. This application was no sooner made, than Salāb'addīn posted away with the utmost celerity to Damascus, at the head of a chosen detachment of 700 horse. Upon his arrival there, he was received by the citizens with open arms, and instantly repaired to the house of his father Ayūb, named Al 'Akiki. However, the citadel for some time refused to surrender to him. But, having brought over Rihān, Al Mālec Al Sāleb's commandant there, he at last made himself master of the place, as well as of all the riches deposited in it. Having settled his affairs at Damascus, and appointed his brother Saif Al Islām Tagtakīn Ebn Ayūb to preside over the people of that city; on the first day of the former Jomāda, he began his march for Hems, and formed the siege of it, the eleventh of the same month. Having possessed himself of the town, he left a body of troops behind him to block up the castle, and advanced to Hamab; which, on the first of the latter Jomāda, opened its gates to him. Al Emīr 'Azzo'ddīn Jordīc, one of Nūro'ddīn's Mamlūks, or slaves, commanded at this time in the citadel. Him Salāb'addīn summoned to surrender; assuring him, that he had no other view in this expedition than to govern that and the neighbouring provinces as Al Mālec Al Sāleb's deputy, and that he was desirous of sending him with a letter to Aleppo. This so pleased Jordīc, that he took the oath of fidelity to Salāb'addīn, as Al Mālec Al Sāleb's deputy; and, having assigned the command of the castle of Hamab to his brother, set out for Aleppo, with the Soltān's letter. He had not been long there, when Camosh Takīn ordered him to be seized and thrown into prison; advice of which being received at Damascus, his brother, without hesitation, delivered up the citadel into Salāb'addīn's hands. The Soltān then marched with his army to Aleppo, and besieged that city. But the citizens, being intirely in Al Mālec Al Sāleb's interest (N), repulsed

(N) We are told by Abu'l Faraj, that Al Mālec Al Sāleb, now only twelve years old, finding himself pressed by Salāb'addīn, who had incamped on mount Jawshan, at a small distance from the city, mounted his horse, convoked the people, and addressed himself to them in the following terms. "You have all had ample experience of my father's love and affection for you, and cannot have forgot the rectitude and lenity of his administration."

- a Salâb'addîn in several attacks, and made a very vigorous defence. Camosb Takîn likewise hired Sinân, or Senân, the chief of the Ismaelians, or Bâtanists, to assassinate Salâb'addîn; who, having been excited thereto by a large sum of money, sent a party of the ruffians he usually employed on such occasions for that purpose to the Soltân's camp. But they perished in the attempt; having all been cut to pieces, if Abu'lfeda may be credited, upon the spot where they would have perpetrated this execrable fact. Another writer, however, relates, that an Ismaelian, or Bâtanist, attacked the Soltân, and wounded him, the following year; but adds, that he held fast the assassin 'till some of his guards came up, who presently dispatched him. Two others, according to this author, afterwards fell upon him, and met with the same fate. Salâb'addîn continued the siege of Aleppo till the first of Rajeb; but
- b being then informed, that the Franks had sat down before Hems, he immediately decamped, and reached Hamab, the eighth of the same month. From Hamab he pursued his march to Hems, with a resolution to fight the Franks; but they thought fit to raise the siege, and retire, at his approach. Being master of the town and district of Hems, the Soltân obliged the castle, which he was not able to reduce before, to submit to his arms, the 21st of Shabân. This conquest was followed by the surrender of Baalbec. The rapid progress of Salâb'addîn's arms alarming Al Mâlec Al Sâleh, he solicited succours of his kinsmen Saifo'd-dîn Gâzi, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel, and 'Amâdo'ddîn Zenki Ebn Mawdûd, the Sâheb of Senjâr; but the latter of these, with how good policy we shall not take upon us to determine, refused to assist him. This so incensed Saifo'ddîn, that he moved with a body of his troops towards
- c Senjâr, in order to lay siege to that place; and sent the rest of his forces, under the command of his brother 'Azzo'ddîn Mas'ûd Ebn Mawdûd Ebn Zenki and 'Azzo'ddîn Mahmûd, one of his best generals, on whom he had conferred the title of Selfandâz, to join the army at Aleppo, without delay. Salâb'addîn, knowing the issues of war to be uncertain, offered to cede Hems and Hamab to Al Mâlec Al Sâleh, and to govern Damascus only as his lieutenant, in order to pave the way to an accommodation. But these proposals being rejected, a bloody battle ensued on the eminences near Hamab; which terminated in the intire defeat of Al Mâlec Al Sâleh and his allies. Salâb'addîn, with the victory, gained an immense quantity of spoil, pursued the flying enemy to Aleppo, and shut them up there. This produced a peace; by which Salâb'addîn remained master of all Syria, or Al Shâm, except only the
- d city and territory of Aleppo, which were left to Al Mâlec Al Sâleh. After the conclusion of this treaty, the Soltân departed from Aleppo to Damascus; and would neither permit Al Mâlec Al Sâleh to be prayed for in the mosques of Syria, nor to have money coined with his name imprest upon it. He also wrested the castle of Bârîn, in the district of Hamab, from Fakbro'ddîn Mas'ûd Ebn Al Za'farâni, one of Nûro'ddîn's principal commanders, towards the close of Shawâl, the present year <sup>p</sup>.

- ABOUT the same time, a Persian prince, or general, as it should seem, took Tabrîz, or A Persian Tauris, denominated Tebris by Ptolemy, the capital of Adherbijân, according to Abu'l Faraj. prince takes Tauris.
- e Al Bahlawân, or the brave, the valiant, the hero, both by Abu'lfeda and Abu'l Faraj. Of this prince, who reigned over Arrân, Al Jêbâl, or the antient Parthia, and Adherbijân, we shall hereafter have occasion to speak. The Behlawân of the Arabs is equivalent to the Peblawân, or rather Pehelawân, as the word is for the most part at present pronounced in Persia, of the antient Persians, as we learn both from M. D'Herbelot and Dr. Hyde. That term in old Persic denotes a general, or prime minister, such as those who served the earliest Persian kings, in the capacity of generalissimo's of their armies, and directors of the state; who governed the kingdom, in almost an absolute manner, under their authority. Pehlawân, or Pehelawân, has also other significations, which the limits we have prescribed ourselves here will not permit us at present to touch upon <sup>q</sup>.

" administration. I am an orphan, destitute of friends, and depending intirely upon your protection. This perfidious and ungrateful wretch, on whom my father heaped so many favours, fearing neither God nor man, is now endeavouring to dispossess me of all my territories." After uttering these words, and others to the same effect, he burst out into tears; which made such an impression upon the people, that they likewise wept, and unanimously resolved to defend him to the last drop of blood. Sallying, therefore, out of the town, they advanced to the top of mount Jawshan without opposition; and attacked the Soltân's camp with so much bravery, that they forced him to retire (1).

The principal
events of the
year 571;

THE 571st year of the Hejra, commencing July 22d, 1175, proved likewise favourable a to the arms of Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb; who at this time not only meditated the subjugation of all the lesser Mohammedan states, but also the expulsion of the Franks out of Syria. He overthrew, with great slaughter, at Tel Al Soltân, the tenth of Shawâl, Saifo'd- dîn Gâzi Ebn Mawdûd Ebn Zenki, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel, the lord of Hisn Caifâ, a small fortress at the foot of mount Carmel, the Sâheb of Mâredîn, and several other princes, who had entered into a confederacy against him. The Soltân, however, did not gain this battle without considerable loss; his left wing having been broke by Saifo'ddîn's right, commanded by Modbaffero'ddîn Ebn Zino'ddîn, a very famous general, in the beginning of the action. But this repulse served only the more to animate Salâb'addîn's men; who, being rallied by the Soltân fell with such fury upon Zino'ddîn's corps, that they dispersed them, b and soon after drove all the enemies forces out of the field. Fakbro'ddîn Abd'almasîb and other persons of distinction, that were taken prisoners, Salâb'addîn released; and gave 'Azzo'ddîn Fakbrîshâb the Sâheb of Al Mawfel's tent. As for Saifo'ddîn himself, he fled to Al Mawfel with so much precipitation, that the Soltân could not come up with him. But thinking himself by no means safe there, he would have abandoned his capital to the victorious enemy, had he not been dissuaded from so pusillanimous a step by his Wazîr. In the mean time, Salâb'addîn having made himself master of the enemy's camp, and secured all the rich spoil found therein, advanced to Bezâga, laid siege to that place, and took it.
He then marched to Manbij, and, towards the close of Shawâl, formed the siege of that c place. Kotbo'ddîn Yenâl Ebn Hasan Al Manbijî, the Sâheb of the town and district of Man- bij, the Hierapolis of the antients, as has been already observed, was a most bitter enemy to Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb; who carried the city by assault, threw Kotbo'ddîn himself into irons, and thoroughly plundered his palace. However, he was afterwards released, went to Al Mawfel, and met there with a very favourable reception from Saifo'ddîn Gâzi Ebn Mawdûd Ebn Zenki; who treated him with uncommon marks of distinction, and made him a present of the city of Al Rakka upon the Euphrates. From Manbij Salâb'addîn directed his march to 'Azâz, or Azâza, a strong fortress situated in the most pleasant and delightful part of the territory of Aleppo, sat down before it, the 3d of Dhu'lkaada, and obliged it to capitulate, the 11th of the following month. Whilst the Soltân was carrying d on the siege of this place, an Ismaelian, or Bâtanist, rushed upon him unexpectedly, and wounded him in the head with a knife. Salâb'addîn immediately seized the fellow, notwithstanding he endeavoured to repeat his blows, and held him till some of his guards came up and killed him. This, however, did not discourage another of those ruffians from making a similar attempt upon the Soltân's life; but he met with the same fate. A third Bâtanist nevertheless soon after attacked Salâb'addîn, with an intent to assassinate him; who was likewise cut to pieces, without being able to execute his horrid design. These attempts not a little terrified the Soltân; who thereupon retired to his tent, and ordered his army to be purged of all unknown and suspected persons. After the surrender of 'Azâz, Salâb'addîn advanced at the head of his forces to the gates of Aleppo, invested that place, about the middle of Dhu'lhajja, and kept Al Mâlec Al Sâleb for some time shut up therein. Whilst he e lay incamped before the town, the daughter of Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki, his former master and benefactor, Al Mâlec Al Sâleb's sister, a little girl, was brought into his tent.
The Soltân took the child up in his arms, kissed her, and, after he had bestowed many valuable things upon her, asked her what he should farther give her? To which, having been before instructed for this purpose, she replied, "The fortress of 'Azâz?" Whereupon he evacuated that place, and departed from Aleppo, with his army, the 20th of Al Mohar- ram, the following year. Before the defeat at Tel Al Soltân, Saifo'ddîn had battered the walls of Senjâr, which belonged to his brother 'Amâdo'ddîn Zenki Ebn Mawdûd, who had submitted to Salâb'addîn, with his military engines, in order to make a breach in them, that he might be thereby enabled to storm the place; but without effect. The victory obtained f over the combined army of the allies by Salâb'addîn near Hamab, the 19th of Ramadân, the preceding year, had animated the garrison to defend the town with the utmost vigour, and forced Saifo'ddîn, much against his inclination, to conclude a peace with his brother. After which, he passed the Euphrates, and marched to Aleppo; where he had an interview with Al Mâlec Al Sâleb, the Sâheb of that city. Having incamped for some time at 'Ain Almo- bârcca, and joined the forces of Aleppo, he entered the citadel with a chosen detachment of horse, and was nobly entertained there, at the expence of Al Mâlec Al Sâleb. From Aleppo he moved to Tel Al Soltân, with the auxiliaries of Diyâr Becr and other provinces, that had reinforced his army; but was not able to cope with the victorious troops of Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb, the conqueror of Syria and Egypt. We must not forget to observe, that Sham- jô'ddîn Turân Shâb Ebn Ayûb, Salâb'addîn's brother, returned from Yaman, where he had resided

a resided some time, to Damascus, before the close of Râjeb, in the year that we are now upon <sup>r</sup>.

IN the 572d year of the Hejra, beginning July 11th, 1176, Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb, and of the after he had retired from Aleppo, made an irruption into the country of the Ismaelians; <sup>year 572.</sup> which, in the month of Al Moharram, he laid waste with fire and sword. He also besieged the castle of Masiât, a strong place seated on mount Al Sekkîn, on the coast of Syria, not far from Tripoli, in the very centre of the Ismaelian dominions. This fortress, if Ebn Shohnab may be credited, he took sword in hand, slew most of the inhabitants of Masiât, and levelled the walls and houses of it with the ground. Sinân, the chief or prince of the Ismaelians, finding himself not in a condition to make head against Salâb'addîn, sent to b Shahâbo'ddîn Al Hâremi, the Sâheb of Hamah, Salâb'addîn's uncle; begging he would intercede with the Soltân for him, and procure him a peace. Shahâbo'ddîn having asked pardon of Salâb'addîn, in Sinân's name, for the villainous attempts of his subjects upon the Soltân's life, without much difficulty, prevailed upon his nephew to conclude a treaty with the Ismaelian prince, and even to consider him in the light of an ally. After which, he resumed his march for Egypt; and, before the expiration of the present year, began to erect the famous wall that surrounded the cities of Mesr and Al Kâbirah, together with the castle, or fortress, on mount Al Mokattem. This wall, however, which, according to Ebn Shohnab, was either 29,000 or 29,300 cubits in circumference, he left unfinished at his death. He likewise founded the school, or college, near the sepulchre of the Imâm Al Shafêi, in the c city of Mesr, and ordered the hospital at Al Kâbirah to be built, this year, after his return to Egypt. Some authors relate, that a great number of rebels, consisting for the most part of the black people of Al Sa'id, assembled at this time near Kest, or Coptos, a very antient city of the Upper Egypt, under the command of one Ebn Abd'alkûab, who pretended to personate Dawd, the son of Al 'Adel, the last Fâtemite Kbalîf. But the rebel general was taken and cut off, the place of their rendezvous almost intirely destroyed, and no less than 3000 of the rebels hanged. Nay, we are told, that out of 100,000 rebels, that appeared in the field, 80,000 perished. Salâb'addîn reached Al Kâbirah, in the latter Rabî; and, before his departure from Syria, appointed his brother Shams'o'ddawla Tûrân Shâb Ebn Ayûb to preside over the people of Damascus. He also suppressed the tribute exacted of the pilgrims d going to Mecca by the Emîr of Mecca, Jodda, and 'Aidab, assigning him in lieu thereof yearly 2000 dinârs, besides a large quantity of wheat sent him from Egypt, the present year <sup>r</sup>.

AT this time, Soltân Togrol Ebn Arslân, reigned over the Seljûks in Irân, or rather the Per- Togrol Ebn fîan Irâk. He succeeded his father Arslân Ebn Togrol, who died the preceding year; after he had lived forty-three years, and swayed the Seljûkian scepter, about fifteen. Arslân was a prince not only valiant and generous, but also patient, and of so excellent a disposition, that he would not suffer any one to be spoken ill of in his presence. Nor did he ever treat any of his domestics with severity or contempt, being eminent for modesty and clemency. He never denied any thing to a man of good parts and address. He is said to have been nice in e his diet, and fond of dress. He had very rich vests, of every kind and colour, wrought with gold, such as no king before him ever wore. His conversation was familiar, and perfectly sincere. Togrol, this prince's son, governed his dominions happily enough, under the direction of his maternal uncle the valiant Mohammed, son of the Atâbek Ildighîz, and called Bablawân, or Pehelawân, Mohammed Ebn Ildegar by Abu'l Faraj. That historian makes him to have been the Sâheb of Al Jebâl, or Kûhestân, part of the Persian Irâk, Al Ray with its district, Esfahân, Arrân, and Adherbijân. In the beginning of this prince's reign, Badanjar attacked the province of Adherbijân; and Mohammed, the son of Togrol Ebn Mohammed, that of the Persian Irâk. But Mohammed Ebn Ildighîz, with his brother Kezel Arslân, marching against them at the head of a powerful army, soon obliged them to sue f for peace. Togrol Ebn Arslân has the appellation of Soltân Mogayâtho'ddîn Togrol assigned him by the author of the Lebtârikb. It may not be improper to remark, that at this time one Togrol presided over the Kara-its, a very potent Turkish or Tartarian tribe, of whom we have spoken above; and that, soon after his accession, the emperor of China sent an ambassador to congratulate him upon that event, who gave him the title of Unk, Onk,

is defeated by
the Franks.

THE following year, being the 573d of the Hejra, which commenced June 30th, 1177, Salâh'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb marched with a formidable army out of Egypt to the maritime parts of Palestine, in order to drive from thence the Franks. He arrived at 'Askalân with his numerous forces, if Abu'lfeda may be depended upon, the 24th of the former Jomâda; Al Bornas, or Arnold, who had been taken prisoner by Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki, and ransomed afterwards at Aleppo, being at this time, according to Bohâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, the principal commander of the Christian troops. The Soltân having posted himself at 'Askalân, or, if we chuse to follow the last mentioned author, at Al Ramla, sent out several detachments to ravage the adjacent country. The Franks taking advantage of the absence b of these detachments, by which the Moslem army was considerably weakened, fell upon the Soltân, then not expecting them, with such fury, that they gave him an intire defeat. However, they met at first with a pretty vigorous resistance; Abmed Ebn Takîo'ddîn Ebn Shâhînbâb charging them with so much bravery, that he slew a great number of them, and forced the rest to retire. But, returning soon to the charge, they broke the body he commanded, killed him upon the spot, and even penetrated almost to the post occupied by Salâh'addîn himself; which struck him with such terror, that he abandoned his camp to the Franks, and betook himself to a precipitate flight. Nay, with so much precipitation did the terrified Moslems fly, that, having no neighbouring garrisons to repair to, they traversed the vast desert between Palestine and Egypt in the utmost confusion, and scarce stopped c before they reached Al Kâbirah itself. The greatest part of the Egyptian army perished in the action and the pursuit. No water being to be met with in the above-mentioned desert, most of the beasts of burthen died of thirst, before the fugitives arrived on the confines of Egypt. As for the Soltân's detachments, sent out to forage and pillage the neighbouring districts, they were either cut to pieces or taken prisoners by the Franks. Amongst the prisoners was Al Fakîh Isa Al Arari, one of Salâh'addîn's most intimate friends; who was two years afterwards ransomed, by the Soltân, for 60,000 dinârs. 'Azzo'ddîn Ali Ebn Al Atbîr, in his Al Câmel, or universal history, relates, tha the saw a letter written by Salâh'addîn with his own hand to his brother Tûrân Shâb, the governor of Damascus, which contained a full and ample description of the aforesaid battle. Amongst other things the d Soltân therein says, "that he was more than once in the most imminent danger; and that "God, as he apprehended, had delivered him from thence, in order to reserve him for the "execution of some grand and most important design".

The Franks
besiege Hamah, but without effect.

THE Franks, elated with the complete victory they had gained, resolved to lay siege to Hamah. To this they were likewise farther excited by the absence of Salâh'addîn, who entered Al Kâbirah, about the middle of the latter Jomâda; by the few troops he had left with his brother Tûrân Shâb, the governor of Damascus, who was moreover of a very voluptuous and effeminate disposition; and by the infirmity of Shahâbo'ddîn Al Hâremî, Salâh'addîn's uncle and deputy at Hamah, who was at this time very ill in that city. Animated, therefore, by this seemingly favourable concurrence of circumstances, they formed e the siege of Hama; and made so vigorous an assault, that they were upon the point of carrying the place by storm. But they were at last repulsed, and beaten back to their camp, with incredible bravery, by the besieged. So that, after they had attacked that fortress four days, they thought fit to decamp, and move towards Hârem. It is worthy observation, that Shahâbo'ddîn Al Hâremî died the very day the Franks raised the siege; and that he survived his son, a very amiable and promising youth, no more than three days".

The situation
of Al Mâlec
affairs.

THE affairs of Al Mâlec Al Sâleh, who resided at Aleppo, were at this time in but an indifferent situation. He had thrown Camosh Takîn, his prime minister, into irons, for ruling with an absolute sway, and arrogating the supreme authority to himself. This minister having possessed himself of Hârem, a fortress and prefecture in the territory of Aleppo, the f garrison he had placed therein refused to deliver it up into Al Mâlec Al Sâleh's hands. They persisted in their refusal, when Camosh Takîn himself commanded them to evacuate the place. They chose to see him tortured, and even at last to expire under the tortures he suffered,

- a by Al Sâleb's order, rather than submit. The Franks receiving advice of this, after their repulse at Hamah, first invested Hârem, and then besieged it in form. Having pushed on the siege for the space of four months, and reduced the garrison to the last extremity; the town must have been obliged to surrender, had not Al Sâleb, by paying them a sum of money, prevailed upon the besiegers to conclude a treaty of peace with him, and retire. Bohâo'ddîn seems to intimate, that the Franks lay before Hârem from the latter Jomâda to the end of the month of Ramadân; and that the troops in garrison surrendered the place to Al Mâlec Al Sâleb, to avoid falling into the hands of the Franks. But he says nothing of any money received by the latter from the former on this occasion, though in that particular both Abu'lfeda and Ebn Shohnab agree. Be that as it will, after the departure of the
- b Franks, Al Mâlec Al Sâleb made Serkbac, one of his father's Mamlûks, or slaves, commandant there. This year, 'Adado'ddîn, the Khalîf Al Mostadi's Wazîr, came to a violent death; and Dbahîro'ddîn, a person of an excellent disposition, munificent, irreproachable in his deportment, esteemed and revered by all, was substituted in his room *.

THE next year, being the 574th year of the Hejra, which began June 19th, 1178, Tûrân Shâh desired of his brother Salâb'addîn the government of Baalbec; which had been conferred by the Soltân upon Shams'o'ddîn Mohammed Ebn Abd'almâlec, generally called Al Mokaddem, when he appointed Tûrân Shâh to preside over the people of Damascus. This Salâb'addîn could not refuse his brother, and therefore orders were immediately dispatched to Al Mokaddem to cede to Tûrân Shâh the city and territory of Baalbec. But Al Mokaddem, being pleased with his situation, would not admit Tûrân Shâh into the town. Hereupon a body of troops, by the Soltân's command, advanced to Baalbec, and besieged Al Mokaddem a considerable time in that city. However, an equivalent being at last allowed him for his former post, he delivered up the place to Tûrân Shâh; who, without any farther opposition, took possession of his predecessor's palace, and entered upon the province assigned him. This year, a grievous famine raged in Syria, and the neighbouring countries; which was followed by a dreadful pestilence, that swept away vast numbers of people. About the same time, Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb ordered his nephew Takîo'ddîn Omar Ebn Shâhînsâh to repair to Hamah, and his cousin Mohammed Shairacûb to Hems, to act in the quality of his lieutenants there. We must not omit observing, that Sâ'id Ebn Mohammed Ebn Sâ'id, commonly denominated Hîsbîs, a poet of great note, a specimen of whose excellent performances has been preserved by Ebn Shohnab, departed this life, if that author may be depended upon, before the close of the present year †.

- THE 575th year of the Hejra, which commenced June 8th, 1179, produced some memorable events that merit the attention of an historian. Soltân Salâb'addîn took by storm a fortress erected by the Franks, at the fords of Al Ajrân, near Bânyâs, or Bânîds, the Paneas of the antients. Kilij Arslân Ebn Mas'ûd, the Seljukian Soltân of Al Rûm, assembled a body of 20,000 horse, in order to besiege the castle of Ra'bân, then possessed by Shams'o'ddîn Ebn Al Mokaddem; which Kilij Arslân, for reasons that have not transpired, was extremely desirous of making himself master of. Takîo'ddîn Omar Ebn Shâhînsâh, having received advice of this intended irruption, advanced against him with only 1000 horse, came up with him, and put him to flight. The Seljuks of Al Rûm being thus routed by a handful of men, Takîo'ddîn could not forbear boasting, "that with one thousand men he had defeated twenty thousand;" whence it seems to appear, that he valued himself not a little upon this exploit. Having obtained permission of the Soltân, to change the government of Baalbec for that of Alexandria, he resigned the former of those posts to 'Azzo'ddîn Fakhr Shâh Ebn Shâhînsâh Ebn Ayûb, on whom it had been conferred by Salâb'addîn, in the month of Dhu'lkaada, this year. After which he went to Alexandria, and ruled the people there to the day of his death. The second of Dhu'lkaada, according to the most approved Moslem writers, died Al Mostadi Beamri'llab Abu Mohammed Al Hasan Ebn Al Mostanjed Bi'llab, the Khalîf of Baghdâd ‡.

- f THIS Khalîf, whose mother was an Armenian concubine, has been represented as an excellent prince both by the Arab and Persian historians. If they may be credited, he was generous, merciful, tho' at the same time a lover of justice, pious, an encourager of learned a men, and in fine of a most amiable disposition. It has been remarked of him, that he was the only Khalif, after Ali's eldest son, who bore the same name, called Al Hasan; and that this second Al Hasan perfectly imitated the virtues of the first, and particularly his liberality, distributing the immense treasures his father had amassed in a short time amongst his subjects. Towards the close of his reign, according to some of the eastern writers, Kotbo'ddin Kimar, his general, took so much upon him, that he disposed of many things without the participation of the Khalif. But Zebir Ebn Al Attâr, the Wazîr, whose councils Al Mostadi generally followed, not bearing to see his master treated in this manner, opposed to the utmost of his power all the enterprizes of Kimar. This so exasperated the general, who plainly saw that the Wazîr was the author of all the vigorous resolutions taken against him, b that he caused Ebn Al Attâr's house to be invested by the troops under his command. The Wazîr, however, having been apprized of Kimar's design, abandoned his house to the pillage of the soldiery, and took refuge in the Khalif's palace. The general, having missed his blow, ordered his men to advance towards the imperial palace; thinking by this means to get the Wazîr into his hands. But, as soon as Al Mostadi heard the noise of the troops attending Kimar, he shewed himself on one of the balconies of his palace, and addressed himself to the people, who had been excited to assemble tumultuously on this occasion, in the following terms. "You cannot but see, my children, the insolence of Kimar, and in c " what manner, going beyond the limits of the power I have given him, he incroaches " daily on my authority. For this reason, in order to punish him for this new outrage, I " give up to you intirely all his wealth and substance, reserving only to myself the chastise- " ment of his person." The people no sooner heard the words of the Khalif, than they d quitted the palace, and ran with one accord to Kimar's house. This obliged the troops to follow them, to prevent its being plundered. But, the mob increasing every hour, nothing could resist them. The general's house was therefore forced and pillaged; and he himself obliged to make a hole in the wall, to facilitate thereby his escape to Al Mawfel, where he soon after died. The Khalif Al Mostadi, notwithstanding his natural clemency, is said to have rendered justice to all his subjects; and to have so effectually patronized men of letters and genius, that the liberal arts and sciences flourished in his dominions through the whole course of his reign. Amongst other persons of erudition, who made no mean figure d when he sat upon upon the Mostem throne, may be ranked Al Samûel Ebn Al Yebûda Al Mogrebi, or Magrebi, Al Andalusi, a Jew, and Al Rahabi, an inhabitant of Damascus, two physicians of very considerable note. Samûel came out of Spain, with his father, young into the East. His father had only a smattering in philosophy, but he was well acquainted with several branches of it. He likewise acquired great knowledge in the mathematics; and wrote several books, held in good repute, upon philosophical, mathematical, and physical subjects. Travelling into the province of Adherbijân, he settled at Marâga; and served, in the capacity of physician, several of the princes denominated Pebelawân. He instructed his sons in the principles of physic, and they followed his method of practice with success. Afterwards embracing Islamism, he composed a book to detect the forgeries of the Jews, e and to point out the particular passages they had falsified and corrupted in the copies of their own law. He died at Marâga, about the year of the Hejra 570. Al Rahabi, a native of Rahaba upon the Euphrates, was a very skilful physician, and met with surprising success in his practice. He was of a chearful temper, applied himself to merchandise, and grew very rich. His sons followed his way of life, and bore an exceeding good character. He observed strictly the rules he had himself laid down for the preservation of health, and attained to extreme old age. A person once asked him, what benefit would accrue to any one from an observance of those rules? "It will, said he, bring him to the natural period f " of human life." "Why then, replied the other, do you now take so much care of your- " self, when you are almost arrived at that period?" "That I may enjoy the small remain- " der of my life, returned he, as much as possible, and not drop into my grave, for want " of adhering to a good regimen, before nature conducts me thither." He shewed the same regard for the preservation of his health 'till he was overtaken by death, in the beginning of the year 632. He left three sons behind him, two of whom proved physicians of transcendent merit. Being called in, with other physicians, to Nûro'ddin Mahmûd Ebn Zenki, when he was at the point of death, he reprimanded that prince for not sending for his physicians sooner, and for confining himself in so small and dark a room. He then told him, it would be proper for him to be carried into a more spacious and lighter apartment, and to lose a little blood. To which Nûro'ddin made answer: "Phlebotomy is an opera- g " tion that ought not to be performed on a man who has compleated the sixtieth year of " his age." Refusing, therefore, to be blooded, the physicians were obliged to have recourse

a recourse to other methods of cure; but without effect, as he not many days after expired. Al Mostadi was born, in the year of the Hejra 536; and succeeded his father Al Mostanjed Billah, in the 566th year of the Moslem æra. Though the lawful authority of the Mohammedan pontiffs was re-united in his person alone, by the abolition of the Khalifa erected by the Fâtemites in Egypt, yet he seems not to have been immediately concerned either in that or any other very memorable event. For which reason, probably, we find it intimated by Mirkhond, that nothing remarkable happened, during the whole course of his reign <sup>a</sup>.
